I SIT down with the first opportunity I have to write to you, and the Lord knows when I can find conveniency to send this letter; for all the morning I am plagued with impertinent visits, below any man of sense or honour to endure if it were any way avoidable. Dinners and afternoons and evenings are spent abroad in walking, to keep and avoid spleen as far as I can; so that, when I am not so good a correspondent as I could wish, you are not to quarrel and be governor; but to impute it to my situation, and to conclude infallibly that I have the same respect and kindness for you I ever professed to have, and shall ever preserve; because you will always merit the utmost that can be given you, especially if you go on to read and still further improve your mind and the talents that nature has given you. I am in much concern for poor Mobkin; and the more because I am sure you are so too. You ought to be as cheerful as you can, for both our sakes, and read pleasant things that will make you laugh, and not sit moping with your elbows on your knees on a little stool by the fire. It is most infallible that riding would do Mobkin more good than any other thing, provided fair days and warm clothes be provided: and so it would to you; and if you lose any skin, you know Job says, "skin for skin will a man give for his life." It is either Job or Satan says so, for ought you know. I am getting an ill head in this cursed town, for want of exercise. I wish I were to walk with you fifty times about your garden, and then drink your coffee. I was sitting last night with half a score of both sexes for an hour, and grew as weary as a dog. Everybody grows silly and disagreeable, or I grow monkish and splenetic; which is the same thing. Conversation is full of nothing but South Sea, and the ruin of the kingdom, and scarcity of money.

FROM SIR THOMAS HANMER.

Mildenhall, October 22, 1720.

SIR,—I received the favour of a letter from you about ten days since, at which time the duke of Grafton was at London; but as he was soon expected in the country, and is now actually returned, I thought it best, rather than write, to wait for an opportunity of speaking to him; and yesterday I went over to his house, on purpose to obey your commands. I found he was not a stranger to the subject of my errand; for he had all the particulars of the story very perfect, and told me my lord Arran had spoke to him concerning it.[b] I added my solicitations, backed with the reasons with which you had furnished me; and he was so kind to promise he would by this post write to the chief-justice; how explicitly or how pressingly I cannot say, because men in high posts are afraid of being positive in their answers; but I hope it will be in such a manner as will be effectual.

If the thing is done, it will be best that the means should be a secret by which it is brought about; and for this reason you will excuse me if I avoid putting my name to the outside of my letter, lest it should excite the curiosity of the post-office. If this affair ends to your satisfaction, I am glad it has proved to me a cause of hearing from you, and an occasion of assuring you that I am, sir, your very humble servant,

THO. HANMER.

TO ALEXANDER POPE, ESQ.

Dublin, January 10, 1721.

A THOUSAND things[c] have vexed me of late years, upon which I am determined to lay open my mind to you. I rather choose to appeal to you than to my lord chief-justice Whitshed, under the situation I am in. For I take this cause properly to lie before you: you are a much fitter judge of what concerns the credit of a writer, the injuries that are done him, and the reparations he ought to receive. Besides, I doubt whether the arguments I could suggest to prove my own innocence would be of much weight from the gentlemen of the long robe to those in furs; upon whose decision about the difference of style or sentiments I should be very unwilling to leave the merits of my cause.

[b] The prosecution of Waters.

[c] No piece of Swift contains more political knowledge, more love of the English constitution and rational liberty than appears in this celebrated letter.

Give me leave then to put you in mind (although you cannot easily forget it) that about ten weeks before the queen's death I left the town, upon occasion of that incurable breach among the great men at court, and went down to Berkshire, where you may remember that you gave me the favour of a visit. While I was in that retirement, I wrote a discourse,[a] which I thought might be useful in such a juncture of affairs, and sent it up to London; but upon some difference in opinion between me and a certain great minister [Bolingbroke] now abroad, the publishing of it was deferred so long that the queen died, and I recalled my copy, which hath been ever since in safe hands. In a few weeks after the loss of that excellent princess, I came to my station here; where I have continued ever since in the greatest privacy and utter ignorance of those events which are most commonly talked of in the world. I neither know the names nor number of the royal family which now reigns further than the Prayer-Book informs me. I cannot tell who is chancellor, who are secretaries, nor with what nations we are in peace or war. And this manner of life was not taken up out of any sort of affectation, but merely to avoid giving offence, and for fear of provoking party zeal.

I had indeed written some memorials of the four last years of the queen's reign, with some other informations, which I received as necessary materials to qualify me for doing something in an employment then designed me; but, as it was at the disposal of a person [duke of Kent] that had not the smallest share of steadiness or sincerity, I disdained to accept it.

These papers, at my few hours of health and leisure, I have been digesting into order by one sheet at a time,[b] for I dare not venture any further, lest the humour of searching and seizing papers should revive; not that I am in pain of any danger to myself, (for they contain nothing of present times or persons, upon which I shall never lose a thought while there is a cat or a spaniel in the house,) but to preserve them from being lost among messengers and clerks.

I have written in this kingdom a discourse to persuade the wretched people to wear their own manufactures, instead of those from England:[c] this treatise soon spread very fast, being agreeable to the sentiments of the whole nation, except of those gentlemen who had employments or were expectants. Upon which a person in great office here immediately took the alarm; he sent in haste for the chief-justice,[d] and informed him of a seditious, factious, and virulent pamphlet, lately published with a design of setting the two kingdoms at variance; directing, at the same time, that the printer should be prosecuted with the utmost rigour of law. The chief-justice had so quick an understanding that he resolved if possible to outdo his orders. The grand juries of the county and city were practised effectually with to represent the said pamphlet with all aggravating epithets, for which they had thanks sent them from England, and their presentments published for several weeks in all the newspapers. The printer was seized, and forced to give great bail. After his trial, the jury brought him in not guilty, although they had been culled with the utmost industry: the chief-justice sent them back nine times, and kept them eleven hours, until, being perfectly tired out, they were forced to leave the matter to the mercy of the judge, by what they call a special verdict. During the trial, the chief-justice, among other singularities, laid his hand on his breast, and protested solemnly that that author's design was to bring in the pretender; although there was not a single syllable of party in the whole treatise, and although it was known that the most eminent of those who professed his own principles publicly disallowed his proceedings. But the cause being so very odious and unpopular, the trial of the verdict was deferred from one term to another, until, upon the duke of Grafton, the lord-lieutenant's arrival, his grace, after mature advice and permission from England, was pleased to grant a noli prosequi.

This is the more remarkable because it is said that the man is no ill decider in common cases of property, where party is out of the question; but, when that intervenes, with ambition at heels to push it forward, it must needs confound any man of little spirit and low birth, who has no other endowment than that sort of knowledge which, however possessed in the highest degree, can possibly give no one good quality to the mind.

It is true I have been much concerned for several years past, upon account of the public, as well as for myself, to see how ill a taste for wit and sense prevails in the world, which politics, and South Sea, and party, and operas, and masquerades, have introduced. For, besides many insipid papers which the malice of some has entitled me to, there are many persons appearing to wish me well, and pretending to be judges of my style and manner, who have yet ascribed some writings to me of which any man of common sense and literature would be heartily ashamed. I cannot forbear instancing a treatise called "A Dedication upon Dedications," which many would have to be mine, although it be as empty, dry, and servile a composition, as I remember at any time to have read. But, above all, there is one circumstance which makes it impossible for me to have been author of a treatise wherein there are several pages containing a panegyric on king George, of whose character and person I am utterly ignorant, nor ever had once the curiosity to inquire into either, living at so great a distance as I do, and having long done with whatever can relate to public matters.

Indeed, I have formerly delivered my thoughts very freely, whether I was asked or not; but never affected to be a counsellor, to which I had no manner of call. I was humbled enough to see myself so far outdone by the earl of Oxford in my own trade as a scholar, and too good a courtier not to discover his contempt of those who would be men of importance out of their sphere. Besides, to say the truth, although I have known many great ministers ready enough to hear opinions, yet I have hardly seen one that would ever descend to take advice; and this pedantry arises from a maxim themselves do not believe at the same time they practise by it, that there is something profound in politics, which men of plain honest sense cannot arrive to.

I only wish my endeavours had succeeded better in the great point I had at heart, which was that of reconciling the ministers to each other. This might have been done, if others, who had more concern and more influence, would have acted their parts; and, if this had succeeded, the public interest both of church and state would not have been the worse, nor the Protestant succession endangered.

But whatever opportunities a constant attendance of four years might have given me for endeavouring to do good offices to particular persons, I deserve at least to find tolerable quarter from those of the other party, for many of which I was a constant advocate with the earl of Oxford; and for this I appeal to his lordship. He knows how often I pressed him in favour of Mr.

[a] "Some Free Thoughts on the Present State of Affairs."
[b] "The History of the Four Last Years of the Queen."
[c] "A Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufactures, 1721."
[d] Lord chief-justice Whitshed.

Addison, Mr. Congreve, Mr. Rowe, and Mr. Steele, although I freely confess that his lordship's kindness to them was altogether owing to his generous notions, and the esteem he had for their wit and parts, of which I could only pretend to be a remembrancer. For I can never forget the answer he gave to the late lord Halifax, who, upon the first change of the ministry, interceded with him to spare Mr. Congreve; it was by repeating these two lines of Virgil:—

> "Non obtusa adeo gestamus pectora Pœni, > Nec tam aversus equos Tyriâ Sol jungit ab urbe."

> "Our hearts are not so cold, nor flames the fire > Of Sol so distant from the ra e of Tyro."—DRYDEN.

Pursuant to which, he always treated Mr. Congreve with the greatest personal civilities, assuring him of his constant favour and protection, adding that he would study to do something better for him.

I remember it was in those times a usual subject of raillery towards me among the ministers that I never came to them without a Whig in my sleeve: which I do not say with any view toward making my court; for the new principles fixed to those of that denomination I did then, and do now, from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure, as wholly degenerate from their predecessors. I have conversed in some freedom with more ministers of state of all parties than usually happens to men of my level; and I confess, in their capacity as ministers, I look upon them as a race of people whose acquaintance no man would court, otherwise than upon the score of vanity or ambition. The first quickly wears off, (and is the vice of low minds, for a man of spirit is too proud to be vain,) and the other was not my case. Besides, having never received more than one small favour, I was under no necessity of being a slave to men in power, but chose my friends by their personal merit, without examining how far their notions agreed with the politics then in vogue. I frequently conversed with Mr. Addison, and the others I named, (except Mr. Steele,) during all my lord Oxford's ministry: and Mr. Addison's friendship to me continued inviolable, with as much kindness as when we used to meet at my lord Somers' or Halifax', who were leaders of the opposite party.

I would infer from all this that it is with great injustice I have these many years been pelted by your pamphleteers, merely upon account of some regard which the queen's last ministers were pleased to have for me: and yet in my conscience I think I am a partaker in every ill design they had against the Protestant succession or the liberties and religion of their country; and can say with Cicero, "that I should be proud to be included with them in all their actions, tanquam in equo Trojano." But, if I have never discovered by my words, writings, or actions, any party virulence or dangerous designs against the present powers; if my friendship and conversation were equally shown among those who liked or disapproved the proceedings then at court, and that I was known to be a common friend of all deserving persons of the latter sort when they were in distress; I cannot but think it hard that I am not suffered to run quietly among the common herd of people, whose opinions unfortunately differ from those which lead to favour and preferment.

I ought to let you know that the thing we called a Whig in England is a creature altogether different from those of the same denomination here; at least it was so during the reign of her late majesty. Whether those on your side have changed or not, it has not been my business to inquire. I remember my excellent friend Mr. Addison, when he first came over hither secretary to the earl of Wharton, then lord-lieutenant, was extremely offended at the conduct and discourse of the chief managers here: he told me they were a sort of people who seemed to think that the principles of a Whig consisted in nothing else but damning the church, reviling the clergy, abetting the dissenters, and speaking contemptibly of revealed religion.

I was discoursing some years ago with a certain minister about that Whiggish or fanatical genius so prevalent among the English of this kingdom: his lordship accounted for it by that number of Cromwell's soldiers, adventurers established here, who were all of the sourest leaven and the meanest birth, and whose posterity are now in possession of their lands and their principles. However, it must be confessed that of late some people in this country are grown weary of quarrelling, because interest, the great motive of quarrelling is at an end; for it is hardly worth contending wh. shall be an exciseman, a country vicar, a crier in t. courts, or an under-clerk.

You will perhaps be inclined to think that a person so ill treated as I have been must at some time or other have discovered very dangerous opinions in government; in answer to which, I will tell you what my political principles were in the time of her late glorious majesty, which I never contradicted by any action, writing, or discourse.

First, I always declared myself against a popish successor to the crown, whatever title he might have by the proximity of blood: neither did I ever regard the right line, except upon two accounts; first, as it was established by law; and, secondly, as it has much weight in the opinions of the people. For necessity may abolish any law, but cannot alter the sentiments of the vulgar; right of inheritance being perhaps the most popular of all topics; and therefore in great changes, when that is broke, there will remain much heart-burning and discontent among the meaner people, which (under a weak prince and corrupt administration) may have the worst consequences upon the peace of any state.

As to what is called a revolution principle, my opinion was this: that whenever those evils which usually attend and follow a violent change of government were not in probability so pernicious as the grievances we suffer under present power, then the public good will justify such a revolution; and this I took to have been the case in the prince of Orange's expedition: although, in the consequence, it produced some very bad effects, which are likely to stick long enough by us.

I had likewise in those days a mortal antipathy against standing armies in times of peace; because I always took standing armies to be only servants hired by the master of the family for keeping his own children in slavery; and because I conceived that a prince who could not think himself secure without mercenary troops, must needs have a separate interest from that of his subjects. Although I am not ignorant of those artificial necessities which a corrupted ministry can create for keeping up forces to support a faction against the public interest.

As to parliaments, I adored the wisdom of that Gothic institution which made them annual, and I was confident our liberty could never be placed upon a firm foundation until that ancient law were restored among us. For who sees not that, while such assemblies are permitted to have a longer duration, there grows up a commerce of corruption between the ministry and the deputies, wherein they both find their accounts, to the manifest danger of liberty; which traffic would never answer the design nor expense if parliaments met once a-year.

I ever abominated that scheme of politics (now about thirty years old) of setting up a moneyed interest in opposition to the landed. For I conceived there could not be a truer maxim in our government than this, that the possessors of the soil are the best judges of what is for the advantage of the kingdom. If others had thought the same way, funds of credit and South-Sea projects would never have been felt nor heard of.

I could never discover the necessity of suspending any law upon which the liberty of the most innocent persons depended: neither do I think this practice has made the taste of arbitrary power so agreeable as that we should desire to see it repeated. Every rebellion subdued and plot discovered contribute to the firmer establishment of the prince. In the latter case, the knot of conspirators is entirely broken, and they are to begin their work anew under a thousand disadvantages; so that those diligent inquiries into remote and problematical guilt, with a new power of enforcing them by chains and dungeons to every person whose face a minister thinks fit to dislike, are not only opposite to that maxim which declares it better that ten guilty men should escape than one innocent suffer, but likewise leave a gate wide open to the whole tribe of informers, the most accursed, and prostitute, and abandoned race that God ever permitted to plague mankind.

It is true the Romans had a custom of choosing a dictator, during whose administration the power of other magistrates was suspended; but this was done upon the greatest emergencies; a war near their doors, or some civil dissension; for armies must be governed by arbitrary power. But when the virtue of that commonwealth give place to luxury and ambition, this very office of dictator became perpetual in the persons of the Cæsars and their successors, the most infamous tyrants that have anywhere appeared in story.

These are some of the sentiments I had relating to public affairs while I was in the world; what they are at present is of little importance either to that or myself; neither can I truly say I have any at all, or if I had, I dare not venture to publish them; for, however orthodox they may be while I am now writing, they may become criminal enough to bring me into trouble before Midsummer. And indeed I have often wished for some time past that a political catechism might be published by authority four times a-year, in order to instruct us how we are to speak, and write, and act during the current quarter. I have by experience felt the want of such an instructor: for, intending to make my court to some people on the prevailing side, by advancing certain old Whiggish principles, which it seems had been exploded about a month before, I have passed for a disaffected person. I am not ignorant how idle a thing it is for a man in obscurity to attempt defending his reputation as a writer, while the spirit of faction has so universally possessed the minds of men that they are not at leisure to attend to anything else. They will just give themselves time to libel and accuse me, but cannot spare a minute to hear my defence. So, in a plot-discovering age, I have often known an innocent man seized and imprisoned, and forced to lie several months in chains, while the ministers were not at leisure to hear his petition until they had prosecuted and hanged the number they proposed.

All I can reasonably hope for by this letter is to convince my friends and others who are pleased to wish me well, that I have neither been so ill a subject nor so stupid an author as I have been represented by the virulence of libellers, whose malice has taken the same train in both, by fathering dangerous principles in government upon me, which I never maintained, and insipid productions which I am not capable of writing. For, however I may have been soured by personal ill-treatment, or by melancholy prospects for the public, I am too much a politician to expose my own safety by offensive words.[a] And if my genius and spirit be sunk by increasing years, I have at least discretion enough left not to mistake the measure of my own abilities by attempting subjects where those talents are necessary, which perhaps I may have lost with my youth.

FROM SIR CONSTANTINE PHIPPS.

Ormond-street, January 14, 1721.

SIR,—Having been a little indisposed, I went at Christmas into the country, which prevented me from sooner acknowledging the favour of your letter. As to Waters's[a] case, I was informed of it; and the last term I spoke to Mr. Attorney-general [sir Robert Raymond] about it; but he told me, he could not grant a writ of error in a criminal case without direction from the king; so that Waters is not likely to have much relief from hence, and therefore I am glad you have some hopes it will drop in Ireland. I think the chief-justice [Whitshed] should have that regard to his own reputation to let it go off so; for I believe the oldest man alive, or any law-book, cannot give any instance of such a proceeding. I was informed who was aimed at by the prosecution, which made me very zealous in it; which I shall be in everything wherein I can be serviceable to that gentleman, for whom nobody has a greater esteem than your most faithful humble servant,

CONSTANTINE PHIPPS.

FROM MR. PRIOR.

Westminster, February 28, 1721.

DEAR SIR,—If I am to chide you for not writing to me, or beg your pardon that I have not written to you, is a question, for our correspondence has been so long interrupted that I swear I do not know which of us wrote last. In all cases I assure you of my continual friendship and kindest remembrance of you; and with great pleasure expect the same from you. I have been ill this winter. Age, I find, comes on; and the cough does not diminish.—

Non sum qualis eram bonæ
Sub regno Cynaræ—Pass for that.

I am tired with politics, and lost in the South Sea. The roaring of the waves and the madness of the people were justly put together. I can send you no sort of news that holds either connexion or sense. It is all wilder than St. Anthony's dream; and the bagatelle is more solid than anything that has been endeavoured here this year. Our old friend Oxford is not well, and continues in Herefordshire. John of Bucks[b] died last night, and Coningsby[c] was sent last night to the Tower. I frequently drink your health with lord Harley, who is always the same good man, and grows daily more beloved as more universally known. I do so too with our honest good-natured friend Ford, whom I love for many good reasons, and particularly for that he loves you.

As to the subscriptions, in which I have given you a great deal of trouble already to make the rest of that

[a] Swift, in one sentence only of his admirable "Sentiments of a Church-of-England Man," demolished the slavish and absurd doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance. "Many of the clergy," says he, "and other learned men, mistook the object to which passive obedience was due. By the supreme magistrate is properly understood the legislative power, which in all governments must be absolute and unlimited. But the word magistrate seeming to denote a single person, and to express the executive power, it came to pass, that the obedience due to the legislature was, for want of knowing or considering this easy distinction, misapplied to the administration."—DR. WARTON.

[a] Dr Swift's printer; who was prosecuted for printing "A Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufactures," written in 1720. The dean, in the preceding letter to Pope, says, that "the jury which tried him had been culled with the utmost industry; but that, notwithstanding, they brought him in not guilty: that Whitshed, the judge, sent them out nine times and kept them eleven hours; till, being tired out, they were forced to leave the matter to the mercy of the judge by a special verdict. The duke of Grafton, lord-lieutenant, soon after, upon mature advice, and permission from England, granted a noli prosequi."

trouble less, I desire you to send the enclosed letter to Mr. Hyde that he may raze out the names of those gentlemen who have taken out their books, and take what convenient care he can of the remaining books. And as to the pecuniary part, I find no better way than that you will remit it, as you did the former sum, by bill of exchange. Mr. Ford likewise judges this the best and securest method.

How do you do as to your health? Are we to see you this summer? Answer me these questions. Give my service to all friends, and believe me to be ever, with great truth and esteem, dear sir, yours,

MATTHEW PRIOR.

FROM MR. PRIOR.

Westminster, April 25, 1721.

DEAR SIR,—I know very well that you can write a good letter if you have a mind to it; but that is not the question. A letter from you sometimes is what I desire. Reserve your tropes and periods for those you love less; and let me hear how you do, in whatever humour you are; whether lending your money to the butchers, protecting the weavers, treating the women, or construing propria quæ maribus to the country curate. You and I are so established authors that we may write what we will without fear of censure; and if we have not lived long enough to prefer the bagatelle to anything else, we deserved to have had our brains knocked out ten years ago.

I have received the money punctually of Mr. Dan. Hayes, have his receipt, and hereby return you all the thanks that your friendship in that affair ought to claim, and your generosity does contemn. There is one turn for you: good.

The man you mentioned in your last [the earl of Oxford] has been in the country these two years, very ill in his health, and has not for many months been out of his chamber; yet what you observe of him is so true that his sickness is all counted for policy, that he will not come up till the public distractions force somebody or other (whom God knows) who will oblige somebody else to send for him in open triumph, and set him in statu quo prius. That, in the mean time, he has foreseen all that has happened; checkmated all the ministry; and to divert himself at his leisure hours, he has laid all those lime twigs for his neighbour Coningsby that keep that precious bird in the cage, out of which himself slipped so cunningly and easily.

Things, and the way of men's judging them, vary so much here that it is impossible to give you any just account of some of our friends' actions. Roffen[a] is more than suspected to have given up his party, as Sancho did his subjects, for so much a-head, l'un portant l'autre. His cause, therefore, which is something originally like that of Lutrin, is opposed or neglected by his ancient friends, and openly sustained by the ministry. He cannot be lower in the opinion of most men than he is; and I wish our friend Harcourt were higher than he is.

Our young Harley's vice is no more covetousness than plainness of speech is that of his cousin Tom. His lordship is really amabilis; and lady Harriette, adoranda.

I tell you no news, but that the whole is a complication of mistakes in policy, and of knavery in the execution of it: of the ministers I speak, for the most part as well ecclesiastical as civil. This is all the truth I can tell you, except one, which I am sure you receive very kindly, that I am ever your friend and humble servant, MATTHEW PRIOR.

Friend Shelton, commonly called Dear Dick, is with me. We drink your health. Adieu.

[a] Dr. Atterbury, bishop of Rochester.

TO [STELLA] MRS. JOHNSON.[a]

Deanery House, Sunday morning, April 30, 1721.

JACK GRATTAN said nothing to me of it till last night; it is none of my fault: how did I know but you were to dine abroad? You should have sent your messenger sooner; yes, I think the dinner you provided for yourselves may do well enough here, but pray send it soon. I wish you would give a body more early warning; but you must blame yourselves. Delany says he will come in the evening; and, for aught I know, Sheridan may be here at dinner: which of you was it that undertook this frolic? Your letter hardly explained your meaning, but at last I found it. Pray do not serve me these tricks often. You may be sure if there be a good bottle you shall have it. I am sure I never refused you, and therefore that reflection might have been spared. Pray be more positive in your answer to this.

Margoose[b] and not Mergoose: it is spelt with an a, simpleton.

No, I am pretty well after my walk. I am glad the archdeacon [Walls] got home safe, and I hope you took care of him. It was his own fault; how could I know where he was? and he could easily have overtaken me; for I walked softly on purpose; I told Delany I would.

TO THE REV. MR. WALLIS.

Dublin, May 18, 1721.

SIR,—I had your letter, and the copy of the bishop's circular enclosed, for which I thank you; and yet I will not pretend to know anything of it, and hope you have not told anybody what you did. I should be glad enough to be at the visitation, not out of any love to the business or the person, but to do my part in preventing any mischief. But in truth my health will not suffer it; and you, who are to be my proxy, may safely give it upon your veracity. I am confident the bishop would not be dissatisfied with wanting my company, and yet he may give himself airs when he finds I am not there. I now employ myself in getting you a companion to cure your spleen. I am your faithful humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE BISHOP OF MEATH.[c]

July 5, 1721.

MY LORD,—I have received an account of your lordship's refusing to admit my proxy at your visitation, with several circumstances of personal reflections on myself, although my proxy attested my want of health; to confirm which, and to lay before you the justice and Christianity of your proceeding, above a hundred persons of quality and distinction can witness that, since Friday the 26th of May, I have been tormented with an ague, in as violent a manner as possible, which still continues, and forces me to make use of another hand in writing to you. At the same time I must be plain to tell you that if this accident had not happened, I should have used all endeavours to avoid your visitation, upon the public promise I made you three years ago, and the motives which occasioned it; because I was unwilling to hear any more very injurious treatment and appellations given to my brethren or myself; and by the grace of God I am still determined to absent myself on the like occasion, as far as I can possibly be dispensed with by any law, while your lordship is in that diocese, and I a member of it: in which resolution I could not conceive but your lordship would be easy; because, although my presence might possibly contribute to your real (at least future) interest, I was sure it could not to your present satisfaction.

[a] Indorsed by Mrs Johnson "An answer to no letter."
[b] Chateau Margoux, a sort of claret so called.
[c] Dr. Evans

If I had had the happiness to have been acquainted with any one clergyman in the diocese of your lordship's principles, I should have desired him to represent me, with hopes of better success: but I wish you would sometimes think it convenient to distinguish men as well as principles; and not to look upon every person who happens to owe you canonical obedience as if ——.[a]

I have the honour to be ordinary over a considerable number of as eminent divines as any in this kingdom, who owe me the same obedience as I owe to your lordship, and are equally bound to attend my visitation; yet neither I, nor any of my predecessors, to my knowledge, did ever refuse a regular proxy.

I am only sorry that you, who are of a country famed for good nature, have found a way to unite the hasty passion of your own countrymen[b] with the long, sedate resentment of a Spaniard: but I have an honourable hope that this proceeding has been more owing to party than complexion. I am, my lord, your lordship's most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO VANESSA.

Gallstown, near Kinnegad, July 5, 1721.

It was not convenient, hardly possible, to write to you before now, though I had a more than ordinary desire to do it, considering the disposition I found you in last; though I hope I left you in a better. I must here beg you to take more care of your health by company and exercise, or else the spleen will get the better of you, than which there is not a more foolish or troublesome disease, and what you have no pretences to in the world, if all the advantages of life can be any defence against it. Cadenus ——— assures me he continues to esteem, and love, and value you above all things, and so will do to the end of his life; but at the same time entreats that you would not make yourself or him unhappy by imaginations. The wisest men of all ages have thought it the best course to seize the minutes as they fly, and to make every innocent action an amusement. If you knew how I struggle for a little health, what uneasiness I am at in riding and walking, and refraining from everything agreeable to my taste, you would think it but a small thing to take a coach now and then, and to converse with fools or impertinents to avoid spleen and sickness. Without health you will lose all desire of drinking coffee, and be so low as to have no spirits. Pray write to me cheerfully, without complaints or expostulations, or else Cadenus shall know it, and punish you. What is this world without being as easy in it as prudence and fortune can make us? I find it every day more silly and insignificant, and I conform myself to it for my own ease. I am here as deeply employed in other folks' plantations and ditches as if they were my own concern; and think of my absent friends with delight, and hopes of seeing them happy, and of being happy with them. Shall you, who have so much honour and good sense, act otherwise to make Cad——— and yourself miserable? Settle your affairs, and quit this scoundrel island, and things will be as you desire. I can say no more, being called away. Mais soyez assurée que jamais personne au monde n'a été aimée, estimée, adorée par votre ami que vous. I have drunk no coffee since I left you, nor intend it till I see you again: there is none worth drinking but yours if myself may be the judge. Adieu.

[a] "He was your footman," may be implied, or left to his lordship's own conjecture.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

I NEVER was so angry in all my life as I was with you last week, on the receipt of your letter of the 19th of June. The extreme pleasure it gave me takes away all the excuses which I had invented for your long neglect. I design to return my humble thanks to those men of eminent gratitude and integrity, the weavers and the judges, and earnestly to entreat them, instead of tossing you in the person of your proxy, who had need to have iron ribs to endure all the drubbings you will procure him, to toss you in your proper person, the next time you offend, by going about to talk sense or to do good to the rabble. Is it possible that one of your age and profession should be ignorant that this monstrous beast has passions to be moved, but no reason to be appealed to; and that plain truth will influence half a score men at most in a nation or an age, while mystery will lead millions by the nose?

Dear Jonathan, since you cannot resolve to write as you preach, what public authority allows, what councils and senates have decided to be orthodox, instead of what private opinion suggests, leave off instructing the citizens of Dublin. Believe me there is more pleasure, and more merit too, in cultivating friendship than in taking care of the state. Fools and knaves are generally best fitted for the last; and none but men of sense and virtue are capable of the other. How comes it then to pass that you who have sense, though you have wit, and virtue, though you have kept bad company in your time, should be surprised that I continue to write to you, and expect to hear from you, after seven years absence?

Anni prædantur euntes, say you: and time will lop off my luxuriant branches: perhaps it will be so. But I have put the pruning-hook into a hand which works hard to leave the other as little to do of that kind as may be. Some superfluous twigs are every day cut; and as they lessen in number, the bough which bears the golden fruit of friendship shoots, swells, and spreads.

Our friend told you what he heard, and what was commonly said, when he told you that I had taken the fancy of growing rich. If I could have resolved to think two minutes a-day about stocks, to flatter law half an hour a-week, or to have any obligation to people I neither loved nor valued, certain it is that I might have gained immensely. But not caring to follow the many bright examples of these kinds which France furnished, and which England sent us over, I turned the little money I had of my own, without being let into any secret, very negligently; and if I have secured enough to content me, it is because I was soon contented. I am sorry to hear you confess that the love of money has got into your head. Take care, or it will, ere long, sink into your heart, the proper seat of passions. Plato, whom you cite, looked upon riches, and the other advantages of fortune, to be desirable; but he declared, as you have read in Diogenes Laërtius, Ea etsi non affluerint, nihilominus tamen beatum fore sapientem. You may think it perhaps hard to reconcile his two journeys into Sicily with this maxim, especially since he got fourscore talents of the tyrant. But I can assure you that he went to the elder Dionysius only to buy books, and to the younger only to borrow a piece of ground, and a number of men, women, and children, to try his Utopia. Aristippus was in Sicily at the same time; and there passed some Billingsgate between these reverend persons. This philosopher had a much stronger fancy to grow rich than Plato; he flattered, he cracked jests, and danced over a stick to get some of the Sicilian gold: but still even he took care sibi res, non se rebus submittere. And I remember, with great edification, how he reproved one of his cate-chumens, who blushed, and shrunk back, when his master showed him the way to the bawdy-house. Non ingredi turpe est, sed egredi non posse turpe est. Th conclusion of all is this; un honnête homme ought t have cent mille livres de rente, if you please; but a wise man will be happy with the hundredth part. Let us no refuse riches when they offer themselves; but let u give them no room in our heads or our hearts. Let u enjoy wealth without suffering it to become necessar to us. And, to finish with one of Seneca's quaint sen tences: "Let us place it so, that fortune may take i without tearing it from us." The passage you men tion does follow that which I quoted to you, and th advice is good. Solon thought so; nay, he went fur ther; and you remember the reason he gave for sitting in the council of Pisistratus, whom he ha' done his utmost to oppose, and who, by the way, proved a very good prince. But the epistle is not writ by Cicero, as you seem to think. It is, if I mistake not, an epistle of Dolabella to him. Cato, you say, would not be of the same mind. Cato is a most venerable name, and Dolabella was but a scoundrel with wit and valour; and yet there is better sense, nay, there is more virtue in what Dolabella advises, than in the conduct o Cato. I must own my weakness to you. This Cat so sung by Lucan in every page, an l so much better sung by Virgil in half a line, strikes me with no great respect. When I see him painted in all the glorious colours which eloquence furnishes, I call to mind that image of him which Tully gives in one of his letters to Atticus, or to somebody else; where he says, that having a mind to keep a debate from coming on in the senate, they made Cato rise to speak, and that he talked till the hour of proposing matters was over. Tully insinuates that they often made this use of him. Does not the moving picture shift? Do you not behold Clarke of Taunton-Dean, in the gown of a Roman senator, sending out the members to piss? The censor used sharp medicines; but in his time the patient had strength to bear them. The second Cato inherited this receipt without his skill; and, like a true quack, he gave the remedy, because it was his only one, though it was too late. He hastened the patient's death; he not only hastened it, he made it more convulsive and painful.

The condition of your wretched country is worse than you represent it to be. The healthful Indian follows his master who died of sickness to the grave; but I much doubt whether those charitable legislators, exact the same, when the master is a lunatic, and cuts his own throat. I mourn over Ireland with all my heart, but I pity you more. In reading your letter I feel your pulse; and I judge of your distemper as surely by the figures into which you cast your ink, as the learned doctor at "the hand and urinal" could do, if he pored over your water. You are really in a very bad way. You say your memory declines; I believe it does, since you forget your friends, and since repeated importunity can hardly draw a token of remembrance from you. There are bad airs for the mind as well as the body: and what do you imagine that Plato, since you have set me upon quoting him (who thanked Heaven that he was not a Bœtian), would have said of the ultima Thule? Shake off your laziness, ramble over hither, and spend some months in a kinder climate. You will be in danger of meeting but one plague here, and you will leave many behind you. Here you will come among people who lead a life singular enough to hit your humour: so near the world as to have all its conveniences; so far from the world as to be strangers to all its inconveniences; wanting nothing which goes to the ease and happiness of life; embarrassed by nothing which is cumbersome. I dare almost venture to say that you will like us better than the persons you live with, and that we shall be able to make you retrograde, (that I may use a canonical simile,) as the sun did on the dial of Hezekiah, and begin anew the twelve years which you complain are gone. We will restore to you the nigros angusto fronte capillos; and with them the dulce loqui, the ridere decorum, et inter vina fugam Cynaræ mœrere protervæ. Hæc est vita solutorum miserâ ambitione gravique, and not yours.

I was going to finish with my sheet of paper; but having bethought myself, that you deserve some more punishment, and calling all my anger against you to my aid, I resolve, since I am this morning in the humour of scribbling, to make my letter at least as long as one of your sermons: and if you do not mend, my next shall be as long as one of Dr. Manton's,[a] who taught my youth to yawn, and prepared me to be a high-churchman, that I might never hear him read, nor read him more.

You must know that I am as busy about my hermitage, which is between the chateau and the maison bourgeoise, as if I was to pass my life in it: and if I could see you now and then I should be willing enough to do so. I have in my wood the biggest and the clearest spring perhaps in Europe, which forms, before it leaves the park, a more beautiful river than any which flows ... Greek or Latin verse. I have a thousand projects about this spring, and, among others, one which will employ some marble. Now marble, you know, makes one think of inscriptions; and if you will correct this, which I have not yet committed to paper, it shall be graved, and help to fill the table-books of Spons and Missons[b] yet to come.

"Propter fidem adversus Reginam, et Partes,
Intemeratè servatam,
Propter operam in pace generali conciliandâ
Strenuè saltem navatam,
Impotentiâ vesanæ factioins
Solum vertere coactus,
Hîc ad aquæ lene caput sacræ
Injustè exulat,
Dulce vivit.
H De B. An." &c.

Ob were better than propter, but ob operam would never please the ear. In a proper place, before the front of the house which I have new built, I have a mind to inscribe this piece of patchwork:—

"Si resipiscat patria, in patriam rediturus;
Si non resipiscat, ubivis melius quam inter
Tales cives futurus,
Hanc villam instauro et orno:
Hinc, velut ex portu, alienos casus
Et fortunæ ludum insolentem
Cernere suave est.
Hic, mortem nec appetens nec timens,
Innocuis deliciis,
Doctâ quiete, et Felicis animi immotâ tranquillitate,
Fruiscor
Hic mihi vivam quod superest aut exilii,
Aut ævi."

If in a year's time you should find leisure to write to me, send me some mottos for groves, and streams, and fine prospects, and retreat, and contempt of grandeur, &c. I have one for my greenhouse, and one for an alley which leads to my apartment, which are happy enough. The first is, Hic ver assiduum, atque alienis mensibus æstas. The other is—fallentis semita vitæ.

You see I amuse myself de la bagatelle as much as you, but here lies the difference; your bagatelle leads to something better; as fiddlers flourish carelessly bea Thomas Manton, D.D., who had been ejected from the rectory of Covent-garden, for nonconformity, after the Restoration.

b James Spon, M.D., and Maximilian Misson, were two eminent travellers.

fore they play a fine air. But mine begins, proceeds, and ends in bagatelle.

Adieu: it is happy for you that my hand is tired.

I will take care that you shall have my picture, and I am simple enough to be obliged to you for asking for it. If you do not write to me soon, I hope it will fall down as soon as you have it, and break your head.

FROM THE DUCHESS OF ORMOND.

September 1, 1721.

SIR,—I DO not know how to account for your long silence, unless your time has been taken up in making an interest with those in power here for one of the two archbishoprics that we heard were void, but I am very glad are not so. Set your heart at rest, for they are promised; and therefore you may as well write to a sister, when next you honour this kingdom with any despatches, as to any greater people. It is a shame to think how you have neglected those of your own house. I had once determined to write to you no more, since no answer was to be expected; but then revenge came into my head, and I was resolved to teaze you, till at last, to be quiet, you will send me some plausible excuse, at least, for never inquiring after brother or sister. I wonder when you will be good-natured enough to come and see how we do; but Ireland has such powerful charms, that I question whether you would leave it to be one of our archbishops. I was at your brother Arran's a good while this summer, and have been much upon the ramble, or else you would have sooner had these just reproaches from me; whom you have no way of appeasing, but by a letter of at least four sides of paper: though I am so good a Christian, upon this occasion, as to be, notwithstanding all this ill-treatmen, sir, your most sincere friend and humble servant,

M. ORMOND.

TO MR WORRAL.

Gaulstown, September 14, 1721.

DEAR JACK,—I answered your letter long ago, and have little to say at present. I shall be in town by the beginning of next month, although a fit of good weather would tempt me a week longer; for I never saw or heard of so long a continuance of bad, which has hindered me from several little rambles I intended; but I row or ride every day in spite of the rain, in spite of a broken shin, or falling into the lakes, and several other trifling accidents. Pray what have you done with the Lichfield man? Has he mended his voice, or is he content to sit down with his Christ-church[b] preferment? I doubt Mrs. Brent will be at a loss about her industry-book,[c] for want of a new leaf, with a list drawn of the debtors. I know you are such a bungler you cannot do it, and therefore I desire that you would, in a loose sheet of paper, make a survey-list, in your bungling manner, as soon as she wants it, and let that serve till I come. Present my service to Mrs. Worral. I wonder how you, and she, and your heir[d] have spent the summer, and how often you have been at Dunleary,[e] and whether you have got her another horse, and whether she hates dying in the country as much as ever. Desire Mrs. Brent, if a messenger goes from hence, to give him my fustian waistcoat, because the mornings grow cold. I have now and then some threatenings with my head; but have never been absolutely giddy above a minute, and cannot complain of my health, I thank God. Pray send them enclosed to the post-office. I hear you have let your house to Mrs. Dopping, who will be a good tenant if she lives. I suppose your new house is finished, and, if Mrs. Worral does not air it well, it may get you a new wife, which I would not have you tell her, because it will do the business better than a boat at Dalky.[a] I hope you have ordered an account of absent vicars, and that their behaviour has not been so bad as usual during my sickness in town; if so, I have but an ill sub-dean. I am, sir, yours, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

P.S.—Tell Mrs. Brent that, if Lloyd agrees, I shall be glad one of his hogsheads was left unracked.

TO ARCHBISHOP KING.

Gaulstown, near Kinnegad, September 28, 1721.

MY LORD,—I had the honour of your grace's letter of the 1st instant; and, although I thought it my duty to be the last writer in corresponding with your grace, yet I know you are so punctual that, if I should write sooner, it would only be the occasion of giving you a new trouble before it ought in conscience to be put upon you. Besides, I was in some pain that your letter of Sept. 1st was not the first you had writ, because about ten days after a friend sent me word that your grace said you had writ to me six weeks before, and had no answer; whereas, I can assure your grace that I received but one from you; nor had I reason to expect it, having not done myself the honour to write to you before. I will tell you the secret of dating my letter; I was in fear lest the post should be gone, and so left a blank, and wisely huddled it up without thinking of the date; but we country gentlemen are frequently guilty of greater blunders; and in that article I grow more perfect every day.

I believe you seriously that you will take care of your health to prevent a successor; that is to say, I believe you tell truth in jest; for I know it is not the value of life that makes you desire to live, and am afraid the world is much of your mind; for it is out of regard to the public, or some of themselves, more than upon your own account, that they wish your continuance among us.

It seems you are a greater favourite of the lieutenant's[b] than you care to own; for we hear that he killed but two bucks, and sent you a present of one.

I hear you are likely to be the sole opposer of the bank:[c] and you will certainly miscarry, because it would prove a most perfidious thing. Bankrupts are always for setting up banks: how then can you think a bank will fail of a majority in both houses?

You are very perverse in misinterpreting the ladies' favour, as if you must die to obtain it; I assure you it is directly contrary, and, if you die, you will lose their favour for ever: I am commanded to tell you so; and therefore, at the peril of your life, and of their good graces, look to your health.

I hear the bishop of Bangor,[d] despairing of doing any good with you, has taken up with Hereford. I am a plain man, and would be glad at any time to see fifty such bishops hanged, if I could thereby have saved the life of his predecessor, for whom I had a great esteem and friendship. I do not much approve the compliments made you by comparisons drawn from good and bad emperors, because the inference falls short on both sides. If Julian had immediately succeeded Constantine, it would have been more to the purpose. Sir James of the Peak[e] said to Bouchier the gamester, "Sirrah, I

[c] Proposal for a national bank in Ireland, but rejected by parliament.
[d] Dr. Benjamin Hoadley.

shall look better than you when I have been a month in my grave." A great man in England was blaming me for despising somebody or other; I assured him I did not at all despise the man he mentioned: that I was not so liberal of my contempt; nor would bestow it where there was not some degree of merit. Upon this principle, I can see no proper ground of opposition between your grace and that wretch of Bangor. I have read indeed that a dog was once made king of Norway, but I forgot who was his predecessor; and therefore am at a loss for the other part of the comparison.

I am afraid the clatter of ladies' tongues is no very good cure for a giddiness in the head. When your grace (as you say) was young, as I am not, the ladies were better company, or you more easily pleased. I am perpetually reproaching them for their ignorance, affectation, impertinence, (but my paper will not hold all,) except lady Betty Rochfort, your old acquaintance.

I own my head and your grace's feet would be ill joined; but give me your head and take my feet, and match us in the kingdom if you can.

My lord, I row after health like a waterman, and ride after it like a post-boy, and find some little success; but subeunt morbi tristisque senectus. I have a receipt to which you are a stranger; my lord Oxford and Mr. Prior used to join with me in taking it; to whom I often said, when we were two hours diverting ourselves with trifles, vive la bagatelle. I am so deep among the workmen at Rochfort's canals and lakes, so dexterous at the oar, such an alderman after the hare ————.[a]

I am just now told, from some newspapers, that one of the king's enemies, and my excellent friend, Mr. Prior,[b] is dead; I pray God deliver me from many such trials. I am neither old nor philosopher enough to be indifferent at so great a loss; and therefore I abruptly conclude, but with the greatest respect, my lord, your grace's most dutiful and obedient servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE REV. MR. JACKSON, AT GAULSTOWN.[c]

Dublin, October 6, 1721.

I HAD no mind to load you with the secret of my going, because you should bear none of the blame. I fell upon a supposition that Mr. Rochfort had a mind to keep me longer, which I will allow in him and you, but not one of the family besides, who, I confess, had reason enough to be weary of a man who entered into none of their tastes, nor pleasures, nor fancies, nor opinions, nor talk. I baited at Clencurry, and got to Leslip between three and four, saw the curiosities there, and the next morning came to Dublin by eight o'clock, and was at prayers in my cathedral. There's a traveller! I forgot a long treatise, copied by my Irish secretary, which I lent Clem. Barry.—Pray get it from him, and seal it up, and keep it till you get a convenience of sending it. Desire lady Betty to give you the old silver box that I carried the comfits in; it belongs to poor Mrs. Brent, and she asked me for it with a sigh. You may trust it with Arthur. You are now happy, and have nobody to teaze you to the oar or the saddle. You can sit in your nightgown till noon without any reproaches.

I left a note for you with James Doyle, with commissions, which I hope you will fulfil, though you borrow the money; I will certainly be out of your debt in all articles between us when you come to town, or before, if you draw a bill upon me; for now I have money, and value no man. I am told your tribe here is all well, though I have seen none but Jack Jackson.

Farewell; go to cards, and lose your money with great gravity.

My service to all your girls.

I gave James Doyle two crowns, and a strict order to take care of [my/our] gray colt, which I desire you will second.

I had a perfect summer journey, and if I had staid much longer I should have certainly had a winter one, which, with weak horses and bad roads, would have been a very unpleasant thing.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE REV. MR. WALLIS.

Dublin, November 3, 1721.

SIR,—You stole in and out of town without seeing either the ladies or me; which was very ungratefully done considering the obligations you have to us for lodging and dieting with you so long. Why did you not call in the morning at the deanery? Besides, we reckoned for certain that you came to stay a month or two, as you told us you intended. I hear you were so kind as to be at Laracor, where I hope you planted something; and I intend to be down after Christmas, when you must continue a week. As for your plan, it is very pretty, too pretty for the use I intend to make of Laracor. All I would desire is what I mention in the paper I left you, except a walk down to the canal. I suppose your project would cost me 10*l.* and a constant gardener. Pray come to town, and stay some time, and repay yourself some of your dinners. I wonder how a mischief you came to miss us. Why did you not set out a Monday, like a true country parson? Besides, you lay a load on us in saying one chief end of your journey was to see us: but I suppose there might be another motive, and you are like the man that died of love and the colic. Let us know whether you are more or less monkish, how long you found yourself better by our company, and how long before you recovered the charges we put you to? The ladies assure you of their hearty services; and I am, with great truth and sincerity, your most faithful humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

January 1, 1722.

I RECEIVED your letter of the 29th of September above a fortnight ago; and should have set you an example by answering it immediately, (which I do not remember you ever set me,) if I had not been obliged to abandon the silence and quiet of this beloved retreat, and to thrust myself into the hurry and babble of an impertinent town. In less than ten days which I spent at Paris, I was more than ten times on the point of leaving my business there undone; and yet this business was to save four-fifths of 400,000 livres, which I have on the town-house; restes misérables du naufrage de ma fortune. Luckily I had the fear of you before my eyes; and though I cannot hope to deserve your esteem by growing rich, I have endeavoured to avoid your contempt by growing poor. The expression is equivocal; a fault which our language often betrays those who scribble hastily into; but your own conscience will serve for a comment, and fix the sense. Let me thank you for remembering me in your prayers, and for using your credit above so generously in my behalf. To despise riches with Seneca's purse, is to have at once all the advantages of fortune and philosophy.

[c] Copied from the original, in the possession of two Irish ladies of the name of Shenton.

You are not like H. Guy,[a] who, among other excellent pieces of advice, gave me this when I first came to court: to be very moderate and modest in my applications for my friends, and very greedy and importunate when I asked for myself. You call Tully names, to revenge Cato's quarrel; and to revenge Tully's, I am ready to fall foul of Seneca. You churchmen have cried him up for a great saint; and as if you imagined that to have it believed that he had a month's mind to be a Christian would reflect some honour on Christianity, you employed one of those pious frauds, so frequently pratised in the days of primitive simplicity, to impose on the world a pretended correspondence between him and the great apostle of the Gentiles.[b] Your partiality in his favour shall bias me no more than the pique which Dion Cassius and others show against him. Like an equitable judge, I shall only tax him with avarice in his prosperity, adulation in his adversity, and affectation in every state of life. Were I considerable enough to be banished from my country, methinks I would not purchase my restoration at the expense of writing such a letter to the prince himself, as your Christian stoic wrote to the emperor's slave, Polibius.[c] Thus I think of the man, and yet I read the author with pleasure; though I join in condemning those points which he introduced into the Latin style; those eternal witticisms strung like beads together, and that impudent manner of talking to the passions before he has gone about to convince the judgment; which Erasmus, if I remember right, objects to him. He is seldom instructive, but he is perpetually entertaining; and when he gives you no new idea, he reflects your own back upon you with new lustre. I have lately writ an excellent treatise in praise of exile.[d] Many of the hints are taken from Consolatio ad Helviam and other parts of his works. The whole is turned on his style and manner; and there is as much of the spirit of the portique as I could infuse, without running too far into the mirabilia, inopinata, et paradoxa, which Tully, and I think Seneca himself, ridicules the school of Zeno for. That you may laugh at me in your turn, I own ingenuously that I began in jest, grew serious at the third or fourth page, and convinced myself before I had done of what perhaps I shall never convince any other, that a man of sense and virtue may be unfortunate, but can never be unhappy. Do not imagine, however, that I have a mind to quarrel with Aristippus: he is still my favourite among the philosophers: and if I find some faults in him, they are few and venial.

You do me much honour in saying that I put you in mind of lord Digby;[e] but say it to no one else, for fear of passing for partial in your parallels, which has done Plutarch more hurt than it has done good to his Grecian heroes. I had forgot, or I never knew, the remarkable passage which you mention. Great virtue, unjustly persecuted, may hold such language, and will be heard with applause; with general applause, I mean, not universal. There was at Athens a wretch who spit in the face of Aristides as he marched firm, calm, and almost gay, to execution. Perhaps there was not another man among the Athenians capable of the same vile action. And for the honour of my country I will believe, that there are few men in England, besides lord Oxford, capable of hearing that strain of eloquence without admiration. There is a sort of kindred in souls, and they are divided into more families than we are apt to imagine. Digby's and Harley's are absolute strangers to one another. Touch a unison, and all the unisons will give the same sound; but you may thrum a lute till your fingers are sore, and you will draw no sound out of a Jew's-harp.

I thank you for correcting my inscriptions, and I thank you still more for promising to gather up mottos for me, and to write often to me. I am as little given to beg correspondents as you are to beg pictures; but since I cannot live with you, I would fain hear from you. To grow old with good sense, and a good friend, was the wish of Thales, I add, with good health: to enjoy but one and a half of these three is hard. I have heard of Prior's death, and of his epitaph;[a] and have seen a strange book writ by a grave and eloquent doctor[b] about the duke of Buckinghamshire. People, who talk much in that moment, can have, as I believe, but one of these two principles, fear or vanity. It is therefore much better to hold one's tongue. I am sorry that the first of these persons, our old acquaintance Matt., lived so poor as you represent him. I thought that a certain lord,[c] whose marriage with a certain heiress was the ultimate end of a certain administration, had put him above want. Prior might justly enough have addressed himself to his young patron, as our friend Aristippus did to Dionysius; "you have money, which I want; I have wit and knowledge which you want." I long to see your "Travels;" [Gulliver's] for, take it as you will, I do not retract what I said. I will undertake to find, in two pages of your bagatelles, more good sense, useful knowledge, and true religion, than you can show me in the works of nineteen in twenty of the profound divines and philosophers of the age.

I am obliged to return to Paris in a month or six weeks' time, and from thence will send you my picture. Would to Heaven I could send you as like a picture of my mind; you would find yourself, in that draught, the object of the truest esteem and the sincerest friendship.

FROM DR. SNAPE.

Windsor, April 13, 1722.

REVEREND SIR,—I take the opportunity of two of our choir going over to try their fortune in your country, at once to return my thanks for a very obliging letter you favoured me with some years ago, and your kind interpretation of my endeavours at that time to assert the cause of our establishment against a prelate [bishop Hoadley] who was undermining it; and also to recommend to your favour the bearer, Mr. Elford, who, upon the encouragement of your worthy primate, is going to settle at Armagh. I cannot pretend to say he has the same compass of voice with his late brother, whom the good queen so much admired; but I will venture to say he has a greater compass of understanding, and, upon the whole, that he is a good choirman. The other that bears him company was a very useful Bishop Atterbury, in a letter to Mr. Pope, dated Sept. 27, 1721, says, "I had not strength enough to attend Mr. Prior to his grave else I would have done it, to have showed his friends that I had forgot and forgiven what he wrote on me. He was buried as he desired, at the feet of Spenser. I will take care to make good, in every respect, what I said to him when living, particularly as to the triplet he wrote for his own epitaph; which, while we were on good terms, I promised him should never appear on his tomb while I was dean of Westminster." Atterbury's Epistolary Correspondence, 1799, vol. ii. p. 117.

If you find either of them for your purpose, especially the bearer, when you have a vacancy in your church, I shall be much obliged to you for any favour you are pleased to show; and be ready to approve myself on any occasion, reverend sir, your most obliged and affectionate servant, A. TO VANESSA.

Clogher, June 1, 1722.

THE weather has been so constantly bad that I have wanted all the healthy advantages of the country, and it seems likely to continue so. It would have been infinitely better once a-week to have met at Kendal, and so forth, where one might pass three or four hours in drinking coffee in the morning, or dining tête-à-tete, drinking coffee again till seven. God send you through your lawsuit and your reference. And remember that riches are nine parts in ten of all that is good in life, and health is the tenth; drinking coffee comes long after, and yet it is the eleventh; but without the two former you cannot drink it right: and remember the china in the old house, and Rider-street, and the colonel's journey to France, and the London wedding, and the sick lady at Kensington, and the indisposition at Windsor, and the strain by the box of books at London. Last year I writ you civilities, and you were angry. This year I will write you none, and you will be angry; yet my thoughts were still the same—Croyez que je serai toujours tout ce que vous désirez. Adieu.

TO VANESSA.

Loughgall, County of Armagh, July 13, 1722.

I AM well pleased with the account of your visit, and the behaviour of the ladies. I see every day as silly things among both sexes, yet endure them for the sake of amusement. The worst thing in you and me is, that we are too hard to please; and whether we have made ourselves so is the question; at least I believe we have the same reason. One thing that I differ from you in is, that I do not quarrel with my best friends. I believe you have ten angry passages in your letter, and every one of them enough to spoil two days apiece of riding and walking. We differ prodigiously in one point; I fly from the spleen to the world's end; you run out of your way to meet it. I doubt the bad weather has hindered you much from the diversions of your country-house, and put you upon thinking in your chamber. The use I have made of it was to read I know not how many diverting books of history and travels. I wish you would get yourself a horse, and have always two servants to attend you, and visit your neighbours; the worse the better: there is a pleasure in being reverenced; and that is always in your power, by your superiority of sense, and an easy fortune. The best maxim I know in this life is, to drink your coffee when you can; and when you cannot, to be easy without it; while you continue to be splenetic, count upon it I will always preach. Thus much I sympathise with you, that I am not cheerful enough to write; for I believe coffee once a-week is necessary to that. I can sincerely answer all your questions as I used to do; out then I give all possible way to amusements, because they preserve my temper, as exercise does my health; and without health and good humour I would rather be a dog. I have shifted scenes oftener than ever I did in my life, and I believe have lain in thirty beds since I left town, and always drew up the clothes with my left hand; which is a superstition I have learned these ten years. I long to see you in figure and equipage. Pray do not lose that taste. Farewell.

TO VANESSA.

August 7, 1722.

I AM this hour leaving my present residence; and if I fix anywhere shall let you know it.

A long vacation.—Law lies asleep, and bad weather. How do you wear away the time? Is it among the groves and fields of your country-seat, or among your cousins in town; or thinking in a train that will be sure to vex you; and then reaping, and forming teasing conclusions from mistaken thoughts? The best companion for you is a philosopher, whom you would regard as much as a sermon. I have read more trash since I left you than would fill all your shelves, and am abundantly the better for it, though I scarce remember a syllable. What a foolish thing is time; and how foolish is man, who would be as angry if time stopped as if it passed. But I will not proceed at this rate; for I am writing and thinking myself fast into the spleen, which is the only thing I would not compliment you by imitating. So adieu till the next place I fix in.

TO ROBERT COPE, ESQ.

Dublin, October 9, 1722.

I AM but just come to town, and therefore look upon myself to have just left Loughgall, and that this is the first opportunity I have of writing to you.

Strange revolutions since I left you: a bishop[a] of my old acquaintance in the Tower for treason, and a doctor of my new acquaintance made a bishop.[b] I hope you are returned with success from your Connaught journey, and that you tired yourself more than you expected in taking the compass of your new land; the consequence of which must be that you will continue needy some years longer than you intended. Your new bishop Bolton was born to be my tormentor; he ever opposed me as my subject,[c] and now has left me embroiled for want of him. The government, in consideration of the many favours they have shown me, would fain have me give St. Bride's to some one of their hang-dogs, that Dr. Howard may come into St. Werburgh's. So that I must either disoblige Whig and Tory in my chapter, or be ungrateful to my patrons in power. When you come to town you must be ready, at what time you hear the sound of tabret, harp, &c., to worship the brazen image set up, or else be cast into a cold watery furnace; I have not yet seen it, for it does not lie in my walks, and I want curiosity. The wicked Tories themselves begin now to believe there was something of a plot; and every plot costs Ireland more than any plot can be worth. The court has sent a demand here for more money by three times than is now in the hands of the Treasury and all the collectors of this kingdom put together. I escaped hanging very narrowly a month ago; for a letter from Preston directed to me was opened in the post-office, and sealed again in a very slovenly manner, when Manley found it only contained a request from a poor curate. This hath determined me against writing treason; however, I am not certain that this letter may not be interpreted as comforting his most excellent majesty's enemies, since you have been a state prisoner. Pray God keep all honest men out of the hands of lions and bears, and uncircumcised Philistines! — I hoped my brother Orrery[d] had loved his land too much to hazard it on a Dr. Atterbury, bishop of Rochester, at this time imprisoned for his share in what was called Sayer's plot.

b Dr. Theophilus Bolton, bishop of Clonfert, Sept 12, 1722; and, in 1729, archbishop of Cashell.

c Dr. Bolton had been chancellor of St. Patrick's.

d Charles Boyle, earl of Orrery, an accomplished and literary character, inventor of the philosophical instrument to which he bequeathed his name, was about this time apprehended and committed to the Tower for some real or supposed accession to the plot which cost Atterbury so dear.

revolution principles. I am told that a lady of my acquaintance was the discoverer of this plot, having a lover among the true Whigs, whom she preferred before an old battered husband.

You never saw anything so fine as my new Dublin plantations of elms; I wish you would come and visit them; and I am very strong in wine, though not so liberal of it as you. It is said that Kelly the parson[a] is admitted to Kelly the squire;[b] and that they are cooking up a discovery between them for the improvement of the hempen manufacture. It is reckoned that the best trade in London this winter will be that of an evidence. As much as I hate the Tories I cannot but pity them as fools. Some think likewise that the pretender ought to have his choice of two caps, a red cap or a fool's cap. It is a wonderful thing to see the Tories provoking his present majesty, whose clemency, mercy, and forgiving temper have been so signal, so extraordinary, so more than humane, during the whole course of his reign; which plainly appears, not only from his own speeches and declarations, but also from a most ingenious pamphlet just come over, relating to the wicked bishop of Rochester. But enough of politics. I have no town news; I have heard nothing. Old Rochfort has got a dead palsy. Lady Betty has been long ill. Dean Percivale has answered the other dean's journal[c] in Grub-street, justly taxing him for avarice and want of hospitality. Madam Percivale absolutely denies all the facts; insists that she never made candles of dripping; that Charley never had the chincough, &c.

My most humble service to Mrs. Cope, who entertained that covetous lampooning dean much better than he deserved. Remember me to honest Nanty and boy Barclay. Ever yours, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE EARL OF OXFORD.

October 11, 1722.

MY LORD,—I often receive letters franked Orford, but always find them written and subscribed by your lordship's servant Mynett. His meaning is some business of his own, wherein I am his solicitor; but he makes his court by giving me an account of the state of your family; and perpetually adds a clause, "That your lordship soon intends to write to me." I knew you indeed when you were not so great a man as you are now, I mean when you were treasurer; but you are grown so proud since your retirement, that there is no enduring you; and you have reason, for you never acted so difficult a part of life before. In the two great scenes of power and persecution you have excelled mankind; and in this of retirement you have most injuriously forgotten your friends. Poor Prior often sent me his complaints on this occasion; and I have returned him mine. I never courted your acquaintance when you governed Europe, but you courted mine; and now you neglect me, when I use all my insinuations to keep myself in your memory. I am very sensible that, next to receiving thanks and compliments, there is nothing you more hate than writing letters; but, since I never gave you thanks, nor made you compliments, I have so much more merit than any of those thousands whom you have less obliged, by only making their fortunes, without taking them into your friendship, as you did me, whom you always countenanced in too public and particular a manner to be forgotten either by the world or myself; for which never man was more proud or less vain.

I have now been ten years soliciting for your picture; and if I had solicited you for a thousand pounds (I mean of your money, not the public) I could have prevailed in ten days. You have given me many hundred hours; can you not now give me a couple? have my mortifications been so few, or are you so malicious to add a greater than I ever yet suffered? did you ever refuse me anything I asked you? and will you now begin? In my conscience, I believe, and by the whole conduct of your life I have reason to believe, that you are too poor to bear the expense. I ever told you I was the richer man of the two: and I am now richer by five hundred pounds than I was at the time when I was boasting at your table of my wealth, before Diamond Pitt.[a]

I have hitherto taken up with a scurvy print of you, under which I have placed this lemma:—

——— Veteres actus primamque juventam,
Prosequar? ad sese mentem præsentia ducunt.

And this I will place under your picture, whenever you are rich enough to send it me. I will only promise in return that it shall never lose you the reputation of poverty; which, to one of your birth, patrimony, and employments, is one of the greatest glories of your life, and so shall be celebrated by me.

I entreat your lordship, if your leisure and your health will permit, to let me know when I can be a month with you at Brampton castle: because I have a great deal of business with you that relates to posterity. Mr. Mynett has, for some time, led me an uncomfortable life, with his ill accounts of your health; but, God be thanked, his style of late is much altered for the better.

My hearty and constant prayers are perpetually offered up for the preservation of you and your excellent family. Pray, my lord, write to me: or you never loved me, or I have done something to deserve your displeasure. My lord and lady Harriot, my brother and sister,[b] pretend to atone by making me fine presents; but I would have his lordship know that I would value two of his lines more than two of his manors, &c.

FROM MR. GAY.

London, December 22, 1722.

DEAR SIR,—After every post-day, for these eight or nine years, I have been troubled with an uneasiness of spirit, and at last I have resolved to get rid of it, and write to you. I do not deserve you should think so well of me as I really deserve; for I have not professed to you that I love you as much as ever I did: but you are the only person of my acquaintance almost that does not know it. Whomever I see that comes from Ireland, the first question I ask is after your health; of which I had the pleasure to hear very lately from Mr. Berkeley. I think of you very often: nobody wishes you better, or longs more to see you. Duke Disney, who knows more news than any man alive, told me I should certainly meet you at the Bath this season: but I had one comfort in being disappointed, that you did not want it for your health. I was there for near eleven weeks for a colic that I have been often troubled with of late; but have not found all the benefit I expected.

I lodge at present in Burlington-house, and have received many civilities from many great men, but very few real benefits. They wonder at each other for not providing for me: and I wonder at them all. Experience has given me some knowledge of them;

[a] George Kelly, who went under the name of Johnson, an Irish clergyman, was apprehended as an accessory to Sayer's plot.

[b] Captain Dennis Kelly, a gentleman of fortune in Ireland, apprehended as an active agent in Atterbury's plot.

[c] See the "Country Life," by dean Swift, in the poetical part.

[a] Thomas Pitt, esq., who amassed great riches as governor of Fort St. George, in the East Indies.

[b] The members of the Club of Sixteen all called one another brothers, and consequently their wives were sisters to the several members. This has before been noticed.

so that I can say that it is not in their power to disappoint me. You find I talk to you of myself: I wish you would reply in the same manner. I hope, though you have not heard of me so long, I have not lost my credit with you; but that you will think of me in the same manner as when you espoused my cause so warmly, which my gratitude never can forget. I am, dear sir, your most obliged and sincere humble servant, J. GAY.

P.S. Mr. Pope, upon reading over this letter, desired me to tell you that he has been just in the same sentiments with me in regard to you, and shall never forget his obligations to you.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Dublin, December 22, 1722.

WHAT care we, whether you swim or sink? Is this a time to talk of boats, or a time to sail in them, when I am shuddering? or a time to build boat-houses, or pay for carriage? No; but toward summer I promise hereby under my hand to subscribe a (guinea[a]) shilling for one: or, if you please me, what is blotted out, or something thereabouts, and the ladies shall subscribe three thirteens between them, and Mrs. Brent a penny, and Robert and Archy halfpence a-piece, and the old man and woman a farthing each; in short I will be your collector, and we will send it down full of wine, a fortnight before we go at Whitsuntide. You will make eight thousand blunders in your planting, and who can help it? for I cannot be with you. My horses eat hay and I hold my visitation on January 7, just in the midst of Christmas. Mrs. Brent is angry, and swears as much as a fanatic can do that she will subscribe sixpence to your boat.——Well, I shall be a countryman when you are not; we are now at Mr. Faden's with Dan and Sam; and I steal out while they are at cards, like a lover writing to his mistress.—We have no news in our town. The ladies have left us to-day, and I promised them that you would carry your club to Arsellagh when you are weary of one another. You express your happiness with grief in one hand and sorrow on the other. What fowl have you but the weep? what hares but Mrs. Macfaden's grey hairs? what peas but your own? Your mutton and your weather are both very bad, and so is your wether mutton. Wild fowl is what we like.—How will this letter get to you?—A fortnight good from this morning you will find Quilca not the thing it was last August; nobody to relish the lake; nobody to ride over the downs; no trout to be caught; no dining over a well; no night heroics, no morning epics; no stolen hour when the wife is gone; no creature to call you names. Poor miserable Master Sheridan! No blind harpers! no journeys to Rantavan! Answer all this, and be my Magnus Apollo. We have new plays and new libels, and nothing valuable is old but Stella, whose bones she recommends to you. Dan desires to know whether you saw the advertisement of your being robbed—and so I conclude,

Yours, &c. T.

TO MR. GAY.

Dublin, January 8, 1723.

COMING home after a short Christmas ramble, I found a letter upon my table, and little expected when I opened it to read your name at the bottom. The best and greatest part of my life, until these last eight years, I spent in England; there I made my friendships, and there I left my desires. I am condemned for ever to another country; what is in prudence to be done? I think to be oblitusque meorum, obliviscendus et illis. What can be the design of your letter but malice, to wake me out of a scurvy sleep, which, however, is better than none? I am towards nine years older since I left you, yet that is the least of my alterations; my business, my diversions, my conversations, are all entirely changed for the worse, and so are my studies and my amusements in writing; yet after all, this humdrum way of life might be passable enough, if you would let me alone. I shall not be able to relish my wine, my parsons, my horses, nor my garden, for three months, until the spirit you have raised shall be dispossessed. I have sometimes wondered that I have not visited you, but I have been stopped by too many reasons besides years and laziness, and yet these are very good ones. Upon my return, after half a year among you, there would be to me desiderio nec pudor nec modus. I was three years reconciling myself to the scene, and the business to which fortune had condemned me, and stupidity was what I had recourse to. Besides, what a figure should I make in London, while my friends are in poverty, exile, distress, or imprisonment, and my enemies with rods of iron? Yet I often threatened myself with the journey and am every summer practising to ride and get health to bear it: the only inconvenience is that I grow old in the experiment. Although I care not to talk to you as a divine, yet I hope you have not been author of your colic: do you drink bad wine or keep bad company? Are you not as many years older as I? It will not be always et tibi quos mihi dempserit apponet annos. I am heartily sorry you have any dealings with that ugly distemper, and I believe our friend Arbuthnot will recommend you to temperance and exercise. I wish they could have as good an effect upon the giddiness I am subject to, and which this moment I am not free from. I should have been glad if you had lengthened your letter by telling me the present condition of many of my old acquaintance, Congreve, Arbuthnot, Lewis, &c., but you mention only Mr. Pope, who I believe is lazy, or else he might have added three lines of his own. I am extremely glad he is not in your case of needing great men's favour, and could heartily wish that you were in his. I have been considering why poets have such ill success in making their court, since they are allowed to be the greatest and best of all flatterers: the defect is, that they flatter only in print or in writing, but not by word of mouth: they will give things under their hand which they make a conscience of speaking. Besides, they are too libertine to haunt antechambers, too poor to bribe porters and footmen, and too proud to cringe to second-hand favourites in a great family. Tell me, are you not under original sin by the dedication of your eclogues to lord Bolingbroke? I am an ill judge at this distance; and besides, am for my ease utterly ignorant of the commonest things that pass in the world; but if all courts have a sameness in them, (as the parsons phrase it,) things may be as they were in my time, when all employments went to parliament-men's friends who had been useful in elections, and there was always a huge list of names in arrears at the treasury which would at least take up your seven years' expedient to discharge even one half. I am of opinion, if you will not be offended, that the surest course would be, to get your friend who lodgeth in your house to recommend you to the next chief governor who comes over here for a good civil employment, or to be one of his secretaries, which your parliament-men are fond enough of when there is no room at home. The wine is good and reasonable; you may dine twice a-week at the deanery-house; there is a set of company in this town sufficient for one man; folks will admire you because they have read you and read of you; and a good employment will make you live tolerably in London, or sumptuously here, or, if you divide between both places, it will be for your health.

I wish I could do more than say I love you. I left you in a good way both for the late court and the successors; and, by the force of too much honesty or too little sublunary wisdom, you fell between two stools. Take care of your health and money; be less modest and more active; or else turn parson and get a bishopric here. Would to God they would send us as good ones from your side! I am ever, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR POPE.

January 12, 1723.

I FIND a rebuke in a letter of yours that both stings and pleases me extremely. Your saying that I ought to have writ a postscript to my friend Gay's makes me not content to write less than a whole letter; and your seeming to take his kindly gives me hopes you will look upon this as a sincere effect of friendship. Indeed, as I cannot but own the laziness with which you tax me, and with which I may equally charge you, for both of us have had (and one of us has both had and given[a]) a surfeit of writing; so I really thought you would know yourself to be so certainly entitled to my friendship that it was a possession you could not imagine stood in need of any further deeds or writings to assure you of it.

Whatever you seem to think of your withdrawn and separate state at this distance, and in this absence, dean Swift still lives in England, in every place and company where he would choose to live; and I find him in all the conversations I keep, and in all the hearts in which I desire any share.

We have never met these many years without mention of you. Besides my old acquaintance, I have found that all my friends of a later date are such as were yours before; lord Oxford, lord Harcourt, and lord Harley may look upon me as one entailed upon them by you;[b] lord Bolingbroke is now returned (as I hope) to take me, with all his other hereditary rights; and, indeed, he seems grown so much a philosopher as to set his heart upon some of them as little as upon the poet you gave him. It is surely my ill fate that all those I most loved, and with whom I most lived, must be banished. After both of you left England my constant host was the bishop of Rochester [Dr. Atterbury]. Sure this is a nation that is cursedly afraid of being overrun with too much politeness, and cannot regain one great genius but at the expense of another.[c] I tremble for my lord Peterborow, whom I now lodge with; he has too much wit, as well as courage, to make a solid general: and, if he escapes being banished by others, I fear he will banish himself. This leads me to give you some account of the manner of my life and conversation, which has been infinitely more various and dissipated than when you knew me and cared for me; and among all sexes, parties, and professions. A glut of study and retirement in the first part of my life cast me into this; and this I begin to see will throw me into study and retirement.

The civilities I have met with from opposite sets of people have hindered me from being violent or sour to any party; but, at the same time, the observations and experiences I cannot but have collected have made me less fond of and less surprised at any: I am therefore the more afflicted and the more angry at the violences and hardships I see practised by either. The merry vein you knew me in is sunk into a turn of reflection that has made the world pretty indifferent to me; and yet I have acquired a quietness of mind, which by fits improves into a certain degree of cheerfulness, enough to make me just so good-humoured as to wish that world well. My friendships are increased by new ones, yet no part of the warmth I felt for the old is diminished. Aversions I have none, but to knaves, (for fools I have learned to bear with,) and such I cannot be commonly civil to, for I think those men are next to knaves who converse with them. The greatest man in power of this sort shall hardly make me bow to him, unless I had a personal obligation, and that I will take care not to have. The top pleasure of my life is one I learned from you, both how to gain and how to use the freedom of friendship with men much my superiors. To have pleased great men, according to Horace, is a praise; but not to have flattered them, and yet not have displeased them, is a greater. I have carefully avoided all intercourse with poets and scribblers, unless where, by great chance, I have found a modest one. By these means I have had no quarrels with any personally; none have been enemies but who were also strangers to me; and, as there is no great need for an éclaircissement with such, whatever they writ or said I never retaliated, not only never seeming to know, but often really never knowing, anything of the matter. There are very few things that give me the anxiety of a wish: the strongest I have would be, to pass my days with you and a few such as you: but fate has dispersed them all about the world; and I find to wish it is as vain as to wish to see the millenium and the kingdom of the just upon earth.

If I have sinned in my long silence, consider there is one to whom you yourself have been as great a sinner. As soon as you see his hand you will learn to do me justice and feel in your heart how long a man may be silent to those he truly loves and respects.

TO THE DUKE OF GRAFTON.

Dublin, January 24, 1723.

MY LORD,—I received lately from the dean of Downe a favourable message from your grace relating to a clergyman who married my dear relation, and whose estate is much encumbered by a long suit at law. I return my most humble acknowledgments for your grace's favourable answer. I can assure your grace that, in those times when I was thought to have some credit with persons in power, I never used it for my own interest, and very rarely for that of others, unless where it was for the public advantage; neither shall I ever be a troublesome or common petitioner to your grace. I am sorry the archbishop of Dublin [Dr. William King] should interpose in petty matters, when he has justly so much weight in things of greater moment. How shall we, the humblest of your addressers, make our way to the smallest mark of your favour? I desired your secretary, Mr. Hopkins, (whom I have long known,) to deal plainly with me as with a man forgotten and out of the world, and if he thought my request unreasonable I would drop it. This he failed to do: and therefore I here complain of him to your grace, and will do so to himself, because I have long done with court answers.

I heartily wish your grace full success in all your great and good endeavours for the service of your country, and particularly of this kingdom; and am, with the greatest respect, my lord, your grace's most obedient and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. GAY.

London, February 3, 1723.

You made me happy in answering my last letter in so kind a manner, which to common appearance I a Alluding to his large work on Homer.

b This shows to whom Pope was indebted for his introduction to lords Oxford, Harcourt, and Bolingbroke.

c The bishop of Rochester thought this to be indeed the case.

did not deserve; but I believe you guessed my thoughts, and knew that I had not forgot you, and that I always loved you. When I found that my book was not sent to you by Tooke, Jervas undertook it and gave it to Mr. Maxwell, who married a niece of Mr. Meredith's. I am surprised you have heard nothing of it, but Jervas has promised me to write about it, so that I hope you will have it delivered to you soon. Mr. Congreve I see often: he always mentions you with the strongest expressions of esteem and friendship. He labours still under the same afflictions as to his sight and gout; but in his intervals of health he has not lost anything of his cheerful temper. I passed all the last season with him at the Bath, and I have great reason to value myself upon his friendship, for I am sure he sincerely wishes me well. We pleased ourselves with the thoughts of seeing you there; but duke Disney, who knows more intelligence than anybody besides, chanced to give us a wrong information. If you had been there, the duke promised, upon my giving him notice, to make you a visit. He often talks of you and wishes to see you.

I was two or three days ago at Dr. Arbuthnot's, who told me he had written you three letters, but had received no answer. He charged me to send you his advice, which is, to come to England and see your friends. This he affirms (abstracted from the desire he has to see you) to be very good for your health. He thinks that your going to Spa and drinking the waters there would be of great service to you, if you have resolution enough to take the journey. But he would have you try England first. I like the prescription very much, but I own I have a self-interest in it; for your taking this journey would certainly do me a great deal of good. Pope has just now embarked himself in another great undertaking as an author; for of late he has talked only as a gardener. He has engaged to translate the Odyssey in three years, I believe rather out of a prospect of gain than inclination; for I am persuaded he bore his part in the loss of the South Sea. He lives mostly at Twickenham, and amuses himself in his house and garden. I supped about a fortnight ago with lord Bathurst and Lewis at Dr. Arbuthnot's. Whenever your old acquaintance meet they never fail of expressing their want of you. I wish you would come and be convinced that all I tell you is true.

As for the reigning amusement of the town, it is entirely music; real fiddles, bass-viols, and hautboys; not poetical harps, lyres, and reeds. There's nobody allowed to say, I sing, but an eunuch or an Italian woman. Everybody is grown now as great a judge of music as they were in your time of poetry; and folks, that could not distinguish one tune from another, now daily dispute about the different styles of Handel, Bononcini, and Attilio. People have now forgot Homer, and Virgil, and Cæsar; or at least they have lost their ranks. For, in London and Westminster, in all polite conversations, Senesino is daily voted to be the greatest man that ever lived.

I am obliged to you for your advice, as I have been formerly for your assistance in introducing me into business. I shall this year be a commissioner of the state lottery, which will be worth to me 150*l.* And I am not without hopes that I have friends that will think of some better and more certain provision for me. You see I talk to you of myself as a thing of consequence to you. I judge by myself; for to hear of your health and happiness will always be one of my greatest satisfactions. Every one that I have named in the letter gives their service to you. I beg you to give mine, Mr. Pope's, and Mr. Kent's[a] to Mr. Ford. I am, dear sir, your most faithful and most humble servant,

J. GAY.

[a] A celebrated gardener.

P.S. My paper was so thin that I was forced to make use of a cover. I do not require the like civility in return.

TO THE REV. MR. WALLIS.

Dublin, February 12, 1723.

SIR,—I would have been at Laracor and Athboy before now, if an ugly depending chapter business had not tied me here. There is a long difficulty, that concerns the government, the archbishop, the chapter, the dean, Dr. Howard, and Robin Grattan; and I know not whether it will be determined in a month. All my design is, to do a job for Robert Grattan; but the rest have their different schemes and politics, too deep and too contemptible for me to trouble myself about them. Meantime you grow negligent, and the improvements at Laracor are forgotten. I beg you will stop there for a day or two, and do what is necessary now before the season is too late; and I will come when this affair is over, and bring down wine (which will not be ready till then, for it is but just bottled); and we will be merry at your house and my cottage

I sent your memorial, drawn up by myself, with my opinion upon it, and a letter to Dr. Kearney, to recommend it to the primate. I likewise desired Mr. Morgan to second it. I have in vain hitherto sought Dr. Kearney, but shall find him soon; and I intend to engage Dr. Worth and Mr. Cross, and probably all may come to nothing——Sed quid tentare nocebit? The ladies are as usually—Mrs. Johnson eats an ounce a-week, which frights me from dining with her. My crew has drunk near three hogsheads since I came to town, and we must take up with new when I come down. I suppose you are in the midst of spleen and justice. I have often an ill head, and am so unfortunate as to pick out rainy days to ride in. What is it to you that old Proby the painter is dead? I am ever yours,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO ARCHBISHOP KING.

Deanery-house, February 22, 1723.

MY LORD,—Mr. Chetwode[a] intends to deliver in a petition to the government to-day, and entreated me to speak to your grace before he delivered it, which not having an opportunity to do, I make bold to enclose this letter, which your grace may please to read, and is the substance of what he desired me to say. I am, my lord, with the greatest respect, your grace's most dutiful, and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO ROBERT COPE, ESQ.

Dublin, May 11, 1723.

I PUT up your letter so very safe, that I was half an hour looking for it. I did not receive it till a few days before I came to town; for I often changed stages, and my last as well as my first was at Wood-park with Mr. Ford. This is the first minute of leisure I have had to answer you, which I did not intend to do till I heard you were come and gone from hence like a sprite. I will tell you that for some years I have intended a southern journey, and this summer is fixed for it, and I hope to set out in ten days. I never was in those parts, nor am acquainted with one christian among them, so that I shall be little more than a passenger; from thence I go to the bishop of Clonfert [Dr. Theophilus Bolton], who expects me, and pretends to be prepared for me. You need not take so much pains to invite me to Loughgall. I am grown so peevish that I can bear no other country place in this kingdom; I quarrel everywhere else, and sour the people I go to as well as myself. I will put the greatest compliment on you that ever I made; which is, to profess sincerely that I never found anything wrong in your house, and that you alone of all my Irish acquaintance have found out the secret of loving your lady and children with some reserve of love for your friends, and, which is more, without being troublesome; and Mrs. Cope, I think, excels even you, at least you have made me think so, and I beg you will deceive me as long as I live. The worst of it is, that if you grow weary of me (and I wonder why you do not) I have no other retreat. The neighbours you mention may be valuable, but I never want them at your house; and I love the very spleen of you and Mrs. Cope better than the mirth of any others you can help me to; it is indeed one additional good circumstance that Tisdall will be absent. I am sorry to say so of an old acquaintance; I would pity all infirmities that years bring on, except envy and loss of good nature; the loss of the latter I cannot pardon in any one but myself. My most humble service to Mrs. Cope; and pray God bless your fire-side! It will spare Dr. Jinny[a] the trouble of a letter if he knows from you in a few days that I intend in a week from your receiving this to begin my journey; for he promised to be my companion. It is probable I may be at Clonfert by the beginning of July.—It is abominable that you will get me none of Prior's guineas.—If you want news, seek other correspondents. Mr. Ford is heartily weary of us for want of company. He is a tavern man, and few here go to taverns, except such as will not pass with him; and, what is worse, as much as he has travelled, he cannot ride. He will be undone when I am gone away; yet he does not think it convenient to be in London during these hopeful times. I have been four hours at a commission to hear the passing of accounts, and thought I should not have spirits left to begin a letter; but I find myself refreshed with writing to you. Adieu, and do me the justice to believe that no man loves and esteems you more than yours, &c.

TO ROBERT COPE, ESQ.

I WROTE to you three weeks ago: perhaps my letter miscarried: I desired you would let Dr. Jinny know that I intended my journey in ten days after my letter would reach you; and I stayed five or six more, and do now leave this town on Monday, and take a long southern journey, and in five or six weeks hope to get to the bishop of Clonfert's. My letter to you was very long, and full of civilities to you and Mrs. Cope, and it is a pity it should be lost. I go where I was never before, without one companion, and among people where I know no creature; and all this is to get a little exercise, for curing an ill head. Pray reproach Dr. Jinny soundly, if you received my letter, and sent my message; for I know not where to direct to him, but thought you might hear of him once a-week. Your friend Ford keeps still in Ireland, and passes the summer at his country-house with two sober ladies of his and my acquaintance. If there be time after my being at Clonfert, I will call at Loughgall; though I wish you would come to the bishop's if Mrs. Cope will give you leave. It seems they are resolved to find out plots here when the parliament meets, in imitation of England; and the chief justice and postmaster are gone on purpose to bring them over, and they will raise 50,000*l.* on the papists here. The bishop of Meath[b] says, "The bishop of Rochester was always a silly fellow."

[a] A clergyman in the neighbourhood.
[b] Dr John Evans, with whom Swift had so many disputes respecting attendance at his visitations

I wish you many merry meetings with Tisdall. The graziers will be ruined this year. Praised be God for all things! Bermudas[a] goes low. The walk toward the bishop of Clonfert's is full of grass. The college and I are fallen out about a guinea. We have some hangings, but few weddings. The next packet will bring us word of the king and bishop of Rochester's[b] leaving England; a good journey and speedy return to one and the other is an honest Whig wish. And so I remain ever entirely yours, &c.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

I AM not so lazy as Pope, and therefore you must not expect from me the same indulgence to laziness; in defending his own cause he pleads yours, and becomes your advocate while he appeals to you as his judge: you will do the same on your part; and I, and the rest of your common friends, shall have great justice to expect from two such righteous tribunals: you resemble perfectly the two alehouse-keepers in Holland, who were at the same time burgomasters of the town, and taxed one another's bills alternately. I declare beforehand I will not stand to the award; my title to your friendship is good, and wants neither deeds nor writings to confirm it; but annual acknowledgments at least are necessary to preserve it: and I begin to suspect, by your defrauding me of them, that you hope in time to dispute it, and to urge prescription against me. I would not say one word to you about myself (since it is a subject on which you appear to have no curiosity) were it not to try how far the contrast between Pope's fortune and manner of life and mine may be carried.

I have been, then, infinitely more uniform and less dissipated than when you knew me and cared for me. That love which I used to scatter with some profusion among the female kind has been these many years devoted to one object. A great many misfortunes, (for so they are called, though sometimes very improperly,) and a retirement from the world, have made that just and nice discrimination between my acquaintance and my friends which we have seldom sagacity enough to make for ourselves: those insects of various hues, which used to hum and buz about me while I stood in the sunshine, have disappeared since I lived in the shade. No man comes to a hermitage but for the sake of the hermit; a few philosophical friends come often to mine, and they are such as you would be glad to live with, if a dull climate and duller company have not altered you extremely from what you were nine years ago.

The hoarse voice of party was never heard in this quiet place; gazettes and pamphlets are banished from it; and if the lucubrations of Isaac Bickerstaff be admitted, this distinction is owing to some strokes by which it is judged that this illustrious philosopher had (like the Indian Fohu, the Grecian Pythagoras, the Persian Zoroaster, and others his precursors among the Zabians, Magians, and the Egyptian seers) both his outward and his inward doctrine, and that he was of side at the bottom. When I am there, I forget I ever was of any party myself; nay, I am often so happily absorbed by the abstracted reason of things, that I am ready to imagine there never was any such monster as party. Alas, I am soon awakened from that pleasing dream by the Greek and Roman historians, by Guicciardine, by Machiavel, and Thuanus; for I have vowed to read no history of our own country till that body of it which you promise to finish appears.

I am under no apprehensions that a glut of study and retirement should cast me back into the hurry of the world; on the contrary, the single regret which I ever feel is, that I fell so late into this course of life; my philosophy grows confirmed by habit, and if you and I meet again I will extort this approbation from you, Jam non consilio bonus, sed more eo perductus, ut non tantum recte facere passim, sed nisi recte facere non possim. The little incivilities I have met with from opposite sets of people have been so far from rendering me violent or sour to any, that I think myself obliged to them all: some have cured me of my fears, by showing me how impotent the malice of the world is; others have cured me of my hopes, by showing how precarious popular friendships are; all have cured me of surprise. In driving me out of party they have driven me out of cursed company; and in stripping me of titles, and rank, and estate, and such trinkets, which every man that will may spare, they have given me that which no man can be happy without.

Reflection and habit have rendered the world so indifferent to me that I am neither afflicted nor rejoiced, angry nor pleased, at what happens in it, any further than personal friendships interest me in the affairs of it, and this principle extends my cares but a little way. Perfect tranquillity is the general tenor of my life; good digestions, serene weather, and some other mechanic springs, wind me above it now and then, but I never fall below it; I am sometimes gay, but I am never sad; I have gained new friends, and have lost some old ones; my acquisitions of this kind give me a good deal of pleasure, because they have not been made lightly. I know no vows so solemn as those of friendship, and therefore a pretty long noviciate of acquaintance should methinks precede them; my losses of this kind give me but little trouble; I contributed nothing to them; and a friend who breaks with me unjustly is not worth preserving. As soon as I leave this town (which will be in a few days) I shall fall back into that course of life which keeps knaves and fools at a great distance from me: I have an aversion to them both; but in the ordinary course of life I think I can bear the sensible knave better than the fool: One must, indeed, with the former, be in some or other of the attitudes of those wooden men whom I have seen before a sword-cutler's shop in Germany, but even in these constrained postures the witty rascal will divert me; and he that diverts me does me a great deal of good, and lays me under an obligation to him which I am not obliged to pay in other coin: the fool obliges me to be almost as much upon my guard as the knave, and he makes me no amends; he numbs me like the torpor, or he teazes me like the fly. This is the picture of an old friend, and more like him than that will be which you once asked, and which he will send you if you continue still to desire it.—Adieu, dear Swift: with all thy faults I love thee entirely; make an effort, and love me on with all mine.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Clonfert, August 3, 1723.

No, I cannot possibly be with you so soon, there are too many rivers, bogs, and mountains between; besides, when I leave this, I shall make one or two short visits in my way to Dublin, and hope to be in town by the end of this month; though it will be a bad time, in the hurry of your lousy p————t. Your dream is wrong, for this bishop is not able to lift a cat upon my shoulders; but if you are for a curacy of 25*l*. a-year, and ride five miles every Sunday to preach to six beggars, have at you: and yet this is no ill country, and the bishop has made, in four months, twelve miles of ditches from his house to the Shannon, if you talk of improving. How are you this moment? Do you love or hate Quilca the most of all places? Are you in or out of humour with the world, your friends, your wife, and your school? Are the ladies in town or in the country? If I knew I would write to them; and how are they in health? Quilca (let me see) (you see I can (if I please) make parentheses as well as others) is about a hundred miles from Clonfert; and I am half weary with the four hundred I have ridden. With love and service, and so, adieu.

Yours, &c.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, September 20, 1723.

RETURNING from a summer expedition of four months on account of my health, I found a letter from you, with an appendix longer than yours from lord Bolingbroke. I believe there is not a more miserable malady than an unwillingness to write letters to our best friends, and a man might be philosopher enough in finding out reasons for it. One thing is clear, that it shows a mighty difference betwixt friendship and love, for a lover (as I have heard) is always scribbling to his mistress. If I could permit myself to believe what your civility makes you say, that I am still remembered by my friends in England, I am in the right to keep myself here —— Non sum qualis eram. I left you in a period of life when one year does more execution than three at yours, to which if you add the dulness of air and of the people, it will make a terrible sum. I have no very strong faith in your pretenders to retirement; you are not of an age for it, nor have gone through either good or bad fortune enough to go into a corner and form conclusions de contemptu mundi et fuga sæculi, unless a poet grows weary of too much applause, as ministers do of too much weight of business.

Your happiness is greater than your merit in choosing your favourites so indifferently among either party: this you owe partly to your education, and partly to your genius employing you in an art in which faction has nothing to do, for I suppose Virgil and Horace are equally read by Whigs and Tories. You have no more to do with the constitution of church and state than a Christian at Constantinople; and you are so much the wiser and the happier, because both parties will approve your poetry as long as you are known to be of neither.

Your notions of friendship are new to me; I believe every man is born with his quantum, and he cannot give to one without robbing another. I very well know to whom I would give the first places in my friendship, but they are not in the way: I am condemned to another scene, and therefore I distribute it in pennyworths to those about me, and who displease me least; and should do the same to my fellow-prisoners if I were condemned to jail. I can likewise tolerate knaves much better than fools, because their knavery does me no hurt in the commerce I have met with them, which, however, I own is more dangerous, though not so troublesome, as that of fools. I have often endeavoured to establish a friendship among all men of genius, and would fain have it done: they are seldom above three or four contemporaries, and if they ıld be united would drive the world before them. I think it was so among the poets in the time of Augustus; but envy, and party, and pride, have hindered it among us. I do not include the subalterns, of which you are seldom without a large tribe. Under the name of poets and scribblers I suppose you mean he fools you are content to see sometimes when they happen to be modest; which was not frequent among hem while I was in the world.

I would describe to you my way of living, if any method could be called so in this country. I choose my companions among those of least consequence and most compliance: I read the most trifling books I can find, and whenever I write it is upon the most trifling subjects; but riding, walking, and sleeping, take up eighteen of the twenty-four hours. I procrastinate more than I did twenty years ago, and have several things to finish which I put off to twenty years hence; hæc est vita solutorum, &c. I send you the compliments of a friend of yours, who has passed four months this summer with two grave acquaintance at his country-house, without ever once going to Dublin, which is but eight miles distant; yet when he returns to London I will engage you shall find him as deep in the court of requests, the park, the operas, and the coffeehouse, as any man there. I am now with him for a few days.

You must remember me with great affection to Dr. Arbuthnot, Mr. Congreve, and Gay.——I think there are no more eodem tertios between you and me except Mr. Jervas, to whose house I address this for want of knowing where you live; for it was not clear from your last whether you lodge with lord Peterborough, or he with you!—I am ever, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.[a]

November 13, 1723.

DEAR SIR,—I have as good a right to invade your solitude as lord Bathurst, Gay, or Pope, and you see I make use of it. I know you wish us all at the devil for robbing a moment from your vapours and vertigo. It is no matter for that; you shall have a sheet of paper every post till you come to yourself. By a paragraph in yours to Mr. Pope I find you are in the case of the man who held the whole night by a broom-bush, and found when daylight appeared he was within two inches of the ground. You do not seem to know how well you stand with our great folks. I myself have been at a great man's table, and have heard out of the mouths of violent Irish Whigs the whole table turn all upon your commendation. If it had not been upon the general topic of your good qualities and the good you did I should have grown jealous of you. My intention in this is not to expostulate, but to do you good. I know how unhappy a vertigo makes anybody that has the misfortune to be troubled with it. I might have been deep in it myself if I had had a mind, and I will propose a cure for you that I will pawn my reputation upon. I have of late sent several patients in that case to the Spa, to drink there of the Geronstere water, which will not carry from the spot. It has succeeded marvellously with them all. There was indeed one who relapsed a little this last summer, because he would not take my advice and return to his course that had been too short the year before. But because the instances of eminent men are most conspicuous, lord Whitworth our plenipotentiary had this disease (which by the way is a little disqualifying for that employment); he was so bad that he was often forced to catch hold of anything to keep him from falling. I know he was recovered by the use of that water to so great a degree that he can ride, walk, or do anything as formerly. I leave this to your consideration. Your friends here wish to see you, and none more than myself; but I really do not advise you to such a journey to gratify them or myself; but I am almost confident it would do you a great deal of good. The dragon is just the old man when he is roused. He is a little deaf, but has all his other good and bad qualities just as of old. Lord B——— is much improved in knowledge, manner, and everything else. The shaver[a] is an honest friendly man as before; he has a good deal to do to smother his Welsh fire, which you know he has in a greater degree than some would imagine. He posts himself a good part of the year in some warm house, wins the ladies' money at ombre, and convinces them that they are highly obliged to him. Lord and lady Masham, Mr. Hill, and Mrs. Hill, often remember you with affection.

As for your humble servant, with a great stone in his right kidney, and a family of men and women to provide for, he is as cheerful as ever. In public affairs he has kept, as Tacitus says, Medium, iter inter vile servitium, et abruptam contumaciam.—He never rails at a great man but to his face; which I assure you he has had both the opportunity and licence to do. He has some few weak friends, and fewer enemies: if any, he is low enough to be rather despised than pushed at by them. I am faithfully, dear sir, your affectionate, humble servant,

J. ARBUTHNOT.

FROM THE DUCHESS OF ORMOND.

December 9, 1723.

SIR,—I find by yours of the 6th of November, which I did not receive till last night, that you have been so good as to remember your poor relation here. But as your three last never came to hand, I think it very happy that you have kept your liberty thus long; for I cannot account for my not receiving them any other way than that they were stopped in the post-office, and interpreted, as most innocent things are, to mean something very distant from the intention of the writer or actor.

I am surprised at the account you give me of that part of Ireland you have been in; for the best I expect from that grateful country is to be forgotten by the inhabitants. For, to remember with any kindness one under the frowns of the court is not a gift the Irish are endowed with. I am very sorry to hear you have got the spleen, where a man of your sense must every day meet with things ridiculous enough to make you laugh; but I am afraid the jests are to low too do so. Change of air is the best thing in the world for your distemper. And if not to cure yourself, at least have so much goodness for your friends here as to come and cure us; for it is a distemper we are overrun with. I am sure your company would go a great way toward my recovery; for I assure you nobody has a greater value for you than I have, and I hope I shall have the good fortune to see you before I die.

I have no sort of correspondence with the person [the duke of Ormond] you have not seen, and wonder at nothing they do or do not do.

I will let your brother and mine know that you remembered him in my letter. He is as good a man as lives.

I am afraid you will wish you had not encouraged my scribbling to you, when you find I am still such an insipid correspondent; but with that which I hope will make some amends, am, with great sincerity, and respect, your most faithful friend and humble servant.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

December 25, 1723.

NEVER letter came more opportunely than your last. The gout had made me a second visit, and several persons were congratulating with me upon the good effect of the waters, which had determined my former illness to a distemper so desirable. My toe pained me; these compliments tired me; and I would have taken my fever again to give the gout to all the company. At that instant your letter was delivered to me; it cleared my brow, diverted my ill humour, and at least made me forget my pain. I told the persons who were sitting round my bed, and who testified some surprise at so sudden a change, that this powerful epistle came from Ireland; at which, to say the truth, I did not observe that their surprise diminished. But the dullest fellow among them, who was a priest (for that happens to be the case sometimes in this country), told the others that Ireland formerly had been called insula sanctorum; that by the acquaintance he had at the Irish college he made no doubt of her deserving still the same appellation; and that they might be sure the three pages were filled with matière d'édification et matière de consolation, which he hoped I would be so good as to communicate to them. A learned Rosicrucian of my acquaintance, who is a fool of as much knowledge and as much wit as ever I knew in my life, smiled at the doctor's simplicity; observed that the effect was too sudden for a cause so heavy in its operations; said a great many extravagant things about natural and theurgic magic; and informed us that, though the sages who deal in occult sciences have been laughed out of some countries and driven out of others, yet there are to his knowledge many of them in Ireland. I stopped these guessers and others who were perhaps ready, by assuring them that my correspondent was neither a saint nor a conjurer. They asked me what he was then? I answered that they should know it from yourself; and opening your letter I read to them in French the character which you draw of yourself. Particular parts of it were approved or condemned by every one, as every one's habits induced him to judge; but they all agreed that my correspondent stood in need of more sleep, more victuals, less ale, and better company. I defended you the best I could; and bad as the cause was, I found means to have the last word, which in disputes you know is the capital point. The truth is however that I convinced nobody, not even the weakest of the company, that is myself.

I flatter my friendship for you with the hopes that you are really in the case in which you say that our friend Pope seems to be; and that you do not know your own character. Or did you mean to amuse yourself like that famous painter who, instead of copying nature, tried in one of his designs how far it was possible to depart from his original? Whatever your intention was, I will not be brought in among those friends whose misfortunes have given you an habitual sourness. I declare to you once for all that I am not unhappy, and that I never shall be so unless I sink under some physical evil. Retrench therefore the proportion of peevishness which you set to my account. You might for several other reasons retrench the proportions which you set to the account of others, and so leave yourself without peevishness or without excuse. I lament and have always lamented your being placed in Ireland; but you are worse than peevish, you are unjust, when you say that it was either not in the power or will of a ministry to place you in England. Write minister, friend Jonathan, and scrape out the words either, power, or; after which the passage will run as well, and be conformable to the truth of things. I know but one man [lord Oxford] who had power at that time, and that wretched man had neither the will nor the skill to make a good use of it. We talk of characters; match me that if you can among all the odd phenomena which have appeared in the moral world. I have not a Tacitus by me; but I believe that I remember your quotation, and as a mark that I hit right I make no comment upon it. As you describe your public spirit, it seems to me to be a disease as well as your peevishness. Your proposals for reforming the state are admirable; and your schemes concise. With respect to your humble servant, you judge better than you did in a letter I received from you about four years ago. You seemed at that time not so afraid of the nightingale's falling into the serpent's mouth. This reflection made me recollect that I writ you at that time a long epistle in metre. After rummaging among my papers I found it, and send it with my letter; it will serve to entertain you the first fast-day. I depend on the fidelity of your friendship that it shall fall under no eye but your own. Adieu.

I read in English (for she understands it) to a certain lady the passage of your letter which relates to her [his lady]. The Latin I most generously concealed. She desires you to receive the compliments of one who is so far from being equal to fifty others of her sex, that she never found herself equal to any one of them. She says that she has neither youth nor beauty, but that she hopes on the long and intimate acquaintance she has had with you, when you meet, if that ever happens, to cast such a mist before your eyes that you shall not perceive the want of either of them.

FROM LADY MASHAM.[a]

February, 1724.

Dear Sir,—It is impossible for you to imagine with what satisfaction I received your kind letter; and though I had been so long without hearing from you, I could never impute it to want of friendship in one whose goodness to me has always been abundantly more than I could deserve. I had written often to you; but, having no safe conveyance, chose rather to inquire after your health and welfare of some people that could give me an account of it. And I do assure you from the bottom of my heart there is not a person living I have a greater friendship for than yourself, and shall have to the end of my life. Indeed now I can show it only in expressions; but I flatter myself you believe them sincere. I long to see you at my retired habitation, where you will meet with a most hearty welcome and faithful friends, and none more so than her who is your most affectionate, humble servant, H. Masham.

My lord, children, brother, and sister, are your humble servants.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY LORD CARTERET,

Lord lieutenant of Ireland.

April 28, 1724.

My Lord,—Many of the principal persons in this kingdom, distinguished for their loyalty to his present majesty, hearing that I had the honour to be known to your excellency, have for some time pressed me very earnestly since you were declared lord-lieutenant of this kingdom to represent to your excellency the apprehensions they are under concerning Mr. Wood's patent for coining halfpence to pass in Ireland. Your excellency knows the unanimous sentiments of the parliament here upon that matter; and upon inquiry you will find that there is not one person of any rank or party in this whole kingdom who does not look upon that patent as the most ruinous project that ever was contrived against any nation. Neither is it doubted that, when your excellency shall be thoroughly informed, your justice and compassion for an injured people will force you to employ your credit for their relief.

I have made bold to send you enclosed two small tracts on this subject, one written (as it is supposed) by the earl of Abercorn: the other is entitled to a weaver, and suited to the vulgar, but thought to be the work of a better hand.

I hope your excellency will forgive an old humble servant, and one who always loved and esteemed you, for interfering in matters out of his province; which he would never have done if many of the greatest persons here had not by their importunity drawn him out of his retirement, to venture giving you a little trouble in hopes to save their country from utter destruction; for which the memory of your government will be blessed by posterity.

I hope to have the honour of seeing your excellency here; and do promise neither to be a frequent visitor nor troublesome solicitor, but ever with the greatest respect, my lord, remain your excellency's most obedient and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY LORD CARTERET.

June 9, 1724.

MY LORD,—It is above a month since I took the boldness of writing to your excellency, upon a subject wherein the welfare of this kingdom is highly concerned.

I wrote at the desire of several considerable persons here, who could not be ignorant that I had the honour of being well known to you.

I could have wished your excellency had condescended so far as to let one of your under-clerks have signified to me that a letter was received.

I have been long out of the world; but have not forgotten what used to pass among those I lived with while I was in it: and I can say that, during the experience of many years and many changes in affairs, your excellency and one more, who is not worthy to be compared to you, are the only great persons that ever refused to answer a letter from me, without regard to business, party, or greatness; and if I had not a peculiar esteem for your personal qualities I should think myself to be acting a very inferior part in making this complaint.

I never was so humble as to be vain upon my acquaintance with men in power, and always rather chose to avoid it when I was not called. Neither were their power or titles sufficient, without merit, to make me cultivate them; of which I have witnesses enough left, after all the havoc made among them by accidents of time, or by changes of persons, measures, and opinions.

I know not how your conceptions of yourself may alter by every new high station; but mine must continue the same or alter for the worse.

I often told a great minister, whom you well know, that I valued him for being the same man through all the progress of power and place. I expected the like in your lordship, and still hope that I shall be the only person who will ever find it otherwise.

I pray God to direct your excellency in all your good undertakings, and especially in your government of this kingdom.

I shall trouble you no more; but remain with great respect, my lord, your excellency's most obedient and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD CARTERET.

Arlington-street, June 20, 1724.

SIR,—To begin by confessing myself in the wrong will, I hope, be some proof to you that none of the stations which I have gone through have hitherto had the effects upon me which you apprehend. If a month's silence has been turned to my disadvantage in your esteem, it has at least had this good effect, that I am convinced by the kindness of your reproaches, as well as by the goodness of your advice, that you still retain some part of your former friendship for me, of which I am the more confident from the agreeable freedom with which you express yourself; and I shall not forfeit my pretensions to the continuance of it by doing anything that shall give you occasion to think that I am insensible of it.

But to come to the point: your first letter is dated the 28th of April, your second the 9th of June. By the date of this you will see that the interval of silence may be accounted for by a few excursions which I have made into the country: therefore I desire you will put the most favourable sense.

The principal affair you mention is under examination,[a] and till that is over I am not informed sufficiently to make any other judgment of the matter than that which I am naturally led to make by the general aversion which appears to it in the whole nation.

I hope the nation will not suffer by my being in this great station; and if I can contribute to its prosperity I shall think it the honour and happiness of my life. I desire you to believe what I say, and particularly when I profess myself to be, with great truth, sir, your most faithful and affectionate humble servant,

CARTERET.

July 9, 1724.

MY LORD,—I humbly claim the privilege of an inferior to be the last writer; yet, with great acknowledgments for your condescension in answering my letters, I cannot but complain of you for putting me in the wrong. I am in the circumstances of a waiting-woman, who told her lady "that nothing vexed her more than to be caught in a lie." But what is worse, I have discovered in myself somewhat of the bully; and that, after all my rattling, you have brought me down to be as humble as the most distant attender at your levee. It is well your excellency's talents are in few hands; for if it were otherwise, we who pretend to be free speakers in quality of philosophers should be utterly cured of our forwardness; at least I am afraid there will be an end of mine with regard to your excellency. Yet, my lord, I am ten years older than I was when I had the honour to see you last, and consequently ten times more testy. Therefore I foretell that you, who could so easily conquer so captious a person and of so little consequence, will quickly subdue this whole kingdom to love and reverence you. I am, with the greatest respect, my lord, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO ARCHBISHOP KING.

Dublin, July 14, 1724.

MY LORD,—Your grace will have received, before this comes to your hands, an account of the primate's death, who died yesterday at twelve o'clock at noon. He had left off spitting for about ten days before; and the want of that is thought to have been the immediate cause of his death, although he eat heartily until the two last days. He has left the bishop of Kildare and his steward, Mr. Morgan, his executors, who were both out of town, but I suppose are sent for. Some who formerly belonged to him think he has left 40,000*l.*; others report he died poor.

The vogue is, that your grace will succeed him, if you please: but I am too great a stranger to your present situation at court to know what to judge. But if there were virtue enough, I could wish your grace would accept the offer if it should be made to you; because I would have your name left to posterity among the primates; and because entering into a new station is entering, after a sort, on a new lease of life; and because it might be hoped that your grace would be advised with about a successor; and because that diocese would require your grace's ability and spirit to reform it; and because—but I should never be at an end if I were to number up the reasons why I would have your grace in the highest stations the crown can give you.

I found all the papers in the cabinet relating to Dr. Stephen's hospital, and therefore I brought them home to the deanery. I opened the cabinet in the presence of Mr. Bouhereau, and saw one paper which proved a bank-note for 500*l*. The greatness of the sum startled me, but I found it belonged to the same hospital; I was in pain because workmen were in the room and about the house. I therefore went this morning to St. Sepulchre's; and in the presence of Mrs. Green [his grace's housekeeper] I took away the note and have it secured in my cabinet, leaving her my receipt for it, and am very proud to find that a scrip under my hand will pass for 500*l*. I wish your grace a good journey to the establishment of your health; and am, with the greatest respect, my lord, your grace's most dutiful and most humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO EDWARD EARL OF OXFORD

July. 1724.

MY LORD,—Although I had, for two years past, inured myself to expect the death of my lord your father, from the frequent accounts of the bad condition of his health, yet the news of it struck me so sensibly that I had not spirit enough to condole with your lordship, as I ought to have done, for so great a loss to the world and yourself. It is true, indeed, you no longer wanted his care and tenderness, nor his example to incite you to virtue; but his friendship and conversation you will ever want, because they are qualities so rare in the world, and in which he so much excelled all others. It has pleased me, in the midst of my grief, to hear that he preserved the greatness, and calmness, and intrepidity of his mind to his last minutes: for it was fit that such a life should terminate with equal lustre to the whole progress of it.

I must now beg leave to apply to your lordship's justice. He was often pleased to promise me his picture; but his troubles and sickness, and want of opportunity, and my absence, prevented him. I do therefore humbly insist that your lordship will please to discharge what I almost look upon as a legacy.

I would entreat another and much greater favour of your lordship, that at your leisure hours you would please to inspect among your father's papers whether there be any memorials that may be of use toward writing his life: which I have sometimes mentioned to him, and often thought on whe : I little thought to survive him. I have formerly gathered several hints: but want many memorials, especially of his more early times, which might be easily supplied. And such a work most properly belongs to me, who loved and respected him above all men, and had the honour to know him better than any other of my level did.

I humbly beg your lordship's pardon for so long a letter upon so mournful an occasion, and expect your justice to believe that I am and ever shall be, with the greatest respect, my lord, your lordship's most obedient, most obliged, and most humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

I desire to present my most humble respects to my lady Oxford.

FROM LORD CARTERET.

Arlington-street, August 4, 1724.

SIR,—Your claim to be the last writer is what I can never allow; that is the privilege of ill writers, and I am resolved to give you complete satisfaction by leaving it with you whether I shall be that last writer or not. Methinks I see you throw this letter upon your table in the height of spleen, because it may have interrupted some of your more agreeable thoughts. But then, in return you may have the comfort of not answering it, and so convince my lord-lieutenant that you value him less now than you did ten years ago. I do not know but this might become a free speaker and a philosopher. Whatever you may think of it, I shall not be testy, but endeavour to show that I am not altogether insensible of the force of that genius which has outshone most of this age, and when you will display it again can convince us that its lustre and strength are still the same.

Once more I commit myself to your censure, and am, sir, with great respect, your most affectionate humble servant, CARTERET.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY LORD CARTERET,

Lord-lieutenant of Ireland.

September 3, 1724.

MY LORD,—Being ten years older than when I had the honour to see your excellency last, by consequence, if I am subject to any ailments, they are now ten times worse—and so it has happened. For I have been this month past so pestered with a return of the noise and deafness in my ears that I had not spirit to perform the common offices of life, much less to write to your excellency, and least of all to answer so obliging and condescending a letter as that I received from you. But these ugly ten years have a worse consequence: that they utterly destroy any title to the good opinion you are pleased to express of me as an amuser of the world and myself. To have preserved that talent, I ought, as I grew older, to have removed into a better climate, instead of being sunk for life in a worse. I imagine France would be properer for me now, and Italy ten years hence. However, I am not so bad as they would make me; for since I left England such a parcel of trash has been there fathered upon me, that nothing but the good judgment of my friends could hinder them from thinking me the greatest dunce live.

There is a gentleman of this kingdom just gone for England; it is Dr. George Berkeley, dean of Derry, the best preferment among us, being worth 1100*l*. a-year. He takes the Bath in his way to London; and will of course attend your excellency, and be presented, I suppose, by his friend my lord Burlington. And because I believe you will choose out some very idle minutes to read this letter, perhaps you may not be ill entertained with some account of the man and his errand. He was a fellow of the university here; and going to England very young, about thirteen years ago, he became the founder of a sect there called the Immaterialists, by the force of a very curious book upon that subject. Dr. Smalridge and many other eminent persons were his proselytes. I sent him secretary and chaplain to Sicily with my lord Peterborough; and upon his lordship's return Dr. Berkeley spent above seven years in travelling over most part of Europe, but chiefly through every corner of Italy, Sicily, and other islands. When he came back to England he found so many friends that he was effectually recommended to the duke of Grafton, by whom he was lately made dean of Derry. Your excellency will be frighted when I tell you all this is but an introduction; for I am now to mention his errand. He is an absolute philosopher with regard to money, titles, and power; and for three years past has been struck with a notion of founding an university at Bermudas, by a charter from the crown. He has seduced several of the hopefullest young clergymen, and others here, many of them well provided for, and all of them in the fairest way of preferment: but in England his conquests are greater, and I doubt will spread very far this winter. He showed me a little tract which he designs to publish; and there your excellency will see his whole scheme of a life academico-philosophical (I shall make you remember what you were) of a college founded for Indian scholars and missionaries; where he most exorbitantly proposes a whole hundred pounds a-year for himself, forty pounds for a fellow, and ten for a student. His heart will break if his deanery be not taken from him and left to your excellency's disposal. I discouraged him by the coldness of courts and ministers, who will interpret all this as impossible and a vision, but nothing will do. And therefore I humbly entreat your excellency either to use such persuasions as will keep one of the first men in this kingdom for learning and virtue quiet at home, or assist him by your credit to compass his romantic design; which, however, is very noble and generous, and directly proper for a great person of your excellent education to encourage.

I must now in all humility entreat one favour of you, as you are lord-lieutenant. Mr. Proby, surgeon of the army here, laid out the greatest part of his fortune to buy a captainship for his eldest son. The young man was lately accused of discovering an inclination to popery while he was quartered in Galway. The report of the court-martial is transmitted to your excellency. The universal opinion here is that the accusation is false and malicious; and the archbishop of Tuam, in whose diocese Galway is, upon a strict inquiry has declared it to be so. But all this is not to sway with your excellency, any more than that the father is the most universally beloved of any man I ever knew in his station. But I entreat that you will please to hear the opinion of others who may speak in his favour, and perhaps will tell you "that, as party is not in the case, so you cannot do any personal thing more acceptable to the people of Ireland than in inclining toward lenity to Mr. Proby and his family;" although I have reason to be confident that they neither need nor desire more than justice: I beg your excellency will remember my request to be only that you would hear others; and not think me so very weak as to imagine I could have hopes of giving the least turn to your mind. Therefore I hope what I have said is pardonable in every respect but that of taking up your time.

My lord, we are here preparing for your reception, and for a quiet session under your government; but whether you approve the manner I can only guess. It is by universal declarations against Wood's coin. One thing I am confident of—that your excellency will find and leave us under dispositions very different toward your person and high station from what have appeared toward others.

I have no other excuse for the length of this letter but a faithful promise that I will never be guilty of the same fault a second time. I am, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.[a]

September 12, 1724.

It is neither sickness, nor journeys, nor ill-humours, nor age, nor vexation, nor stupidity, which has hindered me from answering sooner your letter of the month of June; but a very prudent consideration, and one of the greatest strains of policy I ever exercised in my life. Should I answer you in a month, you might think yourself obliged to answer me in six; and, scared at the sore fatigue of writing twice a-year to an absent friend, you might (for aught either you or I can tell) stop short, and not write at all. Now this would disappoint all my projects; for, to confess the truth, I have been drawing you in these several years, and by my past success I begin to hope that in about ten more I may establish a right of hearing from you once a quarter. The gout neither clears my head nor warms my imagination; and I am ashamed to own to you how near the truth I kept in the description of what passed by my bedside in the reading of your letter. The scene was really such as I painted it; and the company was much better than you seem to think it. When I, who pass a great part, very much the greatest, of my life alone, sally forth into the world, I am very far from expecting to improve myself by the conversation I find there; and still further from caring one jot of what passes there. In short I am no longer the bubble you knew me; and therefore when I mingle in society it is purely for my amusement. If mankind divert me (and I defy them to give me your distemper, the spleen), it is all I expect or ask of them. By this sincere confession, you may perceive that your great masters of reason are not for my turn; their thorough bass benumbs my faculties. I seek the fiddle or the flute; something to raise, or something to calm my spirits agreeably; gay flights, or soothing images. I do not dislike a fellow whose imagination runs away with him, and who has wit enough to be half mad; nor him who atones for a scanty imagination by an ample fund of oddnesses and singularity. If good sense and real knowledge prevail a little too much in any character, I desire there may be at least some latent ridicule, which may be called forth upon occasion and render the person a tolerable companion. By this sketch you may judge of my acquaintance. The dead friends with whom I pass my time you know. The living ones are of the same sort, and therefore few.

I pass over that paragraph of your letter which is a kind of an elegy on a departed minister;[b] and I promise you solemnly neither to mention him nor think of him more till I come to do him justice in a history of the first twenty years of this century, which I believe I shall write if I live three or four years longer. But I must take a little more notice of the paragraph which follows. The verses I sent you are very bad, because they are not very good: mediocribus esse poëtis, non dî, non homines, &c. I did not send them to be admired; and you would do them too much honour if you criticised them. Pope took the best party, for he said not one word to me about them. All I desire of you is, to consider them as a proof that you have never been out of my thoughts, though you have been so long out of my sight; and if I remember you upon paper for the future it shall be in prose.

I must, on this occasion, set you right, as to an opinion which I should be very sorry to have you entertain concerning me. The term esprit fort, in English freethinker, is, according to my observation, usually applied to them whom I look upon to be the pests of society, because their endeavours are directed to loosen the bands of it, and to take at least one curb out of the mouth of that wild beast man, when it would be well if he was checked by half score others. Nay, they go further. Revealed Religion is a lofty and pompous structure, erected close to the humble and plain building of Natural Religion. Some have objected to you who are the architects et les concierges (we want that word in English) of the former—to you who built, or at least repair the house, and who show the rooms that to strengthen some parts of your own building you shake and even sap the foundations of the other. And between you and me, Mr. Dean, this charge may be justified in several instances. But still your intention is not to demolish. Whereas the esprit fort, or the freethinker, is so set upon pulling down your house about your ears, that, if he was let alone, he would destroy the other for being so near it, and mingle both in one common ruin. I therefore not only disown but detest this character. If, indeed, by esprit fort, or freethinker, you only mean a man who makes a free use of his reason, who searches after truth without passion or prejudice, and adheres inviolably to it, you mean a wise and honest man, and such a one as I labour to be. The faculty of distinguishing between right and wrong, true and false, which we call reason or common sense, which is given to every man by our bountiful Creator, and which most men lose by neglect, is the light of the mind, and ought to guide all operations of it. To abandon this rule, and to guide our thoughts by any other, is full as absurd as it would be if you should put out your eyes and borrow even the best staff that ever was in the family of the Staffs,* when you set out upon one of your dirty journeys. Such freethinkers as these I am sure you cannot, even in your apostolical capacity, disapprove; for since the truth of the divine revelation of christianity is as evident as matters of fact, on the belief of which so much depends, ought to be, and agreeable to all our ideas of justice, these freethinkers must needs be christians on the best foundation; on that which St. Paul himself established (I think it was St. Paul), omnia probate, quod bonum est tenete.

But you have a further security from these freethinkers, I do not say a better, and it is this: the persons I am describing think for themselves and to themselves. Should they unhappily not be convinced by your arguments, yet they will certainly think it their duty not to disturb the peace of the world by opposing you. The peace and happiness of mankind is the great aim of these freethinkers; and therefore, as those among them who remain incredulous will not oppose you, so those whom reason, enlightened by grace, has made believers may be sorry, and may express their sorrow as I have done, to see religion perverted to purposes so contrary to her true intention and first design. Can a good christian behold the ministers of the meek and humble Jesus exercising an insolent and cruel usurpation over their brethren? or the messengers of peace and good news setting all mankind together by the ears? or that religion which breathes charity and universal benevolence, spilling more blood, upon reflection and by system, than the most barbarous heathen ever did in the heat of action and fury of conquest? Can he behold all this without a holy indignation and not be criminal? Nay, when he turns his eyes from those tragical scenes, and considers the ordinary tenor of things, do you not think he will be shocked to observe metaphysics substituted to the theory, and ceremony to the practice of morality?

* An allusion to Bickerstaff.

I make no doubt but you are by this time abundantly convinced of my orthodoxy, and that you will name me no more in the same breath with Spinosa, whose system of one infinite substance I despise and abhor, as I have a right to do, because I am able to show why I despise and abhor it.

You desire me to return home, and you promise me, in that case, to come to London, loaden with your travels. I am sorry to tell you that London is, in my apprehension, as little likely as Dublin to be our place of rendezvous. The reasons for this apprehension I pass over; but I cannot agree to what you advance with the air of a maxim, that exile is the greatest punishment to men of virtue, because virtue consists in loving our country. Examine the nature of this love, from whence it arises, how it is nourished, what the bounds and measures of it are, and after that you will discover how far it is virtue, and where it becomes simplicity, prejudice, folly, and even enthusiasm. A virtuous man in exile may properly enough be styled unfortunate, but he cannot be called unhappy. You remember the reason which Brutus gave—"Because wherever he goes he carries his virtue with him." There is a certain bulky volume which grows daily, and the title of which must, I think, be Noctes Gallicæ. There you may perhaps one day or other see a dissertation upon this subject; and to return you threatening for threatening, you shall be forced to read it out, though you yawn from the first to the last page.

The word Ireland was struck out of the paper you mention; that is to satisfy your curiosity, and to kindle it anew I will tell you that this anecdote, which I know not how you came by, is neither the only one nor the most considerable one of the same kind. The person you are so inquisitive about* returns into England at the end of October. She has so great a mind to see you that I am not sure she will not undertake a journey to Dublin. It is not so far from London to Dublin as from Spain to Padua; and you are as well worth seeing as Livy. But I would much rather you would leave the humid climate and the dull company, in which, according to your account, a man might grow old between twenty and thirty. Set your foot on the continent; I dare promise that you will, in a fortnight, have gone back the ten years you lament so much, and be returned to that age at which I left you. With what pleasure should I hear you Inter vina fugam Stellæ mœrere protervæ?

Adieu.

FROM EDWARD EARL OF OXFORD.

Wimple, November 2, 1724.

Good Mr. Dean,—There has nothing of late given me so much real trouble and uneasiness as my having so long deferred writing to you, to make my acknowledgments for your most kind letter, and to assure you that I took every part of your obliging letter in the manner you would wish me to do: I must say that amid my grief and concern it gave me a secret pleasure to find that I was thought of by you; and what was a greater addition, that you still retained the same thoughts and sentiments of my dear father, and that you had not laid aside the design you once entertained of transmitting his name and story to posterity. I did delay writing some time because I was in great hopes I should have been able to have given you a much more satisfactory account than I am now able to give, notwithstanding the search I have made in answer to your question "if he had left any memoirs behind him;"

* His lordship's second wife was a French lady, and niece to the celebrated Madame de Maintenon

I suppose you mean in relation to himself. I have not been able to find any among his papers in town. This, with some other affairs, drew the time into the length it is; but I assure you, if I have the satisfaction to hear from you again (as I hope I shall), I will be more punctual in my returns; for I will allow nobody to value and esteem you more than I do.

There is certainly a very great number of materials for a history, a vast collection of letters and other papers; a great deal may be supplied elsewhere; but give me leave to say that if you do not come into England nothing can be done; it will not be possible to do anything to purpose. Without this view there would be nobody more welcome to me than yourself; you should live in your own way, and do just what was most agreeable to you; I have houses enough, you shall take your choice: I must with earnestness repeat it to you again that I beg you will think of this matter seriously.

As to what you mention of the picture, I have often heard my father say that he did design to sit for you, but did not: I shall certainly take care that you shall have a picture, and a good one: pray let me know what size you would have it of; if you design it should fit any particular place you must send me the exact measure of the place.

Your sister [lady Oxford], as you used to call her, is much your servant; she has been at the Bath for some time; she is better than when she went. I suppose you hear sometimes from our friend Mr. Pope: he has taken another voyage into Homerland,[a] as Gay calls it; I wish he may make an advantageous voyage of it.

I doubt you will say that since I was so long before I began to write that now I have begun I do not know when to end; I will therefore tell you that I am, with great truth, sir, your most obedient humble servant, OXFORD.

I desire your acceptance of a ring, a small remembrance of my father. How shall I send it you?

FROM A QUAKER.[b]

When three hundred pounds were offered for taking up the drapier in 1724.

"AND the people said unto Saul, Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid: as the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for he wrought with God this day. So the people rescued Jonathan that he died not."[c]

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Quilca, January 25, 1725.

I HAVE a packet of letters which I intended to send by Molly, who has been stopped three days by the bad weather; but now I will send them by the post to-morrow to Kells, and enclosed to Mr. Tickell; there is one to you, and one to James Stopford.

I can do no work this terrible weather, which has put us all seventy times out of patience. I have been deaf nine days, and am now pretty well recovered again.

Pray desire Mr. Stanton and Mr. Worral to continue giving themselves some trouble with Mr. Pratt; but, let it succeed or not, I hope I shall be easy.

Mrs. Johnson swears it will rain till Michaelmas. She is so pleased with her pickaxe that she wears it fastened to her girdle on her left side, in balance with her watch. The lake is strangely overflown, and we are desperate about turf, being forced to buy it three miles off; and Mrs. Johnson (God help her!) gives you many a curse. Your mason is come, but cannot yet work upon your garden. Neither can I agree with him about the great wall. For the rest, vide the letter you will have on Monday, if Mr. Tickell uses you well.

The news of this country is, that the maid you sent down, John Farelly's sister, is married; but the portion and settlement are yet a secret. The cows here never give milk on Midsummer eve.

You would wonder what carking and caring there is among us for small beer and lean mutton, and starved lamb, and stopping gaps, and driving cattle from the corn. In that we are all-to-be-Dingleyed.

The ladies' room smokes; the rain drops from the skies into the kitchen; our servants eat and drink like the devil, and pray for rain, which entertains them at cards and sleep; which are much lighter than spades, sledges, and crows. Their maxim is,

Eat like a Turk,
Sleep like a dormouse;
Be last at work,
At victuals foremost.

Which is all at present; hoping you and your good family are well, as we are all at this present writing, &c.

Robin has just carried out a load of bread and cold meat for breakfast; this is their way; but now a cloud hangs over them, for fear it should hold up and the clouds blow off.

I write on till Molly comes in for the letter. O, what a draggletail will she be before she gets to Dublin! I wish she may not happen to fall upon her back by the way.

I affirm against Aristotle, that cold and rain congregate homogenes, for they gather together you and your crew, at whist, punch, and claret. Happy weather for Mrs. Maul, Betty, and Stopford, and all true lovers of cards and laziness.

THE BLESSINGS OF A COUNTRY LIFE.

Far from our debtors,
No Dublin letters,
Not seen by our betters.

THE PLAGUES OF A COUNTRY LIFE.

A companion with news,
A great want of shoes;
Eat lean meat, or choose;
A church without pews.
Our horses astray,
No straw, oats, or hay;
December in May,
Our boys run away,
All servants at play.

Molly sends for the letter.

TO MRS. PRATT.

On her present of a fire screen adorned with painted maps.

March 18, 1725.

MADAM,—Mrs. Fitzmaurice did the unkindest thing she could imagine; she sends an open note by a servant (for she was too much a prude to write me a letter), desiring that the dean of St. Patrick's should inquire for one Howard, master of a ship, who had brought over a screen to him, the said dean, from Mrs. Pratt. Away I ran to the custom-house, where they told me the ship was expected every day; but the god of winds, in confederacy with Mrs. Fitzmaurice to teaze me, kept the ship at least a month longer, and left me miserable in a state of impatience, between hope and fear, worse than a lady who is in pain that her clothes will not be ready against the birthday. I will not move your good nature by representing how many restless nights and days I have passed, with what dreams my sleep hath been disturbed, where I sometimes saw the ship sinking, my screen floating in the sea, and the mermaids struggling which of them should get it for their own apartment. At last Medlycott, whose heart inclines him to pity the distressed, gave me notice of its safe arrival; he interposed his authority, and, overruling the tedious forms of the custom-house, sent my screen to the deanery, where it was immediately opened, on Tuesday the 16th instant, three minutes seven seconds after four o'clock in the afternoon, the day being fair but somewhat windy, the sun in Aries, and the moon within thirty-nine hours eight seconds and a half of being full; all which I had, by consulting Ptolemy, found to be fortunate incidents, prognosticating that with due care my screen will escape the mops of the housemaid and the greasy hands of the footmen.

At the opening the screen just after dinner, some company of both sexes were present; the ladies were full of malice, and the men of envy, while I remained very affectedly calm. But all agreed that nothing showed a better judgment than to know how to make a proper present, and that no present could be more judiciously chosen; for no man in this kingdom wanted a screen so much as myself, and besides, since I had left the world, it was very kind to send "The World" to me. However, one of the ladies affirmed "that your gift was an open reflection upon my age; that she had made the same present some time ago to her grandfather; and that she could not imagine how any of her sex wound send a screen to a gentleman without a design to insinuate that he was absolutely un homme sans conséquence." For my own part, I confess I never expected to be sheltered by the world, when I have been so long endeavouring to shelter myself from it.

See how ill you bestow your favour, where you meet with nothing but complaints and reproaches instead of acknowledgments, for thinking, in the midst of courts and diversions, upon an absent and insignificant man, buried in obscurity: but I know it is as hard to give thanks as to take them; therefore I shall say no more than that I received your acceptable present just as I am sure you desire I should. Though I cannot sit under my own vine or my own fig-tree, yet I will sit under my own screen and bless the giver; but I cannot promise it will add one jot to the love and esteem I have for you, because it is impossible for me to be more than I have always been, and shall ever continue, madam, your most obedient and obliged servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

I just observe that the two celestial maps are placed at the bottom, within two inches of the ground, which is the most fashionable circumstance in the whole work.

I sometimes dine in a third place with your stoic Mr. Pratt; and find he continues in health, but of late very busy, and a courtier.

I desire to present my most humble service to my lady Saville.

Mr. Fitzmaurice dines temperately at a tavern; and sometimes with clergymen, for want o' better company.

Mr. Medlycott dines with me every Sunday, and goes to church like anything.

Mrs. Fitzmaurice is left desolate; I reckoned but fifteen ladies and five gentlemen the other night in her play-room, and I condoled with her upon it. It is thought she will fall out with my lady Carteret for drawing away her company; but at present they are very great, as I find by consulting them both.

I think you are acquainted with lady Worseley; if so, tell her how angry I am at her not coming to Ireland as I expected, and was told she was actually landed: whereupon, being at that time confined by a deafness, I wrote her a most cavalier letter, which being brought back, I tore in a rage.

Miss Carteret is every day getting new magazines of arms, to destroy all England upon her return.

TO LORD CARTERET.

Deanery-house, April 17, 1725.

MY LORD,—I have been so long afflicted with a deafness, and at present with a giddiness in my head, (both old distempers), that I have not been able to attend your excellency and my lady Carteret, as my inclination and duty oblige me; and I am now hastening into the country, to try what exercise and better air will do toward my recovery. Not knowing how long I may be absent, or how soon you may think fit to leave this kingdom, I take this occasion of returning your excellency and my lady Carteret my most humble acknowledgments for your great civilities toward me, which I wish it were in my power to deserve.

I have only one humble request to make to your excellency, which I had in my heart ever since you were nominated lord-lieutenant; and it is in favour of Mr. Sheridan. I beg you will take your time for bestowing on him some church living to the value of 150*l.* per annum. He is agreed on all hands to have done more public service, by many degrees, in the education of lads, than any five of his vocation, and has much more learning than usually falls to the share of those who profess teaching, being perfectly skilled in the Greek as well as Latin tongue, and acquainted with all the ancient writers, in poetry, philosophy, and history. He is a man of good sense, modesty, and virtue. His greatest fault is a wife and four children; for which there is no excuse, but that a wife is thought necessary to a schoolmaster. His constitution is so weak that in a few years he must give up his business; and probably must starve without some preferment, for which he is an ill solicitor. My lord bishop of Elphin has promised to recommend this request to your excellency. And I hope you will please to believe that it proceeds wholly from justice and humanity, for he is neither a dependant nor relation of mine.

I humbly take my leave; and remain with the utmost respect, my lord, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Quilca, June 28, 1725.

YOU run out of your time so merrily, that you are forced to anticipate it like a young heir that spends his fortune faster than it comes in; for your letter is dated to-morrow, June 29, and God knows when it was writ, or what Saturday you mean, but I suppose it is the next, and therefore your own mare, and Dr. Swift's horse or mare, or some other horse or mare, with your own mare aforesaid, shall set out on Wednesday next, which will be June 30, and so they will have two nights' rest if you begin your journey on Saturday. You are an unlucky devil to get a living[a] the furthest in the kingdom from Quilca. If it be worth 200*l.* a-year, my lord-lieutenant has but barely kept his word, for the other fifty must go in a curate and visitation charges, and poxes, proxies I mean. If you are under the bishop of Cork,[b] he is a capricious gentleman; but you must flatter him monstrously upon his learning and his writings; that you have read his book against Toland a hundred times, and his sermons (if he has printed any) have been always your model, &c. Be not disappointed if your living does not answer the sum. Get letters of recommendation to the bishop and principal clergy, and to your neighbouring parson or parsons particularly. I often advised you to get some knowledge of tithes and church livings. You must learn the extent of your parish, the general quantity of arable land and pasture in your parish, the common rate of tithes for an acre of the several sorts of corn, and of fleeces and lambs, and to see whether you have any glebe. Pray act like a man of this world. I doubt, being so far off, you must not let your living as I do, to the several farmers, but to one man; but by all means do not let it for more than one year, till you are surely apprised of the real worth; and even then never let it for above three. Pray take my advice for once, and be very busy while you are there. It is one good circumstance that you got such a living in a convenient time, and just when tithes are fit to be let; only wool and lamb are due in spring, or perhaps belong to the late incumbent. You may learn all on the spot, and your neighbouring parsons may be very useful if they please, but do not let them be your tenants. Advise with archdeacon Wall, but do not follow him in all things. Take care of the principal squire or squires, they will all tell you the worst of your living: so will the proctors and tithe-jobbers; but you will pick out truth from among them. Pray show yourself a man of abilities. After all, I am but a weak brother myself; perhaps some clergy in Dublin who know that country will further inform you. Mr. Townshend of Cork will do you any good offices on my account without any letter. Take the oaths heartily to the powers that be, and remember that party was not made for depending puppies. I forgot one principal thing, to take care of going regularly through all the forms of oaths and inductions; for the least wrong step will put you to the trouble of repassing your patent, or voiding your living.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Quilca, June 29, 1725.

I WROTE to you yesterday, and said as many things as I could then think on, and gave it to a boy of Kells who brought me yours. It is strange that I and Stella, and Mrs. Mackfadin,[a] should light on the same thought to advise you to make a great appearance of temperance while you are abroad. But Mrs. Johnson and I go further, and say you must needs observe all grave forms, for the want of which both you and I have suffered. On supposal that you are under the bishop of Cork, I send you a letter enclosed to him, which I desire you will seal. Mrs. Johnson put me in mind to caution you not to drink or pledge any health in his company, for you know his weak side in that matter.[b] I hope Mr. Tickell has not complimented you with what fees are due to him for your patent; I wish you would say to him (if he refuses them) that I told you it was Mr. Addison's maxim to excuse nobody; for here, says he, I may have forty friends whose fees may be two guineas apiece; then I lose eighty guineas, and my friends save but two apiece.

I must tell you, Dan Jackson ruined his living by huddling over the first year, and then hoping to mend it the next; therefore pray take all the care you can to inquire into the value, and set it at the best rate to substantial people.

I know not whether you are under the bishop of Cork or not: if not, you may burn the letter.

I must desire that you will not think of enlarging your expenses, no not for some years to come, much less at present; but rather retrench them. You might have lain destitute till Antichrist came, for anything you could have got from those you used to treat; neither let me hear of one rag of better clothes for your wife or brats, but rather plainer than ever. This is positively Stella's advice as well as mine. She says now you need not be ashamed to be thought poor.

We compute you cannot be less than thirty days absent; and pray do not employ your time in lolling a-bed till noon to read Homer, but mind your business effectually: and we think you ought to have no breaking up this August: but affect to adhere to your school closer than ever; because you will find that your ill-wishers will give out you are now going to quit your school, since you have got preferment, &c.

Pray send me a large bundle of exercises, good as well as bad, for I want something to read.

I would have you carry down three or four sermons, and preach every Sunday at your own church, and be very devout.

I sent you in my last a bill of twenty pounds on Mr. Worral; I hope you have received it.

Pray remember to leave the pamphlet with Worral, and give him directions, unless you have settled it already some other way. You know it must come out just when the parliament meets.

Keep these letters where I advise you about your living, till you have taken advice.

Keep very regular hours for the sake of your health and credit; and wherever you lie a night within twenty miles of your living, be sure call the family that evening to prayers.

I desire you will wet no commission with your old crew, nor with any but those who befriend you, as Mr. Tickell, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] Mrs. Macfadin was mother to Dr. Sheridan's wife.

[b] He wrote a pamphlet against drinking to the memory of the dead.

TO LORD CARTERET.

July 3, 1725.

MY LORD,—I am obliged to return your excellency my most humble thanks for your favour to Mr. Sheridan, because when I recommended him to you I received a very gracious answer; and yet I am sensible that your chief motive to make some provision for him was, what became a great and good person, your distinguishing him as a man of learning, and one who deserved encouragement on account of his great diligence and success in a most laborious and difficult employment [a schoolmaster].

Since your excellency has had an opportunity so early in your government of gratifying your English dependants by a bishopric and the best deanery in the kingdom [Down], I cannot but hope that the clergy of Ireland will have their share in your patronage. There is hardly a gentleman in the nation who has not a near alliance with some of that body; and most of them who have sons usually breed one of them to the church; although they have been of late years much discouraged and discontented by seeing strangers to the country almost perpetually taken into the greatest ecclesiastical preferments; and too often, under governors very different from your excellency, the choice of persons was not to be accounted for either to prudence or justice.

The misfortune of having bishops perpetually from England, as it must needs quench the spirit of emulation among us to excel in learning and the study of divinity, so it produces another great discouragement, that those prelates usually draw after them colonies of sons, nephews, cousins, or old college companions, to whom they bestow the best preferments in their gift; and thus the young men sent into the church from the university here have no better prospect than to be curates or small country vicars for life.

It will become so excellent a governor as you a little to moderate this great partiality; wherein as you will act with justice and reason, so you will gain the thanks and prayers of the whole nation, and take away one great cause of universal discontent. For I believe your excellency will agree that there is not another kingdom in Europe where the natives (even those descended from the conquerors) have been treated as if they were almost unqualified for any employment either in church or state.

Your excellency, when I had the honour to attend you, was pleased to let me name some clergymen who are generally understood by their brethren to be the most distinguished for their learning and piety. I remember the persons were, Dr. Delany, Dr. Ward of the north, Mr. Ecklin, Mr. Synge of Dublin, and Mr. Corbet; they were named by me without any regard to friendship, having little commerce with most of them, but only the universal character they bear: this was the method I always took with my lord Oxford at his own command, who was pleased to believe that I would not be swayed by any private affections, and confessed I never deceived him; for I always dealt openly when I offered anything in behalf of a friend, which was but seldom: because in that case I generally made use of the common method at court to solicit by another.

I shall say nothing of the young men among the clergy, of whom the three hopefullest are said to be Mr. Stopford, Mr. King, and Mr. Dobbs, all fellows of the college, of whom I am only acquainted with the first. But these are not likely to be great expecters under your excellency's administration, according to the usual period of governors here.

If I have dealt honestly in representing such persons among the clergy as are generally allowed to have the most merit, I think I have done you a service, and am sure I have made you a great compliment, by distinguishing you from most great men I have known these thirty years past; whom I have always observed to act as if they never received a true character, nor had any value for the best; and consequently dispensed their favours without the least regard to abilities or virtue. And this defect I have often found among those from whom I least expected it.

That your excellency may long live a blessing and ornament to your country, by pursuing as you have hitherto done the steps of honour and virtue, is the most earnest wish and prayer of, my lord, your excellency's most obedient and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE REV. MR. WORRALL.

Quilca, July 12, 1725.

I HAVE received your letter, and thank you heartily for it. I know not anybody except yourself who would have been at so much trouble to assist me, and who could have so good success, which I take as kindly as if you had saved me from utter ruin; although I have witnesses that I acted with indifferency enough when I was sure I was not worth a groat besides my goods. There appears to be only 100*l.* remaining according to my account (except this last quarter), and if I lose it it is a trifle in comparison of what you have recovered for me. I think Mr. Pratt has acted very generously, and like a true friend, as I always took him to be; and I have likewise good witnesses to swear that I was more concerned at his misfortunes than my own. And so repeating my thanks to you, but not able to express them as I ought, I shall say no more on this subject, only that you may inquire where the money may be safely put out at 6*l.* per cent. I beg pardon that I did not compute the interest of sir William Fownes's money, which reduces what is due to me about 59*l.* All of consequence is my note to him for 100*l.*

I gave over all hopes of my hay as much as I did of my money; for I reckoned the weather had ruined it; but your good management can conquer the weather. But Charles Grattan, the critic, says the cocks are too large, considering the bad weather, and that there is danger they may heat. You know best.

Mrs. Johnson says you are an ill manager; for you have lost me above 300 apples, and only saved me 1200*l.*

Do not tell me of difficulties how to keep the —— from the wall-fruit.[a] You have got so ill a reputation by getting my money, that I can take no excuse; and I will have the thing effectually done, though it should cost me ten groats. Pray let the ground be levelled as you please, as it must likewise be new dunged, as good husbandry requires; friend Ellis will assist you.

I am quite undone by the knavery of Sheriff and White, and all you have done for me with Mr. Pratt signifies nothing if I must lose 10*l.*

I had your letter about Mrs. Johnson's money, and she thanks you for your care; and says, considering her poverty, you have done as much for her as for me. But I thought my letter to you was enough, without a letter of attorney; for all money matters I am the greatest cully alive.

Little good may do you with your favourable weather; we have had but five good days these twelve weeks.

The ladies are pretty well; but Mrs. Johnson, after a fortnight's great amendment, had yesterday a very bad day; she is now much better. They both present their humble service to Mrs. Worrall, and so do I, and am ever yours, &c.

Jo.,[b] who brings you this, desired me to lend him 20*l.*, which I very prudently refused; but said, if he would leave the worth of it in soap and candles in the Deanery-house, Mrs. Brent viewing them, I would empower you, as I do hereby, to pay him 20*l.* and place it to my account. JONATHAN SWIFT.

Pray desire Mrs. Brent to have ready a hogshead of bottles, packed up as usual, of the same wine with the last she sent, and the next carrier shall have orders to call for it.

Let Mrs. Brent take out what candles or soap are necessary for the ladies, and only as much as will empty two of the boxes, that Jo. may have them; I mean out of those boxes which he is to leave at the deanery for my security for the 20*l.* which he is to receive from you.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

London, July 24, 1725.

MR. FORD will tell you how I do and what I do. Tired with suspense, the only insupportable misfortune of life, I desired, after nine years of autumnal promises and vernal excuses, a decision; and very little cared what that decision was, provided it left me at liberty to settle abroad, or put me on a foot of living agreeably at home. The wisdom of the nation has thought fit, instead of granting so reasonable a request, to pass an act, which, fixing my fortune unalterably to this country, fixes my person here also: and those who had the least mind to see me in England have made it impossible for me to live anywhere else. Here I am then, two-thirds restored, my person safe (unless I meet hereafter with harder treatment than even that of sir Walter Raleigh), and my estate, with all the other property I have acquired or may acquire, secured to me. But the attainder is kept carefully and prudently in force, lest so corrupt a member should come again into the house of lords, and his bad leaven should sour that sweet untainted mass. This much I thought I might say about my private affairs to an old friend, without diverting him too long from his labours to promote the advantage of the church and state of Ireland; or from his travels into those countries of giants and pigmies from whence he imports a cargo I value at a higher rate than that of the richest galleon. Ford brought the dean of Derry [Dr. Berkeley] to see me. Unfortunately for me, I was then out of town; and the journey of the former into Ireland will perhaps defer for some time my making acquaintance with the other; which I am sorry for. I would not by any means lose the opportunity of knowing a man who can espouse in good earnest the system of Father Malebranche, and who is fond of going a missionary into the West Indies.[a] My zeal for the propagation of the gospel will hardly carry me so far; but my spleen against Europe has more than once made me think of buying the dominion of Bermudas, and spending the remainder of my days as far as possible from those people with whom I have passed the first and greatest part of my life. Health and every other natural comfort of life is to be had there better than here. As to imaginary and artificial pleasures, we are philosophers enough to despise them. What say you? Will you leave your Hibernian flock to some other shepherd, and transplant yourself with me into the middle of the Atlantic Ocean? We will form a society more reasonable and more useful than that of Dr. Berkeley's college: and I promise you solemnly, as supreme magistrate, not to suffer the currency of Wood's halfpence: nay, the coiner of them shall be hanged if he presumes to set his foot on our island.

[a] In Naboth's vineyard.

Let me hear how you are and what you do; and if you really have any latent kindness still at the bottom of your heart for me, say something very kind to me, for I do not dislike being cajoled. If your heart tells you nothing, say nothing, that I may take the hint and wean myself from you by degrees. Whether I shall compass it or not, God knows; but surely this is the properest place in the world to renounce friendship in or to forget obligations. Mr. Ford says he will be with us again by the beginning of the winter. Your star [Mrs. Johnson] will probably hinder you from taking the same journey. Adieu, dear dean. I had something more to say to you, almost as important as what I have said already, but company comes in upon me, and relieves you.

FROM THE EARL OF OXFORD

Dover-street, July 26, 1725.

REVEREND SIR,—Mr. Clayton going to Ireland, I take the opportunity of writing to you, in the first place to tell you that I am ready to make good my promise which I made of sending you a picture of my father. The painter has done his part, so that the picture is now ready, but I do not know how to send it to you safe: you did tell me a gentleman should call, but where he lives, or who he is, I know not. I am very desirous you should have it, because it hath been so long coming: and I am very ambitious of doing anything that may in the least be agreeable to you. You had heard of this sooner, but I have been for three months out of town; I made a long progress, even beyond Edinburgh fifty miles.

I inquire of you sometimes of dean Berkeley:[b] I was sorry to hear that you were troubled with that melancholy distemper the want of hearing, although in some cases it is good; but one would have it in one's power to hear or not hear, as it suits best with one's inclinations.

I am also sorry that there is no mention made of any design of your coming into England. I long much for it, and do flatter myself with the thoughts of seeing you under my roof, where you shall exert more authority than I will allow to belong to any bishops made since ———.[a] Do not lay aside all thoughts of coming over; change of air may do you good as well as the voyage. I thank God your sister is very well, considering the way she is in; I hope in two months, or thereabouts, she will be much better: she presents her humble service to you. Peggy is very well.

Pope is well, I suppose; he is rambling about the country. I have the pleasure of seeing a picture which is very like you every day, and is as good a picture as ever Jarvis painted. I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant and brother, OXFORD.

[a] Berkeley's scheme for settling in the Bermudas.
[b] Dr. Berkeley was then the dean of Derry.

TO MR. WORRALL.

Quilca, August 27, 1725.

I WAS heartily sorry to hear you had got the gout, being a disease you have so little pretence to; for you have been all your life a great walker and a little drinker. Although it be no matter how you got your disease, since it was not by your vices; yet I do not love to think I was an instrument, by leading you a walk of eight or nine miles, where your pride to show your activity in leaping down a ditch hurt your foot in such a manner as to end in your present disease.

I have not heard of Mr. Webb, and if he should come here I can do nothing with him; for I shall not take my own judgment, but leave it to some able lawyer to judge and recommend the security; for now it is time for me to learn some worldly wisdom.

I thank you for the purchase you have made of Bristol beer; it will soon pay for itself by saving me many a bottle of wine; but I am afraid it is not good for your gout.

My deafness has left me above three weeks, and therefore I expect a visit from it soon; and it is somewhat less vexatious here in the country, because none are about me but those who are used to it.

Mrs. Worrall's observation is like herself; she is an absolute corrupted city lady, and does not know the pleasures of the country, even of this place, with all its millions of inconveniences. But Mrs. Dingley is of her opinion, and would rather live in a Dublin cellar than a country palace.

I would fain have a shed thrown up in the furthest corner of Naboth's vineyard, toward the lower end of Shebb's garden, till I can find leisure and courage to build a better in the centre of the field. Can it be done?

The weather continues as foul as if there had not been a day of rain in the summer, and it will have some very ill effect on the kingdom.

I gave Jack Grattan[b] the papers corrected, and I think half spoiled by the cowardly caution of him and others. He promised to transcribe them time enough, and my desire is they may be ready to be published upon the first day the parliament meets. I hope you will contrive it among you that it may be sent unknown (as usual) to some printer with proper directions. I had lately a letter without a name, telling me that I have got a sop to hold my tongue, and that it is determined we must have that grievance, &c., forced on us.

[a] The accession of George I.
[b] A very worthy clergyman.

My intention is to return about the beginning of October, if my occasions do not hinder me. Before that time it will be seen how the parliament will act. They who talk with me think they will be slaves as usual, and led where the government pleases.

My humble service to Mrs. Worrall. The ladies present theirs to you both. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM EDWARD EARL OF OXFORD.

Dover street, August 30, 1725.

REVEREND SIR,—I received the favour of your letter; I am vexed that the trifle of the ring should not have reached you; I found where the fault lay; I hope you will soon receive both the picture and the ring safe: I have ordered them to the care of Erasmus Lewis, esq., our old friend, and he is a punctual man, and is well acquainted with Mr. Ford and my lord Arran's chaplain, Mr. Charleton; so I hope this method will not fail that I have now taken. I would not be wanting in the least trifle by which I might show the value and esteem I have and always must and will have for you.

The picture I have of you is the same which Mr. Jervis drew of you in Ireland, and it is very like you, and is a very good picture; and though Mr. Jervis is honoured with the place of his majesty's painter, he cannot paint a picture I shall so much value as I do that of the dean of St. Patrick's.

My old fellow collegiate[a] has done so right a thing as to prefer one of your recommendation. I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant, OXFORD.

My wife sends her compliments to you; she is as well as can be expected.

TO MR. WORRALL.

Quilca, August 31, 1725.

I HAVE yours of the 28th. I am still to acknowledge and thank you for the care of my little affairs. I hope I shall not want the silver; for I hope to be in town by the beginning of October, unless extreme good weather shall invite me to continue.

Since Wood's patent is cancelled, it will by no means be convenient to have the paper printed, as I suppose you and Jack Grattan and Sheridan will agree; therefore, if it be with the printer [Mrs. Harding], I would have it taken back, and the press broke, and let her be satisfied.

The work is done, and there is no more need of the drapier.

Mrs. Johnson does not understand what you mean by her stamped linen, and remembers nothing of it; but supposes it is some jest.

The ladies are well; all our services to Mrs Worrall. Mrs. Dingley at last discovered the meaning of the stamped linen, which makes that part of my letter needless.

Pray pay Jo. Beaumont 4*l.* for a horse I bought from him, and place it to my account.

JONATHAN SWIFT

When Jo. brings you a piece of linen of twenty-four yards, pray put my name upon it, and pay him 6*l.* 8*s.*

FROM MR. ROCHFORT.

Wednesday morning, September 9, 1725.

DEAR SIR,—I find myself stand in need of the advice I bestowed on you the other night, and therefore, if you have not got rid of your cold, I would prescribe a small jaunt to Belcamp[b] this morning. If you find yourself thus disposed, I will wait for you here in my boots: the weather may perhaps look gloomy at the deanery; but I can assure you it is a fine day in the parish,[a] where we set up for as good tastes as our neighbours: to convince you of mine, I send you this invitation. I am, dear sir, your much obliged and obedient servant, GEORGE ROCHFORT.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Quilca, September 11, 1725.

IF you are indeed a discarded courtier, you have reason to complain, but none at all to wonder; you are too young for many experiences to fall in your way, yet you have read enough to make you know the nature of man. It is safer for a man's interest to blaspheme God than to be of a party out of power, or even to be thought so. And since the last was the case, how could you imagine that all mouths would not be open when you were received, and in some manner preferred, by the government, though in a poor way? I tell you there is hardly a Whig in Ireland who would allow a potato and buttermilk to a reputed Tory. Neither is there anything in your countrymen upon this article more than what is common to all other nations, only quoad magis et minus. Too much advertency is not your talent, or else you had fled from that text as from a rock. For, as don Quixote said to Sancho, "What business had you to speak of a halter in a family where one of it was hanged?" And your innocence is a protection that wise men are ashamed to rely on, further than with God. It is indeed against common sense to think that you should choose such a time, when you had received a favour from the lord-lieutenant, and had reason to expect more, to discover your disloyalty in the pulpit. But what will that avail? Therefore sit down and be quiet, and mind your business as you should do, and contract your friendships, and expect no more from man than such an animal is capable of, and you will every day find my description of yahoos more resembling. You should think and deal with every man as a villain, without calling him so, or flying from him, or valuing him less. This is an old true lesson. You believe every one will acquit you of any regard to temporal interest; and how came you to claim an exception from all mankind? I believe you value your temporal interest as much as anybody, but you have not the arts of pursuing it. You are mistaken. Domestic evils are no more within a man than others; and he who cannot bear up against the first will sink under the second; and in my conscience I believe this is your case; for, being of a weak constitution, in an employment precarious and tiresome, loaden with children, cum uxore neque leni neque commoda, a man of intent and abstracted thinking, enslaved by mathematics and complaint of the world, this new weight of party malice had struck you down, like a feather on a horse's back, already loaden as far as he is able to bear. You ought to change the apostle's expression, and say, I will strive to learn in whatever state, &c.

I will hear none of your visions; you shall live at Quilca but three fortnights and a month in the year; perhaps not so much. You shall make no entertainments but what are necessary to your interests; for your true friends would rather see you over a piece of mutton and a bottle once a quarter; you shall be merry at the expense of others; you shall take care of your health, and go early to bed, and not read late at night; and laugh with all men, without trusting any; and then a fig for the contrivers of your ruin, who now have no further thoughts but to stop your progress, which perhaps they may not compass, unless I am deceived more than is usual. All this you will do, si mihi credis, and not dream of printing your sermon, which is a project abounding with objections unanswerable, and with which I could fill this letter. You say nothing of having preached before the lord-lieutenant, nor whether he is altered towards you; for you speak nothing but generals. You think all the world has now nothing to do but to pull Mr. Sheridan down; whereas it is nothing but a slap in your turn, and away. Lord Oxford once said to me on an occasion, "These fools, because they hear a noise about their ears of their own making, think the whole world is full of it." When I come to town we will change all this scene, and act like men of the world. Grow rich, and you will have no enemies; go sometimes to the castle; keep fast Mr. Tickell and Balaguer;[a] frequent those on the right side, friends to the present powers; drop those who are loud on the wrong party, because they know they can suffer nothing by it.

FROM MR. POPE

September 14, 1725.

I NEED not tell you with what real delight I should have done anything you desired, and, in particular, any good offices in my power towards the bearer of your letter, who is this day gone for France. Perhaps it is with poets as with prophets, they are so much better liked in another country than their own, that your gentleman, upon arriving in England, lost his curiosity concerning me.[a] However, had he tried, he had found me his friend; I mean, he had found me yours. I am disappointed at not knowing better a man whom you esteem, and comfort myself only with having got a letter from you, with which, after all, I sit down a gainer, since, to my great pleasure, it confirms my hope of once more seeing you. After so many dispersions and so many divisions, two or three of us may yet be gathered together; not to plot, nor to contrive silly schemes of ambition, or vex our own or others' hearts with busy vanities, (such as, perhaps, at one time of life or other, take their tour in every man,) but to divert ourselves, and the world too if it pleases; or, at worst, to laugh at others as innocently and as unhurtfully as at ourselves. Your travels [Gulliver's] I hear much of; my own I promise you shall never more be in a strange land, but a diligent, I hope useful, investigation[c] of my own territories.[d] I mean no more translations, but something domestic, fit for my own country and for my own time.

If you come to us I will find you elderly ladies enough that can halloo, and two that can nurse, and they are too old and feeble to make too much noise, as you will guess when I tell you they are my own mother and my own nurse. I can also help you to a lady who is as deaf, though not so old, as yourself: you will be pleased with one another, I will engage, though you do not hear one another: you will converse like spirits, by intuition. What you will most wonder at is, she is considerable at court, yet no party-woman; and lives in court, yet would be easy and make you easy.

One of those you mention, (and I dare say always will remember,) Dr. Arbuthnot, is at this time ill of a very dangerous distemper, an imposthume in the bowels; which is broke, but the event is very uncertain. Whatever that be, (he bids me tell you, and I write this by him,) he lives or dies your faithful friend; and one reason he has to desire a little longer life is, the wish to see you once more.

He is gay enough in this circumstance to tell you he would give you (if he could) such advice as might cure your deafness, but he would not advise you, if you were cured, to quit the pretence of it; because you may by that means hear as much as you will, and answer as little as you please. Believe me, yours, &c.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Quilca, September 19, 1725.

WE have prevailed with Neal, in spite of his harvest, to carry up miss with your directions; and it is high time, for she was run almost wild, though we have something civilized her since she came among us. You are too short in circumstances. I did not hear you was forbid preaching. Have you seen my lord? Who forbade you to preach? Are you no longer chaplain? Do you never go to the castle? Are you certain of the accuser, that it is Tighe? Do you think my lord acts thus because he fears it would breed ill humour if he should openly favour one who is looked on as of a different party? I think that is too mean for him. I do not much disapprove your letter, but I think it a wrong method; pray read over the enclosed twice, and if you do not dislike it let it be sent (not by a servant of yours, nor from you) to Mr. Tickell. There the case is stated as well as I could do it in generals, for want of knowing particulars. When I come to town I shall see the lord-lieutenant, and be as free with him as possible. In the mean time I believe it may keep cold; however, advise with Mr. Tickell and Mr. Balaguer. I should fancy that the bishop of Limerick [Dr. William Burscough] could easily satisfy his excellency, and that my lord-lieutenant believes no more of your guilt than I, and therefore it can be nothing but to satisfy the noise of party at this juncture that he acts as he does; and if so (as I am confident it is) the effect will cease with the cause. But, without doubt, Tighe and others have dinned the words Tory and Jacobite into his excellency's ears, and therefore your text, &c., was only made use of as an opportunity.

Upon the whole matter, you are no loser, but at least have got something. Therefore be not like him who hanged himself because, going into a gaming-house and winning ten thousand pounds, he lost five thousand of it, and came away with only half his winnings. When my lord is in London we may clear a way to him to do you another job, and you are young enough to wait.

We set out to Dublin on Monday the 5th of October, and hope to sup at the deanery the next night, where you will come to us if you are not already engaged.

I am grown a bad bailiff toward the end of my service. Your hay is well brought in, and better stacked than usual. All here are well.

I know not what you mean by my having some sport soon; I hope it is no sport that will vex me.

Pray do not forget to seal the enclosed before you send it.

I send you back your letter to the lord-lieutenant.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO DR. SHERIDAN

Quilca, September 25, 1725.

YOUR confusion hindered you from giving any rational account of your distress till this last letter, and therein you are imperfect enough. However, with much ado, we have now a tolerable understanding how things stand. We had a paper sent enclosed, subscribed by Mr. Ford, as we suppose; it is in print, and we all approve it, and this I suppose is the sport I was to expect.[a] I do think it is agreed that all animals fight with the weapons natural to them, (which is a new and wise remark out of my own head,) and the devil take that animal who will not offend his enemy when he is provoked with his proper weapon; and though your old dull horse little values the blows I give him with the butt end of my stick, yet I strike on and make him wince in spite of his dulness; and he shall not fail of them while I am here; and I hope you will do so too to the beast who has kicked against you, and try how far his insensibility will protect him, and you shall have help, and he will be vexed, for so I found your horse this day, though he would not move the faster. I will kill that flea or louse which bites me, though I get no honour by it.

Laudari ab iis, quos omnes laudant, is a maxim; and the contrary is equally true. Thank you for the offer of your mare; and how a pox could we come without her? They pulled off her and your horse's shoes for fear of being rid, and then they rode them without shoes, and so I was forced to shoe them again. All the fellows here would be Tighes, if they were but privy-counsellors. You will never be at ease for your friend's horses or your own till you have walked in a park of twenty acres, which I would have done next spring.

You say not a word of the letter I sent you for Mr. Tickell, whether you sent it him or not; and yet it was very material that I should know it. The two devils of inadvertency and forgetfulness have got fast hold on you. I think you need not quit his and Balaguer's company for the reason I mentioned in that letter, because they are above suspicions, as whiggissimi and unsuspectissimi. When the lord-lieutenant goes for England I have a method to set you right with him I hope, as I will tell you when I come to town, if I do not Sheridan it, I mean forget it.

I did a Sheridanism; I told you I had lost your letter enclosed, which you intended to lord Carteret, and yet I have it safe here.

TO MR. POPE.

September 29, 1725.

I AM now returning to the noble scene of Dublin, into the grand monde, for fear of burying my parts, to signalize myself among curates and vicars, and correct all corruptions crept in, relating to the weight of bread and butter, through those dominions where I govern.[a] I have employed my time (beside ditching) in finishing, correcting, amending, and transcribing my travels,[b] in four parts complete, newly augmented, and intended for the press when the world shall deserve them, or rather when a printer shall be found brave enough to venture his ears. I like the scheme of our meeting after distresses and dispersions, but the chief end I propose to myself in all my labours is, to vex the world rather than divert it; and if I could compass that design without hurting my own person or fortune, I would be the most indefatigable writer you have ever seen without reading. I am exceedingly pleased that you have done with translations: lord-treasurer Oxford often lamented that a rascally world should lay you under a necessity of misemploying your genius for so long a time. But since you will now be so much better employed, when you think of the world, give it one lash the more at my request. I have ever hated all nations, professions, and communities, and all my love is toward individuals; for instance, I hate the tribe of lawyers, but I love counsellor such-a-one, and judge such-a-one: it is so with physicians, (I will not speak of my own trade,) soldiers, English, Scotch, French, and the rest. But principally I hate and detest that animal called man; although I heartily love John, Peter, Thomas, and so forth. This is the system upon which I have governed myself many years (but do not tell); and so I shall go on till I have done with them. I have got materials toward a treatise proving the falsity of that definition animal rationale, and to show it should be only rationis capax. Upon this great foundation of misanthropy (though not in Timon's manner) the whole building of my travels is erected; and I never will have peace of mind till all honest men are of my opinion: by consequence you are to embrace it immediately, and procure that all who deserve my esteem may do so too. The matter is so clear that it will admit of no dispute; nay, I will hold a hundred pounds that you and I agree in the point.

I did not know your "Odyssey" was finished, being yet in the country, which I shall leave in three days. I thank you kindly for the present, but shall like it three-fourths the less from the mixture you mention of other hands; however, I am glad you saved yourself so much drudgery.—I have been long told by Mr. Ford of your great achievements in building and planting, and especially of your subterranean passage to your-garden, whereby you turned a blunder into a beauty, which is a piece of Ars Poetica.

I have almost done with harridans, and shall soon become old enough to fall in love with girls of fourteen. The lady [Mrs. Howard] whom you describe to live at court, to be deaf, and no party-woman, I take to be Mythology, but know not how to moralize it. She cannot be Mercy, for Mercy is neither deaf, nor lives at court; Justice is blind, and perhaps deaf, but neither is she a court lady: Fortune is both blind and deaf, and a court lady, but then she is a most damnable party-woman, and will never make me easy, as you promise. It must be Riches, which answers all your description: I am glad she visits you, but my voice is so weak that I doubt she will never hear me.

Mr. Lewis sent me an account of Dr. Arbuthnot's illness, which is a very sensible affliction to me, who by living so long out of the world have lost that hardness of heart contracted by years and general conversation. I am daily losing friends, and neither seeking nor getting others. O if the world had but a dozen Arbuthnots in it, I would burn my travels! but, however, he is not without fault: there is a passage in Bede highly commending the piety and learning of the Irish in that age, where, after abundance of praises, he overthrows them all, by lamenting that, alas! they kept Easter at a wrong time of the year. So our doctor has every quality and virtue that can make a man amiable or useful; but, alas! he hath a sort of slouch in his walk! I pray God protect him, for he is an excellent Christian, though not a Catholic.

I hear nothing of our friend Gay, but I find the court keeps him at hard meat. I advised him to come over here with a lord-lieutenant. Philips writes little flams (as lord Leicester called those sort of verses) on Miss Carteret. A Dublin blacksmith, a great poet, has imitated his manner in a poem to the same miss. Philips is a complainer, and on this occasion I told lord Carteret that complainers never succeed at court, though railers do.

Are you altogether a country gentleman, that I must address to you out of London, to the hazard of your losing this precious letter, which I will now conclude, although so much paper is left. I have an ill name, and therefore shall not subscribe it, but you will guess it comes from one who esteems and loves you about half as much as you deserve, I mean as much as he can.

I am in great concern at what I am just told is in some of the newspapers, that lord Bolingbroke is much hurt by a fall in hunting. I am glad he has so much youth and vigour left, (of which he has not been thrifty,) but I wonder he has no more discretion.

FROM MR. POPE.

October 15, 1725.

I AM wonderfully pleased with the suddenness of your kind answer. It makes me hope you are coming toward us, and that you incline more and more to your old friends in proportion as you draw nearer to them, and are getting into our vortex. Here is one [Bolingbroke] who was once a powerful planet, but has now (after long experience of all that comes of shining) learned to be content with returning to his first point, without the thought or ambition of shining at all. Here is another [lord Oxford] who thinks one of the greatest glories of his father was to have distinguished and loved you, and who loves you hereditarily. Here is Arbuthnot recovered from the jaws of death, and more pleased with the hope of seeing you again than that of reviewing a world, every part of which he has long despised but what is made up of a few men like yourself. He goes abroad again, and is more cheerful than even health can make a man, for he has a good conscience into the bargain, which is the most catholic of all remedies, though not the most universal. I knew it would be a pleasure to you to hear this, and in truth that made me write so soon to you.

[a] The liberties of St. Patrick's cathedral.
[b] Those of Gulliver.

I am sorry poor P. [Ambrose Philips] is not promoted in this age; for certainly, if his reward be of the next, he is of all poets the most miserable. I am also sorry for another reason; if they do not promote him, they will spoil the conclusion of one of my satires, where, having endeavoured to correct the taste of the town in wit and criticism, I end thus:—

> But what avails to lay down rules for sense?
> In George's reign these fruitless lines were writ,
> When Ambrose Philips was preferr'd for wit!

Our friend Gay is used as the friends of Tories are by Whigs, and generally by Tories too. Because he had humour he was supposed to have dealt with Dr. Swift; in like manner as, when any one had learning formerly, he was thought to have dealt with the devil. He puts his whole trust at court in that lady whom I described to you, and whom you take to be an allegorical creature of fancy: I wish she really were Riches for his sake; though as for yours, I question whether (if you knew her) you would change her for the other.

Lord Bolingbroke had not the least harm by his fall. I wish he had received no more by his other fall; lord Oxford had none by his. But lord Bolingbroke is the most improved mind, since you saw him, that ever was improved without shifting into a new body or being; paulo minus ab angelis. I have often imagined to myself, that if ever all of us meet again, after so many varieties and changes, after so much of the old world and of the old man in each of us has been altered, that scarce a single thought of the one, any more than a single atom of the other, remains just the same—I have fancied, I say, that we should meet like the righteous in the millennium, quite in peace, divested of all our former passions, smiling at our past follies, and content to enjoy the kingdom of the just in tranquillity. But I find you would rather be employed as an avenging angel of wrath, to break your vial of indignation over the heads of the wretched creatures of this world; nay, would make them eat your book, which you have made (I doubt not) as bitter a pill for them as possible.

I would not tell you what designs[a] I have in my head (beside writing a set of maxims in opposition to all Rochefoucault's[b] principles) till I see you here, face to face. Then you shall have no reason to complain of me for want of a generous disdain of this world, though I have not lost my years in yours and their service. Lord Oxford, too, (whom I have now the third time mentioned in this letter, and he deserves to be always mentioned in everything that is addressed to you, or comes from you,) expects you: that ought to be enough to bring you hither; it is a better reason than if the nation expected you. For I really enter as fully as you can desire into your principle of love of individuals: and I think the way to have a public spirit is first to have a private one; for who can believe (said a friend of mine) that any man can care for a hundred thousand people who never cared for one? No ill-humoured man can ever be a patriot, any more than a friend.

I designed to have left the following page for Dr. Arbuthnot to fill, but he is so touched with the period in yours to me concerning him, that he intends to answer it by a whole letter. He too is busy about a book, which I guess he will tell you of. So, adieu. What remains worth telling you? Dean Berkeley is well, and happy in the prosecution of his scheme. Lord Oxford and lord Bolingbroke in health, duke Disney so also; sir William Wyndham better, lord Bathurst well. These and some others preserve their ancient honour and ancient friendship. Those who do neither, if they were d——d, what is it to a Protestant priest, who has nothing to do with the dead? I answer for my own part as a papist, I would not pray them out of purgatory.

My name is as bad a one as yours, and hated by all bad people, from Hopkins and Sternhold to Gildon and Cibber; the first prayed against me with the Turk; and a modern imitator of theirs (whom I leave you to find out) has added the Christian to them, with proper definitions of each, in this manner:—

> The pope's the whore of Babylon;
> The Turk he is a Jew;
> The Christian is an infidel
> That sitteth in a pew.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.

London, October 17, 1725.

DEAR SIR,—I have the vanity to think that a few friends have a real concern for me, and are uneasy when I am in distress; in consequence of which I ought to communicate with them the joy of my recovery. I did not want a most kind paragraph in your letter to Mr. Pope to convince me that you are of the number; and I know that I give you a sensible pleasure in telling you that I think myself at this time almost perfectly recovered of a most unusual and dangerous distemper, an imposthume in the bowels; such a one that, had it been in the hands of a chirurgeon in an outward and fleshy part, I should not have been well these three months. Duke Disney, our old friend, is in a fair way to recover of such another. There have been several of them occasioned, as I reckon, by the cold and wet season. People have told me of new impostures (as they call them) every day. Poor sir William Wyndham has an imposthume: I hope the Bath, where he is going, will do him good. The hopes of seeing once more the dean of St. Patrick's revives my spirits. I cannot help imagining some of our old club met together like mariners after a storm. For God's sake do not tantalize your friends any more. I can prove, by twenty unanswerable arguments, that it is absolutely necessary that you should come over to England; that it would be committing the greatest absurdity that ever was not to do it the next approaching winter. I believe indeed it is just possible to save your soul without it, and that is all. As for your book ["Gulliver's Travels"] (of which I have framed to myself such an idea that I am persuaded there is no doing any good upon mankind without it), I will set the letters myself rather than that it should not be published. But before you put the finishing hand to it, it is really necessary to be acquainted with some new improvements of mankind that have appeared of late, and are daily appearing. Mankind has an inexhaustible source of invention in the way of folly and madness. I have only one fear, that when you come over you will be so much coveted and taken up by the ministry, that unless your friends meet you at their tables, they will have none of your company. This is really no joke; I am quite in earnest. Your deafness is so necessary a thing that I almost begin to think it an affectation. I remember you used to reckon dinners. I know of near half a year's dinners where you are already bespoke. It is worth your while to come to see your old friend Lewis, who is wiser than ever he was, the best of husbands. I am sure I can say, from my own experience, that he is the best of friends. He was so to me when he had little hope I should ever live to thank him.

[a] This was only said as an oblique reproof of the horrid misanthropy in the foregoing letter; and which, he supposed, might be chiefly occasioned by the dean's fondness for Rochefoucault, whose Maxims are founded on the principle of an universal selfishness in human nature.

[b] "Who is the great philosopher," says Addison, "for administering of consolation to the idle, the curious, and the worthless part of mankind"

You must acquaint me before you take your journey, that we may provide a convenient lodging for you among your friends. I am called away this moment, and have only time to add that I long to see you, and am most sincerely, dear sir, your most faithful humble servant, JO. ARBUTHNOT.

FROM THE EARL OF OXFORD.

Dover-street, October 19, 1725.

REVEREND SIR,—I hope you will excuse these few lines for once, when I tell you that yesterday morning, I thank God, my wife was safely delivered of a son, and both mother and child are as well as can be expected. I fancy this will not be disagreeable news to the dean of St. Patrick's, except he be very much altered, which I believe not. I will not trouble you with any more, but to tell you that I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant OXFORD.

TO MR POPE.

November 26, 1725.

I SHOULD sooner have acknowledged yours if a feverish disorder and the relics of it had not disabled me for a fortnight. I now begin to make excuses, because I hope I am pretty near seeing you, and therefore I would cultivate an acquaintance; because, if you do not knew me when you meet, you need only keep one of my letters, and compare it with my face, for my face and letters are counterparts of my heart. I fear I have not expressed that right, but I mean well, and I hate blots: I look in your letter, and, in my conscience, you say the same thing but in a better manner. Pray tell my lord Bolingbroke that I wish he were banished again, for then I should hear from him, when he was full of philosophy and talked de contemptu mundi. My lord Oxford was so extremely kind as to write to me immediately an account of his son's birth. which I immediately acknowledged; but before the letter could reach him, I wished it in the sea: I hope I was more afflicted than his lordship. It is hard that parsons and beggars should be overrun with brats while so great and good a family wants an heir to continue it. I have received his father's picture, but I lament (sub sigillo confessionis) that it is not so true a resemblance as I could wish. Drown the world! I am not content with despising it, but I would anger it, if I could with safety. I wish there were an hospital built for its despisers, where one might act with safety, and it need not be a large building, only I would have it well endowed. Philips is fort chancelant whether he shall turn parson or no. But all employments here are engaged, or in reversion. Cast wits and cast beaux have a proper sanctuary in the church; yet we think it a severe judgment that a fine gentleman, and so much the finer for hating ecclesiastics, should be a domestic humble retainer to an Irish prelate. He is neither secretary nor gentleman-usher, yet serves in both capacities. He has published several reasons why he never came to see me, but the best is that I have not waited on his lordship. We have had a poem sent from London in imitation of that on Miss Carteret. It is on Miss Harvey of a day old; we say and think it is yours. I wish it were not, because I am against monopolies. You might have spared me a few more lines of your satire, but I hope in a few months to see it all. To hear boys like you talk of millenniums and tranquillity! I am older by thirty years, lord Bolinbroke by twenty, and you but by ten, than when we last were together: and we should differ more than ever, you coquetting a maid of honour, my lord looking on to see how the gamesters play, and I railing at you both. I desire you and all my friends will take a special care that my disaffection to the world may not be imputed to my age, for I have credible witnesses ready to depose that it hath never varied from the twenty-first to the f—ty-eighth year of my life (pray fill that blank charitably). I tell you, after all, that I do not hate mankind, it is vous autres who hate them, because you would have them reasonable animals, and are angry at being disappointed: I have always rejected that definition, and made another of my own. I am no more angry with ——— than I was with the kite that last week flew away with one of my chickens; and yet I was pleased when one of my servants shot him two days after. This I say because you are so hardy as to tell me of your intentions to write maxims in opposition to Rochefoucault, who is my favourite, because I found my whole character in him; however, I will read him again, because it is possible I may have since undergone some alterations. Take care the bad poets do not outwit you, as they have served the good ones in every age, whom they have provoked to transmit their names to posterity. Mævius is as well known as Virgil, and Gildon will be as well known as you if his name gets into your verses: and as to the difference between good and bad fame, it is a perfect trifle. I ask a thousand pardons, and so leave you for this time, and I will write again without concerning myself whether you write or not. I am, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE REV. DR. STOPFORD.

Wretched Dublin, in miserable Ireland,
November 26, 1725.

DEAR JIM,—I had your kind letter from Paris, dated Nov. 14, N. S. I am angry with you for being so short, unless you are resolved not to rob your journal-book. What have vous autres voyageurs to do but write and ramble? Your picture of K. C. I. will be a great present whenever I shall receive it, which I reckon will be about the time of your return from Italy; for my lord Oxford's picture was two months coming from London.

Mr. Pope is very angry with you, and says you look on him as a prophet, who is never esteemed in his own country, and he lays all the blame upon you, but will be pacified if you see him when you come back. Your other correspondents tell me that Mr. G., beside his clothes, lost 200*l*. in money, which to me you slur over. I like your Indian's answers well; but I suppose the queen was astonished if she was told, contrary to her notions, that the great people were treated and maintained by the poor. Mrs. Johnson denies you to be a slave, and says you are much more so in quality of a governor; as all good princes are slaves to their subjects. I think you are justly dealt with: you travelled with liberty to work your slavery, and now you travel with slavery to work your liberty. The point of honour will not be so great, but you have equal opportunities to inform yourself and satisfy your curiosity. The happier you were abroad in your first travels, the more miserable you were at your return; and now the case will be directly contrary. I have been confined a fortnight with a little feverish disorder, and the consequences of it, but now am as usual with tolerable health.

As to intelligence, here is the house of commons, with a little remains of the nation's spirit against Wood's coin, are opposing the court in their unreasonable demands of money to satisfy the wanton and pretended debts of the crown, and all party but that of court and country seem to be laid asleep. I have said and writ to the lieutenant what I thought was right, and so have my betters; but all surdis auribus: this is enough for such a hermit as I to tell you of public matters. Your friends are all well, and you have not been long enough absent for any material accident to fall out. Here is a great rumour of the king's being dead or dying at Hanover, which has not the least effect on any passion in me. Dr. Delany is a most perfect courtier; Sheridan full of his own affairs and the baseness of the world; Dr. Helsham à son aise at home or abroad; the dean of St. Patrick's sitting like a toad in a corner of his great house, with a perfect hatred of all public actions and persons. You are desired to bring over a few of the testons, and what d'ye call (Julio's, I think) of Parme, Florence, and Rome, which some people would be glad of for curiosities, and will give you other money for them. If you are rich enough to buy any good copies of pictures by great hands, I desire when you would buy two to buy three, and the third shall be taken off your hands with thanks, and all accidents be answered by the buyer. The people of Ireland have just found out that their fathers, sons, and brothers, are not made bishops, judges, or officers civil or military, and begin to think it should be otherwise; but the government go on as if there were not a human creature in the kingdom fit for anything but giving money. Your brother paid the money to the lady;—what would you have more? This is a time of no events. Not a robbery or murder to be had, for want of which and poetry the hawkers are starving. Take care of your health, and come home by Switzerland; from whence travel blindfold till you get here, which is the only way to make Ireland tolerable. I am told the provost has absolutely given away all your pupils. Pray God give you grace to be hated by him and all such beasts while you live! I excused your bashfulness to the lieutenant, who said he observed and understood it, and liked you the better. He could govern a wiser nation better, but fools are fit to deal with fools; and he seems to mistake our calibre, and treats de haut en bas, and gives no sugar plums. Our dean Maule and Dr. Tisdall have taken upon them the care of the church, and make wise speeches of what they will amend in St. Andrew's vestry every week, to a crew of parsons of their own kind and importance. The primate and the earl of Cavan govern the house of lords. The archbishop of Dublin attacked the same in the castle for giving a good living to a certain animal called a Welsh black, which the other excused, alleging he was preferred to it by lord Townshend. It is a cant word for a deer-stealer. This fellow was leader of a gang, and had the honour of hanging half a dozen of his fellows in quality of informer, which was his merit. If you cannot match me that in Italy, step to Muscovy, and from thence to the Hottentots. I am just going out of town for two days, else I would have filled my paper with more nothings. Pray God bless you, and send you safe back to this place, which it is a shame for any man of worth to call his home. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. POPE AND LORD BOLINGBROKE.

December 10, 1725.

I FIND myself the better acquainted with you for a long absence, as men are with themselves for a long affliction: absence does but hold off a friend to make one see him more truly. I am infinitely more pleased to hear you are coming near us than at anything you seem to think in my favour; an opinion which has perhaps been aggrandized by the distance or dulness of Ireland, as objects look larger through a medium of fogs: and yet I am infinitely pleased with that too. I am much the happier for finding (a better thing than our wits) our judgments jump in the notion that all scribblers should be passed by in silence. To vindicate oneself against such nasty slander is much as wise as it was in your countryman, when the people imputed a stink to him, to prove the contrary by showing his backside. So let Gildon and Philips rest in peace! What Virgil had to do with Mævius[a] that he should wear him upon his sleeve to all eternity, I do not know. I have been the longer upon this, that I may prepare you for the reception both you and your works may possibly meet in England. We your true acquaintance will look upon you as a good man, and love you: others will look upon you as a wit, and hate you. So you know the worst; unless you are as vindictive as Virgil or the aforesaid Hibernian.

I wish as warmly as you for an hospital in which to lodge the despisers of the world; only I fear it would be filled wholly, like Chelsea, with maimed soldiers, and such as had been disabled in its service. I would rather have those that, out of such generous principles as you and I, despise it, fly in its face, than retire from it. Not that I have much anger against the great, my spleen is at the little rogues of it; it would vex one more to be knocked on the head with a pisspot than by a thunderbolt. As to great oppressors, they are like kites or eagles, one expects mischief from them; but to be squirted to death (as poor Wycherley said to me on his deathbed) by apothecaries' apprentices, by the understrappers of under-secretaries to secretaries who were no secretaries—this would provoke as dull a dog as Philips himself.

So much for enemies, now for friends. Mr. L—— thinks all this indiscreet; the doctor not so; he loves mischief the best of any good-natured man in England. Lord B. is above trifling: when he writes of anything in this world, he is more than mortal; if ever he trifles it must be when he turns a divine. Gay is writing tales for prince William; I suppose Mr. Philips will take this very ill for two reasons, one that he thinks all childish things belong to him, and the other, because he will take it ill to be taught that one may write things to a child without being childish. What have I more to add? but that lord Oxford desires earnestly to see you: and that many others whom you do not think the worst of will be gratified by it; none more, be assured, than yours, &c.

P. S. Pope and you are very great wits, and I think very indifferent philosophers: if you despised the world as much as you pretend, and perhaps believe, you would not be so angry with it. The founder of your sect,[b] that noble original whom you think it so great

[b] Very different is the opinion that lord Shaftesbury has given of Seneca the person here alluded to. "'Tis not," says he, finely, "the person, character, or genius, but the style and manner of this great man, which we presume to censure. We acknowledge his noble sentiments and worthy actions; we own the patriot and good minister; but we reject the writer. Where an universal monarchy was actually established, and the interest of a whole world concerned, he surely must have been esteemed a guardian angel who, as a prime minister, could for several years turn the very worst of courts and worst-conditioned of all princes to the fatherly care and just government an honour to resemble, was a slave to the worst part of the world, to the court; and all his big words were the language of a slighted lover, who desired nothing so much as a reconciliation, and feared nothing so much as a rupture. I believe the world has used me as scurvily as most people, and yet I could never find in my heart to be thoroughly angry with the simple, false, capricious thing. I should blush alike to be discovered fond of the world or piqued at it. Your definition of animal rationis, instead of the common one, animal rationale, will not bear examination; define but reason, and you will see why your distinction is no better than that of the pontiff Cotta between mala ratio and bona ratio. But enough of this: make us a visit, and I will subscribe to any side of these important questions which you please. We differ less than you imagine, perhaps, when you wished me banished again: but I am not less true to you and to philosophy in England than I was in France. Yours, &c. BOLINGBROKE.

FROM THE DUCHESS OF HAMILTON.

Wednesday. (About 1725.)

DEAR DEAN,—When we were together last I remember we spoke of a certain stanza, which you suspected me parent of by reason there were some things in it you were sure I should have said twelve years ago. If this be a rule, I am certain you are not dean Swift; for twelve years ago your promised letter had not been so long in coming to me. All I can say is, I wish you had been twelve years ago what I wish you now, and that you were now what you was twelve years ago to your real friend and humble servant,

E. HAMILTON.

TO LORD PALMERSTON.

Dublin, January 1, 1726.

MY LORD,—I am desired by one Mr. Curtis, a clergyman of this town, to write to your lordship upon an affair he has much at heart, and wherein he has been very unjustly and injuriously treated. I do now call to mind what I hear your lordship has written hither, that you were pleased many years ago, at my recommendation, to give Dr. Ellwood a grant of a chamber in the college which is at your disposal; for I had then some credit with your lordship, which I am told I have now lost, although I am ignorant of the reason. I shall therefore only inform your lordship in one point. When you gave that grant, it was understood to continue during Dr. Ellwood's continuance in the college: but he, growing to be a senior fellow and requiring more conveniencies, by changing one room and purchasing another, got into a more convenient apartment, and therefore those who now derive under the doctor have, during the doctor's life, the same property as if they derived under your lordship; just as if one of your tenants should let his holding to another during the term of his lease, and take a more convenient farm. This is directly the case, and must convince your lordship immediately; for Mr. Curtis paid for the chamber, either to the doctor or to those who derived under him, and till the doctor dies or leaves the college the grant is good.

I will say nothing of Mr. Curtis's character, because the affair is a matter of short plain justice; and, besides, because I would not willingly do the young man an injury, as I happened to do to another whom I recommended to your lordship merely for your own service, and whom you afterwards rejected, expressing your reason for doing so, that I had recommended him, by which you lost the very person of the whole kingdom who by his honesty and abilities could have been most useful to you in your offices here. But these are some of the refinements among you great men, which are above my low understanding. And, whatever your lordship thinks of me, I shall still remain your lordship's most obedient and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

of mankind. Such a minister was Seneca, under an Agrippina and a Nero."—Characteristics, iii. 23

FROM LORD PALMERSTON.

January 15, 1726.

MR. DEAN,—I should not give myself the trouble to answer your polite letter, where I as unconcerned about character and reputation as some are. The principles of justice I hope I have learned from those who always treated you in another manner than you do me, even without reason.

You charge me with injury and injustice done Mr. Curtis; he is still in his chamber; till he is turned out none is done him, and he is satisfied with my proceedings, and the issue I have put it on. Your interest with me (which, if ever lost, such letters will not regain) procured Dr. Ellwood the use of that chamber, not the power to job it. Your parallel case of landlord and tenant will not hold, without Dr. Ellwood has a writing under my hand; if he has, I will fulfil it to a tittle; if not, he is as a tenant at will, and when he quits, I am at liberty to dispose of the premises again.

Whoever told you Mr. Stanton was dismissed, because you recommended him, told you a most notorious falsehood; he is the young man I suppose you mean. The true reason was, his demand of a large additional salary, more than he had before my time; so he left the office, and was not turned out.

My desire is to be in charity with all men; could I say as much of you, you had sooner inquired into this matter, or if you had any regard to a family you owe so much to; but I fear you hugged the false report to cancel all feelings of gratitude that must ever glow in a generous breast, and to justify what you have declared, that no regard to the family was any restraint to you. These refinements are past my low understanding, and can only be comprehended by you great wits.

I always thought in you I had a friend in Ireland, but find myself mistaken. I am sorry for it; my comfort is, it is none of my fault. If you had taken anything amiss, you might have known the truth from me. I shall always be as ready to ask pardon when I have offended as to justify myself when I have not. I am, sir, your very humble servant, PALMERSTON.

TO LORD PALMERSTON.

January 29, 1726.

MY LORD,—I desire you will give yourself the last trouble I shall ever put you to; I mean of reading this letter. I do entirely acquit you of any injury or injustice done to Mr. Curtis, and if you had read that passage relating to his bad usage a second time, you could not possibly have so ill understood me. The injury and injustice he received were from those who claimed a title to his chambers, took away his key, reviled and threatened to beat him, with a great deal more of the like brutal conduct. Whereupon at his request I laid the case before you, as it appeared to me. And it would have been very strange if, on account of a trifle, and of a person for whom I have no concern, further than as he was employed by me on the character he bears of piety and learning, I should charge you with injury and injustice to him, when I knew from himself and Mr. Reading that you were not answerable for either.

As you state the case of tenant at will, it is certain no law can compel you; but, to say the truth, I then had not law in my thoughts.

Now, if what I writ of injury and injustice were wholly applied in plain terms to one or two of the college here, whose names were below my remembrance, you will consider how I could deserve an answer in every line full of foul invectives, open reproaches, jesting flirts, and contumelious terms, and what title you have to give me such contumelious treatment who never did you the least injury or received the least obligation from you. I own myself indebted to sir William Temple for recommending me to the late king, although without success, and for his choice of me to take care of his posthumous writings. But I hope you will not charge my living in his family as an obligation, for I was educated to little purpose if I retired to his house on any other motives than the benefit of his conversation and advice, and the opportunity of pursuing my studies. For, being born to no fortune, I was at his death as far to seek as ever, and perhaps you will allow that I was of some use to him. This I will venture to say, that in the time when I had some little credit I did fifty times more for fifty people, from whom I never received the least service or assistance. Yet I should not be pleased to hear a relation of mine reproaching them for ingratitude, although many of them well deserve it; for, thanks to party, I have met in both kingdoms with ingratitude enough.

If I have been ill informed in what you mention of Mr. Stanton, you have not been much better, that I declared no regard to the family (as you express it) was a restraint to me. I never had the least occasion to use any such words. The last time I saw you in London was the last intercourse I ever had with the family. But having always trusted to my own innocence, I shall not be inquisitive to know my accusers.

When I mentioned my loss of interest with you, I did it with concern, but I had no resentment, because I supposed it only to arise from different sentiments in public matters.

My lord, if my letter were polite, it was against my intentions, and I desire your pardon for it; if I have wit, I will keep it to show when I am angry, which at present I am not; because, though nothing can excuse those intemperate words your pen has let fall, yet I shall give allowance to a hasty person, hurried on by a mistake beyond all rules of decency. If a first minister of state had used me as you have done, he should have heard from me in another style, because in that case retaliating would be thought a mark of courage: but as your lordship is not in a situation to do me good, nor, I am sure, of a disposition to do me mischief, so I should lose the merit of being bold, because I could incur no danger, if I gave myself a liberty which your ill usage seemed to demand. In this point alone we are exactly equal, but in wit and politeness I am ready to yield to you as much as I do in titles and estate.

I have found out one secret, that, although you call me a great wit, you do not think me so, otherwise you would have been too cautious to have writ me such a letter.

You conclude with saying you are ready to ask pardon where you have offended. Of this I acquit you, because I have not taken the offence, but whether you will acquit yourself must be left to your conscience and honour.

I have formerly upon occasion been your humble servant in Ireland, and should not refuse to be so still; but you have so useful and excellent a friend in Mr. Reading, that you need no other, and I hope my good opinion of him will not lessen yours. I am, my lord, your most humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.

Tuesday, three o'clock, April 5, 1726.

DEAR SIR,—I have been at your lodgings this morning, but you was out early. Her royal highness [afterward queen Caroline] begs the honour of a visit from you on Thursday night at seven o'clock. You are to be attended by, dear sir, your most faithful humble servant, JO. ARBUTHNOT.

I hope you will not engage yourself at that hour; but I shall see you before that time.

TO MR. WORRALL.

London, April 16, 1726.

THE ladies have told you all my adventures, and I hear you are ruining me with dung. I have writ several times to the ladies, and shall soon do so again. I send you enclosed the bill of lading for a picture that has lain long at sea; you will be so kind to get it out of the custom-house. Mr. Medlycott[a] will make it easy if there should be any difficulties. My humble service to Mrs. Worrall, and the ladies, and all my friends. I thank God I am in pretty good health. I have now company with me; I can say no more.

I hope you are all well.

I got no voice at Oxford; but am endeavouring for one here. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE EARL OF PETERBOROUGH.

Saturday evening.[b]

ONE of your Irish heroes, that from the extremity of our English land came to destroy the wicked brazen project, desires to meet you on Monday next at Parson's-green. If you are not engaged I will send my coach for you.

Sir Robert Walpole, any morning, except Tuesday and Thursday, which are his public days, about nine in the morning, will be glad to see you at his London house. On Monday, if I see you, I will give you a further account. Your affectionate servant,

PETERBOROUGH.

TO THE EARL OF PETERBOROUGH.

April 28, 1726.

MY LORD,—Your lordship having at my request obtained for me an hour from sir Robert Walpole, I accordingly attended him yesterday at eight o'clock in the morning, and had somewhat more than an hour's conversation with him. Your lordship was this day pleased to inquire what passed between that great minister and me; to which I gave you some general answers, from whence you said you could comprehend little or nothing.

I had no other design in desiring to see sir Robert Walpole than to represent the affairs of Ireland to him in a true light, not only without any view to myself, but to any party whatsoever; and because I understood the affairs of that kingdom tolerably well, and observed the representations he had received were such as I could not agree to; my principal design was to set him right, not only for the service of Ireland, but likewise of England, and of his own administration.

I failed very much in my design; for I saw he had conceived opinions, from the example and practices of the present and some former governors, which I could not reconcile to the notions I had of liberty, a possession always understood by the British nation to be the inheritance of a human creature.

Sir Robert Walpole was pleased to enlarge very much upon the subject of Ireland, in a manner so alien from what I conceived to be rights and privileges of a subject of England, that I did not think proper to debate the matter with him so much as I otherwise might, because I found it would be in vain. I shall therefore, without entering into dispute, make bold to mention to your lordship some few grievances of that kingdom, as it consists of a people who, beside a natural right of enjoying the privileges of subjects, have also a claim of merit from their extraordinary loyalty to the present king [George I.] and his family.

[a] Thomas Medlycott, esq., member for Westminster, and a commissioner of the revenue in Ireland.

First, That all persons born in Ireland are called and treated as Irishmen, although their fathers and grandfathers were born in England; and their predecessors having been conquerors of Ireland, it is humbly conceived they ought to be on as good a foot as any subjects of Britain, according to the practice of all other nations, and particularly of the Greeks and Romans.

Secondly, That they are denied the natural liberty of exporting their manufactures to any country which is not engaged in a war with England.

Thirdly, That whereas there is a university in Ireland, founded by queen Elizabeth, where youth are instructed with a much stricter discipline than either in Oxford or Cambridge; it lies under the greatest discouragements, by filling all the principal employments, civil and ecclesiastical, with persons from England, who have neither interest, property, acquaintance, nor alliance in that kingdom, contrary to the practice of all other states in Europe which are governed by viceroys, at least what hath never been used without the utmost discontents of the people.

Fourthly, That several of the bishops sent over to Ireland, having been clergymen of obscure condition, and without other distinction than that of chaplains to the governors, do frequently invite over their old acquaintance or kindred, to whom they bestow the best preferments in their gift. The like may be said of the judges, who take with them one or two dependants, to whom they give their countenance; and who, consequently, without other merit, grow immediately into the chief business of their courts. The same practice is followed by all others in civil employments, if they have a cousin, a valet, or footman in their family born in England.

Fifthly, That all civil employments granted in reversion are given to persons who reside in England.

The people of Ireland, who are certainly the most loyal subjects in the world, cannot but conceive that most of these hardships have been the consequence of some unfortunate representations (at least) in former times; and the whole body of the gentry feel the effects in a very sensible part, being utterly destitute of all means to make provision for their younger sons, either in the church, the law, the revenue, or (of late) in the army: and, in the desperate condition of trade, it is equally vain to think of making them merchants. All they have left is, at the expiration of leases, to rack their tenants, which they have done to such a degree that there is not one farmer in a hundred through the kingdom who can afford shoes or stockings to his children, or to eat flesh, or drink anything better than sour milk or water twice in a year; so that the whole country, except the Scottish plantation in the north, is a scene of misery and desolation hardly to be matched on this side Lapland

The rents of Ireland are computed to about a million and a half, whereof one half-million at least is spent by lords and gentlemen residing in England, and by some other articles too long to mention.

About 300,000*l.* more are returned thither on other accounts; and, upon the whole, those who are the best versed in that kind of knowledge agree that England gains annually by Ireland a million at least, which even I could make appear beyond all doubt.

But as this mighty profit would probably increase, with tolerable treatment, to half a million more, so it must of necessity sink under the hardships that kingdom lies at present.

And whereas sir Robert Walpole was pleased to take notice how little the king gets by Ireland, it ought perhaps to be considered that the revenues and taxes, I think, amount to above 100,000*l.* a-year; and reckoning the riches of Ireland, compared with England, to be as one to twelve, the king's revenues there would be equal to more than five millions here; which, considering the bad payment of rents from such miserable creatures as most of the tenants in Ireland are, will be allowed to be as much as such a kingdom can bear.

The current coin of Ireland is reckoned at most but 500,000*l.*, so that above four-fifths are paid every year into the Exchequer.

I think it manifest that whatever circumstances can possibly contribute to make a country poor and despicable are all united with respect to Ireland. The nation controlled by laws to which they do not consent, disowned by their brethren and countrymen, refused the liberty not only of trading with their own manufactures, but even their native commodities, forced to seek for justice many hundred miles by sea and land, rendered in a manner incapable of serving their king and country in any employment of honour, trust, or profit; and all this without the least demerit; while the governors sent over thither can possibly have no affection to the people further than what is instilled into them by their own justice and love of mankind, which do not always operate; and whatever they please to represent hither is never called in question.

Whether the representatives of such a people, thus distressed and laid in the dust, when they meet in a parliament, can do the public business with that cheerfulness which might be expected from free-born subjects, would be a question in any other country except that unfortunate island; the English inhabitants whereof have given more and greater examples of their loyalty and dutifulness than can be shown in any other part of the world.

What part of these grievances may be thought proper to be redressed by so wise and great a minister as sir Robert Walpole, he perhaps will please to consider; especially because they have been all brought upon that kingdom since the Revolution; which, however, is a blessing annually celebrated there with the greatest zeal and sincerity.

I most humbly entreat your lordship to give this paper to sir Robert Walpole, and desire him to read it, which he may do in a few minutes. I am, with the greatest respect, my lord, your lordship's most obedient and humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

London, July 8, 1726.

GOOD DOCTOR,—I have had two months of great uneasiness at the ill account of Mrs. Johnson's health, and, as it is usual, feared the worst that was possible, and doubted all the good accounts that were sent me. I pray God her danger may warn her to be less wilful, and more ready to fall into those measures that her friends and physician advise her to. I had a letter two days ago from archdeacon Wall, dated six days, before yours, wherein he gives me a better account than you do, and therefore I apprehend she hath not mended since; and yet he says he can honestly tell me she is now much better. Pray thank the archdeacon, and tell him he is to have a share in this letter; and therefore I will save him the trouble of another. Tell him also that I never asked for my 1000*l.*, which he hears I have got, though I mentioned it to the princess the last time I saw her; but I bid her tell Walpole[a] I scorned to ask him for it. But blot out this passage, and mention it to no one except the ladies, because I know Mrs. Johnson would be pleased with it, and I will not write to them till I hear from them; therefore this letter is theirs as well as yours. The archdeacon further says that Mrs. Johnson has not tasted claret for several months, but once at his house. This I dislike. I cannot tell who is the fourth of your friends, unless it be yourself: I am sorry for your new laborious studies, but the best of it is, they will not be your own another day. I thank you for your new style and most useful quotations. I am only concerned that, although you get the grace of the house, you will never get the grace of the town, but die plain Sheridan, or Tom at most, because it is a syllable shorter than doctor. However, I will give it you at length in the superscription; and people will so wonder how the news could come and return so quick to and from England, especially if the wind be fair when the packet goes over; and let me warn you to be very careful in sending for your letters two days after the commencement. You lost one post by my being out of town; for I came hither to-day, and shall stay three or four upon some business, and then go back to Mr. Pope's, and there continue till August, and then come to town till I begin my journey to Ireland, which I propose the middle of August. My old butler Archy is here ruined and starving, and has pursued me and wrote me a letter, but I have refused to see him. Our friend at the castle writ to me two months ago to have a sight of those papers, &c., of which I brought away a copy. I have answered him, that whatever papers I have are conveyed from one place to another through nine or ten hands, and that I have the key. If he should mention anything of papers in general, either to you or the ladies, and that you can bring it in, I would have you and them to confirm the same story, and laugh at my humour in it, &c. My service to Dr. Delany, Dr. Helsham, the Grattans and Jacksons. There is not so despised a creature here as your friend [Ambrose Philips] with the soft verses on children. I heartily pity him. This is the first time I was ever weary of England, and longed to be in Ireland; but it is because go I must; for I do not love Ireland better, nor England, as England, worse; in short you all live in a wretched dirty doghole and prison, but it is a place good enough to die in. I can tell you one thing, that I have had the fairest offer made me of a settlement here that one can imagine, which, if I were ten years younger, I would gladly accept, within twelve miles of London and in the midst of my friends. But I am too old for new schemes, and especially such as would bridle me in my freedoms and liberalities. But so it is, that I must be forced to get home, partly by stealth and partly by force. I have indeed one temptation for this winter, much stronger, which is of a fine house and garden, and park, and wine-cellar in France, to pass away winter in;[b] and if Mrs. Johnson were not so out of order, I would certainly accept of it; and I wish she could go to Montpelier at the same time. You see I am grown visionary, and therefore it is time to have done. Adieu. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. WORRALL.

Twickenham, July 15, 1726.

I WISH you would send me a common bill in form upon any banker for 1[illegible]l., and I will wait for it, and in the mean time borrow where I can. What you tell me of Mrs. Johnson I have long expected with great oppression and heaviness of heart. We have been perfect friends these thirty-five years. Upon my advice they both came to Ireland, and have been ever since my constant companions; and the remainder of my life will be a very melancholy scene, when one of them is gone, whom I most esteemed upon the score of every good quality that can possibly recommend a human creature. I have these two months seen through Mrs. Dingley's disguises.[a] And indeed ever since I left you my heart has been so sunk that I have not been the same man, nor ever shall be again, but drag on a wretched life, till it shall please God to call me away. I must tell you as a friend, that, if you have reason to believe Mrs. Johnson cannot hold out till my return, I would not think of coming to Ireland; and in that case I would expect of you in the beginning of September to renew my licence for another half-year, which time I will spend in some retirement far from London, till I can be in a disposition of appearing after an accident that must be so fatal to my quiet. I wish it could be brought about that she might make her will. Her intentions are to leave the interest of all her fortune to her mother and sister during their lives, and afterwards to Dr. Stephen's hospital, to purchase lands for such uses there as she designs. Think how I am disposed while I write this, and forgive the inconsistencies. I would not for the universe be present at such a trial of seeing her depart. She will be among friends that, upon her own account and great worth, will tend her with all possible care, where I should be a trouble to her, and the greatest torment to myself. In case the matter should be desperate, I would have you advise, if they come to town, that they should be lodged in some airy healthy part, and not in the deanery, which besides, you know, cannot but be a very improper thing for that house to breathe her last in. This I leave to your discretion, and I conjure you to burn this letter immediately, without telling the contents of it to any person alive. Pray write to me every week, that I may know what steps to take; for I am determined not to go to Ireland, to find her just dead, or dying. Nothing but extremity could make me so familiar with those terrible words applied to such a dear friend. Let her know I have bought her a repeating gold watch for her ease in winter nights. I designed to have surprised her with it; but now I would have her know it, that she may see how my thoughts are always to make her easy.

I am of opinion that there is not a greater folly than to contract too great and intimate a friendship, which must always leave the survivor miserable.

On the back of Burton's note there was written the account of Mrs. Johnson's sickness. Pray, in your next avoid that mistake, and leave the back side blank.

When you have read this letter twice, and retain what I desire, pray burn it; and let all I have said lie only in your breast.

Pray write every week. I have (till I know further) fixed on August the fifteenth to set out for Ireland. I shall continue or alter my measures according to your letters. Adieu.

Direct your letters still to Mrs. Rice, &c.

Pray tell Mr. Dobbs of the college that I received his letter, but cannot possibly answer it, which I certainly would if I had materials.

As to what you say about promotion, you will find it was given immediately to Maule,[b] as I am told; and I assure you I had no offers, nor would accept them.

[a] Sir Robert, afterwards earl of Orford.

[b] Lord Bolingbroke invited the dean to spend a winter with him at his house in France, on the banks of the Loire.

[b] Dr. Henry Maule, promoted to the bishopric of Cloyne, Sept. 6, 1726; translated to Dromore, March 20, 1731, and to Meath, May 24, 1744. This most worthy man was one of the first promoters of the Protestant charter schools in Ireland for the reception and education of children of papists, which have met with great success.

My behaviour to those in power has been directly contrary since I came here. I would rather have good news from you than Canterbury, though it were given me upon my own terms.

TO THE REV. DR. STOPFORD

Twickenham, near London, July 20, 1726.

Dear Jim,—I had a letter from you three months ago, with an account of a fine picture you had sent me, which is now safe in Ireland, for which I readily thank you, and Robert Arbuthnot swears it is an original. I did not answer you because I was told you were in motion. I had yours of July 12, N.S., yesterday; and since you are fixed at Paris, I venture to send you this, thought Robert Arbuthnot be here. He has lately married a lady among us of 900*l*. a-year, and I think will soon go to France; but I have chiefly lived about two months with Mr. Pope, since the town grew empty. I shall leave him the beginning of August, and so settle my affairs to be in Ireland by the end of that month, for my licence of half-a-year will then be out. I came here to see my old friends, and upon some business I had with two of them, which, however, proves to be of little consequence. The people in power have been civil enough to me; many of them have visited me. I was not able to withstand seeing the princess, because she had commanded that whenever I came hither, as the news said I intended, that I should wait on her. I was latterly twice with the chief minister; the first time by invitation, and the second at my desire for an hour, wherein we differed in every point: but all this made a great noise, and soon got to Ireland, from whence, upon the late death of the bishop of Cloyne, it was said I was offered to succeed, and I received many letters upon it, but there was nothing of truth, for I was neither offered nor would have received, except upon conditions which would never be granted. For I absolutely broke with the first minister and have never seen him since, and I lately complained of him to the princess, because I knew she would tell him. I am, besides, all to pieces with the lord-lieutenant, whom I treated very roughly, and absolutely refused to dine with him. So that, dear Jim, you see how little I shall be able to assist you with the great ones here, unless some change of ministry should happen. Yet when a new governor goes over, it is hard if I cannot be some way instrumental. I have given strict charge to Mr. Pope to receive you with all kindness and distinction. He is perfectly well received by all the people in power, and he loves to do good; and there can hardly go over a governor to whom he may not, by himself or friends, strongly recommend you.

I fear I shall have more than ordinary reasons to wish you a near neighbour to me in Ireland, and that your company will be more necessary than ever, when I tell you that I never was in so great a dejection of spirits. For I lately received a letter from Mr. Worrall, that one of the two oldest and dearest friends I have in the world is in so desperate a condition of health as makes me expect every post to hear of her death. It is the younger of the two with whom I have lived in the greatest friendship for thirty-three years. I know you will share in my trouble, because there were few persons whom I believe you more esteemed. For my part, as I value life very little, so the poor casual remains of it, after such a loss, would be a burden that I must heartily beg God Almighty to enable me to bear; and I think there is not a greater folly than that of entering into too strict and particular a friendship, with the loss of which a man must be absolutely miserable; but especially at an age when it is too late to engage in a new friendship. Besides, this was a person of my own rearing and instructing from childhood; who excelled in every good quality that can possibly accomplish a human creature.—They have hitherto writ me deceiving letters, but Mr. Worrall has been so just and prudent as to tell me the truth; which, however racking, is better than to be struck on the sudden.—Dear Jim, pardon me, I know not what I am saying; but believe me that violent friendship is much more lasting and as much engaging as violent love. Adieu.

If this accident should happen before I set out, I believe I shall stay this winter in England; where it will be at least easier to find some repose than upon the spot.

If I were your adviser, I would say one thing against my own interest; that, if you must leave your college for the reason you hint at, I think it would be better to live in England on your own estate, and the addition of 1000*l*., and trust to industry and friends and distinction here, than pass your days in that odious country and among that odious people. You can live in a thrifty moderate way, and thrift is decent here; and you cannot but distinguish yourself. You have the advantage to be a native of London; here you will be a freeman, and in Ireland a slave. Here your competitors will be strangers; there every rascal, your contemporary, will get over your head by the merit of party. Farewell again; though my head is now disturbed, yet I have had these thoughts about you long ago.

Jonathan Swift.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE TO THE THREE YAHOOS OF TWICKENHAM; JONATHAN, ALEXANDER, JOHN.[a]

Most Excellent Triumvirs of Parnassus,—Though you are probably very indifferent where I am or what I am doing, yet I resolve to believe the contrary. I persuade myself that you have sent at least fifteen times within this fortnight to Dawley farm,[b] and that you are extremely mortified at my long silence. To relieve you therefore from this great anxiety of mind, I can do no less than write a few lines to you: and I please myself beforehand with the vast pleasure which this epistle must needs give you. That I may add to this pleasure and give you further proofs of my beneficent temper, I will likewise inform you that I shall be in your neighbourhood again by the end of next week; by which time I hope that Jonathan's imagination of business will be succeeded by some imagination more becoming a professor of that divine science la bagatelle. Adieu, Jonathan, Alexander, John! Mirth be with you.

From the banks of the Severn, July 23, 1726.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

July 27, 1726.

I have yours just now of the 19th, and the account you give me is nothing but what I have some time expected with the utmost agonies; and there is one aggravation of constraint, that where I am I am forced to put on an easy countenance. It was at this time the best office your friendship could do not to deceive me. I was violently bent all last year, as I believe you remember, that she should go to Montpellier, or Bath, or Tunbridge. I entreated, if there was no amendment, they might both come to London. But there was a fatality, although I indeed think her stamina could not last much longer when I saw she could take no nourishment. I look upon this to be the greatest event that can ever happen to me; but all my preparations will not suffice to make me bear it like a philosopher nor altogether like a Christian. There hath been the most intimate friendship between us from our childhood, and the greatest merit on her side, that ever was in one human creature toward another. Nay, if I were now near her, I would not see her; I could not behave myself tolerably and should redouble her sorrow. Judge in what a temper of mind I write this. The very time I am writing I conclude the fairest soul in the world hath left its body. Confusion! that I am this moment called down to a visitor, when I am in the country, and not in my power to deny myself. I have passed a very constrained hour, and now return to say I know not what. I have been long weary of the world, and shall for my small remainder of years be weary of life, having for ever lost that conversation which could only make it tolerable. I fear while you are reading this, you will be shedding tears at her funeral; she loved you well, and a great share of the little merit I have with you is owing to her solicitations.

I wrote you about a week ago.[a]

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. POPE.

London, August 4, 1726.

I HAD rather live in forty Irelands than under the frequent disquiets of hearing you are out of order. I always apprehend it most after a great dinner: for the least transgression of yours, if it be only two bits and one sup more than your stint, is a great debauch; for which you certainly pay more than those sots who are carried dead drunk to bed. My lord Peterborough spoiled everybody's dinner, but especially mine, with telling us that you were detained by sickness. Pray let me have three lines under any hand or pothook that will give me a better account of your health; which concerns me more than others, because I love and esteem you for reasons that most others have little to do with, and would be the same although you had never touched a pen further than with writing to me.

I am gathering up my luggage and preparing for my journey: I will endeavour to think of you as little as I can, and when I write to you I will strive not to think of you; this I intend in return to your kindness; and further I know nobody has dealt with me so cruelly as you, the consequences of which usage I fear will last as long as my life, for so long shall I be (in spite of my heart) entirely yours,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. WORRALL.

London, August 6, 1726.

AT the same time that I had your letter, with the bill (for which I thank you), I received another from Dr. Sheridan, both full of the melancholy account of our friend. The doctor advises me to go over at the time I intended, which I now design to do, and to set out on Monday, the 15th from hence. However, if any accident should happen to me, that you do not find me come over on the 1st of September, I would have you renew my licence of absence from the 2nd of September, which will be the day that my half year will be out: and since it is not likely that you can answer this so as to reach me before I leave London, I desire you will write to me, directed to Mrs. Kenah, in Chester, where I design to set up, and shall hardly be there in less than a fortnight from this time; and if I should then hear our friend was no more, I might probably be absent a month or two in some parts of Derbyshire or Wales. However, you need not renew the licence till the 1st of September; and if I come not I will write to you from Chester. This unhappy affair is the greatest trial I ever had; and I think you are unhappy in having conversed so much with that person under such circumstances. Tell Dr. Sheridan I had his letter, but care not to answer it. I wish you would give me your opinion at Chester whether I shall come over or not. I shall be there, God willing, on Thursday, the 18th instant. This is enough to say, in my present situation. I am, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

My humble service and thanks to Mrs. Worrall for the care of our friend, which I shall never forget.

TO MR. WORRALL.

August 13, 1726.

THIS is Saturday, and on Monday I set out for Ireland. I desired you would send me a letter to Chester. I suppose I shall be in Dublin with moderate fortune in ten or eleven days hence; for I will go by Holyhead. I shall stay two days at Chester, unless I can contrive to have my box sent after me. I hope I shall be with you by the end of August; but, however, if I am not with you by the 2nd of September, which is the time that my licence is out, I desire you will get me a new one; for I would not lie at their mercy, though I know it signifies nothing. I expect to be very miserable when I come, but I shall be prepared for it. I desired you would write to me to Chester, which I hope you will do; and pray hinder Dr. Sheridan from writing to me any more.

This is all I have to say to you at present. I am, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. POPE

August 22, 1726.

MANY a short sigh you cost me the day I left you, and many more you will cost me till the day you return. I really walked about like a man banished, and when I came home, found it no home. It is a sensation like that of a limb lopped off; one is trying every minute unawares to use it, and finds it is not. I may say you have used me more cruelly than you have done any other man: you have made it more impossible for me to live at ease without you: habitude itself would have done that, if I had less friendship in my nature than I have. Besides my natural memory of you, you have made a local one which presents you to me in every place I frequent: I shall never more think of lord Cobham's, the woods of Ciceter [Cirencester], or the pleasing prospect of Byberry [Bibury], but your idea must be joined with them; nor see one seat in my own garden, or one room in my own house, without a phantom of you sitting or walking before me. I travelled with you to Chester; I felt the extreme heat of the weather, the inns, the roads, the confinement and closeness of the uneasy coach, and wished a hundred times I had either a deanery or a horse in my gift. In real truth I have felt my soul peevish ever since with all about me from a warm uneasy desire after you. I am gone out of myself to no purpose, and cannot catch you. Inhiat in pedes was not more properly applied to a poor dog after a hare than to me with regard to your departure. I wish I could think no more of it, but lie down and sleep till we meet again, and let that day (how far soever off it be) be the morrow. Since I cannot, may it be my amends that everything you wish may attend you where you are, and that you may find every friend you have there in the state you wish him or her; so that your visits to us may have no other effect than the progress of a rich man to a remote estate which he finds greater than he expected; which knowledge only serves to make him live happier where he is, with no disagreeable prospect if ever he should choose to remove. May this be your state till it become what I wish. But indeed I cannot express the warmth with which I wish you all things, and myself you. Indeed you are engraved elsewhere than on the cups you sent me (with so kind an inscription), and I might throw them into the Thames without injury to the giver. I am not pleased with them, but take them very kindly too; and had I suspected any such usage from you, I should have enjoyed your company less than I really did, for at this rate I may say—

"Nec tecum possum vivere, nec sine te."

I will bring you over just such another present when I go to the deanery of St. Patrick's; which I promise you to do if ever I am enabled to return your kindness. Donarem pateras, &c. Till then I'll drink (or Gay shall drink) daily healths to you, and I will add to your inscription the old Roman vow for years to come, VOTIS X. VOTIS XX. My mother's age gives me authority to hope it for yours. Adieu.

TO MRS. HOWARD.

September 1, 1726.

MADAM,—Being perpetually teased with the remembrance of you by the sight of your ring on my finger, my patience at last is at an end; and in order to be revenged, I have sent you a piece of Irish plaid made in imitation of the Indian, wherein our workmen are grown so expert that in this kind of stuff they are said to excel that which comes from the Indies; and because our ladies are too proud to wear what is made at home, the workman is forced to run a gold thread through the middle and sell it as Indian. But I ordered him to leave out that circumstance that you may be clad in Irish stuff and in my livery. But I beg you will not tell any parliament-man from whence you had that plaid; otherwise, out of malice they will make a law to cut off all our weavers' fingers. I must likewise tell you, to prevent your pride, my intention is to use you very scurvily; for my real design is, that when the princess asks you where you got that fine nightgown, you are to say that it is an Irish plaid sent you by the dean of St. Patrick's; who, with his most humble duty to her royal highness, is ready to make her such another present at the terrible expense of eight shillings and threepence per yard, if she will descend to honour Ireland with receiving and wearing it. And in recompense I, who govern the vulgar, will take care to have her royal highness's health drunk by 500 weavers, as an encourager of the Irish manufactory. And I command you to add that I am no courtier nor have anything to ask. May all courtiers imitate me in that! I hope the whole royal family about you is in health. Dr. Arbuthnot lately mortified me with an account of a great pain in your head. I believe no head that is good for anything is long without some disorder, at least that is the best argument I had for anything that is good in my own.

I pray God preserve you; and entreat you to believe that I am, with great respect, madam, your most obedient and most obliged servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. POPE.

September 3, 1726.

YOURS to Mr. Gay gave me greater satisfaction than that to me (though that gave me a great deal); for to hear you were safe at your journey's end exceeds the account of your fatigues while in the way to it; otherwise believe me every tittle of each is important to me, which sets any one thing before my eyes that happens to you. I wrote you a long letter which I guess reached you the day after your arrival. Since then I had a conference with sir Robert Walpole, who expressed his desire of having seen you again before you left us; he said he observed a willingness in you to live among us, which I did not deny; but at the same time told him you had no such design in your coming this time, which was merely to see a few of those you loved; but that indeed all those wished it, and particularly lord Peterborough and myself, who wished you loved Ireland less had you any reason to love England more. I said nothing but what I think would induce any man to be as fond of you as I, plain truth, did they know either it or you. I cannot help thinking (when I consider the whole short list of our friends) that none of them except you and I are qualified for the mountains of Wales. The doctor [Arbuthnot] goes to cards, Gay to court; one loses money, one loses his time; another of our friends labours to be unambitious, but he labours in an unwilling soil. One lady you like[a] has too much of France to be fit for Wales; another [Mrs. Howard] is too much a subject to princes and potentates to relish that wild taste of liberty and poverty. Mr. Congreve is too sick to bear a thin air; and she [duchess of Marlborough] that leads him too rich to enjoy anything. Lord Peterborough can go to any climate, but never stay in any. Lord Bathurst is too great a husbandman to like barren hills, except they are his own to improve. Mr. Bethel indeed is too good and too honest to live in the world, but yet it is fit for its example he should. We are left to ourselves in my opinion, and may live where we please, in Wales, Dublin, or Bermudas; and for me, I assure you I love the world so well as it loves me so well that I care not in what part of it I pass the rest of my days. I see no sunshine but in the face of a friend.

I had a glimpse of a letter of yours lately, by which I find you are (like the vulgar) apter to think well of people out of power than of people in power; perhaps it is a mistake, but however there is something in it generous. Mr. Pulteney takes it extreme kindly I can perceive, and he has a great mind to thank you for that good opinion for which I believe he has only to thank his ill fortune; for if I am not in an error, he would rather be in power than out.

To show you how fit I am to live in the mountains, I will with great truth apply to myself an old sentence:—"Those that are in may abide in; and those that are out may abide out; yet to me those that are in shall be as those that are out; and those that are out shall be as those that are in."

I am indifferent as to all those matters, but I miss you as much as I did the first day when (with a short sigh) I parted. Wherever you are, or on the mountains of Wales, or on the coast of Dublin,

"Tu mihi, seu magni superas jam saxa Timavi
Sive oram Illyrici legis æquoris,[b]———

I am, and ever shall be, yours, &c.

[a] The marchioness de Vilette, lord Bolingbroke's second wife.

[b] Whether Timavus or the Illyrian coast,
Whatever land or sea thy presence boast.
DRYDEN'S Virgil.

FROM MR. PULTENEY.

London, September 3, 1726

Dear Sir,—I received the favour of your kind letter at my lord Chetwynd's; and though you had so much goodness as to forbid my answering it at that time, yet I should be inexcusable, now I have perfectly recovered my health and strength, if I did not return you my very hearty thanks for your concern for me during my illness. Though our acquaintance has not been of long date, yet I think I may venture to assure you that even among your old friends you have not many who have a juster regard for your merit than I have. I could wish that those who are more able to serve you than I am had the same desire of doing it. And yet methinks, now I consider it, and reflect who they are, I should be sorry they had the merit of doing so right a thing. As well as I wish you, I would rather not have you provided for yet than provided for by those that I do not like. Mr. Pope tells me that we shall see you in spring. When we meet again I flatter myself we shall not part so soon; and I am in hopes you will allow me a larger share of your company than you did. All I can say to engage you to come a little oftener to my house is, to promise that you shall not have one dish of meat at my table so disguised but you shall easily know what it is. You shall have a cup of your own small beer and wine mixed together; you shall have no women at table if you do not like them, and no men but such as like you. I wished mightily to be in London before you left it, having something which I would willingly have communicated to you that I do not think so discreet to trust to a letter. Do not let your expectation be raised as if it was a matter of any great consequence; it is not that, though I should be mighty glad you knew it, and perhaps I may soon find a way of letting you do so.

Our parliament, they now say, is not to meet till after Christmas. The chief business of it being to give money, it may be proper the ministers should know, a little before it meets, how much further they have run the nation in debt, that they may prudently conceal or provide what they think fit. I am told that many among us begin to grumble that England should be obliged to support the charge of a very expensive war while all the other powers of Europe are in peace. But I will enter no further into public matters, taking it for granted that a letter directed to you, and franked by me, cannot fail of raising the curiosity of some of our vigilant minirters, and that they will open it, though we know it is not customary for them so to do. Mrs. Pulteney is very much your humble servant, and I am, with great truth, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

W. Pulteney.

FROM MR. GAY.

London, September 16, 1726.

Dear Sir,—Since I wrote last, I have been always upon the ramble. I have been in Oxfordshire with the duke and duchess of Queensberry, and at Petersham, and wheresoever they would carry me; but as they will go to Wiltshire without me on Tuesday next, for two or three months, I believe I shall then have finished my travels for this year, and shall not go further from London than now and then to Twickenham. I saw Mr. Pope on Sunday, who has lately escaped a very great danger, but is very much wounded across his right hand. Coming home in the dark about a week ago, alone in my lord Bolingbroke's coach from Dawley, he was overturned where a bridge has been broke down, near Whitton, about a mile from his own house. He was thrown into the river with the glasses of the coach up, and was up to the knots of his periwig in water. The footman broke the glass to draw him out; by which he thinks he received the cut across his hand. He was afraid he should have lost the use of his little finger and the next to it; but the surgeon, whom he sent for last Sunday from London to examine it, told him that his fingers were safe, that there were two nerves cut, but no tendon. He was in very good health and very good spirits, and the wound in a fair way of being soon healed.[a] The instructions you sent me to communicate to the doctor about the singer I transcribed from your own letter, and sent to him; for at that time he was going every other day to Windsor-park to visit Mr. Congreve, who has been extremely ill, but is now recovered, so that I was prevented from seeing of him by going out of town. I dined and supped on Monday last with lord and lady Bolingbroke, at lord Berkeley's, at Cranford, and returned to London with the duke and duchess of Queensberry, on Tuesday, by two o'clock in the morning. You are remembered always with great respect by all your acquaintance, and every one of them wishes for your return. The lottery begins to be drawn on Monday next, but my week of attendance will be the first in October. I am obliged to follow the engravers to make them despatch my plates for the Fables; for without it I find they proceed but very slowly. I take your advice in this, as I wish to do in all things, and frequently revise my work, in order to finish it as well as I can. Mr. Pulteney takes the letter you sent him in the kindest manner; and I believe he is, except a few excursions, fixed in town for the winter. As for the particular affair that you want to be informed in, we are as yet wholly in the dark; but Mr. Pope will follow your instructions. Mr. Lancelot sent for the spectacles you left behind you, which were delivered to him.' Mr. Jervas's sheets are sent home to him, mended, finely washed, and neatly folded up. I intend to see Mr. Pope to-morrow or on Sunday. I have not seen Mrs. Howard a great while, which you know must be a great mortification and self-denial; but in my case it is particularly unhappy that a man cannot contrive to be in two places at the same time; if I could, while you are there, one of them should be always Dublin. But after all, it is a silly thing to be with a friend by halves, so that I will give up all thoughts of bringing his project to perfection, if you will contrive that we shall meet again soon. I am, dear sir, your most obliged and affectionate friend and servant,

J. Gay.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.

London, September 20, 1726.

I have been balancing, dear sir, these three days, whether I should write to you first. Laying aside the superiority of your dignity, I thought a notification was due to me, as well as to two others of my friends; then I considered that this was done in the public news with all the formalities of reception of a lord-lieutenant. I reflected on the dependency of Ireland; but, said I, what if my friend should dispute this? Then I considered that letters were always introduced at first from the civilized to the barbarous kingdom. In short, my affection, and the pleasure of corresponding with my dear friend, prevailed; and since you most disdainfully and barbarously confined me to two lines a month, I was resolved to plague you with twenty times that number, though I think it was a sort of a compliment to be supposed capable of saying anything in two lines. The Gascon asked only to speak one word to the French king, which the king confining him to, he brought a paper, and said, signez, and not a word more. Your negotiation with the singing man is in the hands of my daughter Nancy, who I can assure you will neglect nothing that concerns you; she has written about it. Mr. Pope has been in hazard of his life by drowning; coming late, two weeks ago, from lord Bolingbroke's in his coach and six, a bridge on a little river being broke down, they were obliged to go through the water, which was not too high, but the coach was overturned in it; and the glass being up, which he could not break nor get down, he was very near drowned; for the footman was stuck in the mud, and could hardly come in time to help him. He had that in common with Horace, that it was occasioned by the trunk of a tree; but it was trunco rheda illapsa, neque Faunus ictum dextra levabat; for he was wounded in the left hand, but thank God without any danger; but by the cutting of a large vessel lost a great deal of blood. I have been with Mrs. Howard, who has a most intolerable pain in one side of her head. I had a great deal of discourse with your friend, her royal highness. She insisted upon your wit and good conversation. I told her royal highness that was not what I valued you for, but for being a sincere honest man, and speaking truth when others were afraid to speak it. I have been for near three weeks together every day at the duchess of Marlborough's with Mr. Congreve, who has been like to die with a fever and the gout in his stomach; but he is now better, and like to do well. My brother was near being cast away going to France; there was a ship lost just by him. I write this in a dull humour, but with most sincere affection to an ungrateful man as you are, that minds everybody more than me, except what concerns my interest.

My dear friend, farewell.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

London, September 22, 1726.

A BOOKSELLER [George Faulkner], who says he is in a few days going to Dublin, calls here, and offers to carry a letter to you. I cannot resist the temptation of writing to you, though I have nothing to say more by this conveyance than I should have by that of the post; though I have lately clubbed with Pope to make up a most elegant epistle to you in prose and verse; and though I wrote the other day the first paragraph of that Chedder[a] letter which is preparing for you. The only excuse then which I can plead for writing now is, that the letter will cost you nothing. Have you heard of the accident which befel poor Pope in going lately from me? A bridge was down, the coach forced to go through the water, the bank steep, a hole on one side, a block of timber on the other, the night as dark as pitch. In short, he overturned; the fall was broke by the water, but the glasses were up, and he might have been drowned if one of my men had not broke a glass, and pulled him out through the window. His right hand was severely cut; but the surgeon thinks him in no danger of losing the use of his fingers: however, he has lately had very great pains in that arm from the shoulder downward, which might create a suspicion that some of the glass remains still in the flesh. St. André says there is none. If so, these pains are owing to a cold he took in a fit of gallantry which carried him across the water to see Mrs. Howard, who has been extremely ill, but is much better. Just as I am writing, I hear that Dr. Arbuthnot says that Mr. Pope's pains are rheumatic, and have no relation to his wound. He suffers very much; I will endeavour to see him to-morrow. Let me hear from you as often as you can afford to write. I would say something to you of myself if I had any good to say; but I am much in the same way in which you left me, eternally busy about trifles, disagreeable in themselves, but rendered supportable by their end; which is, to enable me to bury myself from the world (who cannot be more tired of me than I am of it) in an agreeable sepulchre. I hope to bring this about by next spring, and shall be glad to see you at my funeral. Adieu.

FROM MR. GAY.

Whitehall, October 22, 1726.

DEAR SIR,—Before I say one word to you give me leave to say something of the other gentleman's affair. The letter was sent; and the answer was, that everything was finished and concluded according to orders, and that it would be publicly known to be so in a very few days; so that I think there can be no occasion for his writing any more about this affair.

The letter you wrote to Mr. Pope was not received till eleven or twelve days after date; and the post-office, we suppose, have very vigilant officers, for they had taken care to make him pay for a double letter. I wish I could tell you that the cutting of the tendons of two of his fingers was a joke; but it is really so; the wound is quite healed; his hand is still weak, and the two fingers drop downward, as I told you before;[a] but I hope it will be very little troublesome or detrimental to him.

In answer to our letter of maps, pictures, and receipts, you call it a tripartite letter. If you will examine it once again, you will find some lines of Mrs. Howard and some of Mr. Pulteney which you have not taken the least notice of. The receipt of the veal is of Monsieur Devaux, Mr. Pulteney's cook; and it has been approved of at one of our Twickenham entertainments. The difficulty of the saucepan I believe you will find is owing to a negligence in perusing the manuscript, for, if I remember right, it is there called a stewpan. Your earthern vessel, provided it is close stopped, I allow to be a good succedaneum. As to the boiling chickens in a wooden bowl, I should be quite ashamed to consult Mrs. Howard upon your account, who thinks herself entirely neglected by you in not writing to her as you promised; however, let her take it as she will, to serve a friend I will venture to ask it of her. The prince and his family come to settle in town tomorrow. That Mr. Pulteney expected an answer to his letter, and would be extremely pleased to hear from you, is very certain; for I have heard him talk of it with expectation for above a fortnight.

I have of late been very much out of order with a slight fever, which I am not yet quite free from. It was occasioned by a cold, which my attendance at the Guildhall improved. I have not a friend who has got anything under my administration but the duchess of Queensberry, who has had a benefit of a thousand pounds. Your mentioning Mr. Rollinson[b] so kindly will, I know, give him much pleasure, for he always talks of you with great regard and in the strongest terms of friendship. He has been of late ill of a fever, but is recovered so as to go abroad and take the air.

If the engravers keep their word with me, I shall be able to publish my Fables soon after Christmas. The doctor's book[a] is entirely printed off, and will be very soon published. I believe you will expect that I should give you some account how I have spent my time since you left me. I have attended my distressed friend at Twickenham, and been his amanuensis, which you know is no idle charge. I have read about half Virgil and half Spenser's "Fairy Queen." I still despise court preferments, so that I lose no time upon attendance on great men; and still can find amusement enough without quadrille, which here is the universal employment of life.

I thought you would be glad to hear from me, so that I determined not to stir out of my lodgings till I had answered your letter: and I think I shall very probably hear more of the matter which I mention in the first paragraph of this letter as soon as I go abroad; for I expect it every day. We have no news as yet of Mr. Stopford:[b] Mr. Rollinson told me he shall know of his arrival, and will send me word. Lord Bolingbroke has been to make a visit to sir William Wyndham. I hear he is returned, but I have not seen him. If I had been in a better state of health, and Mrs. Howard[c] were not to come to town to-morrow, I would have gone to Mr. Pope's to-day to have dined with him there on Monday.

You ask me how to address to lord B———, when you are disposed to write to him. If you mean lord Burlington, he is not yet returned from France, but he is expected every day. If you mean lord Bathurst, he is in Gloucestershire, and makes but a very short stay; so that if you direct to one of them in St. James's-square, or to the other at Burlington-house in Piccadilly, your letter will find them. I will make your compliments to lord Chesterfield and Mr. Pulteney, and I beg you in return to make mine to Mr. Ford. Next week I shall have a new coat and new buttons for the birthday, though I do not know but a turncoat might have been more for my advantage. Yours most sincerely and affectionately.

P. S. I hear that lord Bolingbroke will be in town, at his own house in Pall-mall, next week.

As we cannot enjoy any good things without your partaking of it, accept of the following receipt[d] for stewing veal:—

'Take a knuckle of veal;
You may buy it or steal.
In a few pieces cut it.
In a stewing pan put it.
Salt, pepper, and mace,
Must season this knuckle;
Then[e] what's join'd to a place,
With other herbs muckle
That which kill'd king Will,[f]
And what never stands still;[g]
Some sprigs of that bed
Where children are bred[h]
Which much you will mend, if Both spinach and endive,
And lettuce and beet,
With marygold meet.
Put no water at all,
For it maketh things small;
Which, lest it should happen,
A close cover clap on.
Put this pot of Wood's metal[i]

And there let it be

O then! with what rapture
Will it fill dean and chapter!"

FROM DR ARBUTHNOT.

London, November 8, 1726.

I TAKE it mighty kindly that a man of your high post, dear sir, was pleased to write me so long a letter. I look upon the captain Tom[a] of a great nation to be a much greater man than the governor of it.

I am sorry your commission about your singer has not been executed sooner. It is not Nanny's fault, who has spoke several times to Dr. Pepush about it, and writ three or four letters, and received for answer that he would write for the young fellow; but still nothing is done. I will endeavour to get his name and direction, and write to him myself.

Your books shall be sent as directed; they have been printed above a month; but I cannot get my subscribers' names.[b] I will make over all my profits to you for the property of "Gulliver's Travels," which I believe will have as great a run as John Bunyan. Gulliver is a happy man, that at his age can write such a merry work.

I made my lord archbishop's[c] compliments to her royal highness, who returned his grace her thanks; at the same time, Mrs. Howard read your letter to herself. The princess immediately seized on your plaid[d] for her own use, and has ordered the young princesses to be clad in the same. When I had the honour to see her, she was reading "Gulliver," and was just come to the passage of the hobbling prince, which she laughed at. I tell you freely the part of the projectors is the least brilliant. Lewis grumbles a little at it, and says he wants the key to it, and is daily refining. I suppose he will be able to publish like Barnevelt[e] in time. I gave your service to lady Harvey. She is in a little sort of a miff about a ballad that was writ on her to the tune of Molly Mog, and sent to her in the name of a begging poet. She was bit, and wrote a letter to the begging poet, and desired him to change two double entendres, which the authors, Mr. Pulteney and lord Chesterfield, changed to single entendres. I was against that, though I had a hand in the first. She is not displeased, I believe, with the ballad, but only with being bit.

There has been a comical paper about[f] quadrille, describing it in the terms of a lewd debauch among four ladies meeting four gallants, two of a ruddy and two of a swarthy complexion, talking of their a—es, &c. The riddle is carried on in pretty strong terms: it was not found out for a long time. The ladies, imagining it to be a real thing, began to guess who were of the party. A great minister was for hanging the author. In short it has made very good sport.

Gay has had a little fever, but is pretty well recovered; so is Mr. Pope. We shall meet at lord Bolingbroke's on Thursday, in town, at dinner, and remember you. "Gulliver" is in everybody's hands. Lord Scarborough, who is no inventor of stories, told me that he fell in company with a master of a ship who told him that he was very well acquainted with "Gulliver;" but that the printer had mistaken, that he lived in Wapping and not in Rotherhithe. I lent the book to an old gentleman, who went immediately to his map to search for Lilliput.

[d] The dean sent a present of some silk plaids from Ireland to some of the royal family and to Mrs. Howard.

[e] This refers to "A Key to the Lock; or a Treatise proving beyond all Contradiction the dangerous Tendency of a late Poem, entitled the Rape of the Lock, to Government and Religion. By Esdras Barnevelt, apothecary."

[f] Written by Mr. Congreve, and printed in Almond's "Foundling Hospital for Wit," No. 93.

We expect war here. The city of London are all crying out for it, and they shall be undone without it, there being now a total stoppage of all trade. I think one of the best courses will be to rig out a privateer for the West Indies. Will you be concerned? We will build her at Bermudas, and get Mr. dean Berkeley to be our manager.

I had the honour to see lord Oxford, who asked kindly for you, and said he would write to you. If the project goes on of printing some papers, he has promised to give copies of some things which I believe cannot be found elsewhere. My family, thank God, are pretty well, as far as I know, and give their service. My brother Robert has been very ill of a rheumatism. Wishing you all health and happiness, and not daring to write my paper on the other sid I must remain, dear sir, your most faithful humble servant,

Jo. Arbuthnot.

FROM MR. POPE.

November 16, 1726.

I have resolved to take time; and in spite of all misfortunes and demurs which sickness, lameness, or disability of any kind can throw in my way, to write you (at intervals) a long letter. My two least fingers of one hand hang impediments to the other, like useless dependents, who only take up room, and never are active or assistant to our wants: I shall never be much the better for them. I congratulate you first upon what you call your cousin's wonderful book, which is publica trita manu at present, and I prophesy will be hereafter the admiration of all men. That countenance with which it is received by some statesmen is delightful: I wish I could tell you how every single man looks upon it, to observe which has been my whole diversion this fortnight. I have never been a night in London since you left me till now for this very end, and indeed it has fully answered my expectations.

I find no considerable man very angry at the book; some indeed think it rather too bold, and too general a satire; but none that I hear of accuse it of particular reflections (I mean no persons of consequence or good judgment; the mob of critics you know always are desirous to apply satire to those they envy for being above them), so that you needed not to have been so secret upon this head. Motte received the copy (he tells me) he knew not from whence, nor from whom, dropped at his house in the dark from a hackney coach; by computing the time I found it was after you left England, so for my part I suspend my judgment.

I am pleased with the nature and quality of your present to the princess. The Irish stuff you sent to Mrs. Howard her royal highness laid hold of, and has made up for her own use. Are you determined to be national in everything, even in your civilities? You are the greatest politician in Europe at this rate; but as you are a rational politician there is no great fear of you, you will never succeed.

Another thing in which you have pleased me, was what you say of Mr. Pulteney, by which it seems to me that you value no man's civility above your own dignity, or your own reason. Surely, without flattery, you are now above all parties of men, and it is high time to be so, after twenty or thirty years' observation of the great world.

"Nullius addictus jurare in verba magistri."[a]

I question not, many men would be of your intimacy, that you might be of their interest; but God forbid an honest or witty man should be of any, but that of his country. They have scoundrels enough to write for their passions and their designs; let us write for truth, for honour, and for posterity. If you must needs write about politics at all (but perhaps it is full as wise to play the fool any other way), surely it ought to be so as to preserve the dignity and integrity of your character with those times to come which will most impartially judge of you.

I wish you had writ to lord Peterborough; no man is more affectionate towards you. Do not fancy none but Tories are your friends; for at that rate I must be at most but half your friend, and sincerely I am wholly so. Adieu: write often, and come soon; for many wish you well and all would be glad of your company.

[a] "To follow any party-leader's call"

FROM MRS. HOWARD.[a]

November, 1726.

I did not expect that the sight of my ring would produce the effect it has. I was in such a hurry to show your plaid to the princess that I could not stay to put it into the shape you desired. It pleased extremely, and I have orders to fit it up according to the first design; but as this is not proper for the public, you are desired to send over, for the same princess's use, the height of the Brobdingnag dwarf multiplied by 2½. The young princesses must be taken care of; theirs must be in three shares: for a short method, you may draw a line of twenty feet, and upon that by two circles form an equilateral triangle; then measuring each side, you will find the proper quantity and proper division. If you want a more particular and better rule, I refer you to the academy of Lagado.[b] I am of opinion many in this kingdom will soon appear in your plaid. To this end it will be highly necessary that care be taken of disposing of the purple, the yellow, and the white silks; and though the gowns are for princesses the officers are very vigilant; so take care they are not seized. Do not forget to be observant how you dispose the colours. I shall take all particular precautions to have the money ready, and to return it the way you judge safest. I think it would be worth your reflecting in what manner the checker might be best managed.

The princess will take care that you shall have pumps sufficient to serve you till you return to England, but thinks you cannot, in common decency, appear in heels,[c] and therefore advises your keeping close till they arrive. Here are several Lilliputian mathematicians, so that the length of your head or of your foot is a sufficient measure. Send it by the first opportunity. Do not forget our good friends the 500 weavers. You may omit the gold thread. Many disputes have arisen here whether the big-endians and lesser-endians ever differed in opinion about the breaking of eggs, when they were to be either buttered or poached? or whether this part of cookery was ever known in Lilliput?

I cannot conclude without telling you that our island is in great joy; one of our yahoos having been delivered of a creature, half ram and half yahoo; and another has brought forth four perfect black rabbits.[d] May we not, hope, and with some probability expect, that in time our female yahoos will produce a race of Houyhnhnms? I am, sir, your most humble servant,

TO MRS. HOWARD.

November 17, 1726.

MADAM,—When I received your letter, I thought it the most unaccountable one I ever saw in my life, and was not able to comprehend three words of it together. The perverseness of your lines astonished me, which tended downward to the right in one page, and upward in the two others. This I thought impossible to be done by any one who did not squint with both eyes, an infirmity I never observed in you. However, one thing I was pleased with, that after you had writ down you repented, and writ me up again. But I continued four days at a loss for your meaning, till a bookseller sent me the Travels of one captain Gulliver, who proved a very good explainer, although at the same time I thought it hard to be forced to read a book of seven hundred pages in order to understand a letter of fifty lines; especially as those of our faculty are already but too much pestered with commentators. The stuffs you require are making, because the weaver piques himself upon having them in perfection. But he has read Gulliver's book, and has no conception what you mean by returning money; for he has become a proselyte of the Houyhnhnms, whose great principle, if I rightly remember, is benevolence; and as to myself, I am so highly offended with such a base proposal, that I am determined to complain of you to her royal highness that you are a mercenary yahoo, fond of shining pebbles. What have I to do with you or your court further than to show the esteem I have for your person, because you happen to deserve it; and my gratitude to her royal highness, who was pleased a little to distinguish me? which, by the way, is the greatest compliment I ever paid, and may probably be the last; for I am not such a prostitute flatterer as Gulliver, whose chief study is to extenuate the vices and magnify the virtues of mankind, and perpetually dins our ears with the praises of his country in the midst of corruption, and for that reason alone has found so many readers, and probably will have a pension, which I suppose was his chief design in writing. As for his compliments to the ladies, I can easily forgive him, as a natural effect of the devotion which our sex ought always to pay to yours. You need not be in pain about the officers searching or seizing the plaids, for the silk has already paid duty in England, and there is no law against exporting silk manufacture from hence. I am sure the princess and you have got the length of my foot, and sir Robert Walpole says he has the length of my head, so that I need not give you the trouble of sending you either. I shall only tell you, in general, that I never had a long head, and for that reason few people have thought it worth while to get the length of my foot. I cannot answer your queries about eggs, buttered or poached, but I possess one talent which admirably qualifies me for roasting them; for as the world with respect to eggs is divided into pelters and roasters, it is my unhappiness to be one of the latter, and consequently to be persecuted by the former. I have been five days turning over old books to discover the meaning of those monstrous births you mention. That of the four black rabbits seems to threaten some dark court intrigue, and perhaps, some change in the administration; for the rabbit is an undermining animal that loves to walk in the dark. The blackness denotes the bishops, whereof some of the last you have made are persons of such dangerous parts and profound abilities: but rabbits being clothed in furs may perhaps glance at the judges. However, the ram—by which is meant the ministry—butting with his two horns, one against the church and the other against the law, shall obtain the victory. And whereas the birth was a conjunction of ram and yahoo, this is easily explained by the story of Chiron, governor, or, which is the same thing, chief minister, to Achilles, who was half man and half brute; which, as Machiavel observes, all good governors of princes ought to be. But I am at the end of my line, and my lines. This is without a cover, to save money, and plain paper, because the gilt is so thin it will discover secrets between us. In a little room for words I assure you of my being, with truest respect, madam, your most obedient humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. POPE

Dublin, November 17, 1726.

I AM just come from answering a letter of Mrs. Howard's, writ in such mystical terms that I should never have found out the meaning if a book had not been sent me called "Gulliver's Travels," of which you say so much in yours. I read the book over, and in the second volume observed several passages which appear to be patched and altered,[a] and the style of a different sort, unless I am mistaken. Dr. Arbuthnot likes the projectors[b] least; others, you tell me, the flying island; some think it wrong to be so hard upon whole bodies or corporations, yet the general opinion is, that reflections on particular persons are most to be blamed: so that in these cases I think the best method is to let censure and opinion take their course. A bishop here said that book was full of improbable lies, and for his part he hardly believed a word of it; and so much for Gulliver.

Going to England is a very good thing, if it were not attended with an ugly circumstance of returning to Ireland. It is a shame you do not persuade your ministers to keep me on that side, if it were but by a court expedient of keeping me in prison for a plotter; but at the same time I must tell you that such journeys very much shorten my life, for a month here is longer than six at Twickenham.

How comes friend Gay to be so tedious? Another man can publish fifty thousand lies sooner than he can publish fifty fables.

I am just going to perform a very good office; it is to assist with the archbishop in degrading a parson who couples all our beggars, by which I shall make one happy man, and decide the great question of an indelible character in favour of the principles in fashion; this I hope you will represent to the ministry in my favour as a point of merit; so farewell till I return.

I am come back, and have deprived the parson, who, by a law here, is to be hanged the next couple he marries; he declared to us that he resolved to be hanged, only desired that when he was to go to the gallows the archbishop would take off his excommunication. Is not he a good Catholic? and yet he is but a Scotchman. This is the only Irish event I ever troubled you with, and I think it deserves notice. Let me add, that if I were Gulliver's friend I would desire all my acquaintance to give out that his copy was basely mangled, and abused, and added to, and blotted out, by the printer; for so to me it seems, in the second volume particularly. Adieu.

FROM MR. GAY.

November 17, 1726.

ABOUT ten days ago a book was published here of the travels of one Gulliver, which has been the conversation of the whole town ever since: the whole impression sold in a week: and nothing is more diverting than to hear the different opinions people give of it, though all agree in liking it extremely. It is generally said that you are the author; but I am told the bookseller declares he knows not from what hand it came. From the highest to the lowest it is universally read, from the cabinet-council to the nursery. The politicians to a man agree, that it is free from particular reflections, but that the satire on general societies of men is too severe. Not but we now and then meet with people of greater perspicuity, who are in search for particular applications in every leaf; and it is highly probable we shall have keys published to give light into Gulliver's design. Lord — is the person who least approves it, blaming it as a design of evil consequence to depreciate human nature, at which it cannot be wondered that he takes most offence, being himself the most accomplished of his species, and so losing more than any other of that praise which is due both to the dignity and virtue of a man.[a] Your friend, my lord Harcourt, commends it very much, though he thinks in some places the matter too far carried. The duchess dowager of Marlborough is in raptures at it; she says she can dream of nothing else since she read it: she declares that she has now found out, that her whole life has been lost in caressing the worst part of mankind, and treating the best as her foes: and that if she knew Gulliver, though he had been the worst enemy she ever had, she should give up her present acquaintance for his friendship. You may see by this that you are not much injured by being supposed the author of this piece. If you are, you have disobliged us and two or three of your best friends, in not giving us the least hint of it while you were with us; and in particular Dr. Arbuthnot, who says it is ten thousand pities he had not known it, he could have added such abundance of things upon every subject. Among lady critics, some have found out that Mr. Gulliver had a particular malice to maids of honour. Those of them who frequent the church say, his design is impious, and that it is depreciating the works of the Creator. Notwithstanding, I am told the princess has read it with great pleasure. As to other critics, they think the flying island is the least entertaining; and so great an opinion the town have of the impossibility of Gulliver's writing at all below himself, it is agreed that part was not writ by the same hand, though this has its defenders too. It has passed lords and commons nemine contradicente; and the whole town, men, women, and children, are quite full of it.

Perhaps I may all this time be talking to you of a book you have never seen, and which has not yet reached Ireland; if it has not, I believe what we have said will be sufficient to recommend it to your reading, and that you will order me to send it to you.

But it will be much better to come over yourself, and read it here, where you will have the pleasure of variety of commentators to explain the difficult passages to you.

We all rejoice that you have fixed the precise time of your coming to be cum hirundine primâ, which we modern naturalists pronounce, ought to be reckoned, contrary to Pliny, in this northern latitude of fifty-two degrees, from the end of February, Styl. Greg. at furthest. But to us, your friends, the coming of such a black swallow as you will make a summer in the worst of seasons. We are no less glad at your mention of Twickenham and Dawley: and in town, you know, you have a lodging at court.

The princess is clothed in Irish silk; pray give our service to the weavers. We are strangely surprised to hear that the bells in Ireland ring without your money. I hope you do not write the thing that is not. We are afraid that B— hath been guilty of that crime, that you (like a houyhnhnm) have treated him as a yahoo,[a] and discarded him your service. I fear you do not understand these modish terms, which every creature now understands but yourself.

You tell us your wine is bad, and that the clergy do not frequent your house, which we look upon to be tautology. The best advice we can give you is, to make them a present of your wine and come away to better.

You fancy we envy you, but you are mistaken; we envy those you are with, for we cannot envy the man we love. Adieu.

FROM THE EARL OF PETERBOROUGH.

November 29, 1726.

Sir,—I was endeavouring to give an answer to yours in a new dialect, which most of us are very fond of. I depended much upon a lady who had a good ear and a pliant tongue, in hopes she might have taught me to draw sounds out of consonants. But she, being a professed friend to the Italian speech and vowels, would give me no assistance, and so I am forced to write to you in the yahoo language.

The new one in fashion is much studied, and great pains taken about the pronunciation. Everybody (since a new turn) approves of it; but the women seem most satisfied, who declare for few words and horse performance. It suffices to let you know that there is a neighing duetto appointed for the next opera.

Strange distempers rage in the nation, which your friend the doctor[b] takes no care of. In some, the imagination is struck with the apprehension of swelling to a giant or dwindling to a pigmy. Others expect an oration equal to any of Cicero's, from an eloquent bard, and some take the braying of an ass for the emperor's speech in favour of the Vienna alliance. The knowledge of the ancient world is of no use; men have lost their titles; continents and islands have got new names just upon the appearance of a certain book.[c] Women bring forth rabbits;[d] and every man whose wife has conceived expects an heir with four legs. It was concluded not long ago, that such confusion could be only brought about by the black art, and by the spells of a notorious scribbling magician,[e] who was generally suspected and was to be recommended to the mercy of the inquisition. Indictments were upon the anvil, a charge of sorcery preparing, and Merlin's friends were afraid that the exasperated pettifoggers would persuade the jury to bring in billa vera. For they pretended to bring in certain proofs of his appearance in several shapes: at one time a drapier;[f] at another a Wapping surgeon;[g] sometimes a nardac, sometimes a reverend divine. Nay, more,—that he could raise the dead; that he had brought philosophers, heroes, and poets,

[a] It is no wonder a man of real merit should condemn a satire on his species, as it injures virtue and violates truth; and as little, that a corrupt and worthless man should approve such a satire, because it justifies his principles, and tends to excuse his practice.—Warburton.

[a] By this circumstance it is clear that Gay knew Swift to be the author of "Gulliver," though the whole letter pleasantly goes on the idea of Swift's being a stranger to the work.—Dr. Warton.

[b] Probably Arbuthnot.

[c] "Gulliver's Travels."

[d] Mary Tofts pretended to do this, but being brought up to town and well watched, the imposture was detected.

in the same caravan from the other world; and, after a few questions, had sent them all to play at quadrille in a flying island of his own.

This was the scene not many days ago, and burning was too good for the wizard. But what mutations among the Lilliputians! The greatest lady in the nation resolves to send a pair of shoes without heels to captain Gulliver; she takes vi et armis the plaid from the lady it was sent to, which is soon to appear upon her royal person; and now who but captain Gulliver? The captain indeed has nothing more to do but to chalk his pumps, learn to dance upon the rope, and I may yet live to see him a bishop. Verily, verily, I believe he never was in such imminent danger of preferment. Sir, your affectionate tar.

TO MR. POPE.

December 5, 1726.

I BELIEVE the hurt in your hand affects me more than it does yourself, and with reason, because I may probably be a greater loser by it. What have accidents to do with those who are neither jockeys, nor fox-hunters, nor bullies, nor drunkards? And yet a rascally groom shall gallop a foundered horse ten miles upon a causeway and get home safe.

I am very much pleased that you approve what was sent, because I remember to have heard a great man say, that nothing required more judgment than making a present;[a] which, when it is done to those of high rank, ought to be something that is not readily got for money. You oblige me and at the same time do me justice, in what you observe as to Mr. Pulteney. Besides, it is too late in life for me to act otherwise, and therefore I follow a very easy road to virtue and purchase it cheap. If you will give me leave to join us, is not your life and mine a state of power, and dependence a state of slavery? We care not threepence whether a prince or minister will see us or not: we are not afraid of having ill offices done us, nor are at the trouble of guarding our words for fear of giving offence. I do agree that riches are liberty, but then we are to put into the balance how long our apprenticeship is to last in acquiring them.

Since you have received the verses,[b] I most earnestly entreat you to burn those which you do not approve; and in those few where you may not dislike some parts, blot out the rest, and sometimes (though it be against the laziness of your nature) be so kind as to make a few corrections if the matter will bear them. I have some few of those things I call thoughts moral and diverting; if you please, I will send the best I can pick from them to add to the new volume. I have reason to choose the method you mention of mixing the several verses, and I hope thereby among the bad critics to be entitled to more merit than is my due.

This moment I am so happy as to have a letter from my lord Peterborough, for which I entreat you will present him with my humble respects and thanks, though he all-to-be-Gullivers me by very strong insinuations. Though you despise riddles, I am strongly tempted to send a parcel to be printed by themselves and make a ninepenny job for the bookseller. There are some of my own, wherein I exceed mankind, mira poemata! the most solemn that were ever seen: and some writ by others, admirable indeed but far inferior to mine; but I will not praise myself. You approve that writer who laughs and makes others laugh; but why should I who hate the world, or you who do not love it, make it so happy? therefore I resolve from henceforth to handle only serious subjects, nisi quid tu docte Trebati, dissentis. Yours, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MRS. HOWARD.[a]

MADAM,—My correspondents have informed me that your ladyship has done me the honour to answer several objections that ignorance, malice, and party have made to my Travels, and been so charitable as to justify the fidelity and veracity of the author. This zeal you have shown for truth calls for my particular thanks, and at the same time encourages me to beg you would continue your goodness to me, by reconciling me to the maids of honour, whom they say I have most grievously offended. I am so stupid as not to find out how I have disobliged them. Is there any harm in a young lady's reading of romances? Or did I make use of an improper engine to extinguish a fire that was kindled by a maid of honour? And I will venture to affirm, that if ever the young ladies of your court should meet with a man of as little consequence in this country as I was in Brobdingnag, they would use him with as much contempt; but I submit myself and my cause to your better judgment, and beg leave to lay the crown of Lilliput at your feet, as a small acknowledgment of your favour to my book and person. I found it in the corner of my waistcoat pocket, into which I thrust most of the valuable furniture of the royal apartment when the palace was on fire, and, by mistake, brought it with me into England; for I very honestly restored to their majesties all their goods that I knew were in my possession. May all courtiers imitate me in that, and my being, madam, &c.

FROM LADY BOLINGBROKE.[b]

De Dawley, ce premier Fevrier, 1727.

ON m'a dit, monsieur, que vous vous plaignez de n'avoir point reçû des mes lettres. Vous avez tort: je vous traite comme les divinités, qui tiennent conte aux hommes de leurs intentions. Il y a dix ans que j'ai celle de vous écrire; avant que d'avoir l'honneur de vous connoître, l'idée que je me faisois de votre gravité, me retenoit: depuis que j'ai eu celui de voir votre révérence, je ne me suis pas trouvée assez d'imagination pour l'hazarder. Un certain M. de Gulliver avoit un peu remis en mouvement cette pauvre imagination ci éteinte par l'air de Londres, et par des conversations dont je n'entend que le bruit. Je voulus me saisir de ce moment pour vous écrire, mais je tombai malade, et je l'ai toujours été depuis trois mois. Je profite donc, monsieur, du premier retour de ma santé pour vous remercier de vos reproches, dont je suis très flattée, et pour vous dire un mot de mon ami M. Gulliver. J'apprends avec une grande satisfaction, qu'il vient d'être traduit en François; et comme mon séjour en Angleterre a beaucoup redoublé mon amitié pour mon pays et pour mes compatriotes, je suis ravi qu'ils puissent participer au plaisir que m'a fait ce bon monsieur, et profiter de ces découvertes. Je ne désespère pas même que 12 vaisseaux que la France vient d'armer ne puissent être destinés à une embassade chez mes-

She had been second wife of the marquis de Vilette, chef d'escadre, nephew or cousin to madame de Maintenon. See Voltaire, "Siècle de Louis XIV.," tom. ii. She died March 18, 1749. sieurs les Houyhnhnms. En ce cas je vous proposerai que nous fassions ce voyage. En attendant je sai bon gré à un ouvrier de votre nation, qui pour instruire les dames (lesquelles comme vous savez, monsieur, font ici un grand usage de leurs éventails) en a fait faire, ou toutes les aventures de notre véridique voyageur sont dépeintes. Vous jugez bien quelle part il va avoir dans leur conversation. Cela fera à la vérité beaucoup de tort à la pluie et au beautems, qui en remplissoient une partie, et en mon particulier je sera privée des very cold et very warm, qui sont les seuls mots que j'entends. Je conte de vous envoyer de ces éventails par un de vos amis. Vous vous en ferez un mérite avec les dames d'Irlande, si tant est que vous en ayez besoin; ce que je ne crois pas, du moins si elles pensent comme les Françoises. Le seigneur de Dawley, Mr. Pope, et moi sommes ici occupés à boire, manger, dormir, ou ne rien faire, priant Dieu qu'ainsi soit de vous. Revenez ce printems nous revoir, monsieur; j'attend votre retour avec impatience pour tuer le bœuf le plus pesant, et le cochon le plus gras, qui soit dans ma ferme: l'un et l'autre seront servis en entier sur la table de votre révérence, crainte que mon cuisinier n'use aucun déguisement. Vous brillerez parmi nous du moins autant que parmi vos chanoines, nous ne serons pas moins empressés à vous plaire. Je le disputerai à tout autre, étant plus que personne du monde votre très humble et très obéissante servante.

FROM LADY BOLINGBROKE.

MR. POPE m'a fait grand plaisir, monsieur, de m'assurer que votre santé est bonne; et de me montrer dans une de vos lettres des marques de l'honneur de votre souvenir. Je trouve que vous prenez fort mal votre tems d'habiter votre Dublin pendant que nous habitons notre Dawley. Nous aurions eu grand soin de vous cet hiver, et nous aurions haï ensemble le genre humain, autant qu'il vous auroit plû, car je trouve qu'il n'embellit point au paroître. On a fait deux pièces de théâtre en France, tirées soi-disant des idées de Gulliver. Je ne vous les envoye point, car elles sont détestable: mais cela prouve au moins, que ce bon voyageur a si bien réussi chez nous, qu'on a crû, qu'en mettant seulement son nom aux plus mauvaises pièces, on les rendroit recommendables au publique. Notre fermier vous embrasse: il se plaint et boude de ce que vous êtes parti sans qu'il ait pu vous dire adieu; et de ce qu'il a vu une de vos lettres, où vous ne dites pas un mot pour lui: mais je vous crois comme les coquettes, qui se fiant à leurs charmes ne s'embarrassent pas de leurs torts. En effet ils vous seront pardonnés à la première lettre, et encore plus aisément à la première espérance de vous revoir. Adieu, monsieur, portez-vous bien, et nous serons content. Je ne m'aviserai pas de vous mander des nouvelles de ce pays-ci: Je suis étrangère de plus en plus, et je ne serois tentée de me faire naturaliser, que dans ceux où je pourrois vivre avec vous.

TO MRS. HOWARD.

February 1, 1727.

MADAM,—I am so very nice, and my workmen so fearful, that there is but one piece finished of the two, which you commanded me to send to her royal highness. The other was done; but the undertaker, confessing it was not to the utmost perfection, has obtained my leave for a second attempt, in which he promises to do wonders, and tells me it will be ready in another fortnight; although perhaps the humour may be quite off with the princess and you, for such were courts when I knew them. I desire you will order her royal highness to go to Richmond as soon as she can this summer, because she will have the pleasure of my neighbourhood; for I hope to be in London by the middle of March, and I do not love you much when you are there; and I expect to find you are altered by flattery or ill company. I am glad to tell you now that I honour you with my esteem, because, when the princess grows a crowned head, you shall have no more such compliments; and it is a hundred to one whether you will deserve them. I do not approve of your advice to bring over pumps for myself, but will rather provide another shoe for his royal highness,[a] against there shall be occasion. I will tell you an odd accident that happened this night:—While I was caressing one of my own Houyhnhnms, he bit my little finger so cruelly that I am hardly able to write; and I impute the cause to some foreknowledge in him that I was going to write to a Sieve Yahoo, for so you are pleased to call yourself. Pray tell sir Robert Walpole that if he does not use me better next summer than he did last, I will study revenge, and it shall be vengeance ecclésiastique. I hope you will get your house and wine ready, to which Mr. Gay and I are to have free access when you are at court; for as to Mr. Pope, he is not worth considering on such occasions. I am sorry I have no complaints to make of her royal highness; therefore I think I may let you tell her, "That every grain of virtue and good sense in one of her rank, considering the bad education among flatterers and adorers, is worth a dozen in any inferior person." Now if what the world says be true, that she excels all other ladies at least a dozen times, then multiply one dozen by the other, you will find the number to be one hundred and forty-four. If any man can say a civiler thing let him, for I think it too much for me. I have some title to be angry with you for not commanding those who write to me to mention your remembrance. Can there be anything more base than to make me the first advances, and then be inconstant? It is very hard that I must cross the sea, and ride two hundred miles to reproach you in person: when at the same time I feel myself, with the most entire respect, madam, &c.,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

February 17, 1727.

THIS opportunity of writing to you I cannot neglect, though I shall have less to say to you than I should have by another conveyance. Mr. Stopford being fully informed of all that passes in this boisterous climate of ours, and carrying with him a cargo of our weekly productions, you will find anger on one side, and rage on the other; satire on one side and defamation on the other. Ah! où est Grillon?[b] You suffer much where you are, as you tell me in an old letter of yours which I have before me; but you suffer with the hopes of passing next summer between Dawley and Twickenham; and these hopes, you flatter us enough to intimate, support your spirits. Remember this solemn renewal of your engagements. Remember that though you are a dean, you are not great enough to despise the reproach of breaking your word. Your deafness must not be a hackney excuse to you as it was to Oxford. What matter if you are deaf? what matter if you cannot hear what we say? You are not dumb, and we shall hear you, and that is enough. My wife writes to you herself, and sends you some fans just arrived from Lilliput, which you will dispose of to the present Stella,[a] whoever she be. Adieu, dear friend; I cannot, in conscience, keep you any longer from enjoying Mr. Stopford's conversation. I am burying myself here that I may get a day or two for Dawley, where I hope that you will find me established at your return. There I propose to finish my days in ease, without sloth; and believe I shall seldom visit London unless it be to divert myself now and then with annoying fools and knaves for a month or two. Once more, adieu; no man loves you better than your faithful B——.

FROM MR. GAY.

Whitehall, February 18, 1727.

Dear Sir,—I believe it is now my turn to write to you, though Mr. Pope has taken all I have to say, and put it into a long letter, which is sent too by Mr. Stopford; but, however, I could not omit this occasion of thanking you for his acquaintance. I do not know whether I ought to thank you or not, considering I have lost him so soon, though he has given me some hopes of seeing him again in the summer. He will give you an account of our negotiations together; and I may now glory in my success, since I could contribute to his. We dined together to-day at the doctor's, who, with me, was in high delight upon an information Mr. Stopford gave us, that we are likely to see you soon. My "Fables" are printed, but I cannot get my plates finished, which hinders the publication. I expect nothing, and am like to get nothing. It is needlss to write, for Mr. Stopford can acquaint you of my affairs more fully than I can in a letter. Mrs. Howard desires me to make her compliments; she has been in an ill state as to her health all this winter, but I hope is somewhat better. I have been very much out of order myself for the most part of the winter; upon my being let blood last week my cough and my headache are much better. Mrs. Blount always asks after you. I refused supping at Burlington-house to-night in regard to my health; and this morning I walked two hours in the park. Bowrie told me this morning that Pope had a cold, and that Mrs. Pope is pretty well. The contempt of the world grows upon me, and I now begin to be richer and richer; for I find I could, every morning I awake, be content with less than I aimed at the day before. I fancy, in time, I shall bring myself into that state which no man ever knew before me. In thinking I have enough, I really am afraid to be content with so little, lest my good friends should censure me for indolence, and the want of laudable ambition, so that it will be absolutely necessary for me to improve my fortune to content them. How solicitous is mankind to please others! Pray give my sincere service to Mr. Ford. Dear sir, yours most affectionately, J. Gay.

FROM MR POPE.

March 8, 1727.

Mr. Stopford will be the bearer of this letter, for whose acquaintance I am, among many other favours, obliged to you; and I think the acquaintance of so valuable, ingenious, and unaffected a man to be none of the least obligations.

Our "Miscellany" is now quite printed. I am prodigiously pleased with this joint volume, in which methinks we look like friends, side by side, serious and merry by turns, conversing interchangeably, and walking down hand in hand to posterity; not in the stiff forms of learned authors, flattering each other, and setting the rest of mankind at nought; but in a free, unimportant, natural, easy manner; diverting others just as we diverted ourselves. The third volume consists of verses, but I would choose to print none but such as have some peculiarity, and may be distinguished for ours from other writers. There's no end of making books, Solomon said, and above all making miscellanies, which all men can make. For unless there be a character in every piece like the mark of the elect, I should not care to be one of the twelve thousand signed.

You received, I hope, some commendatory verses from a horse and a Lilliputian, to Gulliver, and an heroic epistle of Mrs. Gulliver. The bookseller would fain have printed them before the second edition of the book, but I would not permit it without your approbation; nor do I much like them. You see how much like a poet I write, and if you were with us you would be deep in politics. People are very warm and very angry, very little to the purpose, but therefore the more warm and the more angry: non nostrum est tantas componere lites. I stay at Twit'nam without so much as reading newspapers, votes, or any other paltry pamphlets: Mr. Stopford will carry you a whole parcel of them, which are sent for your diversion, but not imitation. For my own part, methinks I am at Glubbdubdrib with none but ancients and spirits about me.

I am rather better than I used to be at this season, but my hand (though as you see it has not lost its cunning) is frequently in very awkward sensations rather than pain. But to convince you it is pretty well, it has done some mischief already, and just been strong enough to cut the other hand while it was aiming to prune a fruit-tree.

Lady Bolingbroke has writ you a long lively letter, which will attend this: she has very bad health; he very good. Lord Peterborough has writ twice to you; we fancy some letters have been intercepted, or lost by accident. About ten thousand things I want to tell you: I wish you were as impatient to hear them, for if so you would, you must come early this spring. Adieu. Let me have a line from you. I am vexed at losing Mr. Stopford as soon as I knew him; but I thank God I have known him no longer. If every man one begins to value must settle in Ireland, pray make me know no more of them, and I forgive you this one.

TO THE REV. MR. WALLIS.

Dublin, April 8, 1727.

Sir,—I am just going for England, and must desire you to be my proxy at the bishop's visitation. I find there is likewise a triennial visitation, and think the enclosed may serve for both, with your wise management. The ladies are with me, being now come to live at the deanery for this summer. You have their service, and so has Mrs. Wallis as well as mine. I reckon you are now deep in mire and mortar, and are preparing to live seven years hence. I have been plagued with the roguery of my deanery proctor, whom I have discharged. I believe I am worse for him 600*l.*, and his brother is not much better. I wish you had been at my elbow to advise one, for you are fitter for the world than I am. I hope to come safe back, and then to have done with England. I am ever yours, &c.

Jonathan Swift.

MR. POPE TO W. FORTESQUE, ESQ.

Twit'nam, May 1, 1727.

Dear Sir,—Dr. Swift is come into England, who is now with me, and with whom I am to ramble again.

[a] Mrs. Johnson died the month preceding the date of this letter. But considering the tenderness with which the dean was known to regret her loss, this is a strange expression.

to lord Oxford's and lord Bathurst's, and other places. Dr. Arbuthnot has led him a course through the town, with lord Chesterfield, Mr. Pulteney, &c. Lord Peterborough and lord Harcourt propose to carry him to sir R. Walpole, and I to Mrs. Howard, &c. I wish you were here to know him. I have just now a very ill-timed misfortune, a lame thigh, which keeps me from these parties; but I hope, since so many of my friends' prayers are on this occasion joined to my own, that I may be blessed with a speedy recovery, and make one amongst them. Many good wishes of mine attend you. May no similar accident, such as a fall from your horse by day, or a sprain in your back by night, retard your return to us! Your faithful and ever affectionate servant, A. POPE.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

London, May 13, 1727.

THIS goes by a private hand, for my writing is too much known and my letters often stopped and opened. I had yours of the 4th instant, and it is the only one I have received out of Ireland since I left you. I hardly thought our friend would be in danger by a cold: I am of opinion she should be generally in the country, and only now and then visit the town.—We are here in a strange situation; a firm settled resolution to assault the present administration, and break it if possible. It is certain that Walpole is peevish and disconcerted, stoops to the vilest offices of hireling scoundrels to write Billingsgate of the lowest and most prostitute kind, and has none but beasts and blockheads for his penmen, whom he pays in ready guineas very liberally. I am in high displeasure with him and his partisans; a great man, who was very kind to me last year, doth not take the least notice of me at the prince's court, and there hath not been one of them to see me. I am advised by all my friends not to go to France (as I intended for two months), for fear of their vengeance in a manner which they cannot execute here. I reckon there will be a warm winter, wherein my comfort is, I shall have no concern. I desire you will read this letter to none but our two friends and Mr. P——; his cousin with the red ribbon inquired very kindly after him.—I hear no news about your bishops, further than that the lord-lieutenant stickles to have them of Ireland, which Walpole always is averse from, but does not think it worth his trouble to exert his credit on such trifles. The dispute about a war or no war still continues, and the major part inclines to the latter, although ten thousand men are ordered to Holland. But this will bring such an addition to our debts that it will give great advantages against those in power in the next sessions. Walpole laughs at all this, but not so heartily as he used. I have at last seen the princess[a] twice this week by her own commands; she retains her old civility, and I my old freedom; she charges me without ceremony to be the author of a bad book,[b] though I told her how angry the ministry were; but she assures me, that both she and the prince were very well pleased with every particular; but I disown the whole affair, as you know I very well might, only gave her leave, since she liked the book, to suppose what author she pleased.—You will wonder to find me say so much of politics, but I keep very bad company, who are full of nothing else. Pray be very careful of your charge, or I shall order my lodgers the bulk of their glasses, and the number of their bottles. I stole this time to write to you, having very little to spare. I go as soon as possible to the country, and shall rarely see this town.

My service to all friends.

I desire you will send me six sets of the edition of the "Drapiers," by the first convenience of any friend or acquaintance that comes hither.

[a] Caroline princess of Wales, afterwards queen-consort of George II.
[b] "Gulliver's Travels."

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

May, 18, 1727.

I LIVED on Tuesday with you and Mr. Pope. Yesterday another of my friends found his way to this retreat [Dawley], and I shall pass this day alone. Would to God my whole life could be divided in the same manner; two-thirds to friendship, one-third to myself, and not a moment of it to the world.

In the epistle, a part of which you showed me, mention is made of the author of "Three Occasional Letters,"[a] a person entirely unknown. I would have you insinuate there that the only reason Walpole can have had to ascribe them to a particular person, is the authority of one of his spies, who wriggles himself into the company of those who neither love, esteem, nor fear the minister, that he may report, not what he hears (since no man speaks with any freedom before him), but what he guesses.

Friday Morning.

I was interrupted yesterday when I least expected it; and I am going to-day to London, where I hear that my wife is not very well. Let me know how Mrs. Pope does.

I had a hint or two more for you; but they have slipped out of my memory. Do not forget the sixty nor the twenty guineas, nor the min—— character transferred into the administration. Adieu, I am ever faithfully yours, my dear and reverend dean. I embrace Pope.

TO ARCHBISHOP KING.

May 18, 1727.

MY LORD,—I understand by some letters just come to my hands, that at your grace's visitation of the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's, a proxy was insisted on from the dean, the visitation adjourned, and a rule entered that a proxy be exhibited within a month. If your grace can find, in any of your old records or of ours, that a proxy was ever demanded for a dean of St. Patrick's, you will have some reason to insist upon it; but as it is a thing wholly new and unheard of, let the consequences be what they will, I shall never comply with it. I take my chapter to be my proxy, if I want any: it is only through them that you visit me, and my sub-dean is to answer for me. I am neither civilian nor canonist: your grace may probably be both, with the addition of a dexterous deputy. My proceeding shall be only upon one maxim; never to yield to an oppression, to justify which no precedent can be produced. I see very well how personal all this proceeding is; and how, from the very moment of the queen's death, your grace has thought fit to take every opportunity of giving me all sorts of uneasiness, without ever giving me, in my whole life, one single mark of your favour beyond common civilities. And if it were not below a man of spirit to make complaints, I could date them from six-and-twenty years past. This has something in it the more extraordinary, because during some years, when I was thought to have credit with those in power, I employed it to the utmost for your service, with great success, where it could be most useful against many violent enemies you then had, however unjustly; by which I got more ill-will than by any other action in my life, I mean from my friends. My lord, I have lived, and by the grace of God, will die an enemy to servitude and slavery of all kinds: and I believe, at the same time, that persons of such a disposition will be the most ready to pay obedience wherever it is due. Your grace has often said, "You would never infringe any of our liberties." I will call back nothing of what is past; I will forget, if I can, that you mentioned to me a licence to be absent. Neither my age, health, humour, nor fortune qualify me for little brangles; but I will hold to the practice delivered down by my predecessors. I thought, and have been told that I deserved better from that church and that kingdom: I am sure I do from your grace. And I believe people on this side will attest, that all my merits are not very old. It is a little hard that the occasion of my journey hither, being partly for the advantage of that kingdom, partly on account of my health, partly on business of importance to me, and partly to see my friends, I cannot enjoy the quiet of a few months, without your grace interposing to disturb it. But, I thank God, the civilities of those in power here, who allow themselves to be my professed adversaries, make some atonement for the unkindness of others, who have so many reasons to be my friends. I have not long to live; and therefore, if conscience were quite out of the case for me to do a base thing, I will set no unworthy examples for my successors to follow: and, therefore, repeating it again that I shall not concern myself upon the proceeding of your lordship, I am, &c.

In European characters and English thus:

The high and mighty prince EGROEGO, born to the most puissant empire of the East, Unto STELLA, the most resplendent glory of the Western hemisphere, sendeth health and happiness.

BRIGHTEST PRINCESS,—That invincible hero, the MAN MOUNTAIN, fortunately arriving at our coasts some years ago, delivered us from ruin by conquering the fleets and armies of our enemies, and gave us hopes of a durable peace and happiness. But now the martial people of Blefuscu, encouraged from his absence, have renewed the war, to revenge upon us the loss and disgrace they suffered by our valiant champion.

The fame of your superexcellent person and virtue, and the huge esteem which that great general has for you, urged us in this our second distress to sue for your favour. In order to which we have sent our able and trusty Nardac KOORBNILOB, requesting that if our general does yet tread upon the terrestrial globe, you, in compassion to us, would prevail upon him to take another voyage for our deliverance.

And lest any apprehensions of famine among us should render Nardac MOUNTAIN averse to the undertaking, we signify to you that we have stored our folds, our coops, our granaries and cellars, with plenty of provision for a long supply of the wastes to be made by his capacious stomach.

And furthermore, because as we hear you are not so well as we could wish, we beg you would complete our happiness by venturing your most valuable person along with him into our country; where, by the salubrity of our finer air and diet, you will soon recover your health and stomach.

In full assurance of your complying goodness, we have sent you some provision for your voyage, and we shall with impatience wait for your safe arrival to our kingdom. Most illustrious lady farewell.

PRINCE EGROEGO.

Dated the 11th day of the 6th moon, in the 2001 year of the Lilliputian era.

[a] Here we have a parcel of characters formed at random, by way of the address in the Lilliputian tongue.

FROM MONSIEUR VOLTAIRE.

Friday 1.

SIR,—I send you here enclosed two letters, one for M. de Morville, our secretary of state, and the other for M. de Maisons, both desirous and worthy of your acquaintance. Be so kind as to let me know if you intend to go by Calais, or by the way of Rouen. In case you resolve to go by Rouen, I will give you some letters for a good lady who lives in her country castle just by Rouen. She will receive you as well as you deserve. There you will find two or three of my intimate friends who are your admirers, and who have learned English since I am in England. All will pay you all the respects, and procure all the pleasures they are capable of. They will give you a hundred directions for Paris, and provide you with all the requisite conveniences. Vouchsafe to acquaint me with your resolution; I shall certainly do my best endeavours to serve you, and to let my country know that I have the inestimable honour to be one of your friends. I am, with the highest respect and esteem, your most humble, obedient, faithful servant, VOLTAIRE.

MONSIEUR VOLTAIRE
AU COMTE DE MORVILLE, MINISTRE ET SECRETAIRE D'ETAT A VERSAILLES.

MONSEIGNEUR,—Je me suis contenté jusqu'ici d'admirer en silence votre conduite dans les affaires de l'Europe; mais il n'est pas permis à un homme qui aime votre gloire, et qui vous est aussi tendrement attaché que je le suis, de demeurer plus longtemps sans vous faire ses sincères complimens.

Je ne puis d'ailleurs me refuser l'honneur que me fait le célèbre Monsieur Swift, de vouloir bien vous présenter une de mes lettres. Je sas que sa réputation est parvenue jusqu'à vous, et que vous avez envie de le connoître. Il fait l'honneur d'une nation que vous estimez. Vous avez lû les traductions de plusieurs ouvrages qui lui sont attribués. Et qui est plus capable que vous, monseigneur, de discerner les beautés d'un original à travers la foiblesse des plus mauvaises copies? Je crois que vous ne serez pas fâché de dîner avec Monsieur Swift, et Monsieur le Président Henaut. Et je me flatte que vous regarderez comme une preuve de mon sincère attachement à votre personne, la liberté que je prens de vous présenter un des hommes les plus extraordinaires que l'Angleterre ait produit, et les plus capables de sentir toute l'étendue de vos grandes qualités.

Je suis pour toute ma vie, avec un profond respect, et un attachement rempli de la plus haute estime, monseigneur, votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur,

VOLTAIRE.

MR. VOLTAIRE TO THE COUNT DE MORVILLE, MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE AT VERSAILLES.

June, 1727.

MY LORD,—Hitherto I have confined myself to a tacit admiration of your management of the public affairs of Europe; but it is impossible for a person who has your glory so much at heart, and for whom you have a sincere affection, to keep silence any longer, and not to present his sincere compliments to you upon the wisdom of your conduct.

Besides, I could not decline the honour which the celebrated dean Swift does me in offering to deliver this letter to your lordship. I am sensible that he is already known to you by fame, and that you are desirous of his acquaintance. He does honour to a nation which you highly esteem. You have perused the translations of several pieces attributed to him; and who is more capable than you, my lord, of discovering the beauties of an original, even through the veil of an inelegant version? I apprehend you will not be sorry to dine in company with dean Swift and the president Henault: and I also flatter myself that the liberty I take in introducing to your acquaintance one of the most extraordinary men that England ever produced—one who is most capable of forming a just idea of your truly great qualities—will be considered by you as a token of my sincere attachment to your person.

I shall ever remain, with the most profound respect and esteem, my lord, your lordship's most obedient humble servant, VOLTAIRE.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

London, June 24, 1727.

I HAVE received your last, with the enclosed print. I desire you will let Dr. Delany know that I transcribe the substance of his letter, and the translation of what was registered, and added a whole state of the case, and gave it Mrs. Howard to give to the prince from me, and to desire that, as chancellor, he would do what he thought most fit.[a] I forgot to ask Mrs. Howard what was done in it, the next time I saw her, and the day I came to town came the news of the king's death, of which I sent particulars the very same day to our friend: since then we have been all in a hurry, with millions of schemes. I deferred kissing the king's and queen's hands till the third day, when my friends at court chid me for deferring it so long. I have been and am so extremely busy, that though I begin this letter, I cannot finish it till next post; for now it is the last moment it can go, and I have much more to say. I was just ready to go France, when the news of the king's [king George I.] death arrived, and I came to town in order to begin my journey. But I was desired to delay it and I then determined it a second time; when upon some new incidents I was with great vehemence dissuaded from it by certain persons, whom I could not disobey. Thus things stand with me. My stomach is pretty good, but for some days my head has not been right, yet it is what I have been formerly used to. Here is a strange world, and our friend will reproach me for my share in it; but it shall be short, for I design soon to return into the country. I am thinking of a chancellor for the university, and have pitched upon one, but whether he will like it, or my word be of any use, I know not. The talk is now for a moderating scheme, wherein nobody shall be used the worse or better for being called Whig or Tory; and the king hath received both with great equality, showing civilities to several who are openly known to be the latter. I prevailed with a dozen, that we should go in a line to kiss the king's and queen's hands. We have now done with repining, if we shall be used well, and not baited as formerly; we all agree in it, and if things do not mend, it is not our faults: we have made our offers; if otherwise, we are as we were. It is agreed the ministry will be changed, but the others will have a soft fall; although the king must be excessive generous if he forgives the treatment of some people. I writ long ago my thoughts to my viceroy, and he may proceed as he shall be advised. But if the archbishop [Dr. William King] goes on to proceed to sub pœna contemptûs, &c., I would have an appeal at proper time, which I suppose must be to delegates, or the crown, I know not which. However, I will spend a hundred o. two pounds, rather than be enslaved, or betray a right which I do not value threepence, but my successors may. My service to all friends; and so, thinking I have said enough, I bid you farewell heartily, and long to eat of your fruit, for I dare eat none here.

It hath cost me five shillings in victuals since I came here, and ten pounds to servants where I have dined. I suppose my agent [Rev. Mr. John Worrall] in Ship-street takes care and inquires about my new agent.

[a] His royal highness George prince of Wales, chancellor of the university of Dublin.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

Saturday, at Pope's, June 24, 1727.

I AM going to London, and intend to carry this letter, which I will give you, if I see you, and leave for you if I do not see you.

There would not be common sense in your going into France at this juncture, even if you intended to stay there long enough to draw the sole pleasure and profit which I propose you should have in the acquaintance I am ready to give you there; much less ought you to think of such an unmeaning journey when the opportunity for quitting Ireland for England is, I believe, fairly before you. To hanker after a court is fit for men with blue ribbons, pompous titles, and overgrown estates. It is below either you or me: one of whom never made his fortune, and the other's turned rotten at the very moment it grew ripe. But without hankering, without assuming a suppliant dependent's air, you may spend in England all the time you can be absent from Ireland, et faire la guerre à l'œil. There has not been so much inactivity as you imagine; but I cannot answer for consequences. Adieu.

If you can call on me to-morrow morning in your way to church, about ten o'clock, you will find me just returning to Cranford from the Pall-Mall.

I shall return again to London on Monday evening.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

Cranford, Tuesday.

I HAVE so severe a defluxion of rheum on both my eyes that I dare hardly stir abroad. You will be ready to say, "Physician cure thyself;" and that is what I am about. I took away, by cupping, yesterday, fourteen ounces of blood; and such an operation would, I believe, have done you more good than steel and bitters, waters and drops. I wish John Gay success in his pursuit; but I think he has some qualities which will keep him down in the world. Good God! what is man? polished, civilized, learned man! A liberal education fits him for slavery; and the pains he has taken give him the noble pretension of dangling away life in an ante-chamber, or of employing real talents to serve those who have none; or, which is worse than all the rest, of making his reason and his knowledge serve all the purposes of other men's follies and vices. You say not a word to me about the public, of whom I think as seldom as possible. I consider myself as a man with some little satisfaction, and with some use: but I have no pleasure in thinking I am an Englishman; nor is it, I doubt, to much purpose, to act like one. Serpit enim res, quæ proclivis ad perniciem, cum semel cœpit, labitur. Plures enim discunt quemadmodum hæc fiant, quam quemadmodum his resistatur. Adieu.

Let me know how you do. If your landlord[a] is returned, my kindest service to him.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.[b]

Sunday.

You may be sure of letters from me to people who will receive you with all the honours due to so great a traveller and so exact an author. I am obliged to stay in the country to-morrow, by some business relating to my poor farm, which I would willingly make a rich one; and for which purpose a person is with me, who comes from Suffolk on my summons.

On Tuesday, by seven in the evening, I will certainly be in the Pall-Mall, and there you shall have, if you meet me, and not otherwise, both my letters and instructions, which will be of use to you.

Raillery apart: since you do go into France, I shall be glad to talk with you before your departure; and I fancy you would not leave England without embracing the man in England who loves you best. Adieu. My best services attend all with you.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Twickenham, July 1, 1727.

I HAD yours of June 22. You complain of not hearing from me; I never was so constant a writer. I have writ six times to our friends, and as many to you. Mr. Pope is reading your "Persius:" he is frequently sick, and so at this time: he has read it, but you must wait till next letter for his judgment. He would know whether it is designed for an elegant translation, or only to show the meaning; I reckon it an explanation of a difficult author, not only for learners, but for those also who are not expert in Latin, because he is a very dark author. I would not have your book printed entire till I treat with my bookseller here for your advantage. There is a word (concacuus) which you have not explained, nor the reason of it. Where you are ignorant you should confess you are ignorant. I wrote to Stella the day we heard the king was dead, and the circumstances of it. I hold you a guinea I shall forget something. Worrall writ to me lately. In answer, I desire that when the archbishop comes to a determination, that an appeal be properly lodged, by which I will elude him till my return, which will be at Michaelmas. I have left London, and stay here a week, and then I shall go thither again; just to see the queen, and so come back hither. Here are a thousand schemes wherein they would have me engaged, which I embrace but coldly, because I like none of them. I have been these ten days inclined to my old disease of giddiness, a little tottering; our friend understands it, but I grow cautious, and am something better; cider, and champagne, and fruit have been the cause. But now I am very regular, and I eat enough. I took Dr. Delany's paper to the king when he was prince; he and his secretary [Samuel Molyneux, esq.] are discontented with the provost [Rev. Mr. Baldwin]; but they find he has law on his side. The king's death hath broke that measure. I proposed the prince of Wales to be chancellor, and I believe so it will go. Pray copy out the verses I writ to Stella on her collecting my verses, and send them to me, for we want some to make our poetical miscellany large enough, and I am not there to pick what should be added. Direct them and all other double papers to lord Bathurst, in St. James's-square, London. I was in a fright about your verses on Stella's sickness, but glad when they were a month old.

Desire our friends to let me know what I should buy for them here of any kind. I had just now a long letter from Mrs. Dingley, and another from Mr. Synge. Pray tell the latter that I return him great thanks, and will leave the visiting affair to his discretion. But all the lawyers in Europe shall never persuade me that it is in the archbishop's power to take or refuse my proxy, when I have the king's leave of absence. If he be violent, I will appeal, and die two or three hundred pounds poorer to defend the rights of the dean. Pray ask Mr. Synge whether his fenocchio be grown; it is now fit to eat here, and we eat it like celery, either with or without oil, &c. I design to pass my time wholly in the country, having some business to do and settle before I leave England for the last time. I will send you Mr. Pope's criticisms, and my own, on your work. Pray forget nothing of what I desire you. Pray God bless you all. If the king had lived but ten days longer, I should be now at Paris. Simpleton! the "Drapiers" should have been sent unbound, but it is no great matter; two or three would have been enough. I see Mrs. Fad but seldom; I never trouble them but when I am sent for; she expects me soon, and after that perhaps no more while I am here. I desire it may be told that I never go to court, which I mention because of a passage in Mrs. Dingley's letter; she speaks mighty good things of your kindness. I do not want that poem to Stella to print it entire, but some passages out of it, if they deserve it, to lengthen the volume. Read all this letter without hesitation, and I will give you a pot of ale. I intend to be with you at Michaelmas, bar impossibilities.

A Paris, le 4 Juillet, 1727.

J'AI l'honneur, monsieur, de vous envoyer la 2de édition de votre ouvrage, que j'ai traduit en François. Je vous aurois envoyé la première, si je n'avois pas été obligé, pour des raisons que je ne puis vous dire, d'insérer dans la préface un endroit, dont vous n'auriez pas eu lieu d'être content, ce que j'ai mis assurément malgré moi. Comme le livre s'est débité sans contradiction, ces raisons ne subsistent plus, et j'ai aussitôt supprimé cet endroit dans la 2de édition, comme vous verrez. J'ai aussi corrigé l'endroit de monsieur Carteret, sur lequel j'avois eu de faux mémoires. Vous trouverez, monsieur, en beaucoup d'endroits une traduction peu fidèle; mais tout ce qui plaît en Angleterre, n'a pas ici le même agrément; soit parce que les mœurs sont différentes; soit parce que les allusions et les allégories, qui sont sensibles dans un pays, ne le sont pas dans un autre; soit enfin parce que le goût des deux nations n'est pas le même. J'ai voulu donner aux François un livre, qui fut à leur usage: voilà ce qui m'a rendu traducteur libre et peu fidèle. J'ai même pris la liberté d'ajouter, selon que votre imagination échauffoit la mienne. C'est à vous seul, monsieur, que je suis redevable de l'honneur, que me fait cette traduction, qui a été débitée ici avec une rapidité étonnante, et dont il y a déjà trois éditions. Je suis pénétré d'une si grande estime pour vous, et je vous suis si obligé, qui si la suppression, que j'ai faite, ne vous satisfaisoit pas entièrement, je ferai volontiers encore davantage pour effacer jusqu'au souvenir de cet endroit de la préface; au surplus, je vous supplie, monsieur, de vouloir bien faire attention à la justice, que je vous ai rendûe dans la même préface.

On se flatte, monsieur, qu'on aura bientôt l'honneur de vous posséder ici. Tous vos amis vous attendent avec impatience.

On ne parle ici que de votre arrivée, et tout Paris souhaite de vous voir. Ne différez pas notre satisfaction: vous verrez un peuple qui vous estime infiniment. En attendant je vous demande, monsieur, l'honneur de votre amitié, et vous prie d'être persuadé, que personne ne vous honore plus que moi, et n'est avec plus de considération et d'estime, votre très humble et très obéissant serviteur, L'ABBE DES FONTAINES.

Mr. Arbuthnot a bien voulû se charger de vous faire tenir cette lettre avec l'exemplaire que j'ai l'honneur de vous envoyer.

[a] Peter Francis Guyet des Fontaines, born at Rouen, in Normandy, June 29, 1684, entered into the society of the Jesuits in 1700, but quitted it fifteen years after. He lived some years with the cardinal d'Auvergne, and died at Paris, December 16, 1745; being well known for several works, and particularly for his "Observations sur les Ouvrages Modernes;" and his "Jugement sur les Ecrits Nouveaux."

FROM THE ABBE DES FONTAINES.

Paris, July 4, 1727.

SIR,—I have the honour to send to you the second edition of your work, which I have translated into French. I should have sent you the first, had I not been obliged, for reasons which I am not at liberty to tell you, to insert a passage in the preface, which you would not have been pleased with, and which indeed I inserted much against my inclinations. As the book has made its way without opposition, these reasons no longer subsist, and I have expunged this passage in the second edition, as you will find. I have likewise altered the passage relating to my lord Carteret, concerning which I had received false intelligence. In many parts you will easily see that my translation is not exact; but what pleases in England has not always the same effect in France; either because our manners are different, or because the allusions and allegories that strike people in one country do not make the same impression in another; or, in fine, because the two nations do not always agree in taste. My intention was to present my countrymen with a book which might be of use to them; and this has made me take some liberties in varying from the original. I have been even so free as to make some additions, according as I found my own imagination raised by yours. To you only I am indebted for the honour this translation does me; a translation that has been sold with amazing rapidity, for there have been already three editions of it. I have conceived so high an esteem for you, and so greatly am I obliged to you, that if you are not entirely satisfied with the suppression I made in this edition, I am still ready to go any further length in order to cancel the memory of that part of the preface: as for the rest, I beg you will pay due attention to the justice I have done you in that very preface.

We flatter ourselves that we shall soon have the honour of seeing you in this capital. All your friends are impatient for your arrival: nothing else is talked of; and all Paris eagerly expects this agreeable event. Do not defer giving us this pleasure; you will see a nation that holds you in the highest esteem. In the mean time I claim the honour of your friendship, and beg you will be persuaded that no one respects you more than myself; being, with the profoundest regard and esteem, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant,

THE ABBE DES FONTAINES.

Dr. Arbuthnot has been so good as to undertake to deliver this letter to you, together with the copy of your work, which I have the honour of sending you.

A M. L'ABBE DES FONTAINES.

IL y a plus d'un mois que j'aye reçu votre lettre du 4e Juillet, monsieur; mais l'exemplaire de la 2de édition de votre ouvrage ne m'a pas été encore remis. J'ai lû la préface de la première; et vous me permettrez de vous dire, que j'aye été fort surpris d'y voir, qu'en me donnant pour patrie un pays, dans lequel je suis né, vous avez trouvé à propos de m'attribuer un livre, qui porte le nom de son auteur, qui a eu le malheur de déplaire à quelques uns de nos ministres, et que je n'ai jamais avoue. Cette plainte, que je fais de votre conduite à mon égard, ne m'empêche pas de vous rendre justice. Les traducteurs donnent pour la plupart des louanges excessives aux ouvrages qu'ils traduisent, et s'imaginent peut-être, que leur réputation dépend en quelque façon de celles des auteurs qu'ils ont choisis. Mais vous avez senti vos forces, qui vous mettent au dessus de pareilles précautions. Capable de corriger un mauvais livre, entreprise plus difficile, que celle d'en composer un bon, vous n'avez pas craint de donner au public la traduction d'un ouvrage, que vous assurez être plein de polissoneries, de sottises, de puérilités, &c. Nous convenons ici, que le goût des nations n'est pas toujours le même. Mais nous sommes portés à croire, que le bon goût est le même par tout, où il y a des gens d'esprit, de jugement et de sçavoir. Si donc les livres du sieur Gulliver ne sont calculés que pour les isles Britanniques, ce voyageur doit passer pour un très pitoyable écrivain. Les mêmes vices et les mêmes folies régnent par tout; du moins, dans tous les pays civilisés de l'Europe: et l'auteur, que n'écrit que pour une ville, une province, un royaume, ou même un siècle, mérite si peu d'être traduit, qu'il ne mérite pas d'être lû.

Les partisans de ce Gulliver, qui ne laissent pas d'être en fort grand nombre chez nous, soutiennent, que son livre durera autant que notre langage, parce qu'il ne tire pas son mérite de certaines modes ou manières de penser et de parler, mais d'une suite d'observations sur les imperfections, les folies, et les vices de l'homme.

Vous jugez bien, que les gens, dont je viens de vous parler, n'approuvent pas fort votre critique; et vous serez sans doute surpris de sçavoir, qu'ils regardent ce chirurgien de vaisseau, comme un auteur grave, qui ne sort jamais de son sérieux, qui n'emprunte aucun fard, qui ne se pique point d'avoir de l'esprit, et qui se contente de communiquer au public, dans une narration simple et naive, les aventures qui lui sont arrivées, et les choses qu'il a vûes, ou entendues dire pendant ses voyages.

Quant à l'article qui regarde milord Carteret, sans m'informer d'où vous tirez vos mémoires, je vous dirai, que vous n'avez écrit que la moitié de la vérité; et que ce Drapier, ou réel ou supposé, a sauvé l'Irlande, en menant toute la nation contre un projet, qui devoit enrichir au dépens du public un certain nombre de particuliers.

Plusieurs accidens, qui sont arrivés, m'empêcheront de faire le voyage de France présentement, et je ne suis plus assez jeune pour me flatter de retrouver un autre occasion. Je sçais que j'aye perdû beaucoup, et je suis très sensible à cette perte. L'unique consolation qui me reste c'est de songer, que j'en supporterai mieux le pays auquel la fortune m'a condamné.

DR. SWIFT'S ANSWER.

August, 1727.

SIR,—It is above a month since I received your letter of the 4th of July; but the copy of the second edition of your translation is not yet come to hand. I have read the preface to the first; and give me leave to tell you that I was very much surprised to find that, at the same time you mentioned the country in which I was born, you also took notice of me by name as the author of that book, though I have had the misfortune of incurring the displeasure of some of our ministers by it, and never acknowledged it as mine. Your behaviour however in this respect, though somewhat exceptionable, shall not prevent me from doing you justice. The generality of translators are very lavish of their praises on such works as they undertake to render into their own language, imagining perhaps that their reputation depends in some measure on that of the authors whom they have thought proper to translate. But you were sensible of your own abilities, which rendered all such precautions needless. Capable of mending a bad book,—an enterprise more difficult than to write a good one,—you have ventured to publish the translation of a work which you affirm to abound with nonsense, puerilities, &c. We think with you that nations do not always agree in taste, but are inclined to believe that good taste is the same wherever there are men of wit, judgment, and learning. Therefore, if the Travels of Gulliver are calculated only for the British islands, that voyager must certainly be reckoned a paltry writer. The same vices and follies prevail in all countries, at least in all the civilized parts of Europe; and an author, who would sit down to write only for a single town, a province, a kingdom, or even a century, so far from deserving to be translated, does not deserve to be read.

This Gulliver's adherents, who are very numerous here, maintain that his book will last as long as our language, because he does not derive his merit from certain modes of expression or thought, but from a series of observations on the imperfections, follies, and vices of mankind.

You may very well judge that the people I have been speaking of do not approve of your criticisms; and you will doubtless be surprised when I inform you that they regard this sea-surgeon as a grave author who never departs from his character, and who uses no foreign embellishment,—never pretends to set up for a wit,—but is satisfied with giving the public a plain and simple narrative of the adventures that befell him, and of the things he saw and heard in the course of his voyages.

With regard to the article relating to lord Carteret, without waiting for any information whence you borrowed your intelligence, I shall take the liberty to tell you that you have written only one half of the truth; and that this real or supposed Drapier has saved Ireland, by spiriting up the whole nation to oppose a project by which a certain number of individuals would have been enriched at the public expense.

A series of accidents have intervened, which will prevent my going to France at present, and I am now too old to hope for any future opportunity. I am sensible that this is a great loss to me. The only consolation that remains is to think that I shall be the better able to bear that spot of ground to which fortune has condemned me, &c.

TO MRS. HOWARD.

Twickenham, July 9, 1727, between church and dinner time

Madam,—Mr Gay, by your commands, as he says, showed me a letter to you from an unfortunate lady, one Mrs. Pratt, whose case I know very well, and pity very much; but I wonder she would make any mention of me, who am almost a stranger to you further than your goodness led you a little to distinguish me. I have often told Mrs. Pratt that I had not the least interest with the friend's friend's friend of anybody in power; on the contrary, I have been used like a dog for a dozen years by every soul who was able to do it, and were but sweepers about a court. I believe you will allow that I know courts well enough to remember that a man must have got many degrees above the power of recommending himself before he should presume to recommend another, even his nearest relation; and, for my own part, you may be sure that I will never venture to recommend a mouse to Mrs. Cole's cat, or a shoe-cleaner to your meanest domestic. But you know too well already how very injudicious the general tribe of wanters are." I told Mrs. Pratt that, if she had friends, it were best to solicit a pension; but it seems she had mentioned a place. I can only say that, when I was about courts, the best lady there had some cousin, or near dependent, whom she would be glad to recommend for an employment, and therefore would hardly think of strangers: for I take the matter thus; that a pension may possibly be got by commiseration, but great personal favour is required for an employment. There are, madam, thousands in the world who, if they saw your dog use me kindly, would the next day, in a letter, tell me of the delight they heard I had in doing good; and, being assured that a word of mine to you would do anything, desire my interest to speak to you, to speak to the speaker, to speak to sir Robert Walpole, to speak to the king, &c. Thus wanting people are like drowning people, who lay hold of every reed or bulrush in their way.

One place I humbly beg for myself, which is in your gift if it be not disposed of, I mean the perquisite of all the letters and petitions you receive, which, being generally of fair, large, strong paper, I can sell to good advantage to the band-box and trunk-makers, and I hope will annually make a pretty comfortable penny.

I hear, while I was at church, Mr. Pope wrote to you upon the occasion of Mrs. Pratt's letter; but they will not show me what is written: therefore I will not trust them, but resolved to justify myself; and they shall not see this.

I pray God grant you patience, and preserve your eye-sight; but confine your memory to the service of your royal mistress, and the happiness of your truest friends, and give you a double portion of your own spirit to distinguish them. I am, with the truest respect, madam, your most obedient and most obliged humble servant, Jonathan Swift.

TO MRS. BLOUNT.

Twitenham Garret, Thursday morning at nine.

Madam Patt,—You are commanded by Mr. Pope to read that part of the enclosed which relates to Mr. Gay and yourself, and to send a direct answer to your humble servant by my humble servant the bearer. Being at an end of all my shoes and stockings, I am not able to wait on you to-day after so rainy a night and so suspicious a morning.

Mrs. Pope is yours; but I, with the greatest respect, madam, your most obedient and devoted servant,

Jonathan Swift.

Pray do not give a copy of this letter to Curll the bookseller.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

[August, 1727.] Tuesday.

I return you the papers, which I have read twice over since you were here. They are extremely well; but the "Craftsman" has not only advertised the public that he intended to turn newswriter, he has begun, and for some weeks continued to appear under that new character. This consideration inclines me to think that another turn might be given to the introduction; and perhaps this would naturally call for a fourth letter from the Occasional Writer, to account for his silence, to prosecute your argument, to state the present disputes about political affairs, and, in short, to revive and animate the paper war. When we meet next, I will explain myself better than I can do by a letter writ in haste, with mowers and haymakers about me. Adieu. Let Pope share my embraces with you.

TO DR. SWIFT.[a]

Thursday.

Lord B. is so ill, and so much alone, the common fate of those who are out of power, that I have not left him one day since my return from London. Let me know how you are. Say something kind from me to Pope. Toss John Gay over the water to Richmond, if he is with you. Adieu.

[a] It does not appear who was the writer of this short letter. Perhaps Mr. Pulteney.

MR. PULTENEY TO MR. POPE.

Eleven o'clock, Tuesday morning.

I AM obliged to you all for your compliments, and when the dean is well enough, I hope to see you in town. You will probably find me a much happier man than when you saw me last; for I flatter myself that in an hour or two I shall be once more blessed with a son. Mrs. Pulteney is now in labour; if she does well and brings me a boy, I shall not care one sixpence how much longer sir Robert governs England, or Horace governs France. I am ever yours, W. P.

FROM CHEVALIER RAMSAY.[a]

Paris, August 1, 1727.

REVEREND SIR,—Mr. Hook having acquainted me with what goodness and patience you have been pleased to examine a performance of mine,[b] I take this occasion to make my acknowledgments. Nothing could flatter me more sensibly than your approbation. To acquire the esteem of persons of your merit is the principal advantage I could wish for by becoming an author, and more than I could flatter myself with. I should be proud of receiving your commands, if I could be any way useful to you in this part of the world; where, I assure you, your reputation is as well established as in your own country. I am, with the utmost regard and esteem, reverend sir, your most humble, and most obliged, obedient servant, A. RAMSAY.

FROM MRS. HOWARD.

August, 1727.

I WRITE to you to please myself. I hear you are melancholy because you have a bad head and deaf ears. These are two misfortunes I have laboured under these many years, and yet was never peevish with myself or the world. Have I more philosophy and resolution than you? Or am I so stupid that I do not feel the evil? Is this meant in a good-natured view? or do I mean that I please myself when I insult over you? Answer these queries in writing, if poison or other methods do not enable you soon to appear in person. Though I make use of your own word poison, give me leave to tell you, it is nonsense: and I desire you will take more care, for the time to come, how you endeavour to impose upon my understanding, by making no use of your own.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Twickenham, August 12, 1727

I AM cleverly caught, if ever gentleman was cleverly caught; for three days after I came to town with lord Oxford[c] from Cambridgeshire, which was ten days ago, my old deafness seized me, and hath continued ever since with great increase; so that I am now deafer than ever you knew me, and yet a little less I think than I was yesterday; but, which is worse, about four days ago my giddiness seized me, and I was so very ill that yesterday I took a hearty vomit, and though I now totter, yet I think I am a thought better; but what will be the event I know not; one thing I know, that these deaf fits use to continue five or six weeks, and I am resolved if it continues, or my giddiness, some days longer, I will leave this place, and remove to Greenwich, or somewhere near London, and take my cousin Lancelot to be my nurse. Our friends know her; it is the same with Pat Rolt.[d] If my disorder should keep me longer than my licence of absence lasts, I would have you get Mr. Worrall to renew it; it will not expire till the 6th or 7th of October, and I resolved to begin my journey September 15th. Mr. Worrall will see by the date of my licence what time the new one should commence; but he has seven weeks yet to consider: I only speak in time. I am very uneasy here, because so many of our acquaintance come to see us, and I cannot be seen; besides Mr. Pope is too sickly and complaisant, therefore I resolve to go somewhere else. This is a little unlucky, my head will not bear writing long: I want to be at home, where I can turn you out, or let you in, as I think best. The king and queen come in two days to our neighbourhood [Richmond]; and there I shall be expected, and cannot go; which, however, is none of my grievances, for I would rather be absent, and have now too good an excuse. I believe this giddiness is the disorder that will at last get the better of me; but I would rather it should not be now; and I hope and believe it will not, for I am now better than yesterday. Since my dinner my giddiness is much better, and my deafness a hair's breadth not so bad. It is just as usual, worst in the morning and at evening. I will be very temperate; and in the midst of peaches, figs, nectarines, and mulberries, I touch not a bit. I hope I shall, however, set out in the midst of September, as I designed. This is a long letter for an ill head: so, adieu. My service to our two friends and all others.

TO MRS. HOWARD.

Twickenham, August 15, 1727.

MADAM,—I wish I were a young lord, and you were unmarried: I should make you the best husband in the world, for I am ten times deafer than ever you were in your life; and instead of a poor pain in my face, I have a good substantial giddiness and headache. The best of it is, that although we might lay our heads together, you could tell me no secrets that might not be heard five rooms distant. These disorders of mine, if they hold me as long as they used to do some years ago, will last as long as my leave of absence, which I shall not renew: and then the queen will have the misfortune not to see me, and I shall go back with the satisfaction never to have seen her since she was queen, but when I kissed her hand. And, although she were a thousand queens, I will not lose my privilege of never seeing her but when she commands it. I told my two landlords, that I would write you a love-letter; which, I remember, you commanded me to do last year: but I would not show it to either of them. I am the greatest courtier and flatterer you have; because I try your good sense and taste more than all of them put together, which is the greatest compliment I could put upon you; and you have hitherto behaved yourself tolerably well under it; much better than your mistress, if what a lady told me was true, that, talking with the queen about me, her majesty said, "I was an odd sort of a man." But I forgive her: for it is an odd thing to speak freely to princes.

I will say another thing in your praise, that goodness would become you better than any person I know; and for that very reason, there is nobody I wish to be good so much as yourself. I am, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MRS. HOWARD.

Twickenham, August 19, 1727.

MADAM,—About two hours before you were born I got my giddiness, by eating a hundred golden pippins at a time at Richmond; and when you were four years and a quarter old, bating two days, having made a fine seat about twenty miles further in Surrey, where I used to read and ——, there I got my deafness; and these two friends have visited me, one or other, every year since, and being old acquaintance, have now thought fit to come together. So much for the calamities wherein I have the honour to resemble you; and you see your sufferings are but children in comparison of mine; and yet, to show my philosophy, I have been as cheerful as Scarron. You boast that your disorders never made you peevish. Where is the virtue, when all the world was peevish on your account, and so took the office out of your hands? Whereas I bore the whole load myself, nobody caring threepence what I suffered, or whether I were hanged or at ease. I tell you my philosophy is twelve times better than yours; for I can call witnesses that I bear half your pains, beside all my own, which are in themselves ten times greater. Thus have I most fully answered your queries. I wish the poison were in my stomach, (which may be very probable, considering the many drugs I take,) if I remember to have mentioned that word in my letter. But ladies who have poison in their eyes may be apt to mistake in their reading.[a] O! I have found it out; the word person I suppose was written like poison. Ask all the friends I write to, and they will attest this mistake to be but a trifle in my way of writing, and could easily prove it if they had any of my letters to show. I make nothing of mistaking untoward for Howard; wellpull for Walpole; knights of a share for knights of a shire; monster for minister; in writing speaker, I put an n for a p; and a hundred such blunders, which cannot be helped, while I have a hundred oceans rolling in my ears, into which no sense has been poured this fortnight; and therefore if I write nonsense, I can assure you it is genuine, and not borrowed. Thus I write by your commands; and beside, I am in duty bound to be the last writer. But, deaf or giddy, hearing or steady, I shall ever be, with the truest regard, madam, your most obedient and most humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO DR. SHERIDAN

Twickenham, August 29, 1727.

I HAVE had your letter of the 19th, and expect before you read this to receive another from you with the most fatal news that can ever come to me, unless I should be put to death for some ignominious crime.[b] I continue very ill with my giddiness and deafness, of which I had two days intermission, but since worse, and I shall be perfectly content, if God shall please to call me away at this time. Here is a triple cord of friendship broke, which hath lasted thirty years, twenty-four of which in Ireland. I beg, if you have not written to me before you get this, to tell me no particulars, but the event in general: my weakness, my age, my friendship will bear no more. I have mentioned the case, as well as I knew it, to a physician, who is my friend; and I find his methods were the same—air and exercise—and, at last, ass's milk. I will tell you sincerely, that if I were younger and in health, or in hopes of it, I would endeavour to divert my mind by all methods in order to pass my life in quiet; but I now want only three months of sixty. I am strongly visited with a disease that will at last cut me off, if I should this time escape; if not, I have but a poor remainder, and that is below any wise man's valuing. I do not intend to return to Ireland so soon as I purposed; I would not be there in the very midst of grief. I desire you will speak to Mr. Worrall to get a new licence about the beginning of October, when my old one (as he will see by the date) shall expire; but if that fatal accident were not to happen, I am not able to travel in my present condition. What I intend is, immediately to leave this place and go with my cousin for a nurse about five miles from London on the other side toward the sea; and if I recover, I will either pass this winter near Salisbury Plain, or in France; and therefore I desire Mr. Worrall may make this licence run like the former—("To Great Britain or elsewhere, for the recovery of his health)."

Neither my health nor grief will permit me to say more; your directions to Mr. Lancelot at his house in New Bond-street, over against the Crown and Cushion, will reach me. Farewell.

This stroke was unexpected, and my fears last year were ten times greater.

[a] See Mrs. Howard's letter, August, 1727.

[b] The account of Stella's last illness.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

London, September 2, 1727.

I HAD yours of the 19th of August, which I answered the 29th from Twickenham. I came to town on the last day of August, being impatient of staying there longer, where so much company came to us while I was so giddy and deaf. I am now got to my cousin Lancelot's house, where I desire all letters may be directed to me; I am still in the same condition, or rather worse, for I walk like a drunken man, and am deafer than ever you knew me. If I had any tolerable health, I would go this moment to Ireland; yet I think I would not, considering the news I daily expect to hear from you. I have just received yours of August 24; I kept it an hour in my pocket with all the suspense of a man who expected to hear the worst news that fortune could give him; and at the same time was not able to hold up my head. These are the perquisites of living long; the last act of life is always a tragedy at best; but it is a bitter aggravation to have one's best friend go before one. I desired in my last that you would not enlarge upon that event, but tell me the bare fact. I long knew that our dear friend had not the stamina vitæ; but my friendship could not arm me against this accident, although I foresaw it. I have said enough in my last letter, which now I suppose is with you. I know not whether it be an addition to my grief or not that I am now extremely ill; for it would have been a reproach to me to be in perfect health when such a friend is desperate. I do profess, upon my salvation, that the distressed and desperate condition of our friend makes life so indifferent to me, who by course of nature have so little left, that I do not think it worth the time to struggle; yet I should think, according to what hath been formerly, that I may happen to overcome this present disorder; and to what advantage? Why, to see the loss of that person for whose sake only life was worth preserving. I brought both those friends over,[a] that we might be happy together as long as God should please; the knot is broken, and the remaining person you know has ill answered the end; and the other, who is now to be lost, is all that was valuable. You agreed with me, or you are a great hypocrite. What have I to do in the world? I never was in such agonies as when I received your letter, and had it in my pocket. I am able to hold up my sorry head no longer.

MR POPE TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Twickenham, September 6, 1727.

SIR,—I am both obliged and alarmed by your letter. What you mention of a particular friend of the dean's being upon the brink of another world gives me great pain; for it makes me, in tenderness to him, wish him with you, and at the same time I fear he is not in a condition to make the journey. Though (to ease you as far as I can) his physician and friend Dr. Arbuthnot assures me he will soon be well. At present he is very deaf, and more uneasy than I hoped that complaint alone would have made him. I apprehend he has written to you in a melancholy way, which has put you into a greater fright, than (with God's will) we may have any reason for. He talks of returning to Ireland in three weeks if he recovers sufficiently; if not, he will stay here this winter. Upon pretence of some very unavoidable occasions, he went to London four days since, where I see him as often as he will let me. I was extremely concerned at his opiniâtreté in leaving me; but he shall not get rid of the friend though he may of his house. I have suggested to him the remedy you mention; and I will not leave him a day till I see him better. I wish you could see us in England without manifest inconvenience to yourself; though I heartily hope and believe that our friend will do well. I sincerely honour you for your warmth of affection, where it is so justly merited: and am, both for his sake and your own, with great esteem, sir, your truly affectionate and obedient servant,

ALEXANDER POPE.

P.S.—I have often desired the dean to make known to you my sense of the good opinion you have expressed of me in your letters. I am pleased to have an opportunity of thanking you under my hand, and I desire you to continue it to one who is no way ungrateful.

FROM MRS. HOWARD.

September, 1727.

I DID desire you to write me a love-letter: but I never did desire you to talk of marrying me. I would rather you and I were dumb as well as deaf for ever than that should happen. I would take your giddiness, your headache, or any other complaint you have, to resemble you in one circumstance of life. So that I insist upon your thinking yourself a very happy man, at least whenever you make a comparison between yourself and me. I likewise insist upon your taking no resolution to leave England till I see you; which must be here, for the most disagreeable reason in the world, and the most shocking; I dare not go to you. Believe nobody that talks to you of the queen, without you are sure the person likes both the queen and you. I have been a slave twenty years without ever receiving a reason for any one thing I ever was obliged to do; and I have now a mind to take the pleasure once in my life, of absolute power, which I expect you to give me, in obeying all my orders, without one question why I have given them.

TO MR. WORRALL.

London, September, 12, 1727.

I HAVE not written to you this long time, nor would I now, if it were not necessary. By Dr. Sheridan's frequent letters, I am every post expecting the death of a friend, with whose loss I shall have very little regard for the few years that nature may leave me. I desire to know where my two friends lodge. I gave a caution to Mrs. Brent that it might not be in domo decani, quoniam hoc minimè decet, uti manifestum est; habeo enim malignos, qui sinistrè hoc interpretabuntur, si eveniet (quod Deus avertat) ut illic moriatur. I am in such a condition of health, that I cannot possibly travel. Dr. Sheridan, to whom I write this post, will be more particular and spare my weak disordered head. Pray answer all calls of money in your power to Mrs Dingley, and desire her to ask it. I cannot come back at the time of my licence, I am afraid. Therefore, two or three days before it expires, which will be the beginning of October (you will find by the date of the last), take out a new one for another half-year; and let the same clause be in (of leave to go to Great Britain, or elsewhere, for the recovery of his health), for very probably, if this unfortunate event should happen of the loss of our friend (and I have no probability or hopes to expect better), I will go to France, if my health will permit me to forget myself.[a] I leave my whole little affairs with you: I hate to think of them. If Mr. Deacon or alderman Pearson come to pay rent, take it on account, unless they bring you their last acquittance to direct you. But Deacon owes me 75*l*. and interest, upon his bond: so that you are to take care of giving him any receipt in full of all accounts. I hope you and Mrs. Worrall have your health. I can hold up my head no longer. I am sincerely yours, &c.

You need not trouble yourself to write till you have business, for it is uncertain where I shall be.

TO MRS. HOWARD.

September, 1727.

MADAM,—This cruel disorder of deafness, attended with giddiness, still confines me. I have been debating with myself, that having a home in Dublin not inconvenient, it would be prudent for me to return thither, while my sickness will allow me to travel. I am therefore setting out for Ireland; and it is one comfort to me, that I am ridding you of a troublesome companion. I am infinitely obliged to you for all your civilities, and shall retain the remembrance of them during my life.

I hope you will favour me so far as to present my most humble duty to the queen, and to describe to her majesty my sorrow that my disorder was of such a nature as to make me incapable of attending her, as she was pleased to permit me. I shall pass the remainder of my life with the utmost gratitude for her majesty's favours.

FROM MR. POPE.

October 2, 1727.

IT is a perfect trouble to me to write to you, and your kind letter left for me at Mr. Gay's affected me so much that it made me like a girl. I cannot tell what to say to you; I only feel that I wish you well in every circumstance of life; that it is almost as good to be hated as to be loved, considering the pain it is to minds of any tender turn to find themselves so utterly impotent to do any good, or give any ease to those who deserve most from us. I would very fain know as soon as you recover your complaints, or any part of them. Would to God I could ease any of them, or had been able even to have alleviated any! I found I was not, and truly it grieved me. I was sorry to find you could think yourself easier in any house than in mine, though at the same time I can allow for a tenderness in your way of thinking, even when it seemed to want that tenderness. I cannot explain my meaning, perhaps you know it: but the best way of convincing you of my indulgence will be, if I live, to visit you in Ireland, and act there as much in my own way as you did here in yours. I will not leave your roof, if I am ill. To your bad health I fear there was added some disagreeable news from Ireland, which might occasion your so sudden departure; for the last time I saw you you assured me you would not leave us the whole winter, unless your health grew better, and I do not find it did so. I never complied so unwillingly in my life with any friend as with you, in staying so entirely from you; nor could I have had the constancy to do it if you had not promised that before you went we should meet, and you would send to us all to come. I have given your remembrances to those you mention in yours; we are quite sorry for you, I mean for ourselves. I hope, as you do, that we shall meet in a more durable and a more satisfactory state; but the less sure I am of that, the more I would indulge it in this. We are to believe we shall have something better than even a friend there, but certainly here we have nothing so good.

Adieu for this time; may you find every friend you go to as pleased and happy as every friend you went from is sorry and troubled. Yours, &c.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, October 12, 1727.

I HAVE been long reasoning with myself upon the condition I am in, and in conclusion have thought it best to return to what fortune has made my home; I have there a large house, and servants and conveniencies about me. I may be worse than I am, and have nowhere to retire. I therefore thought it best to return to Ireland, rather than go to any distant place in England. Here is my maintenance, and here my convenience. If it pleases God to restore me to my health, I shall readily make a third journey; if not, we must part as all human creatures have parted. You are the best and kindest friend in the world, and I know nobody alive or dead to whom I am so much obliged; and if ever you made me angry, it was for your too much care about me. I have often wished that God Almighty would be so easy to the weakness of mankind as to let old friends be acquainted in another state; and if I were to write a Utopia for Heaven, that would be one of my schemes. This wildness you must allow for, because I am giddy and deaf.

I find it more convenient to be sick here, without the vexation of making my friends uneasy; yet my giddiness alone would not have done if that unsociable comfortless deafness had not quite tired me: and I believe I should have returned from the inn if I had not feared it was only a short intermission, and the year was late, and my licence expiring. Surely, beside all other faults, I should be a very ill judge to doubt your friendship and kindness. But it has pleased God that you are not in a state of health to be mortified with the care and sickness of a friend. Two sick friends never did well together: such an office is fitter for servants and humble companions, to whom it is wholly indifferent whether we give them trouble or not. The case would be quite otherwise if you were with me; you could refuse to see anybody, and here is a large house where we need not hear each other if we were both sick. I have a race of orderly elderly people of both sexes at command, who are of no consequence, and have gifts proper for attending us; who can bawl when I am deaf, and tread softly when I am only giddy and would sleep.

I had another reason for my haste hither, which was changing my agent, the old one having terribly involved my little affairs; to which, however, I am grown so indifferent, that I believe I shall lose 200*l.* or 300*l* rather than plague myself with accompts: so that I am very well qualified to be a lord, and put into Peter Walter's hands.

Pray God continue and increase Mr. Congreve's amendment, though he does not deserve it like you, having been too lavish of that health which nature gave him.

I hope my Whitehall landlord is nearer to a place than when I left him; as the preacher said, "the day of judgment was nearer than ever it had been before."

Pray God send you health, det salutem, det opes, animam æquam ipse tibi parabis.[a] You see Horace wishes for money as well as health; and I would hold a crown he kept a coach; and I shall never be a friend to the court till you do so too. Yours, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE EARL OF OXFORD.

Dover Street, October 12, 1727.

REVEREND SIR,—I was very much concerned to hear you were so much out of order when I went to the north; and upon my return, which was but lately, I was in hopes to have found you here, and that you would not have gone to your deanery till the spring. I should be glad to hear that you are well, and have got rid of that troublesome distemper, your deafness.

I have seen Pope but once, and that was but for a few minutes; he was very much out of order, but I hope it only proceeded from being two days in town, and staying out a whole opera. He would not see the coronation, although he might have seen it with little trouble.

I came last night well home, after attending and paying my duty in my rank at the coronation. I hope there will not be another till I can have the laudable excuse of old age not to attend; which is no ill wish to their present majesties, since Nottingham at fourscore could bear the fatigue very well. I will not trouble you with an account of the ceremony; I do not doubt but you will have a full and true account from much better hands.

I have been put in hopes that we shall see you again early in the spring, which will be a very great pleasure to me.

There is a gentleman that is now upon putting out a new edition of the "Oxford Marmora;" I should take it for a great favour if you would be so kind to lend me your copy of that book. I think there are some corrections: if you think fit to do this, Mr. Clayton, who is in Ireland, will take care to bring it safe to me, and I will with great care return it to you again.

I must not conclude this without making my wife's compliments to you. I am, with true respect, sir, your most humble servant,

OXFORD.

You forgot to send me the ballad.

Mr. Clayton will call upon you before he comes to England: I have written to him to that purpose.

FROM MR. GAY AND MR. POPE.

October 22, 1727.

THOUGH you went away from us so unexpectedly, and in so clandestine a manner, yet, by several inquiries, we have informed ourselves of everything that hath happened to you.

To our great joy, you have told us your deafness left you at the inn in Aldersgate Street: no doubt your ears knew there was nothing worth hearing in England.

Our advices from Chester tell us that you met captain Lawson:[b] the captain was a man of veracity, and set sail at the time he told you. I really wished you had laid hold of that opportunity, for you had then been in Ireland the next day; besides, as it is credibly reported, the captain had a bottle or two of excellent claret in his cabin. You would not then have had the plague of that little smoky room at Holyhead;[c] but considering it was there you lost your

An inward treasure in an equal mind."

[b] Commander of the king's Dublin yacht.

[c] The dean's route upon this, as upon other occasions, might be traced by his memoranda upon the walls and windows of his giddiness, we have great reason to praise smoky rooms for the future, and prescribe them in like cases to our friends. The maid of the house writes us word, that while you were there you were busy for ten days together writing continually; and that, as Wat drew nearer and nearer to Ireland, he blundered more and more. By a scrap of paper left in this smoky room, it seemed as if the book you were writing was a most lamentable account of your travels; and really had there been any wine in the house, the place would not have been so irksome. We were further told that you set out, were driven back again by a storm, and lay in the ship all night. After the next setting sail, we were in great concern about you, because the weather grew very tempestuous; when, to my great joy and surprise, I received a letter from Carlingford, in Ireland, which informed us that, after many perils, you were safely landed there. Had the oysters been good, it would have been a comfortable refreshment after your fatigue. We compassionated you in your travels through that country of desolation and poverty in your way to Dublin; for it is a most dreadful circumstance to have lazy, dull horses on a road where there are very bad or no inns. When you carry a sample of English apples next to Ireland, I beg you would get them either from Goodrich or Devonshire. Pray who was the clergyman that met you at some distance from Dublin? because we could not learn his name. These are all the hints we could get of your long and dangerous journey, every step of which we shared your anxieties; and all that we have now left to comfort us is to hear that you are in good health.

But why should we tell you what you know already? The queen's [a] family is at last settled, and in the list I was appointed gentleman-usher to the princess Louisa, the youngest princess; which, upon account that I am so far advanced in life, I have declined accepting; and I have endeavoured in the best manner I could to make my excuses by a letter to her majesty. So now all my expectations are vanished; and I have no prospect but in depending wholly upon myself and my own conduct. As I am used to disappointments, I can bear them; but as I can have no more hopes, I can no more be disappointed, so that I am in a blessed condition. You remember you were advising me to go into Newgate to finish my scenes the more correctly. I now think I shall, for I have no attendance to hinder me; but my opera [b] is already finished. I leave the rest of this paper to Mr. Pope.

Gay is a free man, and I wrote him a long congratulatory letter upon it. Do you the same: it will mend him and make him a better man than a court could do. Horace might keep his coach in Augustus's time if he pleased; but I will not in the time of our Augustus. My poem ["The Dunciad"], (which it grieves me that I dare not send you a copy of, for fear of the Curlls and Dennises of Ireland, and still more for fear of the worst of traitors, our friends and admirers.) my poem, I say, will show you what a distinguished age we live in. Your name is in it, with some others, under a mark of such ignominy as you will not much grieve to wear in that company. Adieu, and God bless you, and give you health and spirits.

Whether thou choose Cervantes' serious air,
Or laugh and shake in Rab'lais' easy chair,
Or in the graver gown instruct mankind
Or, silent, let thy morals tell thy mind

These two verses are over and above what I have said of you in the poem.[c] Adieu.

TO MR. POPE.

October 30, 1727.

THE first letter I wrote after my landing was to Mr. Gay, but it would have been wiser to direct it to Tonson or Lintot, to whom I believe his lodgings are better known than to the runners of the post-office. In that letter you will find what a quick change I made in seven days from London to the deanery, through many nations and languages unknown to the civilized world.

And I have often reflected in how few hours, with a swift horse or a strong gale, a man may come among a people as unknown to him as the antipodes. If I did not know you more by your conversation and kindness than by your letter, I might be base enough to suspect that, in point of friendship, you acted like some philosophers, who wrote much better upon virtue than they practised it. In answer, I can only swear that you have taught me to dream, which I had not done in twelve years further than by inexpressible nonsense; but now I can every night distinctly see Twickenham, and the Grotto, and Dawley, and many other et ceteras, and it is but three nights since I beat Mrs. Pope. I must needs confess that the pleasure I take in thinking on you is very much lessened by the pain I am in about your health; you pay dearly for the great talents God has given you, and for the consequences of them in the esteem and distinction you receive from mankind, unless you can provide a tolerable stock of health; in which pursuit I cannot much commend your conduct, but rather entreat you would mend it by following the advice of my lord Bolingbroke and your other physicians. When you talked of cups and impressions it came into my head to imitate you in quoting scripture, not to your advantage; I mean what was said to David by one of his brothers; "I knew thy pride and the naughtiness of thy heart;" I remember when it grieved your soul to see me pay a penny more than my club at an inn, when you had maintained me three months at bed and board; for which, if I had dealt with you in the Smithfield way, it would have cost me 100*l.*, for I live worse here upon more. Did you ever consider that I am for life almost twice as rich as you, and pay no rent, and drink French wine twice as cheap as you do port, and have neither coach, chair, nor mother? As to the world, I think you ought to say to it with St. Paul, "If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things?" This is more proper still if you consider the French word spirituel, in which sense the world ought to pay you better than they do. If you made me a present of 1000*l.* I would not allow myself to be in your debt; and if I made you a present of 2000*l.* I would not allow myself to be out of it. But I have not half your pride: witness what Mr Gay says in his letter, that I was censured for begging presents, though I limited them to 10*s.* I see no reason (at least my friendship and vanity see none) why you should not give me a visit when you shall happen to be disengaged: I will send a person to Chester to take care of you, and you shall be used by the best folks we have here as well as civility and good-nature can contrive; I believe local motion will be no ill physic, and I will have your coming inscribed on my tomb, and recorded in never-dying verse.

I thank Mrs. Pope for her prayers, but I know the mystery. A person of my acquaintance who used to correspond with the last great duke of Tuscany, showing one of the duke's letters to a friend, and professing great sense of his highness's friendship, read this passage out of the letter: "I would give one of my fingers to procure your real good." The person to whom this was read, and who knew the duke well, said, the meaning of real good was only that the other might turn a good Catholic. Pray ask Mrs. Pope whether this story is applicable to her and me? I pr. God bless her, for I am sure she is a good Christi: and (which is almost as rare) a good woman. Adieu

TO MR. GAY.

Dublin, November 27, 1727

I ENTIRELY approve your refusal of that employmen and your writing to the queen. I am perfectly confident you have a keen enemy in the mini try [sir Robert Walpole]. God forgive him, but not till he puts himsel in a state to be forgiven. Upon reasoning with myself, I should hope they are gone too far to discard you quite, and that they will give you something; which, althoug much less then they ought, will be (as far as it is worth) better circumstantiated: and since you already just live, a middling help will make you just tolerable Your lateness in life (as you so soon call it) might be improper to begin the world with, but almost the eldest men may hope to see changes in a court. A minister is always seventy: you are thirty years younger; and consider Cromwell himself did not begin to appear till he was older than you. I beg you will be thrifty, and learn to value a shilling, which Dr. Birch said was a serious thing. Get a stronger fence about your 1000*l.* and throw the inner fence into the heap, and be advised by your Twickenham landlord and me about an annuity. You are the most refractory, honest, good-natured man I ever have known; I could argue out this paper.—I am very glad your opera is finished, and hope your friends will join the readier to make it succeed, because you are ill used by others.

I have known courts these thirty-six years, and know they differ; but in some things they are extremely constant: first, in the trite old maxim of a minister's never forgiving those he hath injured: secondly, in the insincerity of those who would be thought the best friends: thirdly, in the love of fawning, cringing, and tale-bearing: fourthly, in sacrificing those whom we really wish well to a point of interest or intrigue: fifthly, in keeping everything worth taking for those who can do service or disservice [a]

Now why does not Pope publish his "Dulness"? the rogues he marks will die of themselves in peace, and so will his friends, and so there will be neither punishment nor reward. Pray inquire how my lord St. John does; there is no man's health in England I am more concerned about than his. I wonder whethe you begin to taste the pleasure of independency? or whether you do not sometimes leer upon the court, oculo retorto? Will you not think of an annuity when you are two years older, and have doubled your purchase-money? Have you dedicated your opera and got the usual dedication fee of twenty guineas? How is the doctor? does he not chide that you never called upon him for hints? Is my lord Bolingbroke, at the moment I am writing, a planter, a philosopher, or a writer? Is Mr. Pulteney in expectation of a son, or my lord Oxford of a new old manuscript?

I bought your opera to-day for sixpence, a cursed print. I find there is neither dedication nor preface both which wants I approve; it is in the grand gout.

We are as full of it, pro modulo nostro, as London can be; continually acting, and houses crammed, and the lord-lieutenant several times there laughing his heart out. I did not understand that the scene of Locket and Peachum's quarrel was an imitation of one between Brutus and Cassius till I was told it. I wish Macheath, when he was going to be hanged, had imitated Alexander the Great when he was dying:[b] I would have had his fellow-rogues desire his commands about a successor, and he to answer, Let it be the most worthy, &c. We hear a million of stories about the opera, of the applause at the song "That was levelled at me," when two great ministers were in a box together, and all the world staring at them. [a] I am heartily glad your opera hath mended your purse, though perhaps it may spoil your court.

Will you desire my lord Bolingbroke, Mr. Pulteney, and Mr. Pope, to command you to buy an annuity with 2000*l.*? that you may laugh at courts, and bid ministers ——.

Ever preserve some spice of the alderman, and prepare against age and dulness, and sickness, and coldness or death of friends. A whore has a resource left, that she can turn bawd; but an old decayed poet is a creature abandoned, and at mercy when he can find none. Get me likewise Polly's mezzotinto.[b] Lord, how the schoolboys at Westminster and university lads adore you at this juncture! Have you made as many men laugh as ministers can make weep?

I will excuse sir —— the trouble of a letter. When ambassadors came from Troy to condole with Tiberius upon the death of his nephew after two years, the emperor answered, that he likewise condoled with them for the untimely death of Hector. I always loved and respected him very much, and do still as much as ever; and it is a return sufficient if he pleases to accept the offers of my most humble service.

The "Beggars' Opera" hath knocked down "Gulliver;" I hope to see Pope's "Dulness" knock down the "Beggars' Opera," but not till it hath fully done its job.

To expose vice, and make people laugh with innocence, does more public service than all the ministers of state from Adam to Walpole, and so adieu.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.

London, November 30, 1727.

HAVE heard, dear sir, with great pleasure, of your safe arrival; and, which is more, of the recovery of 'our health. I think it will be the best expedient for ne to take a journey. You will know who the enlosed comes from; and I hope will value mine for what it contains. I think every one of your friends ave heard from you except myself. Either you have ot done me justice, or your friends have not done you; or I have not heard from them of my name being menioned in any of your letters. If my curiosity wanted nly to be gratified, I do not stand in need of a letter rom yourself to inform me what you are doing; for here are people about court who can tell me everyhing that you do or say, so that you had best take are of your conduct. You see of what importance are. However, all quarrels aside, I must ask you f you have any interest (or do you think that I could ave or procure any) with my lord-lieutenant to adance a relation of mine, one captain Innes, I think in olonel Wilson's regiment, and now in Limerick? He an exceeding worthy man, but has stuck long in a ow post for want of friends. Pray tell me which way shall proceed in this matter.

I was yesterday with all your friends at St. James's. here is certainly a fatality upon poor Gay. As for opes of preferment there by favour, he has laid it side. He had made a pretty good bargain (that is, a mithfield one) for a little place in the Custom-house, hich was to bring him in about 100*l.* a-year. It was done as a favour to an old man, and not at all to Gay. When everything was concluded, the man repented, and said he would not part with his place. I have begged Gay not to buy an annuity upon my life; I am sure I should not live a week. I long to hear of the safe arrival of Dr. Delany. Pray give my humble service to him.

As for news, it was written from Spain to me, from my brother in France, that the preliminaries were ratified, and yet the ministry know nothing of it. Nay some of them told me that the answer was rather surly Lord Townshend is very ill; but I think, by the description of his case, it is not mortal. I was with our friend at the back-stairs yesterday, and had the honour to be called in, and prettily chid for leaving off, &c. The first part of the discourse was about you, Mr. Pope, Curll, and myself. My family are well: they, and my brother in France, and one that is here, all give their service to you. If you had been so lucky as to have gone to Paris last summer, you would have had health, honour, and diversion, in abundance: for I will promise you would have recovered of the spleen. I shall add no more, but my kindest wishes, and that I am, with the greatest affection and respect, yours, &c.

FROM MONSIEUR VOLTAIRE.

In London, Maiden-lane, at the White Peruke, Covent-garden, December 14, 1727.

SIR,—You will be surprised in receiving an English essay[a] from a French traveller. Pray forgive an admirer of you, who owes to your writings the love he bears to your language, which has betrayed him into the rash attempt of writing in English.

You will see by the advertisement that I have some designs upon you, and that I must mention you for the honour of your country, and for the improvement of mine. Do not forbid me to grace my relation with your name. Let me indulge the satisfaction of talking of you as posterity will do.

In the mean time can I make bold to entreat you to make some use of your interest in Ireland, about some subscriptions for the "Henriade," which is almost ready, and does not come out yet for want of a little help? The subscriptions will be but one guinea in hand. I am, with the highest esteem and the utmost gratitude, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant,

VOLTAIRE.

FROM MONSIEUR VOLTAIRE.

SIR,—I sent the other day a cargo of French dulness to my lord lieutenant. My lady Bolingbroke has taken upon herself to send you one copy of the "Henriade." She is desirous to do that honour to my book; and I hope the merit of being presented to you by her hands will be a commendation to it. However, if she has not done it already, I desire you to take one of the cargo which is now at my lord-lieutenant's. I wish you a good hearing; if you have got it, you want nothing. I have not seen Mr. Pope this winter; but I have seen the third volume of the "Miscellanea;" and the more I read your works, the more I am ashamed of mine. I am, with respect, esteem, and gratitude, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant,

VOLTAIRE.

He had been imprisoned in the Bastile in Paris; but being re- d about the year 1725, he came to England, and solicited subscriptions for his poem. In about a year and a half he had made himself master of our language; and in 1727, when this letter was written, he published the essay here mentioned, with "An Essay on the Epic Poetry of the European Nations, from Homer to Milton."

TO MRS. MOORE.

Deanery-house, December 27, 1727.

DEAR MADAM,—Though I see you seldomer than is agreeable to my inclinations, yet you have no friend in the world that is more concerned for anything that can affect your mind, your health, or your fortune; I have always had the highest esteem for your virtue, the greatest value for your conversation, and the truest affection for your person; and therefore cannot but heartily condole with you for the loss of so amiable, and (what is more) so favourite a child. These are the necessary consequences of too strong attachments, by which we are grieving ourselves with the death of those we love, as we must one day grieve those who love us with the death of ourselves. For life is a tragedy, wherein we sit as spectators awhile, and then act our own part in it. Self-love, as it is the motive to all our actions, so it is the sole cause of our grief. The dear person you lament is by no means an object of pity, either in a moral or religious sense. Philosophy always taught men to despise life, as a most contemptible thing in itself; and religion regards it only as a preparation for a better, which you are taught to be certain that so innocent a person is now in possession of; so that she is an immense gainer, and you and her friends the only losers. Now, under misfortunes of this kind, I know no consolation more effectual to a reasonable person than to reflect rather upon what is left than what is lost. She was neither an only child nor an only daughter. You have three children left, one (Charles Devenish, esq.) of them of an age to be useful to his family, and the two others as promising as can be expected from their age; so that, according to the general dispensations of God Almighty, you have small reason to repine upon that article of life. And religion will tell you that the true way to preserve them is, not to fix any of them too deep in your heart, which is a weakness that God seldom leaves long unpunished: common observation showing us that such favourite children are either spoiled by their parents' indulgence, or soon taken out of the world; which last is, generally speaking, the lighter punishment of the two.

God, in his wisdom, hath been pleased to load our declining years with many sufferings, with diseases and decays of nature; with the death of many friends, and the ingratitude of more; sometimes with the loss or diminution of our fortunes, when our infirmities most need them; often with contempt from the world, and always with neglect from it; with the death of our most hopeful or useful children; with a want of relish for all worldly enjoyments; with a general dislike of persons and things; and though all these are very natural effects of increasing years, yet they were intended by the author of our being to wean us gradually from our fondness of life, the nearer we approach toward the end of it. And this is the use you are to make in prudence, as well as in conscience, of all the afflictions you have hitherto undergone, as well as of those which in the course of nature and providence you have reason to expect. May God, who hath endowed you with so many virtues, add strength of mind and reliance upon his mercy, in proportion to your present sufferings, as well as those he may think fit to try you with through the remainder of your life.

I fear my present ill disposition, both of health and mind, has made me but a sorry comforter:[a] however, it will show that no circumstance of life can put you out of my mind, and that I am, with the truest respect, esteem, and friendship, dear madam, your most obedient and humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] It was written little more than a month before Mrs Johnson's death, an event which was then almost daily expected.

TO LORD CARTERET.

January 18, 1728.

My Lord,—I was informed that your excellency having referred to the university here for some regulations of his majesty's benefaction for professors, they have in their answer insinuated as if they thought it best that the several professorships should be limited to their fellows, and to be held only as they continue to be so. I need not inform your excellency how contrary such a practice is to that of all the universities in Europe. Your excellency well knows how many learned men, of the two last ages, have been invited by princes to be professors in some art or science for which they were renowned; and that the like rule has been followed in Oxford and Cambridge. I hope your excellency will show no regard to so narrow and partial an opinion, which can only tend to mend fellowships and spoil professorships; although I should be sorry that any fellow should be thought incapable on that account, when otherwise qualified; and I should be glad that any person whose education has been in this university should be preferred before another upon equal deservings. But that must be left to those who shall be your excellency's successors, who may not always be great clerks; and I wish you could in some measure provide against having this benefaction made a perquisite of humour or favour. Whoever is preferred to a bishopric, or to such a preferment as shall hinder him from residing within a certain distance of this town, should be obliged to resign his professorship.

As long as you are governor here I shall always expect the liberty of telling you my thoughts; and I hope you will consider them, until y[illegible] I grow impertinent, or have some bias of my own.

If I had not been confined to my chamber by the continuance of my unconversable disorder, I would have exchanged your trouble of reading for that of hearing. I am, &c. Jonathan Swift.

I desire to present my most humble respects to my lady Carteret.

Your friend Walpole has lately done one of the cruelest actions that ever I knew, even in a minister of state, these thirty years past; which if the queen hath not intelligence of, may my right hand forget its cunning

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE AND MR. POPE.

Pope charges himself with this letter: he has been here two days, he is now hurrying to London, he will hurry back to Twickenham in two days more, and before the end of the week he will be, for aught I know, at Dublin. In the mean time his "Dulness" [the "Dunciad"] grows and flourishes as if he was there already. It will indeed be a noble work: the many will stare at it, the few will smile, and all his patrons, from Bickerstaff to Gulliver, will rejoice to see themselves adorned in that immortal piece.

I hear that you have had some return of your illness, which carried you so suddenly from us, if indeed it was your own illness which made you in such haste to be at Dublin. Dear Swift, take care of your health; I will give you a receipt for it, à la Montaigne, or, which is better, à la Bruyère. "Nourisser bien votre corps; ne le fatiguer jamais:[a] laisser rouiller l'esprit, meuble inutil, voire outil dangereux: Laisser sonner vos cloches le matin pour éveiller les chanoines, et pour faire dormir le doyen d'un sommeil doux et profond, qui lui procure de beaux songes: lever vous tard, et aller à l'église, pour vous faire payer d'avoir bien dormi et bien déjeûné."

[a] The whole of this pleasant receipt is taken from the "Lutrin" of Boileau.

As to myself (a person about whom I concern myself very little), I must say a word or two out of complaisance to you. I am in my farm, and here I shoot strong and tenacious roots; I have caught hold of the earth (to use a gardener's phrase), and neither my enemies nor my friends will find it an easy matter to transplant me again. Adieu; let me hear from you, at least of you: I love you for a thousand things, for none more than for the just esteem and love which you have for all the sons of Adam.

P.S. According to lord Bolingbroke's account, I shall be at Dublin in three days. I cannot help adding a word, to desire you to expect my soul there with you by that time; but as for the jade of a body that is tacked to it, I fear there will be no dragging it after. I assure you I have few friends here to detain me, and no powerful one at court absolutely to forbid my journey. I am told the gynocracy[a] are of opinion that they want no better writers than Cibber and the British Journalist;[b] so that we may live at quiet, and apply ourselves to our more abstruse studies. The only courtiers I know, or have the honour to call my friends, are John Gay and Mr. Bowry; the former is at present so employed in the elevated airs of his opera, and the latter in the exaltation of his high dignity, (that of her majesty's waterman,) that I can scarce obtain a categorical answer from either to anything I say to them. But the "Beggars' Opera" succeeds extremely to yours and my extreme satisfaction, of which he promises this post to give you a full account. I have been in a worse condition of health than ever, and think my immortality is very near out of my enjoyment: so it must be in you and in posterity to make me what amends you can for dying young. Adieu. While I am, I am yours. Pray love me and take care of yourself.

FROM MR. GAY.

Whitehall, February 15, 1728.

Dear Sir,—I have deferred writing to you from time to time, till I could give you an account of the "Beggars' Opera." It is acted at the playhouse in Lincoln's-inn-fields with such success, that the playhouse has been crowded every night. To-night is the fifteenth time of acting, and it is thought it will run a fortnight longer. I have ordered Motte[c] to send the play to you the first opportunity. I made no interest either for approbation or money; nor has anybody been pressed to take tickets for my benefit: notwithstanding which, I think I shall make an addition to my fortune of between 600*l.* and 700*l.* I know this account will give you pleasure, as I have pushed through this precarious affair without servility or flattery.

As to any favours from great men, I am in the same state you left me; but I am a great deal happier, as I have no expectations. The duchess of Queensberry has signalized her friendship to me upon this occasion in such a conspicuous manner that I hope (for her sake) you will take care to put your fork to all its proper uses, and suffer nobody for the future to put their knives in their mouths.[d] Lord Cobham says

[b] William Arnall, bred an attorney. It appears from the Report of the Secret Committee in the year 1742, for Inquiring into the Conduct of sir Robert Walpole, that Arnall received for "Free Britons," and other writings, in the space of four years, not less than 10,997*l.* 6*s.* 8*d* out of the treasury.

[c] Benjamin Motte, the bookseller.

[d] Alluding to some jest between the duchess and Swift, about his using his knife at table when a fork would have been more appropriate. It is again hinted at in Gay's letter of 9th November, 1729.

that I should have printed in Italian over against the English, that the ladies might have understood what they read. The outlandish (as they now call it) opera has been so thin of late, that some have called that the "Beggars' Opera;" and if the run continues, I fear I shall have remonstrances drawn up against me by the Royal Academy of Music. As none of us have heard from you of late, every one of us are in concern about your health: I beg we may hear from you soon. By my constant attendance on this affair I have almost worried myself into an ill state or health; but I intend, in five or six days, to go to our country seat at Twickenham for a little air. Mr. Pope is very seldom in town. Mrs. Howard frequently asks after you, and desires her compliments to you. Mr. George Arbuthnot, the doctor's brother, is married to Mrs. Peggy Robinson.

I would write more, but as to-night is for my benefit, I am in a hurry to go out about business. I am, dear sir, your most affectionate and obedient servant, JOHN GAY.

TO MRS. BLOUNT.[a]

Dublin, February 29, 1728.

DEAR PATTY,—I am told you have a mind to receive a letter from me, which is a very undecent declaration in a young lady, and almost a confession that you have a mind to write to me; for as to the fancy of looking on me as a man sans consequence, it is what I will never understand. I am told likewise you grow every day younger and more a fool, which is directly contrary to me, who grow wiser and older, and at this rate we shall never agree. I long to see you a London lady, where you are forced to wear whole clothes, and visit in a chair, for which you must starve next summer at Petersham, with a mantua out at the sides; and sponge once a-week at our house, without ever inviting us in a whole season to a cow-heel at home. I wish you would bring Mr. Pope over with you when you come; but we will leave Mr. Gay to his beggars and his operas till he is able to pay his club. How will you pass this summer for want of a squire to Ham-common and Walpole's lodge? for as to Richmond-lodge and Marble-hill, they are abandoned as much as sir Spencer Compton: and Mr. Schabe's coach, that used to give so many a set-down, is wheeled off to St. James's. You must be forced to get a horse, and gallop with Mrs. Jansen and Miss Bedier.* Your greatest happiness is, that you are out of the chiding of Mrs. Howard and the dean; but I suppose Mr. Pope is so just as to pay our arrears, and that you edify as much by him as by us, unless you are so happy that he now looks upon you as reprobate and a castaway, of which I think he hath given me some hints. However, I would advise you to pass this summer at Kensington, where you will be near the court and out of his jurisdiction; where you will be teazed with no lectures of gravity and morality, and where you will have no other trouble than to get into the mercer's books, and take up 100*l.* of your principal for quadrille. Monstrous, indeed, that a fine lady in the prime of life and gaiety must take up with an antiquated dean, an old gentlewoman of fourscore, and a sickly poet! I will stand by my dear Patty against the world, if Theresa beats you for your good, and I will buy her a fine whip for the purpose. Tell me, have you been confined to your lodging this winter for want of chair-hire? [Do you know that this unlucky Dr. Delany came last night to the deanery? and, being denied without my knowledge, is gone to England this morning, and so I must send this by the post. I bought your opera to-day for sixpence, so small printed that it will spoil my eyes. I ordered you to send me your edition, but now you may keep it till you get an opportunity.] Patty, I will tell you a blunder: I am writing to Mr. Gay, and had almost finished the letter; but by mistake I took up this instead of it, and so the six lines in a hook are all to him, and therefore you must read them to him, for I will not be at the trouble to write them over again. My greatest concern in the matter is, that I am afraid I continue in love with you, which is hard, after near six months' absence. I hope you have done with your rash and other little disorders, and that I shall see you a fine young, healthy, plump lady; and if Mr. Pope chides you, threaten him that you will turn heretic. Adieu, dear Patty, and believe me to be one of your truest friends and humblest servants; and that, since I can never live in England, my greatest happiness would be to have you and Mr. Pope condemned during my life to live in Ireland, he at the deanery, and you, for reputation sake, just at next door, and I will give you eight dinners a-week, and a whole half-dozen of pint bottles of good French wine at your lodgings, a thing you could never expect to arrive at, and every year a suit of fourteen-penny stuff, that should not be worn out at the right side; and a chair costs but sixpence a job; and you shall have catholicity as much as you please, and the Catholic dean of St. Patrick's, as old again as I, for your confessor. Adieu, again, dear Patty. JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] The direction is simply, "To Patty Blount."

FROM MR. GAY.

March 20, 1728.

DEAR SIR,—I am extremely sorry that your disorder is returned: but as you have a medicine which has twice removed it, I hope by this time you have again found the good effects of it. I have seen Dr. Delany at my lodgings; but as I have been for a few days with Mr. Pulteney at Cashioberry, I have not yet returned his visit. I went with him to wait upon lord Bathurst and lord Bolingbroke, both of whom desire me to make you their compliments. Lady Bolingbroke was very much out of order; and, with my lord, is now at Dawley: she expects a letter from you. Mrs. Howard would gladly have the receipt you have found so much benefit by: she is happier than I have seen her ever since you left us, for she is free, as to her conjugal affairs, by articles of agreement.[a] The "Beggars' Opera" has been acted now thirty-six times, and was as full the last night as the first; and as yet there is not the least probability of a thin audience; though there is a discourse about the town that the directors of the Royal Academy of Music design to solicit against its being played on the outlandish opera days, as it is now called. On the benefit day of one of the actresses last week, one of the players falling sick, they were obliged to give out another play, or dismiss the audience. A play was given out, but the audience called out for the "Beggars' Opera;" and they were forced to play it, or the audience would not have stayed.

I have got by all this success between 700*l.* and 800*l.*, and Rich (deducting the whole charge of the house) has cleared already near 4000*l.*[b] In about a month I am going to the Bath with the duchess of Marlborough and Mr. Congreve; for I have no expectations of receiving any favours from the court. The duchess of Queensberry is in Wiltshire, where she has had the small-pox in so favourable a way that she had not above seven or eight on her face; she is now perfectly recovered. There is a mezzotinto print published to-day of Polly, the heroine of the "Beggars

[a] Her husband blustered and bullied about her connexion with the king, until his mouth was stopped with a pension. See letter, May 7.

[b] The well-known bon-mot expressed both their good fortune; the opera was said to have made Gay rich, and Rich gay.

Opera,"[a] who was before unknown, and is now in so high vogue that I am in doubt whether her fame does not surpass that of the opera itself. I would not have talked so much upon this subject, or upon anything that regards myself, but to you; but as I know you interest yourself so sincerely in everything that concerns me, I believe you would have blamed me if I had said less.

Your singer owes Dr. Arbuthnot some money, I have forgot the sum; I think it is two guineas: the doctor desired me to let you know it. I saw him last night with Mr. Lewis at sir William Wyndham's, who if he had not the gout would have answered your letter you sent him a year and a half ago. He said this to me a week since, but he is now pretty well again, and so may forget to write; for which reason I ought to do him justice, and tell you that I think him a sincere well-wisher of yours. I have not seen Mr. Pope lately, but have heard that both he and Mrs. Pope [Mr. Pope's mother] are very well. I intend to see him at Twickenham on Sunday next. I have not drunk out the Guthridge cider yet; but I have not so much as a single pint of port in my cellar. I have bought two pair of sheets against your coming to town, so that we need not send any more to Jervas upon that account. I really miss you every day; and I would be content that you should have a whole window to yourself, and half another, to have you again. I am, dear sir, yours most affectionately.

You have half a year's interest due at Lady-day, and now it is March the 20th, 1728.

FROM MR. POPE.

March 23, 1728.

I SEND you a very odd thing, a paper printed in Boston, in New England, wherein you will find a real person, a member of their parliament, of the name of Jonathan Gulliver. If the fame of that traveller has travelled thither, it has travelled very quick to have folks christened already by the name of the supposed author. But if you object that no child so lately christened could be arrived at years of maturity to be elected into parliament, I reply (to solve the riddle) that the person is an Anabaptist, and not christened till full age, which sets all right. However it be, the accident is very singular that these two names should be united.

Mr. Gay's opera has been acted near forty days running, and will certainly continue the whole season. So he has more than a fence about his 1000*l*.;[b] he will soon be thinking of a fence about his 2000*l*. Shall no one of us live as we would wish each other to live? Shall he have no annuity, you no settlement on this side, and I no prospect of getting to you on the other? This world is made for Cæsar—as Cato said, for ambitious, false, or flattering people to domineer in: nay they would not, by their good will, leave us our very books, thoughts, or words in quiet. I despise the world yet, I assure you, more than either Gay or you, and the court more than all the rest of the world. As for those scribblers for whom you apprehend I would suppress my "Dulness" (which, by the way, for the future you are to call by a more pompous name, the "Dunciad"), how much that nest of hornets are my regard will easily appear to you when you read the "Treatise of the Bathos."

At all adventures, yours and my name shall stand linked as friends to posterity, both in verse and prose, and (as Tully calls it) in consuetudine studiorum. Would to God our persons could but as well and as surely be inseparable! I find my other ties dropping from me; some worn off, some torn off, others relaxing daily: my greatest [his mother], both by duty, gratitude, and humanity, time is shaking every moment, and it now hangs but by a thread! I am many years the older for living so much with one so old; much the more helpless for having been so long helped and tendered by her; much the more considerate and tender for a daily commerce with one who required me justly to be both to her; and consequently the more melancholy and thoughtful; and the less fit for others who want only, in a companion or a friend, to be amused or entertained. My constitution too has had its share of decay as well as my spirits, and I am as much in the decline at forty as you at sixty. I believe we should be fit to live together could I get a little more health, which might make me not quite insupportable. Your deafness would agree with my dulness; you would not want me to speak when you could not hear. But God forbid you should be as destitute of the social comforts of life as I must when I lose my mother; or that ever you should lose your more useful acquaintance so utterly as to turn your thoughts to such a broken reed as I am, who could so ill supply your wants. I am extremely troubled at the returns of your deafness: you cannot be too particular in the accounts of your health to me; everything you do or say in this kind obliges me, nay, delights me, to see the justice you do me in thinking me concerned in all your concerns; so that, though the pleasantest thing you can tell me be that you are better or easier, next to that it pleases me that you make me the person you would complain to.

As the obtaining the love of valuable men is the happiest end I know of this life, so the next felicity is to get rid of fools and scoundrels; which I cannot but own to you was one part of my design in falling upon these authors, whose incapacity is not greater than their insincerity, and of whom I have always found (if I may quote myself)

> That each bad author is as bad a friend.

This poem will rid me of those insects.

> Cedite, Romani scriptores, cedite, Graii;
> Nescio quid majus nascitur Iliade.[a]

I mean than my Iliad: and I call it Nescio quid, which is a degree of modesty; but however, if it silence these fellows,[b] it must be something greater than any Iliad in Christendom. Adieu.

FROM MRS. BLOUNT.

May 7, 1728.

SIR,—I am very much pleased with your letter, but I should have thought myself much more obliged had you been less sincere, and not told me I did not owe the favour entirely to your inclinations, but to an information that I had a mind to hear from you; and I mistrust you think even that as much as I deserve. If so, you really are not deserving of my repeated inquiries after you and my constant good wishes and concern for your welfare, which merits some remembrance without the help of another. I cannot say I have a great inclination to write to you, for I have no great vanity that way, at least not enough to support me above the fear of writing ill; but I would fain have you know how truly well I wish you.

I am sorry to hear no good account of your health; mine has been since Christmas (at which time I had my fever and rash) neither well nor ill enough to be [a] Miss Fenton.

[b] Before Mr. Gay had fenced his 1000*l*., he had a consultation with his friends about the disposal of it. Mr. Lewis advised him to intrust it in the funds, and live upon the interest: Dr. Arbuthnot to intrust it to Providence, and live upon the principal; and Mr. Pope was for purchasing an annuity for life: In this uncertainty he could only say with the old man in Terence—

> " ——————— fecistis probe:
> Incertior sum multo, quam dudum."

[a] " Ye Greek and Roman authors, yield the prize;
See something greater than an Iliad rise."

[b] It did in a little time effectually silence them.

taken notice of; but within these three weeks I have been sick in form, and kept my bed for a week, and my chamber to this day.

This confinement, together with the mourning,[a] has enabled me to be very easy in my chaise-hire; for a dyed black gown and a scoured white one have done my business very well; and they are now just fit for Petersham, where we talk of going in three weeks; and I am not without hopes I shall have the same squire [Dr. Swift] I had last year. I am very unwilling to change; and moreover I begin to fear I have no great prospect of getting any new danglers; and therefore, in order to make a tolerable figure, I shall endeavour to behave myself mighty well that I may keep my old ones.

As a proof that I continue to be well received at court, I will tell you where the royal family design to pass their summer; two months at Richmond-lodge, the same time at Hampton court, and six weeks at Windsor. Mrs. Howard is well, and happier than ever you saw her, for her whole affair with her husband is ended to her satisfaction.[b]

Dr. Arbuthnot I am very angry with; he neglects me for those he thinks finer ladies. Mr. Gay's fame continues, but his riches are in a fair way of diminishing; he is gone to the Bath: I wish you were ordered there, for I believe that would carry Mr. Pope, who is always inclined to do more for his friends than himself. He is much out of order, and is told nothing is so likely to do him good.

My illness has prevented my writing to you sooner. If I were a favourite at court, I would soon convince you that I am very sincerely your faithful friend and very humble servant, M. B.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, May 10, 1728.

I have with great pleasure shown the New England newspaper with the two names Jonathan Gulliver; and I remember Mr. Fortescue[c] sent you an account from the assizes of one Lemuel Gulliver who had a cause there, and lost it on his ill reputation of being a liar. These are not the only observations I have made upon odd strange accidents in trifles, which in things of great importance would have been matter for historians. Mr. Gay's opera has been acted here twenty times, and my lord-lieutenant tells me it is very well performed; he has seen it often, and approves it much.

You give a most melancholy account of yourself, and which I do not approve. I reckon that a man, subject like us to bodily infirmities, should only occasionally converse with great people, notwithstanding all their good qualities, easinesses, and kindnesses. There is another race which I prefer before them, as beef and mutton for constant diet before partridges; I mean a middle kind both for understanding and fortune, who are perfectly easy, never impertinent, complying in everything, ready to do a hundred little offices that you and I may often want, who dine and sit with me five times for once that I go to them, and whom I can tell without offence that I am otherwise engaged at present. This you cannot expect from any of those that either you or I, or both, are acquainted with on your side; who are only fit for our healthy seasons, and have much business of their own. God forbid I should condemn you to Ireland (Quanquam O!), and for England I despair; and indeed a change of affairs would come too late at my season of life, and might probably produce nothing on my behalf. You have kept Mrs. Pope longer, and have had her care beyond what from nature you could expect; not but her loss will be very sensible whenever it shall happen. I say one thing, that both summers and winters are milder here than with you; all things for life in general better for a middling fortune; you will have an absolute command of your company, with whatever obsequiousness or freedom you may expect or allow. I have an elderly housekeeper who has been my Walpole above thirty years whenever I lived in this kingdom. I have the command of one or two villas near this town; you have a warm apartment in this house, and two gardens for amusement. I have said enough, yet not half. Except absence from friends, I confess freely that I have no discontent at living here beside what arises from a silly spirit of liberty, which, as it neither sours my drink, nor hurts my meat, nor spoils my stomach further than in imagination, so I resolve to throw it off.

You talk of this "Dunciad," but I am impatient to have it volare per ora—there is now a vacancy for fame; the "Beggars' Opera" has done its task, discedat uti conviva satur. Adieu.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO LORD CARTERET.

May 10, 1728.

MY LORD,—I told your excellency that you were to run on my errands. My lord Burlington has a very fine monument of his ancestor the earl of Corke in my cathedral, which your excellency has seen. I and the chapter have written to him in a body to have it repaired, and I in person have desired he would do it. And I desired likewise that he would settle a parcel of land worth 5*l*. a-year (not an annuity) to keep it always in repair. He said "he would do anything to oblige me, but was afraid that in future times the 5*l*. a-year would be misapplied, and secured by the dean and chapter to their own use." I answered "that a dean and twenty-four members of so great a chapter, who in livings, estates, &c., had about 4000*l*., a-year among them, would hardly divide 4*s*. among them to cheat his posterity; and that we could have no view but to consult the honour of his family." I therefore command your excellency to lay this before him, and the affront he has put upon us in not answering a letter written to him by the dean and chapter in a body.

The great duke of Schomberg is buried under the altar in my cathedral. My lady Holderness is my old acquaintance, and I wrote to her about a small sum to make a monument for her grandfather. I wrote to her myself; and also there was a letter from the dean and chapter to desire she would order a monument to be raised for him in my cathedral. It seems Mildmay, now lord Fitzwalter, her husband, is a covetous fellow; or whatever is the matter, we have had no answer. I desire you will tell lord Fitzwalter "that, if he will not send 50*l*. to make a monument for the old duke, I and the chapter will erect a small one of ourselves for 10*l*.; wherein it shall be expressed that the posterity of the duke, naming particularly lady Holderness and Mr. Mildmay, not having the generosity to erect a monument, we have done it of ourselves." And if, for an excuse, they pretend they will send for his body, let them know it is mine; and, rather than send it, I will take up the bones, and make of it a skeleton, and put it in my register-office, to be a memorial of their baseness to all posterity. This I expect your excellency will tell Mr. Mildmay, or, as you now call him, lord Fitzwalter; and I expect likewise that he will let sir Conyers d'Arcy know how ill I take his neglect in this matter; although, to do him justice, he averred "that Mildmay was so avaricious a wretch that he would let his own father be buried without a coffin to save charges."

[a] For the death of king George I.
[b] This shameful intrigue is minutely detailed by lord Orford in his "Reminiscences."
[c] William Fortescue, esq., afterward a baron of the Exchequer

I expect likewise, that if you are acquainted with your successor, you will let him know how impartial I was in giving you characters of clergymen, without regard to party, and what weight you laid on them; and that, having but one clergyman who had any relation to me, I let him pass unpreferred. And lastly, that you will let your said successor know that you lament the having done nothing for Mr. Robert Grattan,[a] and give him such a recommendation that he may have something to mend his fortune.

These are the matters I leave in charge to your excellency; and I desire that I, who have done with courts, may not be used like a courtier; for, as I was a courtier when you were a schoolboy, I know all your arts. And so God bless you, and all your family, my old friends; and remember, I expect you shall not dare to be a courtier to me. I am &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. GAY.

Bath, May 16, 1728.

DEAR SIR,—I have been at the Bath about ten days, and I have played at no game but once, and that at backgammon with Mr. Lewis, who is very much your humble servant. He is here upon account of the ill state of health of his wife, who has as yet found very little benefit from the waters. Lord and lady Bolingbroke are here; and I think she is better than when I came here; they stay, as I guess, only about a fortnight longer. They both desired me to make their compliments; as does Mr. Congreve,[b] who is in a very ill state of health, but somewhat better since he came here. Mr. Lewis tells me that he is promised to receive 100*l.* upon your account at his return to London; he having (upon request) complied to stay for the payment till that time. The 200*l.* you left with me are in the hands of lord Bathurst, together with some money of mine, all which he will repay at Midsummer, so that we must think of some other way of employing it; and I cannot resolve what to do. I do not know how long I shall stay here, because I am now, as I have been all my life, at the disposal of others. I drink the waters and am in hopes to lay in a stock of health, some of which I wish to communicate to you. Dr. Delany told me you had been upon a journey, and I really fancy taking horse is as good as taking the waters; I hope you have found benefit by it. "The Beggars' Opera" is acted here; but our Polly has got no fame, though the actors have got money. I have sent by Dr. Delany the opera, Polly Peachum, and captain Macheath. I would have sent you my own head, (which is now engraving to make up the gang,) but it is not yet finished. I supposed you must have heard that I have had the honour to have had a sermon preached against my works by a court chaplain,[c] which I look upon as no small addition to my fame.—Direct to me here when you write; and the sooner that is, the sooner you will make me happy.

TO MR. POPE.

June 1, 1728.

I LOOK upon my lord Bolingbroke and us two as a peculiar triumvirate, who have nothing to expect or to fear; and so far fittest to converse with one another; only he and I are a little subject to schemes, and one of us (I would not say which) upon very weak appearances, and this you have nothing to do with. I do profess without affectation that your kind opinion of me as a patriot (since you call it so) is what I do not deserve; because what I do is owing to perfect rage and resentment, and the mortifying sight of slavery, folly, and baseness about me, among which I am forced to live. And I will take my oath that you have more virtue in an hour than I in seven years; for you despise the follies and hate the vices of mankind without the least ill effect on your temper; and with regard to particular men, you are inclined always rather to think the better, whereas with me it is always directly contrary. I hope, however, this is not in you from a superior principle of virtue, but from your situation, which has made all parties and interests indifferent to you; who can be under no concern about high and low church, Whig and Tory, or who is first minister.—Your long letter was the last I received till this by Dr. Delany, although you mention another since. The doctor told me your secret about the "Dunciad," which does not please me, because it defers gratifying my vanity in the most tender point, and perhaps may wholly disappoint it. As to one of your inquiries, I am easy enough in great matters, but have a thousand paltry vexations in my little station, and the more contemptible the more vexatious. There might be a Lutrin written upon the tricks used by my chapter to teaze me. I do not converse with one creature of station or title, but I have a set of easy people whom I entertain when I have a mind: I have formerly described them to you, but when you come you shall have the honours of the country as much as you please, and I shall on that account make a better figure as long as I live. Pray God preserve Mrs. Pope for your sake and ease; I love and esteem her too much to wish it for her own; if I were five-and-twenty I would wish to be of her age, to be as secure as she is of a better life. Mrs. P. B. [Patty Blount] has written to me, and is one of the best letter-writers I know; very good sense, civility, and friendship, without any stiffness or constraint. The "Dunciad" has taken wind here; but if it had not, you are as much known here as in England, and the university lads will crowd to kiss the hem of your garment. I am grieved to hear that my lord Bolingbroke's ill health forced him to the Bath. Tell me, is not temperance a necessary virtue for great men, since it is the parent of ease and liberty, so necessary for the use and improvement of the mind, and which philosophy allows to be the greatest felicities of life? I believe, had health been given so liberally to you, it would have been better husbanded without shame to your parts.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. POPE.

Dawley, June 28, 1728.

I NOW hold the pen for my lord Bolingbroke, who is reading your letter between two haycocks, but his attention is somewhat diverted by casting his eyes on the clouds, not in admiration of what you say, but for fear of a shower. He is pleased with your placing him in the triumvirate between yourself and me; though he says that he doubts he shall fare like Lepidus—while one of us runs away with all the power, like Augustus, and another with all the pleasures, like Anthony. It is upon a foresight of this that he has fitted up his farm, and you will agree that his scheme of retreat at least is not founded upon weak appearances. Upon his return from the Bath, all peccant humours he finds are purged out of him; and his great temperance and economy are so signal, that the first is fit for my constitution, and the latter would enable you to lay up so much money as to buy a bishopric in England. As to the return of his health and vigour, were you here, you might inquire of his haymakers; but as to his temperance, I can answer that (for one whole day) we have had nothing for dinner but mutton broth, beans and bacon, and a barn-door fowl.

[a] Of this family there were seven brothers, sons of Dr. Grattan, a venerable and hospitable clergyman, who gave them all a liberal education.

[b] He died January 19, 1729.

Now his lordship is run after his cart, I have a moment left to myself to tell you that I overheard him yesterday agree with a painter for 200*l.* to paint his country-hall with trophies of rakes, spades, prongs, &c., and other ornaments, merely to countenance his calling this place a farm—now turn over a new leaf.—

He bids me assure you he should be sorry not to have more schemes of kindness for his friends than of ambition for himself; there, though his schemes may be weak, the motives at least are strong; and he says further, if you could bear as great a fall and decrease of your revenues as he knows by experience he can, you would not live in Ireland an hour

The "Dunciad" is going to be printed in all pomp, with the inscription, which makes me proudest. It will be attended with proeme, prolegomena, testimonia scriptorum, index authorum, and notes variorum. As to the latter, I desire you to read over the text, and make a few in any way you like best;[a] whether dry raillery, upon the style and way of commenting of trivial critics; or humorous, upon the authors in the poem; or historical, of persons, places, times; or explanatory, or collecting the parallel passages of the ancients. Adieu. I am pretty well, my mother not ill. Dr. Arbuthnot vexed with his fever by intervals; I am afraid he declines, and we shall lose a worthy man: I am troubled about him very much: I am, &c.

FROM MR GAY

Bath, July 6, 1728.

Dear Sir,—The last news I have heard of you was from Mr. Lancelot, who was at this place with lord Sussex, who gave me hopes of seeing you the latter end of this summer. I wish you may keep that resolution, and take the Bath in your way to town. You in all probability will find here some or most of those you like to see. Dr. Arbuthnot wrote to me to-day from Tunbridge, where he is now for the recovery of his health, having had several relapses of a fever: he tells me that he is much better, and that in August he intends to some hither. Mr. Congreve and I often talk of you, and wish you health and every good thing; but often, out of self-interest, we wish you with us. In five or six days I set out upon an excursion to Herefordshire, to lady Scudamore's, but shall return here the beginning of August. I wish you could meet me at Gutheridge. The Bath did not agree with lady Bolingbroke, and she went from here much worse than she came. Since she went to Dawley, by her own inclination, without the advice of physicians, she has taken to a milk diet, and she hath written me an account of prodigious good effects both in the recovery of her appetite and spirits. The weather is extremely hot, the place is very empty, I have an inclination to study, but the heat makes it impossible. The duke of Bolton, I hear, has run away with Polly Peachum,[b] having settled 400*l.* a-year upon her during pleasure; and upon disagreement 200*l.* a-year. Mr. Pope is in a state of persecution for the "Dunciad;" I wish to be witness of his fortitude, but he writes but seldom. It would be a consolation to me to hear from you. I have heard but once from Mrs. Howard these three months, and, I think, but once from Mr. Pope. My portrait mezzotinto is published from Mrs. Howard's painting; I wish I could contrive to send you one, but I fancy I could get a better impression at London. I have ten thousand things to talk to you, but few to write; yet defer writing to you no longer, knowing you interest yourself in everything that concerns me so much, that I make you happy, as you will me if you can tell me you are in good health, which I wish to hear every morning as soon as I awake. I am, dear sir, yours most affectionately.

[a] Dr. Swift did so.

[b] Miss Fenton, whom he afterwards married.

TO MR. POPE.*

July 26, 1728.

I have often run over the "Dunciad," in an Irish edition (I suppose full of faults), which a gentleman sent me. The notes I could wish to be very large, in what relates to the persons concerned; for I have long observed that twenty miles from London nobody understands hints, initial letters, or town facts and passages; and in a few years not even those who live in London. I would have the names of those scribblers printed indexically, at the beginning or end of the poem, with an account of their works, for the reader to refer to. I would have all the parodies (as they are called) referred to the author they imitate.—When I began this long paper, I thought I should have filled it with setting down the several passages I had marked in the edition I had; but I find it unnecessary, so many of them falling under the same rule. After twenty times reading the whole, I never, in my opinion, saw so much good satire, or more good sense, in so many lines. How it passes in Dublin I know not yet; but I am sure it will be a great disadvantage to the poem that the persons and facts will not be understood till an explanation comes out, and a very full one. I imagine it is not to be published till toward winter, when folks begin to gather in town. Again I insist, you must have your asterisks filled up with some real names of real dunces.

I am now reading your preceding letter of June 28, and find that all I have advised above is mentioned there. I would be glad to know whether the quarto edition is to come out anonymously, as published by the commentator, with all his pomp of prefaces, &c., and among many complaints of spurious editions? I am thinking whether the editor should not follow the old style of this excellent author, &c., and refine in many places when you meant no refinement; and into the bargain, take all the load of naming the dunces, their qualities, histories, and performances!

As to yourself, I doubt you want a spurrer-on to exercise and to amusements; but to talk of decay at your season of life is a jest. But you are not so regular as I. You are the most temperate man Godward, and the most intemperate yourself-ward, of most I have known. I suppose Mr. Gay will return from the Bath with twenty pounds more flesh, and two hundred less in money: Providence never designed him to be above two-and-twenty by his thoughtlessness and cullibility. He has as little foresight of age, sickness, poverty, or loss of admirers, as a girl of fifteen. By the way, I must observe that my lord Bolingbroke (from the effects of his kindness to me) argues most sophistically: the fall from a million to a hundred thousand pounds is not so great as from eight hundred pounds a-year to one: besides, he is a controller of fortune; and poverty dares not look a great minister in the face under his lowest declension. I never knew him live so greatly and expensively as he has done since his return from exile; such mortals have resources that others are not able to comprehend. But God bless you, whose great genius has not so transported you as to leave you to the courtesy of mankind; for wealth is liberty, and liberty is a blessing fittest for a philosopher—and Gay is a slave just by 2000*l.* too little. And Horace was of my mind, and let my lord contradict him if he dares. Jonathan Swift.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Market-hill,[a] August 2, 1728

Our friends here, as well as myself, were sadly disappointed upon hearing the account of your journey. Nobody in town or country, as we were informed, knew where you were; but I persuaded our family that you were certainly in a way of making yourself easy, and had got that living you mentioned: and accordingly we were grieved and rejoiced at the loss and settlement of a friend; but it never entered into our heads that you were bestowing forty days in several stages between constable and constable, without any real benefit to yourself, further than of exercise; and we wished that nobody should have had the benefit of your long absence from your school but yourself, by a good living, or we by your good company; much less that the pleasure of spiting T——— [Richard Tighe] had been your great motive. I heartily wish you were settled at Hamilton's Bawn, and I would be apt to advise you not to quit your thoughts that way, if the matter may be brought to bear; for, by a letter I just received from the bishop of Cork, which was short and dry, with the stale excuse of pre-engagements, I doubt you can hope nothing from him. As to what you call my exercise, I have long quitted it: it gave me too much constraint, and the world does not deserve it. We may keep it cold till the middle of winter.

As to my return, there are many speculations. I am well here, and hate removals: my scheme was, that you should come hither, as you say, and I return with you in your chaise. Sir Arthur, on hearing your letter, pressed me to stay longer. I am a very busy man, such as at Quilca, which you will know when you come; yet I would contrive to be pressed more to stay till Christmas, and then you may contrive to be here again, and take me back with you time enough for my own visitation; and my reason for staying is, to be here the planting and pruning time, &c. I hate Dublin, and love the retirement here and the civility of my hosts. This is my state and humour upon it, and accordingly you are to manage my scheme. However, I would have you keep your vacation of September here: and let Mrs Brent send me a dozen guineas (half of them half guineas) by you, and a periwig, and a new riding-gown and cassock, and whatever else I may want by a longer absence, provided you will resolve and swear that I shall stay.

I had all Mrs. Brent's packets by Mr. Little. My service to Mrs. Dingley. I cannot say that I have more to say than to say that I am, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Market-hill, September 18, 1728.

My continuance here is partly owing to indolence, and partly to my hatred to Dublin. I am in a middling way, between healthy and sick, hardly ever without a little giddiness or deafness, and sometimes both: so much for that. As to what you call my lesson, I told you I would think no more of it, neither do I conceive the world deserves so much trouble from you or me. I think the sufferings of the country for want of silver deserve a paper,[b] since the remedy is so easy, and those in power so negligent. I had some other subjects in my thoughts: but truly I am taken up so much with long lampoons on a person who owns you for a back, that I have no time for anything else: and if I do not produce one every now and then of about two hundred lines, I am chid for my idleness and threatened with you. I desire you will step to the deanery, speak to Mrs. Brent,[a] bid her open the middle great drawer of Ridgeway's scrutoire in my closet, and then do you take out from thence the history[b] in folio, marble cover; and two thin folios, fairly written. I forget the titles, but you have read them; one is an account of the proceedings of lord Oxford's ministry, and the other[c] to the same purpose. There are foul copies of both in the same drawer, but do you take out the fair ones, not in my hand. Let them be packed up and brought hither by the bearer. My lady is perpetually quarrelling with sir Arthur and me, and shows every creature the libels I have writ against her.[d]

Mr. Worrall sent me the particulars of the havoc made in Naboth's vineyard.[e] The d——— burst, &c.

I think lady Dun's burning would be an admirable subject to show how hateful an animal a human creature is that is known to have never done any good. The rabble all rejoicing, &c., which they would not have done at any misfortune to a man known to be charitable.

I wish you could get in with the primate, on the account of some discourse about you here to-day with Whaley and Walmsley. Whaley goes to Dublin on Monday next in order for England. I would have you see him. I fancy you may do some good with the primate as to the first good vacant school, if you wheedle him and talk a little Whiggishly.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

MR. POPE TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Sir,—I thank you kindly for your news of the dean of St. Patrick's for your "Persius,[f]" for everything in your letter. I will use my warmest endeavours to serve Dr. Whaley. Beside his own merit, the demerit of his antagonist goes into the scale, and the dean tells me he is a coadjutant of that fool Smedley. You must have seen, but you cannot have read, what he has lately published against our friend and me. The only pleasure a bad writer can give me he has given, that of being abused with my betters and my friends. I am much pleased with most of the "Intelligencers," but I am a little piqued at the author of them for not once doing me the honour of a mention upon so honourable an occasion as being slandered by the dunces, together with my friend the dean, who is properly the author of the "Dunciad:" it had never been written but at his request, and for his deafness: for, had he been able to converse with me, do you think I had amused my time so ill? I will not trouble you with amendments to so imperfect an edition as is now published; you will soon see a better, with a full and true commentary, setting all mistakes right, and branding none but our own cattle. Some very good epigrams on the gentlemen of the "Dunciad" have been sent me from Oxford, and others of the London authors. If I had an amanuensis (which is a thing neither I nor my common trifles are worth) you should have them with this. If your university or town have produced any on this subject, pray send them me, or keep them at least together, for another day they may all meet.

I have written to the dean just now by Mr. Elrington, who charges himself with this, and have inserted a hint or two of his libelling the lady of the family: in as innocent a manner as he does it, he will hardly suspect I had any information of it.

[f] A prose translation by Dr. Sheridan

Though I am a very ill correspondent, I shall at al times be glad to have the favour of a line from you My eyesight is bad, my head often in pain, my tim strangely taken up. Were I my own master (which, thank God, I yet am, in all points but one, where humanity only constrains me) I would infallibly see Ireland before I die. But whether that, or many othe of my little though warm designs, will ever take effect, Caliginosa nocte premit Deus.

I am (wherever I am) the dean's and the dean's friends', and consequently faithfully, sir, your affectionate servant, ALEXANDER POPE.

TO MR. WORRALL.[a]

September 28, 1728.

I HAD all the letters given me by my servants; so tell Mrs. Brent and Dr. Sheridan: and I thank you for the great care you had in the commissions I troubled you with.

I imagine Mrs. Brent is gone into the country but that you know where to send to her. I desire you will pay her four pounds, and sixteen pounds to Mrs. Dingley, and take their receipts. I beg Mrs. Dingley's pardon for not remembering her debt sooner, and my humble service to her. I desire Mrs. Brent to send me the best receipt she has for making meath: she may send me her receipt for making the strong meath, and that for making the next strong, and the third strong. Hers was always too strong; and on that account she was so wilful I would suffer her to make no more. There is a vexatious thing happened about the usquebaugh for my lord Bolingbroke. It seems you only directed it for the earl of Berkeley; but I thought I had desired you to add "for lord Bolingbroke;" but there is nothing in that, for I wrote to the earl of Berkeley to give him notice. But Mr. Gavan, who married a daughter of Mrs. Kenna, who keeps the inn at Chester, hath just sent me a letter, informing me that the usquebaugh came to Park-gate, within seven miles of Chester; and that Mr. Whittle, the owner of the ship, was to deliver it himself; but he sent it by a man of a noted bad character, who, as Mrs. Kenna supposes, kept it some time, and opened it before he delivered it; for, immediately upon the delivery of it, Mrs. Kenna sent to Park-gate, to have the usquebaugh brought up to Chester; but was told that the fellow had brought it away; that he said he sent it as directed; but that no doubt he must have some view of paying himself for the trouble, which made him so busy; but whether it was by changing the usquebaugh, or overrating the charges of it, Mr. Gavan could not tell; but adds that, if I should hear of anything amiss, I should write to Mrs. Kenna, his mother, who will endeavour to make the fellow do me justice. All this I have transcribed from Mr. Gavan's letter; and I desire you will call upon his father, Mr. Luke Gavan, (who is a known man in Dublin,) and desire him, when he writes to his son, to give my service to him and Mrs. Kenna, and let them know I will do as they direct. I am very unfortunate in this affair; but have no remedy; however, I will write to lord Bolingbroke: though I fear I am cheated of it all: for I do not find that the fellow demanded anything from Mrs. Kenna, or came to her at all. Your new fancies of making my riding-gown and cassock (I mean Mrs. Brent's fancies) do not please me at all, because they differ so much from my old one. You are a bad packer of bad grapes. Mrs. Dingley says she cannot persuade Mrs. Brent to take a vomit. Is she not (do not tell her) an old fool? she has made me take many a one without mercy. Pray give Mrs. Worrall a thousand thanks from me for her kind present and workmanship of her fairest hands in making me two nightcaps.

We have a design upon Sheridan. He sent us in print a ballad upon Ballyspellin, in which he has employed all the rhymes he could find to that word; but we have found fifteen more, and employed them in abusing his ballad and Ballyspellin too. I here send you a copy, and desire you will get it printed privately, and published.

Your periwig-maker is a cursed rogue. The wig he gave you is an old one with a new cawl, and so big that I cannot wear it, and the curls all fallen: I just tried it on my head; but I cannot wear it. I am ever yours, &c.

FROM MR POPE.

Bath November 14, 1728.

I HAVE passed six weeks in quest of health, and found it not: but I found the folly of solicitude about it in a hundred instances: the contrariety of opinions and practices, the inability of physicians, the blind obedience of some patients, and as blind rebellion of others. I believe, at a certain time of life, men are either fools or physicians for themselves; and zealots or divines for themselves.

It was much in my hopes that you intended us a winter's visit, but last week I repented that wish, having been alarmed with a report of your lying ill on the road from Ireland; from which I am just relieved by an assurance that you are still at sir Arthur's [sir Arthur Acheson] planting and building; two things that I envy you for, besides a third, which is the society of a valuable lady. I conclude, though I know nothing of it, that you quarrel with her and abuse her every day if she is so. I wonder I hear of no lampoons upon her, either made by yourself or by others, because you esteem her. I think it a vast pleasure that, whenever two people of merit regard one another, so many scoundrels envy and are angry at them; it is bearing testimony to a merit they cannot reach: and if you knew the infinite content I have received of late at the finding yours and my name constantly united in any silly scandal, I think you would go near to sing Io Triumphe! and celebrate my happiness in verse: and I believe, if you will not, I shall. The inscription to the "Dunciad" is now printed and inserted in the poem. Do you care I should say anything further how much that poem is yours? since certainly without you it had never been. Would to God we were together for the rest of our lives! the whole weight of scribblers would just serve to find us amusement, and not more. I hope you are too well employed to mind them; every stick you plant, and every stone you lay, is to some purpose; but the business of such lives as theirs is but to die daily, to labour and raise nothing. I only wish we could comfort each other under our bodily infirmities, and let those who have so great a mind to have more wit than we win it and wear it. Give us but ease, health, peace, and fair weather! I think it is the best wish in the world, and you know whose it was. If I lived in Ireland, I fear the wet climate would endanger more than my life, my humour and health, I am so atmospherical a creature.

I must not omit acquainting you that what you heard of the words spoken of you in the drawing-room was not true. The sayings of princes are generally as ill related as the sayings of wits. To such reports little of our regard should be given, and less of our conduct influenced by them.

TO THE REV. MR. WALLIS.

Market-hill, November 16, 1728.

SIR,—I am extremely obliged to you for your kind intention in the purchase you mention; but it will not answer my design, because these lands are let in leases renewable for ever, and consequently can never have the rent raised; which is mortal to all estates left for ever to a public use, and is contrary to a fundamental maxim of mine; and most corporations feel the smart of it.

I have been here several months, to amuse me in my disorders of giddiness and deafness, of which I have frequent returns—and I shall hardly return to Dublin till Christmas.

I am truly grieved at your great loss.[a] Such misfortunes seem to break the whole scheme of man's life, and although time may lessen sorrow, yet it cannot hinder a man from feeling the want of so near a companion, nor hardly supply it with another. I wish you health and happiness, and that the pledge[b] left you may prove a comfort. I am, with great sincerity, your most obliged and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

DR. SHERIDAN TO LORD MOUNTCASHEL.

December 1, 1728.

MY LORD,—I dedicate to you this edition and translation of "Persius,"[c] as an acknowledgment for the great pleasure you gave me in the first part of your education, which, by your own application and goodness of temper, was attended with a success equal to my wishes.

And since you still proceed in the same paths of diligence and virtue in the university, where you have already distinguished yourself in a very short time, it lays a further obligation upon me to return you my thanks in this public manner for having so faithfully regarded the last advice which I gave you.

When I hear from your governors with what respect and deference you treat them; how cheerful you are in your obedience to their commands; that you are constant in all duties enjoined you by the statutes (too much hitherto neglected by those of your quality); that you are regular in your life, decent in your behaviour, good-natured and civil to your companions, whom you have prudently chosen from among the best; that you are diligent in your studies; with many other additions to your character which very much redound to your honour; I then return my thanks to God, and think all my labour on your account rewarded in the noblest and the best manner.

You are now in a situation of taking two the most delightful prospects that a generous mind can have. First, you can look back upon a good and honourable reputation, left behind you among your schoolfellows. You can behold that ardent emulation in most of them which you kindled in their breasts by your example; and thus you see yourself a blessed instrument of bringing others into the road of honour and virtue, which you naturally followed upon the first direction. The next prospect is, that you are now placed on a more public stage, among the hopefulest young gentlemen of this kingdom, who are already so far influenced by your example that they rather seem willing to contend with you in the race than to follow; and this by your own encouragement. Consider, my lord, the good you now do is not confined to the present age; but those to come shall show the effects of your virtue, and posterity shall bless you for giving an advantage to them, which they can only requite by the greatest esteem they will preserve for your memory.

I shall make you no compliments upon your birth or title, for which, you and your schoolfellows will witness for me that I never did once either distinguish or spare you while you were under my care. Neither shall I ever allow you any merit from the mere advantages of fortune. Besides, I always observed you much more fond of the genealogies of the Greek and Roman heroes than of your own. There you found so many wonderful examples of piety, wisdom, justice, fortitude, love to their country, faithfulness to their friends, every action great, noble, and truly humane, that it is not to be wondered your character exceeds your years, when you endeavoured to borrow most of it from them; for which every wise man will acquit you, since there are so few examples in the present world that will deserve your imitation. But the great characters of antiquity are such as you may safely follow in everything that is great and good. And although it hath been your misfortune to live in a country not the most inviting scene to employ those talents which God hath given you, and which your own disposition, added to the care of your instructors, is so likely to improve, yet let not that be a discouragement from persevering to qualify yourself for appearing one day where you can shine to more advantage.

But my zeal for your happiness makes me forget that you are now under governors much fitter to direct you in your future conduct. I shall therefore only join with them in my good wishes for a blessing on their labours. "Si agricolam arbor ad fructum perducta delectat; si pastor ex fœtu gregis sui capit voluptatem; si alumnum suum nemo aliter intuetur quam ut adolescentiam illius suam judicet, quid evenire credis his qui ingenia educaverunt, et qui tenera formaverunt, adulta subito vident? Assero te mihi, Meum opus es." [Seneca, Ep. 34.] My case, my lord, is the very same. You are a plant of my own rearing; and although you be now removed to another soil, the same delight which I conceived at your prosperous growth makes me earnest in my expectations to see the fruit. May you never disappoint our hopes, but become a true son of the church, a loyal subject to your prince, a faithful friend to your country, and an honour to the age you live in! May all happiness and success attend you to the last period of your life. I am, my lord, with true respect, esteem, and affection, your most obedient and most humble servant,

THOMAS SHERIDAN.

FROM MR. GAY.

London, December 2, 1728.

DEAR SIR,—I think this is my fourth letter, I am sure it is the third, without any answer. If I had any assurance of your health I should have been more easy. I should have written to you upon this subject above a month ago, had it not been for a report that you were upon the road in your way to England: which I fear now was without foundation. Your money, with part of my own, is still in the hands of lord Bathurst, which I believe he will keep no longer, but repay upon his coming to town; when I will endeavour to dispose of it as I do of my own, unless I receive your orders to the contrary. Lord and lady Bolingbroke are in town: she has been lately very ill, but is now somewhat better. I have had a very severe attack of a fever, which, by the care of our friend Dr. Arbuthnot, has, I hope, almost left me. I have been confined about ten days, but never to my bed, so that I hope soon to get abroad about my business; that is, the care of the second part of the "Beggars' Opera," which was almost ready for rehearsal; but Rich received the duke of Grafton's commands (upon an information that he was rehearsing a play improper to be represented) not to rehearse any new play whatever, till his grace has seen it. What will become of it I know not; but I am sure I have written nothing that can be legally suppressed, unless the setting vices in general in an odious light, and virtue in an amiable one, may give offence. I passed five or six months this year at the Bath with the duchess of Marlborough; and then, in the view of taking care of myself, writ this piece. If it goes on, in case of success I have taken care to make better bargains for myself: I tell you this because I know you are so good as to interest yourself so warmly in my affairs that it is what you would want to know. I saw Mr. Pope on Friday, who, as to his health, is just as you left him. His mother, by his account, is much the same. Mr. Lewis, who is very much your servant, (as are all I have mentioned,) tells me further time is still desired of him about the 100*l*. Dr. Arbuthnot particularly desires his compliments, and Mrs. Howard often asks after you. Prince Frederick is expected over this week. I hope to go abroad in two or three days. I wish I could meet with you either abroad or at home.

[a] The death of Mrs. Wallis.

TO MR. WORRALL.

Market-hill, January 4, 1729.

I HAD your long letter, and thank you heartily for your concern about my health. I continue very deaf and giddy: but, however, I would certainly come to town, not only for my visitation, but because in these circumstances, and in winter, I would rather be at home. But it is now Saturday night, and that beast Sheridan is not yet come, although it has been thawing since Monday. If I do not come, you know what to do.

My humble service to our friends, as usual.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. WORRALL.

Market-hill, January 13, 1729.

I JUST received your letter, and should never have done if I returned you thanks so often as I ought for your care and kindness: both my disorders still continue; however, I desire that Mrs. Brent may make things ready, for my raggedness will soon force me away. I have been now ill about a month, but the family are so kind as to speak loud enough for me to hear them; and my deafness is not so extreme as you have known when I fretted at your mannerly voice, and was only relieved by Mrs. Worrall.

I send you enclosed the fruit of my illness, to make an "Intelligencer;" I desire you will enclose it in a letter to Mrs. Harding, and let your letter be in an unknown hand, and desire her to show it to the author of the "Intelligencer," and to print it if he thinks fit. There is a letter you will find, that is to be prefixed before the verses, which letter is grounded upon a report; and if that report be false, the former part of the letter will be unseasonable, but the latter will not; and therefore the "Intelligencer" must be desired to alter it accordingly.

It should be sent soon, to come time enough for the next "Intelligencer."

Pray, in your letter to Mrs. Harding, desire her to make her people be more correct, and that the "Intelligencer" himself may look over it; for that everybody who reads those papers are very much offended with the continual nonsense made by her printers. I am yours, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. WORRALL.

Market-hill, January 18, 1729.

I HAVE yours of the 14th instant, but you had not then received my last, in which was enclosed a paper for the "Intelligencer," which I hope you have disposed of as desired. My disorder still continues the same for this fortnight past, and I am neither better nor worse. However, I resolve to return on the first mending of the weather: these three last days there being as violent a storm as I have known, which still continues. We have been told my lord Mountcashel[a] is dead at Drogheda, but believe it to be a lie. However, he is so tender, and affects so much vigour and fatigue, that we have been in pain about him.

I had a letter two days ago which cost me six shillings and four pence: it consisted of the probate of a will in Leicestershire, and of two enclosed letters, and was beyond the weight of letters franked. When I went a lad to my mother, after the Revolution, she brought me acquainted with a family where there was a daughter with whom I was acquainted. My prudent mother was afraid I should be in love with her; but when I went to London she married an innkeeper in Loughborough, in that county, by whom she had several children. The old mother died, and left all that she had to her daughter aforesaid, separate from her husband. This woman (my mistress with a pox) left several children, who are all dead but one daughter, Anne by name. This Anne, for it must be she about seven years ago wrote to me from London to tell me she was daughter of Betty Jones, for that was my mistress's name till she was married to one Perkins, innkeeper at the George in Loughborough, as I said before. The subject of the girl's letter was, that a young lady of good fortune was courted by an Irishman who pretended to be barrack-master-general of Ireland, and desired me, as an old acquaintance of her mother, Betty Jones, alias Perkins, to inquire about this Irishman. I answered that I knew him not, but supposed he was a cheat: I heard no more. But now comes a letter to me from this Betty Jones, alias Perkins, to let me know that her daughter Anne Giles married an Irishman, one Giles, and was now come over to Ireland to pick up some debts due to her husband which she could not get; that the young widow (for her husband Giles is dead) has a mind to settle in Ireland, and to desire I would lend her daughter Giles three guineas, which her mother will pay me when I draw upon her in England: and Mrs. Giles writes me a letter to that purpose. She intends to take a shop, and will borrow the money from Mrs. Brent (whose name she has learned), and pay me as others do. I was at first determined to desire you would from me make her a present of five pounds, on account of her mother and grandmother, whom my mother used to call cousin. She has sent me an attested copy of her mother's will, which, as I told you, cost me six shillings and four pence. But I am in much doubt; for, by her mother's letters, she is her heiress, and the grandmother left Betty Jones, alias Perkins, the mother of this woman in Dublin, all she had, as a separate maintenance from her husband (who proved a rogue) to the value of 500*l*. Now I cannot conceive why she would let her only daughter and heiress come to Ireland without giving her money to bear her charges here and put her in some way. The woman's name is Anne Giles; she lodges at one Mrs. Wilmot's, the first house in Molesworth-court, on the right hand, in Fishamble-street. I have told you this long story to desire you will send for the woman—this Anne Giles—and examine her strictly, to find if she be the real daughter of Elizabeth Jones, alias Perkins, or not; and how her mother, who is so well able, came to send her in so miserable a condition to Ireland. The errand is so romantic that I know not what to say to it. I would be ready to sacrifice five pounds on old acquaintance to help the woman: I suspect her mother's letters to be counterfeit, for I remember she spells like a kitchen-maid. And so I end this worthy business.

My bookseller, Mr. Motte, by my recommendation, dealt with Mr. Hyde:[a] there are some accounts between them, and Hyde is in his debt. He has desired me to speak to Mr. Hyde's executors to state the account, that Mr. Motte may be in the way to recover the balance. I wish you would step to Mr. Hyde's house and inquire how that matter stands, and how Mr. Motte is to be paid. I suppose Mr. Hyde died in good circumstances, and that there will be no danger of his creditors suffering by his death.

I enclose a letter to Mr. Motte, which you will be so kind to send to the post-office.

I desire, likewise, that you will make Mrs. Brent buy a bottle of usquebaugh and leave it with the woman who keeps sir Arthur Acheson's house in Capel-street, and desire her to deliver it to captain Creichton,[b] who lodges at the Pied Horse in Capel-street, and is to bring down other things to my lady Acheson.

My most humble service to Mrs. Worrall, Mrs. Dingley, and love to Mrs. Brent.

I wish you all a happy new year.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, February 13, 1729.

I LIVED very easily in the country. Sir Arthur is a man of sense and a scholar, has a good voice, and my lady a better: she is perfectly well bred and desirous to improve her understanding, which is very good, but cultivated too much like a fine lady. She was my pupil there, and severely chid when she read wrong; with that and walking, and making twenty little amusing improvements, and writing family verses of mirth by way of libels on my lady, my time passed very well, and in very great order; infinitely better than here, where I see no creature but my servants and my old presbyterian housekeeper, denying myself to everybody till I shall recover my ears.

The account of another lord-lieutenant was only in a common-newspaper when I was in the country; and if it should have happened to be true I would have desired to have had access to him, as the situation I am in requires. But this renews the grief for the death of our friend Mr. Congreve,[c] whom I loved from my youth, and who, surely, beside his other talents, was a very agreeable companion. He had the misfortune to squander away a very good constitution in his younger days; and I think a man of sense and merit like him is bound in conscience to preserve his health for the sake of his friends as well as of himself. Upon his own account I could not much desire the continuance of his life under so much pain and so many infirmities. Years have not yet hardened me, and I have an addition of weight on my spirits since we lost him; though I saw him so seldom, and possibly if he had lived on, should never have seen him more. I do not only wish, as you ask me, that I was unacquainted with any deserving person, but almost that I never had a friend. Here is an ingenious good-humoured physician, a fine gentleman, an excellent scholar, easy in his fortunes, kind to everybody, has abundance of friends, entertains them often and liberally: they pass the evening with him at cards, with plenty of good meat and wine—eight or a dozen together: he loves them all and they him: he has twenty of these at command; if one of them dies it is no more than poor Tom; he gets another or takes up with the rest, and is no more moved than at the loss of his cat: he offends nobody, is easy with everybody: is not this the truly happy man? I was describing him to my lady Acheson who knows him too; but she hates him mortally by my character, and will not drink his health. I would give half my fortune for the same temper, and yet I cannot say I love it, for I do not love my lord ——, who is much of the doctor's nature. I hear Mr. Gay's second opera which you mentioned is forbid; and then he will be once more fit to be advised and reject your advice. Adieu.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

ADVERTISEMENT BY DR. SWIFT,

IN HIS DEFENCE AGAINST JOSHUA LORD ALLEN.

February 18, 1729.

"WHEREAS Dr. Jonathan Swift, dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, hath been credibly informed that on Friday, the 13th of this instant February, a certain person did, in a public place and in the hearing of a great number, apply himself to the right honourable the lord mayor of this city and some of his brethren in the following reproachful manner: 'My lord, you and your city can squander away the public money in giving a gold box to a fellow who has libelled the government!' or words to that effect. Now, if the said words, or words to the like effect, were intended against him, the said dean, and as a reflection on the right hon. the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons, for the decreeing unanimously and in full assembly the freedom of this city to the said dean, in an honourable manner, on account of an opinion they had conceived of some services done by him the said dean to this city and to the kingdom in general, the said dean doth declare that the said words, or words to the like effect, are insolent, false, scandalous, malicious, and in a particular manner perfidious: the said person who is reported to have spoken the said or the like words having for some years past, and even within some few days, professed a great friendship for the said dean, and, what is hardly credible, sending a common friend of the dean and himself, not many hours after the said or the like words had been spoken, to renew his profession of friendship to the said dean, but concealing the oratory, whereof the dean had no account till the following day, and then told it to all his friends."

TO MR. POPE.

March 6, 1729.

SIR,—If I am not a good correspondent I have bad health, and that is as good. I passed eight months in the country with sir Arthur and my lady Acheson, and had at least half a dozen returns of my giddiness and deafness, which lasted me about three weeks apiece, and among other inconveniences hindered me from visiting my chapter and punishing enormities, but did not save me the charges of a visitation dinner. This disorder neither hinders my sleeping nor much my walking, yet is the most mortifying malady I can suffer. I have been just a month in town, and have just got rid of it in a fortnight; and when it is on me, I have neither spirits to write, or read, or think, or eat. But I drink as much as I like, which is a resource you cannot fly to when you are ill; and I like it as little as you, but I can bear a pint better than you can a spoonful. You were very kind in your care for Mr. Whaley;[a] but I hope you remembered that Daniel[b] is a damnable poet, and consequently a public enemy to mankind. But I despise the lords' decree, which is a jest upon common sense: for what did it signify to the merits of the cause whether George the old or the young were on the throne?"

No: I intended to pass last winter in England, but my health said no: and I did design to live a gentleman, and, as Sancho's wife said, to go in my coach to court. I know not whether you are in earnest to come hither in spring; if not, pray God you may never be in jest! Dr. Delany shall attend you at Chester, and your apartment is ready; and I have a most excellent chaise, and about sixteen dozen of the best cider in the world; and you shall command the town and kingdom, and digito monstrari, &c. And when I cannot hear you shall have choice of the best people we can afford to hear you, and nurses enough; and your apartment is on the sunny side.

The next paragraph strikes me dumb. You say, "I am to blame if I refuse the opportunity of going with my lady Bolingbroke to Aix-la-Chapelle." I must tell you that a foreign language is mortal to a deaf man. I must have good ears to catch up the words of so nimble a tongued race as the French, having been a dozen years without conversing among them. Mr. Gay is a scandal to all lusty young fellows with healthy countenances; and I think he is not intemperate in a physical sense. I am told he has an asthma, which is a disease I commiserate more than deafness, because it will not leave a man quiet either sleeping or waking. I hope he does not intend to print his opera[c] before it is acted; for I defy all your subscriptions to amount to 800*l.* And yet I believe he lost as much more for want of human prudence.

I told you some time ago that I was dwindled to a writer of libels on the lady of the family where I lived, and upon myself; but they never went further, and my lady Acheson made me give her up all the foul copies, and never gave the fair ones out of her hands, or suffered them to be copied. They were sometimes shown to intimate friends, to occasion mirth, and that was all. So that I am vexed at your thinking I had any hand in what could come to your eyes. I have some confused notion of seeing a paper called "Sir Ralph the Patriot," but am sure it was bad or indifferent; and as to "The Lady at Quadrille," I never heard of it. Perhaps it may be the same with a paper of verses called "The Journal of a Dublin Lady," which I wrote at sir Arthur Acheson's; and, leaving out what concerned the family, I sent it to be printed in a paper which Dr. Sheridan had engaged in, called "The Intelligencer," of which he made but sorry work, and then dropped it. But the verses were printed by themselves, and most horridly mangled in the press, and were very médiocre in themselves, but did well enough in the manner I mentioned, of a family jest. I do sincerely assure you that my frequent old disorder, and the scene where I am, and the humour I am in, and some other reasons which time has shown and will show more if I live, have lowered my small talents with a vengeance, and cooled my disposition to put them in use. I want only to be rich, for I am hard to be pleased; and for want of riches, people grow every day less solicitous to please me. Therefore I keep humble company, who are happy to come where they can get a bottle of wine without paying for it. I give my vicar a supper, and his wife a shilling, to play with me an hour at backgammon once a fortnight. To all people of quality, and especially of titles, I am not within; or at least am deaf a week or two after I am well. But on Sunday evenings it costs me six bottles of wine to people whom I cannot keep out. Pray come over in April, if it be only to convince you that I tell no lies, and the journey will be certainly for your health. Mrs. Brent, my housekeeper, famous in print for digging out the great bottle, says "she will be your nurse;" and the best physicians we have shall attend you without fees; although I believe you will have no occasion but to converse with one or two of them to make them proud. Your letter came but last post, and you see my punctuality. I am unlucky at everything I send to England. Two bottles of usquebaugh were broken. Well, my humble service to my lord Bolingbroke, lord Bathurst, lord Masham and his lady, my dear friend, and Mr. Pulteney, and the doctor, and Mr. Lewis, and our sickly friend Gay, and my lady Bolingbroke; and very much to Patty, who I hope will learn to love the world less before the world leaves off to love her. I am much concerned to hear of my lord Peterborough being ill. I am exceedingly his servant; and pray God recover his health! As for your courtier Mrs. Howard and her mistress, I have nothing to say but that they have neither memory nor manners; else I should have some mark of the former from the latter, which I was promised about two years ago: but since I made them a present it would be mean to remind them. I am told poor Mrs. Pope is ill. Pray God preserve her to you, or raise you up as useful a friend!

This letter is in answer to Mr. Ford, whose hand I mistook for yours, having not heard from him this twelvemonth. Therefore you are not to stare: and it must not be lost, for it talks to you only.

Again, forgive my blunders; for, reading the letter by candlelight and not dreaming of a letter from Mr. Ford, I thought it must be yours, because it talks of our friends.

The letter talks of Gay, and Mr. Whaley, and lord Bolingbroke, which made me conclude it must be yours, so all the answering part must go for nothing.

FROM FRANCIS GEOGEGHAN, ESQ.

March 10, 1729.

SIR,—Your time is precious, your curiosity not very small, my esteem of you very great; therefore come not within the walls of the four courts in hopes of hearing a matrimonial decree in this reign; for on Monday, (viz.) that is to say, the 10th of this instant March, 1729, his excellency Thomas Wyndham, esq., lord high-chancellor of Ireland, pronounced, after your back was turned, and not with the assistance of the two chiefs, his decree in the case of Stewart v. Stewart, on A. Powell, to this effect:—He said there was a full consent till such time as the draught of the settlement was sent down to Mrs. Stewart, to be considered by her and her friends; and after she had considered it she shall not be at liberty to make any objections; for all restrictions of marriage are odious in the civil law, and not favoured by the common law, especially after the age of one-and-twenty; therefore, marry they may, and let Mr. Nutley be a lawyer for Mrs. Rebecca Stewart, the plaintiff, to take care of the settlement for her advantage, and let Powell choose another lawyer for himself; though, by the by, Mr. Nutley would serve for both; and it is not necessary to inquire what Powell makes by his practice, although he assured the mother it amounted to 1400*l.* per annum.

"Ovid, 'tis true, successfully imparts
The rules to steal deluded virgins hearts;
But O! ye fair ones, pious Nutley's skill
Instructs you to elude, by magic bill,
The laws of God, and gratify your will."

You will, I hope, excuse this liberty in one who, to resent the indignity offered to you by Ram's coachman, made him drunk soon after at Gory; which so incensed the aforesaid Ram that he discharged him his service, and he is now so reduced that he has no other way of getting his bread but by crying in this city, "Ha' you any dirt to carry out?" I am, sir, your sincere friend and humble servant,

FRANCIS GEOGEGHAN.

FROM WILLIAM FLOWER, ESQ.

Ashbrook, March 18, 1729.

SIR,—As I have been honoured with some of your letters, and as you are my old acquaintance, though to my sorrow not intimately so, I trust you will pardon this presumption. Perhaps you may be at a loss to guess what title I have to an old acquaintance with you; but as several little accidents make indelible impressions upon the minds of schoolboys, near thirty years ago, when I was one, I remember I was committed to your care from Sheene to London: we took water at Mortlake, the commander of the little skiff was very drunk and insolent, put us ashore at Hammersmith, yet insisted with very abusive language on his fare, which you courageously refused as the mob gathered; I expected to see your gown stripped off, and, for want of a blanket, to take a flight with you in it, but,—

Tum pietate gravem ac meritis si forte virum quem
Conspexere, silent, arrectisque auribus astant:
Ille regit dictis animos, et pectora mulcet.

VIRG. Æn. i. 155.

If then some grave and pious man appear,
They hush their noise and lend a list'ning ear;
He soothes with sober words their angry mood,
And quenches their innate desire of blood.

DRYDEN.

By your powerful eloquence you saved your bacon and money, and we happily proceeded on our journey.

But it is not an inclination purely to tell you this old story which persuades me to write. A friend from Dublin lately obliged me with a very entertaining paper, entitled "The Intelligencer;" it is No. 20, a posthumous work of Nestor Ironside; a correspondent mentioning these papers in a letter raising my curiosity, with the specimen I had of them, to read the rest. For my part, I have buried myself in the country, and know little of the world but what I learn from newspapers: you who live so much in it, and from other more convincing proofs, I am satisfied are acquainted with the "Intelligencer." I wish his zeal could promote the welfare of his poor country, but I fear his labour is in vain.

The miseries of the north as represented demand the utmost compassion, and must soften the malice of the most bitter enemy. I hope they whose interest it is, if they rightly considered it, to relieve those miserable wretches, will redress so public a calamity; to which if, as I have heard, some of the clergy by exacting of tithes have contributed, they deserve as great censure as a certain dean, who lends several sums without interest to his poor parishioners, has gained credit and honour by his charitable beneficence. Bad men, to be sure, have crept in, and are of that sacred and learned order; the blackest of crimes—forgery, treason, and blasphemy—recently prove this: such should be spewed out of it with the utmost contempt, and punished according to their demerit with severe justice. If this allegation be true, I hope to see them censured by the "Intelligencer," and recommend to him the words of Jeremiah to expatiate upon, chap. x. ver. 21, chap. xii. ver. 10, 11. I imagine the poor widow, his printer [Mrs. Harding], is in danger of punishment; she suffered very cruelly for the Drapier's works; I hope several contributed to ease her misfortunes on that occasion; I confess I am sorry I did not; but if you will give her a piece of gold, not in my name, I beg, being unwilling to vaunt of charity, but as from a friend of yours, I shall by the first safe hand send one; in return I expect the Drapier's works entire.

I am sorry that for the benefit of the ladies the author has not given us the English of

Motus doceri gaudet Ionicos
Matura virgo.

Not having Creech's "Horace," a gentleman prevailed on me to attempt translating it in a couple of distichs: the science which the compound English and Greek word signifies little concerns a widower, but I should be glad to see it improved by good proficients in the Ionic jig. I own in my little reading I never met with this word, which puts me in mind of a passage on the Thames. My younger uncle, the grave Mr. Flower, his wife and mine, and parson Dingle, one day made the tour of the city: we saw Bedlam, the lions, and what not; and finished with a view of that noble engine under London bridge; then we took water for Whitehall, rowed very silently to opposite the glasshouse, where a dyer, his boat at anchor, was angling; poor Jack unfortunately asked, addressing himself to our waterman, "What that man was fishing for?" The wag answered very brisk, "For ——, master, will you buy any?" You are a man of too much humour not to be pleased with the reply. I never can think of it without a laugh, and am sure need not describe the scene to you. He is since called in our family by the name of Jack Fisher.

FROM MR. GAY.[a]

From the duke of Queensberry's, Burlington-gardens, March 18, 1729.

DEAR SIR,—I have written to you several times, and having heard nothing from you makes me fear my letters are miscarried. Mr. Pope's letter has taken off my concern in some degree; but I hope good weather will entirely re-establish you in your health. I am but just recovered from the severest fit of sickness that ever anybody had who escaped death: I was several times given up by the physicians and everybody that attended me; and upon my recovery was judged to be in so ill a condition that I should be miserable for the remainder of my life; but, contrary to all expectation, I am perfectly recovered, and have no remainder of the distempers that attacked me, which were at the same time fever, asthma, and pleurisy. I am now in the duke of Queensberry's house, and have been so ever since I left Hampstead; where I was carried at a time that it was thought I could not live a day. Since my coming to town I have been very little abroad, the weather has been so severe.

I must acquaint you (because I know it will please you) that during my sickness I had many of the kindest proofs of friendship, particularly from the duke and duchess of Queensberry; who if I had been their nearest relation and nearest friend could not have treated me with more constant attendance then; and they continue the same to me now.

You must undoubtedly have heard that the duchess took up my defence with the king and queen in the cause of my play; and that she has been forbid the court for interesting herself to increas my fortune by the publication of it without being acted. The duke, too, has given up his employment (which he would have done if the duchess had not met with this treatment) upon account of ill usage from the ministers; but this hastened him in what he had determined. The play is now almost printed, with the music, words, and basses engraved on thirty-one copper-plates; which by my friends' assistance has a possibility to turn greatly to my advantage. The duchess of Marlborough has given me 100*l.* for one copy, and others have contributed very handsomely; but as my account is not yet settled I cannot tell you particulars.

For writing in the cause of virtue and against the fashionable vices, I am looked upon at present as the most obnoxious person almost in England. Mr. Pulteney tells me I have got the start of him. Mr. Pope tells me that I am dead, and that this obnoxiousness is the reward for my inoffensiveness in my former life. I wish I had a book ready to send you; but I believe I shall not be able to complete the work till the latter end of the next week. Your money is still in lord Bathurst's hands, but I believe I shall receive it soon: I wish to receive your orders how to dispose of it. I am impatient to finish my work, for I want the country air; not that I am ill, but to recover my strength; and I cannot leave my work till it is finished. While I am writing this I am in the room next to our dining-room, with sheets all around it, and two people from the binder folding sheets. I print the book at my own expense in quarto, which is to be sold for six shillings with the music. You see I do not want industry, and I hope you will allow that I have not the worst economy. Mrs. Howard has declared herself strongly both to the king and queen as my advocate. The duchess of Queensberry is allowed to have shown more spirit, more honour, and more goodness than was thought possible in our times: I should have added, too, more understanding and good sense. You see my fortune (as I hope my virtue will) increases by oppression. I go to no courts, I drink no wine, and am calumniated even by ministers of state; and yet am in good spirits. Most of the courtiers, though otherwise my friends, refused to contribute to my undertaking. But the city, and the people of England, take my part very warmly; and I am told the best of the citizens will give me proofs of it by their contributions.

I could talk to you a great deal more, but I am afraid I should write too much for you and for myself. I have not written so much together since my sickness. I cannot omit telling you that Dr. Arbuthnot's attendance and care of me showed him the best of friends. Dr. Hollins, though entirely a stranger to me, was joined with him, and used me in the kindest and most handsome manner. Mr. and Mrs. Pulteney were greatly concerned for me, visited me, and showed me the strongest proofs of friendship. When I see you I will tell you of others: as of Mr. Pope, Mrs. Blount, Mr. and Mrs. Rollinson, lord and lady Bolingbroke, &c.: I think they are all your friends and well-wishers. I hope you will love them the better upon my account; but do not forget Mr. Lewis, nor lord Bathurst, sir William Wyndham, and lord Gower, and lord Oxford among the number. My service to Dr. Delany and Mr. Stopfort.

TO MR. GAY.[a]

Dublin, March 19, 1729.

I DENY it. I do write to you according to the old stipulation; for when you kept your old company when I wrote to one I wrote to all. But I am ready to enter into a new bargain since you are got into a new world, and will answer all your letters. You are first to present my most humble respects to the duchess of Queensberry, and let her know that I never dine without thinking of her, although it be with some difficulty that I can obey her when I dine with forks that have but two prongs, and when the sauce is not very consistent. You must likewise tell her grace that she is a general toast among all honest folks here, and particularly at the deanery, even in the face of my Whig subjects. I will leave my money in lord Bathurst's hands, and the management of it (for want of better) in yours; and pray keep the interest-money in a bag wrapped up by itself for fear of your own fingers under your carelessness. Mr. Pope talks of you as a perfect stranger; but the different pursuits, and manners, and interests of life, as fortune has pleased to dispose them, will never suffer those to live together who by their inclinations ought never to part. I hope when you are rich enough you will have some little economy of your own in town and country, and be able to give your friend a pint of port; for the domestic season of life will come on. I had never much hopes of your vamped play, although Mr. Pope seemed to have, and although it were ever so good; but you should have done like the parsons and changed your text, I mean your title, and the names of the persons. After all it was an effect of idleness, for you are in the prime of life, when invention and judgment go together. I wish you had 100*l.* a-year more for horses. I ride and walk whenever good weather invites me, and am reputed the best walker in this town and five miles round. I wrote lately to Mr. Pope. I wish you had a little village in his neighbourhood; but you are yet too volatile, and any lady with a coach and six horses would carry you to Japan. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.

London, March 19, 1729.

THIS is the second or third time, dear sir, that I have written to you without hearing a word of you or from you; only in general that you are very much out of order, sometimes of your two old complaints the vertigo and deafness, which I am very sorry for. The gentleman who carries this has come better off than I did imagine: I used my little interest as far as it would go in his affair. He will be able to give you some account of your friends, many of whom have been in great distress this winter. John Gay, I may say with vanity, owes his life, under God, to the unwearied endeavours and care of your humble servant; for a physician who had not been passionately his friend could not have saved him. I had beside my personal concern for him other motives of my care. He is now become a public person—a little Sacheverell; and I took the same pleasure in saving him as Radcliffe did in preserving my lord chief-justice Holt's wife, whom he attended out of spite to the husband who wished her dead.

[a] Found among Mr. Gay's papers, and returned to Dr. Swift by the duke of Queensberry and Mr. Pope.

The inoffensive John Gay is now become one of the obstructions to the peace of Europe, the terror of ministers, the chief author of the "Craftsman," and all the seditious pamphlets which have been published against the government. He has got several turned out of their places, the greatest ornament of the court banished from it for his sake, another great lady in danger of being chasée likewise, about seven or eight duchesses pushing forward, like the ancient circumcelliones in the church, who shall suffer martyrdom upon his account first. He is the darling of the city. If he should travel about the country he would have hecatombs of roasted oxen sacrificed to him. Since he became so conspicuous Will Pulteney hangs his head to see himself so much outdone in the career of glory. I hope he will get a great deal of money by printing his play, but I really believe he would get more by showing his person; and I can assure you this is the very identical John Gay whom you formerly knew and lodged with in Whitehall two years ago. I have been diverting myself with making an extract out of a history which will be printed in the year 1948: I wish I had your assistance to go through with it; for I can assure you it rises to a very solemn piece of burlesque.

As to the condition of your little club it is not quite so desperate as you might imagine; for Mr. Pope is as high in favour as I am afraid the rest are out of it. The king, upon the perusal of the last edition of his "Dunciad," declared he was a very honest man. I did not know till this moment that I had so good an opportunity to send you a letter, and now I know it I am called away, and obliged to end with my best wishes and respects, being most sincerely yours, &c.

TO LORD BOLINGBROKE.

Dublin, March 21, 1729.

You tell me you have not quitted the design of collecting, writing, &c. This is the answer of every sinner who defers his repentance. I wish Mr. Pope were as great an urger as I, who long for nothing more than to see truth under your hands laying all detr. ..n in the dust. I find myself disposed every year, or rather every month, to be more angry and revengeful; and my rage is so ignoble, that it descends even to resent the folly and baseness of the enslaved people among whom I live. I knew an old lord in Leicestershire who amused himself with mending pitchforks and spades for his tenants gratis. Yet I have higher ideas left, if I were nearer to objects on which I might employ them; and contemning my private fortune would gladly cross the channel and stand by while my betters were driving the boars out of the garden, if there be any probable expectation of such an endeavour. When I was of your age I often thought of death, but now, after a dozen years more, it is never out of my mind and terrifies me less. I conclude that Providence has ordered our fears to decrease with our spirits, and yet I love la bagatelle better than ever: for, finding it troublesome to read at night and the company here growing tasteless, I am always writing bad prose or worse verses, either of rage or raillery, whereof some few escape to give offence or mirth, and the rest are burnt.

They print some Irish trash in London and charge it on me, which you will clear me of to my friends, for all are spurious except one paper, for which Mr. Pope very lately chid me. I remember your lordship used to say that a few good speakers would in time carry any point that was right; and that the common method of a majority, by calling to the question, would never hold long when reason was on the other side. Whether politics do not change, like gaming, by the invention of new tricks, I am ignorant; but I believe in your time you would never as a minister have suffered an act to pass through the house of commons, only because you were sure of a majority in the house of lords to throw it out; because it would be unpopular and consequently a loss of reputation. Yet this, we are told, has been the case in the qualification bill relating to pensioners. It should seem to me that corruption, like avarice, has no bounds. I had opportunities to know the proceedings of your ministry better than any other man of my rank; and having not much to do I have often compared it with these last sixteen years of a profound peace all over Europe and we running seven millions in debt. I am forced to play at small game, to set the beasts here a-madding, merely for want of a better game. Tentanda via est qua me quoque possim,[a] &c. The devil take those politics, where a dunce might govern for a dozen years together. I will come in person to England if I am provoked, and send for the dictator from the plough. I disdain to say, O! mihi præteritos—but cruda deo viridisque senectus.[b] Pray, my lord, how are the gardens? have you taken down the mount and removed the yew hedges? have you not bad weather for the spring corn? has Mr. Pope gone further in his ethic poems? and is the head-land sown with wheat? and what says Polybius? and how does my lord St. John? which last question is very material to me, because I love burgundy and riding between Twickenham and Dawley. I built a wall five years ago, and when the masons played the knaves, nothing delighted me so much as to stand by while my servants threw down what was amiss. I have likewise seen a monkey overthrow all the dishes and plates in a kitchen, merely for the pleasure of seeing them tumble and hearing the clatter they made in their fall. I wish you would invite me to such another entertainment; but you think as I ought to think, that it is time for me to have done with the world; and so I would if I could get into a better before I was called into the best, and not die here in a rage like a poisoned rat in a hole. I wonder you are not ashamed to let me pine away in this kingdom while you are out of power.

I come from looking over the mélange above written and declare it to be a true copy of my present disposition, which must needs please you, since nothing was ever more displeasing to myself. I desire you to present my most humble respects to my lady.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FRIEND JONATHAN SWIFT,—Having been often agreeably amused by thy Tale, &c. &c., and being now loading a small ship for Dublin, I have sent thee a gammon, the product of the wilds of America; which perhaps may not be unacceptable at thy table, since it is only designed to let thee know that thy wit and parts are here in esteem at this distance from the place of thy residence. Thou needest ask no questions who this comes from, since I am a perfect stranger to thee.

ye 30.

TO LORD BOLINGBROKE.

Dublin, April 5, 1729.

I DO not think it could be possible for me to hear better news than that of your getting over your scurvy suit, which always hung as a deep weight on my heart; I hated it in all its circumstances, as it affected your fortune and quiet, and in a situation of life that must make it every way vexatious. And as I am infinitely obliged to you for the justice you do me in supposing your affairs do at least concern me as much as my own, so I would never have pardoned your omitting it. But, before I go on, I cannot forbear mentioning what I read last summer in a newspaper, that you were writing the history of your own times. I suppose such a report might arise from what was not secret among your friends, of your intention to write another kind of history, which you often promised Mr. Pope and me to do; I know he desires it very much, and I am sure I desire nothing more for the honour and love I bear you and the perfect knowledge I have of your public virtue. My lord, I have no other notion of economy than that it is the parent of liberty and ease, and I am not the only friend you have who has chid you in his heart for the neglect of it, though not with his mouth as I have done. For there is a silly error in the world, even among friends otherwise very good, not to intermeddle with men's affairs in such nice matters. And my lord, I have made a maxim that should be written in letters of diamonds, that a wise man ought to have money in his head but not in his heart. Pray, my lord, inquire whether your prototype, my lord Digby, after the restoration, when he was at Bristol, did not take some care of his fortune, notwithstanding that quotation I once sent you out of his speech to the house of commons? In my conscience, I believe fortune, like other drabs, values a man gradually less for every year he lives. I have demonstration for it; because if I play at piquet for sixpence with a man or woman two years younger than myself I always lose; and there is a young girl of twenty who never fails of winning my money at backgammon, though she is a bungler and the game be ecclesiastic. As to the public, I confess nothing could cure my itch of meddling with it but these frequent returns of deafness, which have hindered me from passing last winter in London; yet I cannot but consider the perfidiousness of some people who, I thought when I was last there, upon a change that happened, were the most impudent in forgetting their professions that I have ever known. Pray, will you please to take your pen and blot me out that political maxim from whatever book it is in, that Res nolunt diu male administrari? the commonness makes me not know who is the author, but sure he must be some modern.

I am sorry for lady Bolingbroke's ill health; but I protest I never knew a very deserving person of that sex who had not too much reason to complain of ill health. I never wake without finding life a more insignificant thing than it was the day before; which is one great advantage I get by living in this country where there is nothing I shall be sorry to lose. But my greatest misery is recollecting the scene of twenty years past, and then all on a sudden dropping into the present. I remember when I was a little boy I felt a great fish at the end of my line which I drew up almost on the ground, but it dropped in, and the disappointment vexes me to this very day, and I believe it was the type of all my future disappointments. I should be ashamed to say this to you, if you had not a spirit fitter to bear your own misfortunes than I have to think of them. Is there patience left to reflect by what qualities wealth and greatness are got and by what qualities they are lost? I have read my friend Congreve's verses to lord Cobham, which end with a vile and false moral, and I remember is not in Horace to Tibullus, which he imitates, "that all times are equally virtuous and vicious:" wherein he differs from all poets, philosophers, and christians, that ever wrote. It is more probable that there may be an equal quantity of virtues always in the world, but sometimes there may be a peck of it in Asia and hardly a thimbleful in Europe. But if there be no virtue, there is abundance of sincerity; for I will venture all I am worth that there is not one human creature in power who will not be modest enough to confess that he proceeds wholly upon a principle of corruption: I say this because I have a scheme, in spite of your notions, to govern England upon the principles of virtue, and when the nation is ripe for it I desire you will send for me. I have learned this by living like a hermit, by which I am got backward about nineteen hundred years in the era of the world, and begin to wonder at the wickedness of men. I dine alone upon half a dish of meat, mix water with my wine, walk ten miles a-day, and read Baronius. Hic explicit epistola ad Dom. Bolingbroke, et incipit ad amicum Pope.

Having finished my letter to Aristippus I now begin to you. I was in great pain about Mrs. Pope, having heard from others that she was in a very dangerous way, which made me think it unseasonable to trouble you. I am ashamed to tell you that, when I was very young I had more desire to be famous than ever since; and fame, like all things else in this life, grows with me every day more a trifle. But you who are so much younger, although you want that health you deserve, yet your spirits are as vigorous as if your body were sounder. I hate a crowd where I have not an easy place to see and be seen. A great library always makes me melancholy,[a] where the best author is as much squeezed and as obscure as a porter at a coronation. In my own little library I value the compliments of Grævius and Gronovius, which make thirty-one volumes in folio (and were given me by my lord Bolingbroke), more than all my books besides; because whoever comes into my closet casts his eyes immediately upon them and will not vouchsafe to look upon Plato or Xenophon. I tell you it almost incredible how opinions change by the decline or decay of spirits, and I will further tell you, that all my endeavours, from a boy, to distinguish myself were only for want of a great title and fortune, that I might be used like a lord by those who have an opinion of my parts; whether right or wrong it is no great matter; and so the reputation of wit or great learning does the office of a blue riband or of a coach and six horses. To be remembered for ever on the account of our friendship is what would exceedingly please me: but yet I never loved to make a visit or be seen walking with my betters, because they get all the eyes and civilities from me. I no sooner wrote this than I corrected myself, and remembered sir Fulk Grevil's epitaph, "Here lies, &c., who was friend to sir Philip Sidney." And therefore I must heartily thank you for your desire that I would record our friendship in verse, which if I can succeed in, I will never desire to write one more line in poetry while I live. You must present my humble service to Mrs. Pope, and let her know I pray for her continuance in the world, for her own reason, that she may live to take care of you. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE CHEVALIER RAMSAY.

London, April 10, 1729.

SIR,—One of the greatest pleasures I proposed to myself in a journey to England was that of seeing you at London; and it is a very sensible mortification to me to find myself disappointed in so agreeable an expectation. It is now many years since I had the highest este- of your genius and writings; and when I was very young I found in some of them certain ideas that prepared me for relishing those principles of universal religion which I have since endeavoured to unfold in Cyrus. I could not let our common friend Mr. Leslie[a] go back to Ireland without seizing the opportunity of acknowledging the obliging zeal you have shown to make my work esteemed. Such marks of friendship do me a great deal of honour as well as pleasure, and I hope I have a thorough sense of them. As I have much enlarged my book I am going to publish a new edition by subscription. I have given a hundred copies of the proposals to our friend, and flatter myself that I may count upon the continuation of your friendship. I am, with great respect, sir, your most obliged and most obedient humble servant,

A. RAMSAY.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.

London, May 8, 1729.

DEAR SIR,—I have written three times to Mr. Dean of St. Patrick's without receiving so much as an acknowledgment of the receipt of my letters. At the same time I hear of other letters which his acquaintances receive from him. I believe I should hardly have brought myself to have written this were it not to serve you and a friend at the same time.

I recommended one Mr. Mason, son of Mason, gentleman of the queen's chapel, a barytone voice, for the vacancy of a singer in your cathedral. This letter was written from Bath last September. The same Mason informs me that there is another vacancy: therefore I renew my request. I believe you will hardly get a better: he has a pleasant mellow voice, and has sung several times in the king's chapel this winter, to the satisfaction of the audience. I beg at least your answer to this. Your friends in town, such as I know, are well. Mr. Pope is happy again in having his mother recovered. Mr. Gay is gone to Scotland with the duke of Queensberry. He has about twenty lawsuits with booksellers for pirating his book. The king goes soon to Hanover. These are all the news I know. I hope you do not imagine I am so little concerned about your health as not to desire to be informed of the state of it from yourself. I have been tolerably well this winter, I thank God. My brother Robin is here, and longs, as well as I, to know how you do. This, with my best wishes and respects, from, dear sir, your most faithful humble servant,

J. ARBUTHNOT.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.

London, June 9, 1729.

DEAR SIR,—This is given you by Mr. Mason, whom I believe you will find answer the character I gave of him, which really was not partial; for I am not so much as acquainted with his father or himself. I explained everything to him according to the tenor of the letter which I received from you some time ago, and for which I most heartily thank you. Let him now speak for himself. I have been inquiring about a counter-tenor, but have, as yet, no intelligence of any.

I am really sensibly touched with the account you give of Ireland. It is not quite so bad here, but really bad enough; at the same time we are told that we are in great plenty and happiness.

Your friends whom you mention in yours are well. Mr. Gay is returned from Scotland, and has recovered his strength by his journey. Mr. Pope is well; he had got an injunction in chancery against the printers who had pirated his "Dunciad:" it was dissolved again, because the printer could not prove any property, nor did the author appear. That is not Mr. Gay's case, for he has owned his book. Mr. Pulteney gives you his service. They are all better than myself; for I am now so bad of a constant convulsion in my heart that I am like to expire sometimes. We have no news that I know of. I am apt to believe that in a little time this matter of the provisional treaty will be on or off. The young man waits for my letter. I shall trouble you no more at present, but remain, with my best wishes and most sincere affection, dear sir, your most faithful humble servant, J. ARBUTHNOT.

My family all send you their love and service.

FROM LADY CATHARINE JONES

[Daughter of Richard earl of Ranelagh].

Chelsea, June 11, 1729.

SIR,—I received the favour of your letter the 22nd of May, and own my obligation to Mr. Dean for the information of the decay of my grandfather's monument in the cathedral church of St. Patrick.

Mr. French, the present receiver of my father's estate, will be, some time next month, in that kingdom, whom I have ordered to wait upon you for your direction in that affair; in which, when he has informed me of the expense, I shall immediately give directions to have it done, agreeably to the desire of the dean and chapter, as well as the duty due to the memory of my grandfather, without adding further trouble to Mr. Dean from his most humble and obedient servant, CATHARINE JONES.

TO MR. POPE.

August 11, 1729.

I AM very sensible that in a former letter I talked very weakly of my own affairs, and of my imperfect wishes and desires, which, however, I find with some comfort do now daily decline, very suitably to my state of health for some months past. For my head is never perfectly free from giddiness, and especially toward night. Yet my disorder is very moderate, and I have been without a fit of deafness this half-year; so I am like a horse, which, though off his mettle, can trot on tolerably; and this comparison puts me in mind to add that I am returned to be a rider, wherein I wish you would imitate me.

[a] Son of the rev. Dr. Charles Leslie, the famous nonjuror.

As to this country,[a] there have been three terrible years' dearth of corn, and every place strewed with beggars; but dearths are common in better climates, and our evils here lie much deeper. Imagine a nation, the two-thirds of whose revenues are spent out of it, and who are not permitted to trade with the other third, and where the pride of women will not suffer them to wear their own manufactures, even where they excel what come from abroad: this is the true state of Ireland in a very few words. These evils operate more every day, and the kingdom is absolutely undone, as I have been telling often in print these ten years past.

What I have said requires forgiveness, but I had a mind for once to let you know the state of our affairs, and my reason for being more moved than perhaps becomes a clergyman and a piece of a philosopher; and perhaps the increase of years and disorders may hope for some allowance to complaints, especially when I may call myself a stranger in a strange land. As to poor Mrs. Pope (if she be still alive) I heartily pity you and pity her: her great piety and virtue will infallibly make her happy in a better life, and her great age has made her fully ripe for heaven and the grave, and her best friends will most wish her eased of her labours when she has so many good works to follow them. The loss you will feel by the want of her care and kindness I know very well; but she has amply done her part, as you have yours. One reason why I would have you in Ireland when you shall be at your own disposal is, that you may be master of two or three years' revenues, provisæ frugis in annos copia, so as not to be pinched in the least when years increase, and perhaps your health impairs; and when this kingdom is utterly at an end you may support me for the few years I shall happen to live; and who knows but you may pay me exorbitant interest for the spoonful of wine and scraps of a chicken it will cost me to feed you? I am confident you have too much reason to complain of ingratitude; for I never yet knew any person one-tenth part so heartily disposed as you are to do good offices to others without the least private view.

Was it a gasconade to please me that you said your fortune was increased 100*l.* a-year since I left you? you should have told me how. Those subsidia senectuti are extremely desirable if they could be got with justice and without avarice? of which vice, though I cannot charge myself yet, nor feel any approaches toward it, yet no usurer more wishes to be richer, or rather to be surer of his rents. But I am not half so moderate as you, for I declare I cannot live easily under double to what you are satisfied with.

I hope Mr. Gay will keep his 3000*l.* and live on the interest without decreasing the principal one penny; but I do not like your seldom seeing him. I hope he is grown more disengaged from his intentness on his own affairs, which I ever disliked, and is quite the reverse to you, unless you are a very dexterous disguiser. I desire my humble service to lord Oxford, lord Bathurst, and particularly to Mrs. Blount, but to no lady at court. God bless you for being a greater dupe than I: I love that character too myself, but want your charity. Adieu.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

Aix-la-Chapelle, August 30, 1729, N. S.

I TOOK a letter of yours from Pope, and brought it to this place that I might answer at least a part of it. I begin to-day; when I shall finish I know not; perhaps when I get back to my farm. The waters I have been persuaded to drink, and those which my friends drink, keep me fuddled or employed all the morning. The afternoons are spent in airings or visits, and we go to bed with the chicken.

Brussels, September 27, N. S.

I have brought your French acquaintance [lady Bolingbroke] thus far on her way into her own country, and considerably better in health than she was when she went to Aix. I begin to entertain hopes that she will recover such a degree of health as may render old age supportable. Both of us have closed the tenth lustre, and it is high time to determine how we shall play the last act of the farce. Might not my life be entitled much more properly a what-dy'e-call-it than a farce?[a] Some comedy, a great deal of tragedy, and the whole interspersed with scenes of Harlequin, Scaramouch, and Dr. Baloardo, the prototype of your hero Oxford. I used to think sometimes formerly of old age and of death; enough to prepare my mind; not enough to anticipate sorrow, to dash the joys of youth, and to be all my life a-dying. I find the benefit of this practice now, and shall find it more as I proceed on my journey; little regret when I look backward, little apprehension when I look forward. You complain grievously of your situation in Ireland. I could complain of mine too in England, but I will not, nay, I ought not, for I find, by long experience, that I can be unfortunate without being unhappy. I do not approve your joining together the figure of living and the pleasure of giving, though your old prating friend Montaigne[b] does something like it in one of his rhapsodies: to tell you my reasons would be to write an essay, and I shall hardly have time to write a letter; but if you will come over and live with Pope and me I will show you in an instant why those two things should not aller de pair, and that forced retrenchments on both may be made without making us uneasy. You know that I am too expensive, and all mankind knows that I have been cruelly plundered; and yet I feel in my mind the power of descending, without anxiety, two or three stages more. In short, Mr. Dean, if you will come to a certain farm in Middlesex,[c] you shall find that I can live frugally without growling at the world, or being peevish with those whom fortune has appointed to eat my bread, instead of appointing me to eat theirs; and yet I have naturally as little disposition to frugality as any man alive. You say you are no philosopher, and I think you are in the right to dislike a word which is so often abused; but I am sure you like to follow reason, not custom (which is sometimes the reason, and oftener the caprice of others of the mob of the world). Now to be sure of doing this you must wear your philosophical spectacles as constantly as the Spaniards used to wear theirs. You must make them part of your dress, and sooner part with your

[a] There are many acute and new observations on the state of Ireland in Berkeley's "Querist," by which he appears to be as great a patriot and politician as in his other works he is a philosopher and divine.

[a] Bolingbroke is reported in a letter to Pouilly to have said "You, and I, and Pope are the only three men fit to reign." Voltaire, in the 12th volume of his letters, denies this anecdote; and adds, "J'aime mieux ce que disait à ses compagnons la plus fameuse catin de Londres: mes sœurs, Bolingbroke est déclaré aujourd'hui secrétaire d'état: sept mille guinées de rente, mes sœurs; et tout pour nous!" It appears by Voltaire's Letters, vol. i. p. 13, that in the year 1722 he was at La Source, near Orleans, with lord Bolingbroke; to whom he communicated the first sketches of the "Henriade," and received from him the highest commendations.

[b] Yet there are few writers that give us such an insight into human nature as this old prater.

[c] Dawley, the residence of lord Bolingbroke.

broad-brimmed beaver, your gown, scarf, or even that emblematical vestment, your surplice. Through this medium you will see few things to be vexed at, few persons to be angry at.

Ostend, October 5.

And yet there will frequently be things which we ought to wish altered, and persons whom we ought to wish hanged. Since I am likely to wait here for a wind I shall have leisure to talk with you more than you will like perhaps. If that should be so you will never tell it me grossly, and my vanity will secure me against taking a hint.

In your letter to Pope you agree that a regard for fame becomes a man more towards his exit than at his entrance into life; and yet you confess that the longer you live the more you grow indifferent about it. Your sentiment is true and natural; your reasoning I am afraid is not so upon this occasion. Prudence will make us desire fame, because it gives us many real and great advantages in all the affairs of life. Fame is the wise man's means; his ends are his own good and the good of society. Your poets and orators have inverted this order; you propose fame as the end; and good, or at least great actions, as the means. You go further: you teach our self-love to anticipate the applause which we suppose will be paid by posterity to our names; and with idle notions of immortality you turn other heads beside your own: I am afraid this may have done some harm in the world.

Calais, October 9.

I go on from this place, whither I am come in hopes of getting to sea, which I could not do from the port of Ostend.

Fame is an object which men pursue successfully by various and even contrary courses. Your doctrine leads them to look on this end as essential, and on the means as indifferent; so that Fabricius and Crassus, Cato and Cæsar, pressed forward to the same goal. After all, perhaps it may appear, from a consideration of the depravity of mankind, that you could do no better, nor keep up virtue in the world, without calling this passion or this direction of self-love in to your aid. Tacitus has crowded this excuse for you, according to his manner, into a maxim,—Contemptu famæ contemni virtutes. But now, whether we consider fame as a useful instrument in all the occurrences of private and public life, or whether we consider it as the cause of that pleasure which our self-love is so fond of, methinks our entrance into life, or, to speak more properly, our youth, not our old age, is the season when we ought to desire it most, and therefore when it is most becoming to desire it with ardour. If it is useful, it is to be desired most when we have or may hope to have a long scene of action open before us; toward our exit this scene of action is or should be closed; and then methinks it is unbecoming to grow fonder of a thing which we have no longer occasion for. If it is pleasant, the sooner we are in possession of fame the longer we shall enjoy this pleasure; when it is acquired early in life, it may tickle us on to old age; but when it is acquired late, the sensation of pleasure will be more faint, and mingled with the regret of our not having tasted it sooner.

From my Farm, October 5, O. S.

I am here; I have seen Pope, and one of my first inquiries was after you. He tells me a thing I am sorry to hear: you are building it seems on a piece of land you have acquired for that purpose, in some county of Ireland.[a] Though I have built in a part of the world [Dawley] which I prefer very little to that where you have been thrown and confined by our ill fortune and yours, yet I am sorry you do the same thing. I have repented a thousand times of my resolution; and I hope you will repent of yours before it is executed. Pope tells me he has a letter of yours, which I have not seen yet. I shall have that satisfaction shortly; and shall be tempted to scribble to you again, which is another good reason for making this epistle no longer than it is already. Adieu, therefore, my old and worthy friend. May the physical evils of life fall as easily upon you as ever they did on any man who lived to be old! and may the moral evils which surround us make as little impression on you as they ought to make on one who has such superior sense to estimate things by, and so much virtue to wrap himself up in!

My wife desires not to be forgotten by you; she is faithfully your servant and zealously your admirer. She will be concerned and disappointed not to find you in this island at her return; which hope both she and I had been made to entertain before I went abroad.

[a] Drapier's-hill, where the dean entertained some thoughts of building.

FROM MR. POPE.

October 9, 1729.

It pleases me that you received my books at last: but you have never once told me if you approve of the whole, or disapprove not of some parts, of the commentary, &c. It was my principal aim in the entire work to perpetuate the friendship between us, and to show that the friends or the enemies of one were the friends or enemies of the other; if in any particular anything be stated or mentioned in a different manner from what you like, pray tell me freely, that the new editions now coming out here may have it rectified. You will find the octavo rather more correct than the quarto, with some additions to the notes and epigrams cast in, which I wish had been increased by your acquaintance in Ireland. I rejoice in hearing that Drapier's-hill is to emulate Parnassus; I fear the country about it is as much impoverished. I truly share in all that troubles you, and wish you removed from a scene of distress which I know works your compassionate temper too strongly. But if we are not to see you here, I believe I shall once in my life see you there. You think more for me and about me than any friend I have, and you think better for me. Perhaps you will not be contented, though I am, that the additional 100*l.* a-year is only for my life. My mother is yet living, and I thank God for it: she will never be troublesome to me, if she be not so to herself: but a melancholy object it is to observe the gradual decays both of body and mind in a person to whom one is tied by the links of both. I cannot tell whether her death itself would be so afflicting.

You are too careful of my worldly affairs; I am rich enough, and I can afford to give away 100*l.* a-year. Do not be angry: I will not live to be very old. I have revelations to the contrary. I would not crawl upon the earth without doing a little good when I have a mind to do it: I will enjoy the pleasure of what I give by giving it alive, and seeing another enjoy it. When I die, I should be ashamed to leave enough to build me a monument if there were a wanting friend above ground.

Mr. Gay assures me his 3000*l.* is kept entire and sacred; he seems to languish after a line from you, and complains tenderly. Lord Bolingbroke has told me ten times over he was going to write to you. Has he or not? The doctor [Arbuthnot] is unalterable both in friendship and quadrille: his wife has been very near death last week: his two brothers buried their wives within these six weeks. Gay is sixty miles off, and has been so all this summer with the duke and duchess of Queensberry. He is the same man: so is every one here that you know: mankind is unamendable. Optimus ille qui minimis urgetur. Poor Mrs.  is like the rest; she cries at the thorn in her foot, but will suffer nobody to pull it out. The court lady [Mrs. Howard] I have a good opinion of, yet I have treated her more negligently than you would do, because you like to see the inside of a court, which I do not. I have seen her but twice. You have a desperate hand at dashing out a character by great strokes, and at the same time a delicate one at fine touches. God forbid you should draw mine if I were conscious of any guilt: but if I were conscious only of folly, God send it! for as nobody can detect a great fault so well as you, nobody would so well hide a small one. But after all that lady means to do good, and does no harm, which is a vast deal for a courtier. I can assure you that lord Peterborough always speaks kindly of you, and certainly has as great a mind to be your friend as any one. I must throw away my pen; it cannot, it will never tell you what I inwardly am to you. Quod nequeo monstrare, et sentio tantum.

TO MR. POPE.

October 31, 1729.

You were so careful of sending me the "Dunciad" that I have received five of them, and have pleased four friends. I am one of everybody who approve every part of it, text and comment; but am one abstracted from everybody in the happiness of being recorded your friend while wit, and humour, and politeness, shall have any memorial among us. As for your octavo edition we know nothing of it, for we have an octavo of our own which has sold wonderfully, considering our poverty, and dulness the consequence of it.

I write this post to lord Bolingbroke, and tell him in my letter that, with a great deal of loss for a frolic, I will fly as soon as build: I have neither years, nor spirits, nor money, nor patience, for such amusements. The frolic is gone off, and I am only 100*l.* the poorer. But this kingdom is grown so excessively poor that we wise men must think of nothing but getting a little ready money It is thought there are not 200,000*l.* of specie in the whole island; for we return thrice as much to our absentees as we get by trade, and so are all inevitably undone; which I have been telling them in print these ten years to as little purpose as if it came from the pulpit. And this is enough for Irish politics, which I only mention because it so nearly touches myself. I must repeat what I believe I have said before, that I pity you much more than Mrs. Pope. Such a parent and friend hourly declining before your eyes is an object very unfit for your health, and duty, and tender disposition; and I pray God it may not affect you too much. I am as much satisfied that your additional 100*l.* per annum is for your life as if it were for ever. You have enough to leave your friends; I would not have them glad to be rid of you; and I shall take care that none but my enemies will be glad to get rid of me. You have embroiled me with lord B——— about the figure of living and the pleasure of giving. I am under the necessity of some little paltry figure in the station I am; but I make it as little as possible. As to the other part, you are base, because I thought myself as great a giver as ever was of my ability; and yet in proportion you exceed, and have kept it till now a secret even from me, when I wondered how you were able to live with your whole little revenue. Adieu.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO LORD BOLINGBROKE.

Dublin, October 31, 1729.

I RECEIVED your lordship's travelling letter of several dates, at several stages, and from different nations, languages, and religions. Neither could anything be more obliging than your kind remembrance of me in so many places. As to your ten lustres, I remember, when I complained in a letter to Prior that I was fifty years old, he was half angry in jest, and answered me out of Terence, ista commemoratio est quasi exprobratio. How then ought I to rattle you when I have a dozen years more to answer for, all monastically passed in this country of liberty, and delight, and money, and good company! I go on answering your letter; it is you were my hero, but the other [lord Oxford] never was; yet if he were, it was your own fault who taught me to love him, and often vindicated him in the beginning of your ministry from my accusations. But I granted he had the greatest inequalities of any man alive, and his whole scene was fifty times more a what-d'ye-call-it than yours, for I declare yours was unie; and I wish you would so order it that the world may be as wise as I upon that article. Mr. Pope wishes it too, and I believe there is not a more honest man in England even without wit. But you regard us not. I was forty-seven years old when I began to think of death;* and the reflections upon it now begin when I wake in the morning, and end when I am going to sleep.—I wrote to Mr. Pope, and not to you. My birth, although from a family not undistinguished in its time, is many degrees inferior to yours; all my pretensions from person and parts infinitely so; I a younger son of younger sons, you born to a great fortune; yet I see you with all your advantages sunk to a degree that you could never have been without them: but yet I see you as much esteemed, as much beloved, as much dreaded, and perhaps more (though it be almost impossible), than ever you were in your highest exaltation; only I grieve like an alderman that you are not so rich. And yet, my lord, I pretend to value money as little as you, and I will call five hundred witnesses (if you will take Irish witnesses) to prove it. I renounce your whole philosophy because it is not your practice. By the figure of living (if I used that expression to Mr. Pope), I do not mean the parade, but a suitableness to your mind; and as for the pleasure of giving, I know your soul suffers when you are debarred of it. Could you, when your own generosity and contempt of outward things (be not offended, it is no ecclesiastical, but an Epictetian phrase), could you, when these have brought you to it, come over and live with Mr. Pope and me at the deanery? I could almost wish the experiment were tried.—No, God forbid that ever such a scoundrel as Want should dare to approach me. But in the mean time do not brag; retrenchments are not your talent. But, as old Weymouth said to me in his lordly Latin, Philosopha verba, ignava opera; I wish you could learn arithmetic, that three and two make five, and will never make more. My philosophical spectacles which you advise me to will tell me that I can live upon fifty pounds a-year (wine excluded, which my bad health forces me to), but I cannot endure that otium should be sine dignitate.—My lord, what I would have said of fame is meant of fame which a man enjoys in this life; because I cannot be a great lord I would acquire what is a kind of subsidium, I would endeavour that my betters should seek me by the merit of something distinguishable, instead of my seeking them. The desire of enjoying it in after-times is owing to the spirit and folly of youth: but with age we learn to know the house is so full that there is no room for above one or two at most in an age through the whole world. My lord, I hate and love to write you; it gives me pleasure, and kills me with melancholy. The d—— take stupidity, that it will not come to supply the want of philosophy.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. GAY.

Middleton Stoney, November 9, 1729.

I HAVE long known you to be my friend upon several occasions, and particularly by your reproofs and admonitions. There is one thing which you have often put me in mind of, the overrunning you with an answer before you had spoken. You find I am not a bit the better for it; for I still write and write on without having a word of an answer. I have heard of you once by Mr. Pope: let Mr. Pope hear of you the next time by me. By this way of treating me—I mean by your not letting me know that you remember me, you are very partial to me—I should have said very just to me. You seem to think that I do not want to be put in mind of you, which is very true; for I think of you very often, and as often wish to be with you. I have been in Oxfordshire with the duke of Queensberry for these three months, and have had very little correspondence with any of our friends. I have employed my time in new writing a damned play which I wrote several years ago, called "The Wife of Bath."[a] As it is approved or disapproved of by my friends when I come to town, I shall either have it acted or let it alone, if weak brethren do not take offence at it. The ridicule turns upon superstition, and I have avoided the very words bribery and corruption. Folly, indeed, is a word that I have ventured to make use of; but that is a term that never gave fools offence. It is a common saying that he is wise that knows himself. What has happened of late I think is a proof that it is not limited to the wise.

My lord Bathurst is still our cashier: when I see him I intend to settle our accounts, and repay myself the 5*l.* out of the 200*l.* I owe you. Next week I believe I shall be in town: not at Whitehall, for those lodgings were judged not convenient for me and were disposed of. Direct to me at the duke of Queensberry's, in Burlington-gardens, near Piccadilly. You have often twitted me in the teeth for hankering after the court: in that you mistook me; for I know by experience that there is no dependence that can be sure but a dependence upon oneself. I will take care of the little fortune I have got. I know you will take this resolution kindly, and you see my inclinations will make me write to you whether you will write to me or not. I am, dear sir, yours most sincerely and most affectionately,

J. GAY.

P.S. To the lady I live with I owe my life and fortune: think of her with respect; value and esteem her as I do; never more despise a fork with three prongs. I wish, too, you would not eat from the point of your knife. She has so much goodness, virtue, and generosity, that if you knew her you would have a pleasure in obeying her as I do. She often wishes she had known you.

[a] This comedy was the first he wrote, and was unsuccessfully performed at the theatre in Drury-lane in the year 1713. It was altered by the author, and revived several years after [1730] at the theatre in Lincoln's-inn fields, and condemned a second time, although the author's reputation was then at its height from the uncommon success of his "Beggar's Opera."

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

November 19, 1729.

I FIND that you have laid aside your project of building in Ireland, and that we shall see you in this island cum zephyris, et hirundine primâ. I know not whether the love of fame increases as we advance in age, sure I am that the force of friendship does. I loved you almost twenty years ago; I thought of you as well as I do now; better was beyond the power of conception—or, to avoid an equivoque, beyond the extent of my ideas. Whether you are more obliged to me for loving you as well when I knew you less, or for loving you as well after loving you so many years, I shall not determine: what I would say is this: while my mind grows daily more independent of the world, and feels less need of leaning on external objects, the ideas of friendship return oftener—they busy me, they warm me more. Is it that we grow more tender as the moment of our great separation approaches, or is it that they who are to live together in another state (for vera amicitia non nisi inter bonos) begin to feel more strongly that divine sympathy which is to be the great band of their future society? There is no one thought which soothes my mind like this: I encourage my imagination to pursue it, and am heartily afflicted when another faculty[a] of the intellect comes boisterously in and wakes from so pleasing a dream, if it be a dream. I will dwell no more on economics than I have done in my former letter: thus much only I will say, that otium cum dignitate is to be had with 500*l.* a-year as well as with 5000*l.*; the difference will be found in the value of the man and not in that of the estate. I do assure you that I have never quitted the design of collecting, revising, improving, and extending several materials which are still in my power; and I hope that the time of setting myself about this last work of my life is not far off. Many papers of much curiosity and importance are lost, and some of them in a manner which would surprise and anger you: however, I shall be able to convey several great truths to posterity so clearly and so authentically that the Burnets and the Oldmixons of another age may rail but not be able to deceive. Adieu, my friend. I have taken up more of this paper than belongs to me, since Pope is to write to you; no matter, for upon recollection the rules of proportion are not broken; he will say as much to you in one page as I have said in three. Bid him talk to you of the work he is about:[b] I hope in good earnest it is a fine one, and will be in his hands an original. His sole complaint is that he finds it too easy in the execution: this flatters his laziness: it flatters my judgment, who always thought that (universal as his talents are) this is eminently and peculiarly his above all the writers I know, living or dead: I do not except Horace. Adieu.

[a] Viz. reason. Tully (to whom the letter-writer seems to allude) observes something like this on the like occasion, where, speaking of Plato's famous book of the Soul, he says, "Nescio quomodo, dum lego, adsentior: cum posui librum, et mecum ipse de immortalitate animorum cœpi cogitare, adsentio illa omnis elabitur." Cicero seems to have had but a confused notion of the cause of the slippery nature of this assent, which the letter-writer has here explained; namely, that the imagination is always ready to indulge so flattering an idea, but severer reason corrects and disclaims it. As to religion, that is out of the question; for Tully wrote to his few philosophic friends; though, as has been the fate of his lordship's first philosophy (where this whole matter is explained at large), it came at last into the hands of the public.

[b] "Essay on Man;" on which therefore it appears he was employed in 1729.

FROM MR. POPE.

November 28, 1729.

This letter (like all mine) will be a rhapsody: it is many years ago since I wrote as a wit.[a] How many occurrences or informations must one omit if once determined to say nothing that one could not say prettily! I lately received, from the widow of one dead correspondent and the father of another, several of my own letters of about fifteen and twenty years old; and it was not unentertaining to myself to observe how and by what degrees I ceased to be a witty writer; as either my experience grew on the one hand, or my affection to my correspondents on the other. Now as I love you better than most I have ever met with in the world, and esteem you too the more the longer I have compared you with the rest of the world, so inevitably I write to you more negligently—that is, more openly; and what all but such as love one another will call writing worse. I smile to think how Curll would be bit were our epistles to fall into his hands; and how gloriously they would fall short of every ingenious reader's expectations.

You cannot imagine what a vanity it is to me to have something to rebuke you for in the way of economy. I love the man that builds a house subito ingenio, and makes a wall for a horse, then cries "We wise men must think of nothing but getting ready money." I am glad you approve my annuity; all we have in this world is no more than an annuity as to our own enjoyment: but I will increase your regard for my wisdom and tell you that this annuity includes also the life of another [his mother], whose concern ought to be as near to me as my own, and with whom my whole prospects ought to finish. I my throw javelin of hope no farther, cur brevi fortes jaculamur ævo, &c.[b]

The second (as it is called, but indeed the eighth) edition of the "Dunciad," with some additional notes and epigrams, shall be sent you if I know any opportunity: if they reprint it with you let them by all means follow that 8vo edition. The "Drapier's Letters" are again printed here, very laudably as to paper, print, &c.—for you know I disapprove Irish politics (as my commentator tells you), being a strong and jealous subject of England. The lady you mention you ought not to complain of for not acknowledging your present; she having lately received a much richer present from Mr. Knight, of the South Sea; and you are sensible she cannot ever return it to one in the condition of an outlaw. It is certain, as he never can expect any favour, his motive must be wholly disinterested. Will not this reflection make you blush? Your continual deplorings of Ireland make me wish you were here long enough to forget those scenes that so afflict you: I am only afraid, if you were, you would grow such a patriot here, too, as not to be quite at ease for your love of old England. It is very possible your journey in the time I compute might exactly tally with my intended one to you; and if you must soon again go back you would not be unattended. For the poor woman decays perceptibly every week; and the winter may too probably put an end to a very long and a very irreproachable life. My constant attendance on her does indeed affect my mind very much, and lessen extremely my desires of long life; since I see the best that can come of it is a miserable benediction. I look upon myself to be many years older in two years since you saw me: the natural imbecility of my body, joined now to this acquired old age of the mind, makes me at least as old as you; and we are the fitter to crawl down the hill together: I only desire I may be able to keep pace with you. My first friendship, at sixteen, was contracted with a man of seventy; and I found him not grave enough or consistent enough for me, though we lived well to his death: I speak of old Mr. Wycherley; some letters of whom (by the bye) and of mine the booksellers have got and printed; not without the concurrence of a noble friend of mine and yours. I do not much approve of it, though there is nothing for me to be ashamed of; because I will not be ashamed of anything I do not do myself, or of anything that is not immoral but merely dull: as for instance, if they printed this letter I am now writing, which they easily may if the underlings at the post-office please to take a copy of it. I admire on this consideration your sending your last to me quite open, without a seal, wafer, or any closure whatever, manifesting the utter openness of the writer. I would do the same by this, but fear it would look like affectation to send two letters so together. I will fully represent to our friend (and I doubt not it will touch his heart) what you so feelingly set forth as to the badness of your burgundy, &c. He is an extremely honest man, and indeed ought to be so, considering how very indiscreet and unreserved he is; but I do not approve this part of his character, and will never join with him in any of his idleness in the way of wit. You know my maxim, to keep as clear of all offence as I am clear of all interest in either party. I was once displeased before at you for complaining to Mr. ——— of my not having a pension; and am so again at your naming it to a certain lord. I have given proof in the course of my whole life (from the time when I was in the friendship of lord Bolingbroke and Mr. Craggs even to this when I am civilly treated by sir Robert Walpole) that I never thought myself so warm in any party's cause as to deserve their money, and therefore would never have accepted it; but give me leave to tell you that of all mankind the two persons I would least have accepted any favour from are those very two to whom you have unluckily spoken of it. I desire you to take off any impressions which that dialogue may have left on his lordship's mind, as if I ever had any thought of being beholden to him or any other in that way. And yet you know I am no enemy to the present constitution: I believe as sincere a well-wisher to it—nay, even to the church established, as any minister in or out of employment whatever, or any bishop of England or Ireland. Yet I am of the religion of Erasmus—a Catholic; so I live, so I shall die; and hope one day to meet you, bishop Atterbury, and the younger Craggs, Dr. Garth, dean Berkeley, and Mr. Hutchinson in that place to which God of his infinite mercy bring us and everybody.

Lord B.'s answer to your letter I have just received, and join it to this packet. The work he speaks of with such abundant partiality is a system of ethics in the Horatian way.

[a] He used to value himself on this particular.

At things beyond the mark of life?

TO A CERTAIN ESQUIRE.[a]

January 3, 1730.

Sir,—Seeing your frank on the outside and your address in the same hand, it was obvious who was the writer. And before I opened it, a worthy friend being with me, I told him the contents of the difference between us: that your tithes being generally worth five or six pounds per annum, and by the terror of squireship frighting my agent to take what you graciously thought fit to give, you wronged me of half my due every year; that, having held from your father an island worth three-pence a-year which I planted and paid two shillings annually for, and being out of possession of the said island seven or eight years, there could not possibly be above four shillings due to you, for which you have thought proper to stop three or four years' tithe, at your own rate of two pounds five shillings a-year (as I remember), and still continue to stop it in pretence that the said island was not surrendered to you in form, although you have cut down more plantations of willows and abeles than would purchase a dozen such islands. I told my friend "that this talent of esquires prevailed very much formerly in the country: that as to yourself, from the badness of your education against all my advices and endeavours, and from the cast of your nature, as well as another circumstance which I shall not mention, I expected nothing from you that became a gentleman: that I had expostulated this scurvy matter very gently with you; that I conceived this letter was an answer: that from the prerogative of a good estate, however gotten, and the practice of lording over a few Irish wretches, and from the natural want of better thinking, I was sure your answer would be extremely rude and stupid—full of very bad language in all senses; that a bear in a wilderness will as soon fix on a philosopher as on a cottager; and a man wholly void of education, judgment, or distinction of persons has no regard in his insolence but to the passion of fear; and how heartily I wished that, to make you show your humility, your quarrel had rather been with a captain of dragoons than the dean of St. Patrick's."

All this happened before my opening your letter; which being read, my friend told me, "I was an ill guesser; that you affirmed you despised me only as a clergyman, by your own confession; and that you had reason, because clergymen pretend to learning, wherein you value yourself as what you are an utter stranger to."

I took some pains in providing and advising about your education; but since you have made so ill use of my rules, I cannot deny that, according to your own principles, your usage of me is just. You are wholly out of my danger; the weapons I use will do you no hurt; and to that which would keep nicer men in awe you are insensible. A needle against a stone wall can make no impression. Your faculty lies in making bargains; stick to that. Leave your children a better estate than your father left you; as he left you much more than your grandfather left him. Your father and you are much wiser than I, who gave among you fifty years' purchase for land, for which I am not to see one farthing. This was intended as an encouragement to a clergyman to reside among you whenever any of your posterity shall be able to distinguish a man from a beast. One thing I desire you will be set right in: I do not despise all squires. It is true, I despise the bulk of them. But pray take notice, that a squire must have some merit before I shall honour him with my contempt; for I do not despise a fly, a maggot, or a mite.

If you send me an answer to this, I shall not read it, but open it before company, and in their presence burn it, for no other reason but the detestation of bad spelling, no grammar, and that pertness which proceeds from ignorance and an invincible want of taste.

I have ordered a copy of this letter to be taken, with an intention to print it as a mark of my esteem for you; which, however, perhaps I shall not pursue, for I could willingly excuse our two names from standing in the same paper, since I am confident you have as little desire of fame as I have to give it you.

I wish many happy new-years to you and your family; and am, with truth, your friend and humble servant.

Let me add something serious: That, as it is held an imprudent thing to provoke valour, so, I confess, it was imprudent in me to provoke rudeness; which, as it was my own standing rule never to do, except in cases where I had power to punish it, so my error proceeded from a better opinion of you than you have thought fit to make good: for with every fault in your nature, your education, and your understanding, I never imagined you so utterly devoid of knowing some little distinction between persons.

FROM LORD BATHURST.

February 12, 1730.

DEAR DEAN,—I have this moment received a letter from you; but it is the first I can call a letter; the other scraps were only to direct me to convey your correspondence to others, and I thought I answered them best by obeying your demands. But now you have deigned to send me one in form, with a proper beginning and ending, I will not wait even for a post-day; but I have taken pen and ink immediately to tell you how much I think myself obliged to you, and how sincerely I am——

Well, I might end here if I would, but I cannot part with you so soon, and I must let you know that, as to your money affairs, though I have paid off John Gay, I still keep your 200*l.*, for which I have given him a note. I have paid him interest to this time for it, which he must account to you for. Now you must imagine that a man who has nine children to feed cannot long afford alienos pascere nummos; but I have four or five that are very fit for the table.[a] I only wait for the lord-mayor's day to dispose of the largest, and I shall be sure of getting off the youngest whenever a certain great man [sir Robert Walpole] makes another entertainment at Chelsea. Now you see, though I am your debtor, I am not without my proper ways and means to raise a supply answerable to your demand. I must own to you that I should not have thought of this method of raising money but that you seem to point it out to me. For just at the time that scheme came out which pretended to be calculated only for Ireland, you gave me a hint in one of the envelopes (Anglicè covers) that you wished I might provide for my numerous family; and in this last you harp upon the same string. I did immmediately propose it to lady Bathurst as your advice, particularly for her last boy, which was born the plumpest, finest thing that could be seen; but she fell in a passion, and bid me send you word that she would not follow your direction, but that she would breed him up to be a parson, and he should live upon the fat of the land; or a lawyer, and then instead of being eat himself he should devour others. You know women in passion never mind what they say; but as she is a very reasonable woman I have almost brought her over now to your opinion; and having convinced her that as matters stood we could not possibly maintain all the nine, she does begin to think it reasonable the youngest should raise fortunes for the eldest; and upon that foot a man may perform family duty with more courage and zeal; for if he should happen to get twins, the selling of one might provide for the other. Or if by any accident, while his wife lies in with one child, he should get a second upon the body of another woman, he might dispose of the fattest of the two, and that would help to breed up the other. The more I think upon this scheme, the more reasonable it appears to me, and it ought by no means to be confined to Ireland, for in all probability we shall in a very little time be altogether as poor here as you are there. I believe, indeed, we shall carry it further and not confine our luxury only to the eating of children; for I happened to peep the other day into a large assembly [the parliament] not far from Westminster-hall, and I found them roasting a great fat fellow [sir Robert Walpole]. For my own part I had not the least inclination to a slice of him; but if I guessed right, four or five of the company had a devilish mind to be at him. Well, adieu; you begin now to wish I had ended when I might have done it so conveniently.

[a] This alludes to a tract of the dean's, entitled, "A modest Proposal for preventing the Children of poor People in Ireland from being a Burden to their Parents or Country, and for making them beneficial to the Public." The dean had proposed many useful schemes, which having been neglected, he satirically and humorously proposed to fatten and eat the children of the poor, as the only remaining expedient to prevent misery to themselves and render them of some benefit to the public.

FROM MR. GAY.

London, March 3, 1730.

Dear Sir,—I find you are determined not to write to me according to our old stipulation. Had I not been every post for some time in expectation to have heard from you, I should have written to you before, to have let you know the present state of your affairs, for I would not have you think me capable of neglecting yours, whatever you think of me as to my own. I have received 21*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* interest from lord Bathurst for your 200*l.*, from October, 1727, to Christmas, 1729, being two years and two months, at 5*l.* per cent. Lord Bathurst gave me a note for your 200*l.* again, and to allow interest for the same, dated January 15, 1730. If you would have me dispose of your money any other way, I shall obey your orders. Let me know what I shall do with the interest-money I have received. What I have done for you I did for myself, which will be always the way of my transacting anything for you. My old vamped play got me no money, for it had no success. I am going very soon into Wiltshire with the duke of Queensberry, with an intention to stay there till the winter. Since I had that severe fit of sickness, I find my health requires it; for I cannot bear the town as I could formerly. I hope another summer's air and exercise will reinstate me. I continue to drink nothing but water, so that you cannot require any poetry from me. I have been very seldom abroad since I came to town, and not once at court. This is no restraint upon me, for I am grown old enough to wish for retirement. I saw Mr. Pope a day or two ago, in good spirits, and with good wishes for you; for we always talk of you. The doctor [Dr. Arbuthnot] does the same. I have left off all great folk but our own family; perhaps you will think all great folks little enough to leave off us in our present situation. I do not hate the world, but I laugh at it, for none but fools can be in earnest about a trifle. I am, dear sir, yours most affectionately.

Direct for me at the duchess of Queensberry's, Burlington-gardens.[a]

FROM THE EARL OF OXFORD.

Dover-street, March 4, 1730.

Good Mr. Dean,—It is now above a whole year and six months since I have had the favour and pleasure of a line from your own self, and I have not troubled you with one from myself; the answer that you would naturally make is very obvious, Why do you then trouble me now? I reply, It is to join with my friend Mr. Pope in recommending the person concerned in the enclosed proposal to your favour and protection, and to entreat that you would be so good as to promote his interest. I have not sent you any of his receipts, but will when you please to let me know what number you can dispose of; I believe that your bishops have more learning, at least would be thought to have more, than our bench here can pretend to, so I hope they will all subscribe. The person concerned is a worthy, honest man; and by this work of his he hopes to get free of the load which has hung upon him some years. This debt of his is not owing to any folly or extravagance of his, but to the calamnity of his house being twice burnt, which he was obliged to rebuild: and having but small preferment in the church, and a large family of children, he has not been able to extricate himself out of the difficulties these accidents have brought upon him. Three sons he has bred up well at Westminster, and they are excellent scholars; the eldest has been one of the ushers in Westminster school since the year 1714.

He is a man in years, yet hearty, and able to study many hours in a day. This, in short, is the case of an honest, poor, worthy clergyman; and I hope you will take him under your protection. I cannot pretend that my recommendation should have any weight with you, but as it is joined to, and under the wing of, Mr. Pope.

I took hold of this opportunity to write to you, to let you know you had such a humble servant in being that often remembers you and wishes to see you in this island. My family, I thank God, is well; my daughter had, last summer, the small-pox really, and in the natural way, and she is not marked at all. My wife and daughter desire that you will accept of their humble services, and say that they want much to see you.

I obeyed your commands, and did Mr. Whalley all the little service I was capable of: it was little enough that was in my power, God knows. He comes again before us soon after Easter; he seems to be in great hopes; I wish they may be well founded.

I think it is now time to release you, which I will not do until I have told you, I may say repeat to you, that I have a house for you, or house-room, come when you please, provided you come soon. I am, with true respect and esteem, your most obliged and most humble servant, Oxford.

Your lord-lieutenant would do well to encourage this poor man; he deserves it better than Bulkeley.

FROM MR. GAY.

March 31, 1730.

Dear Sir,—I expect in about a fortnight to set out for Wiltshire, and am as impatient as you seem to be to have me to get on horseback. I thought proper to give you this intelligence, because Mr. Lewis told me last Sunday that he was in a day or two to set out for the Bath; so that very soon you are likely to have neither of your cashiers in town. Continue to direct for me at this house: the letters will be sent to me wherever I am. My ambition at present is levelled to the same point that you direct me to, for I am every day building villakins and have given over that of castles. If I were to undertake it in my present circumstances, I should in the most thrifty scheme soon be straitened, and I hate to be in debt, for I cannot bear to pawn 5*l.* worth of my liberty to a tailor or a butcher. I grant you this is not having the true spirit of modern nobility, but it is hard to cure the prejudice of education. I have made your compliments to Mr. Pulteney, who is very much your humble servant. I have not seen the doctor, and am not likely to see his Rouen brother very soon, for he is gone to China. Mr. Pope told me he had acquainted the doctor with the misfortune of the sour hermitage. My lord Oxford told me he at present could match yours, and from the same person. The doctor was touched with your disappointment, and has promised to represent this affair to his brother at his return from China. I assure you, too, for all your gibes, that I wish you heartily good wine, though I can drink none myself. When lord Bolingbroke is in town he lodges at Mr. Chetwynd's, in Dover-street. I do not know how to direct to him in the country. I have been extremely taken up of late in settling a steward's account. I am endeavouring to do all the justice and service I can for a friend; so I am sure you will think I am well employed. Upon this occasion I now and then have seen Jo. Taylor, who says he has a demand upon you for rent, you having taken his house in the country, and he being determined not to let it to anybody else; and he thinks it but reasonable that you should either come and live in it or pay your rent. I neither ride nor walk, but I design to do both this month, and to become a laudable practitioner.

The duchess wishes she had seen you, and thinks you were in the wrong to hide yourself and peep through the window that day she came to Mr. Pope's. The duke, too, is obliged to you for your good opinion, and is your humble servant. If I were to write, I am afraid I should again incur the displeasure of my superiors. I cannot for my life think so well of them as they themselves think they deserve. If you have a very great mind to please the duchess and at the same time to please me, I wish you would write a letter to her to send to her brother, lord Cornbury, to advise him in his travels: for she says she would take your advice rather than mine; and she remembers that you told her in the park that you loved and honoured her family. You always insisted upon a lady's making advances to you; I do not know whether you will think this declaration sufficient. Then, too, when you were in England she wrote a letter to you, and I have been often blamed since for not delivering it.

The day the pension-bill was thrown out of the house of lords lord Bathurst spoke with great applause. I have not time to go to Mr. Pope's: in a day or two, very probably, I shall see him and acquaint him about the usquebaugh. I will not embezzle your interest-money; though by looking upon accounts I see how money may be embezzled. As to my being engaged in an affair of this kind, I say nothing for myself but that I will do all I can: for the rest I leave Jo. Taylor to speak for me. To-day I dine with alderman Barber, the present sheriff, who holds his feast in the city. Does not Chartres's misfortune[a] grieve you? For that great man is likely to save his life and lose some of his money. A very hard case!

P.S. I am just now come from the alderman's feast, who had a very fine dinner and a very fine appearance of company.

The post is just going away.

FROM MR. POPE AND LORD BOLINGBROKE.

April 12, 1730.

This is a letter extraordinary, to do and say nothing but recommend to you (as a clergyman, and a charitable one) a pious and a good work, and for a good and an honest man; moreover he is above seventy, and poor, which you might think included in the word honest. I shall think it a kindness done myself if you can propagate Mr. Wesley's subscription for his "Commentary on Job" among your divines (bishops excepted, of whom there is no hope), and among such as are believers or readers of scripture. Even the curious may find something to please them, if they scorn to be edified. It has been the labour of eight years of this learned man's life; I call him what he is, a learned man, and I engage you will approve his prose more than you formerly could his poetry.[a] Lord Bolingbroke is a favourer of it, and allows you to do your best to serve an old Tory and a sufferer for the church of England, though you are a Whig as I am.

We have here some verses in your name, which I am angry at. Sure you would not use me so ill as to flatter me. I therefore think it is some other weak Irishman.

P. S. I did not take the pen out of Pope's hands, I protest to you. But since he will not fill the remainder of the page, I think I may without offence. I seek no epistolary fame, but am a good deal pleased to think that it will be known hereafter that you and I lived in the most friendly intimacy together. Pliny wrote his letters for the public,[b] so did Seneca, so did Balsac, Voiture, &c. Tully did not, and therefore these give us more pleasure than any which have come down to us from antiquity. When we read them, we pry into a secret which was intended to be kept from us. That is a pleasure. We see Cato, and Brutus, and Pompey, and others, such as they really were, and not such as the gaping multitude of their own age took them to be, or as historians and poets have represented them to ours. That is another pleasure. I remember to have seen a procession at Aix-la-Chapelle, wherein an image of Charlemagne is carried on the shoulders of a man who is hid by the long robe of the imperial saint. Follow him into the vestry, you see the bearer slip from under the robe, and the gigantic figure dwindles into an image of the ordinary size and is set by among other lumber. I agree much with Pope, that our climate is rather better than that you are in, and perhaps your public spirit would be less grieved, or oftener comforted, here than there. Come to us, therefore, on a visit at least. It will not be the fault of several persons here if you do not come to live with us. But great good will and little power produce such slow and feeble effects as can be acceptable to heaven alone and heavenly men. I know you will be angry with me if I say nothing to you of a poor woman who is still on the other side of the water in a most languishing state of health. If she regains strength enough to come over (and she is better within these few weeks), I shall nurse her in this farm with all the care and tenderness possible. If she does not, I must pay her the last duty of friendship wherever she is, though I break through the whole plan of life which I have formed in my mind. Adieu.

I am most faithfully and affectionately yours.

[a] He was condemned at the Old Bailey, February 27, 1730, for a rape.

[a] In the "Battle of the Books," Homer is said to have slain Wesley with a kick of his horse's heel. He was author of "The Life of Christ."

[b] A just and sensible criticism on epistolary writings, which we should bear in our minds while we are reading this collection of Letters.

TO LADY WORSLEY.[a]

April 19, 1730.

MADAM,—My lady Carteret (if you know such a lady) commands me to pursue my own inclination; which is to honour myself with writing you a letter; and thereby endeavouring to preserve myself in your memory, in spite of an acquaintance of more years than, in regard to my own reputation as a young gentleman, I care to recollect. I forget whether I had not some reasons to be angry with your ladyship when I was last in England. I hope to see you very soon the youngest great-grandmother in Europe: and fifteen years hence (which I shall have nothing to do with) you will be at the amusement of "Rise up, daughter," &c. You are to answer this letter; and to inform me of your health and humour, and whether you like your daughter better or worse after having so long conversed with the Irish world and so little with me. Tell me what are your amusements at present; cards, court, books, visiting, or fondling (I humbly beg your ladyship's pardon, but it is between ourselves) your grandchildren? My lady Carteret has been the best queen we have known in Ireland these many years; yet is she mortally hated by all the young girls, because (and it is your fault) she is handsomer than all of them together. Pray do not insult poor Ireland on this occasion; for it would have been exactly the same thing in London. And therefore I shall advise the king, when I go next to England, to send no more of her sort (if such another can be found), for fear of turning all his loyal female subjects here against him.

How is our old friend Mrs. Barton?[b] (I forget her new name.) I saw her three years ago at court, almost dwindled to an echo, and hardly knew her; while your eyes dazzled me as much as when I first met them; which, considering myself, is a greater compliment than you are aware of. I wish you may have grace to find it.

My lady Carteret has made me a present, which I take to be malicious, with a design to stand in your place. Therefore I would have you to provide against it by another, and something of your own work, as hers is. For you know I always expect advances and presents from ladies. Neither was I ever deceived in this last article by any of your sex but the queen, whom I taxed three years ago with a present of ten pounds value. Upon taking my leave, she said, "She intended a medal for me, but it was not finished." I afterwards sent her, on her own commands, about 35*l.* worth of silk for herself and the princesses; but never received the medal to this day. Therefore I will trust your sex no more. You are to present my most humble service to my old friend sir Robert Worsley. I hope my friend Harry is well, and fattening in the sun, and continuing a bachelor, to enrich the poor Worsley family.

I command you to believe me to be, with the greatest truth and respect, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD BATHURST

June 30, 1730.

DEAR DEAN,—I received a letter from you some time ago, which gave me infinite pleasure; and I was going to return you an answer immediately, but when I sat down to write I found my thoughts rolled upon the trifles which fill the scene of life in that busy, senseless place [London] where I then was; and though I had nothing to do there, at least nothing worth doing, and time lay upon my hands, I was resolved to defer writing to you till I could clear my head from that rubbish which every one must contract in that place. I cannot but fancy, if one of our heads were dissected after passing a winter's campaign there, it would appear just like a pamphlet-shop; you would see a collection of treaties, a bundle of farces, a parcel of encomiums, another of satires, speeches, novels, sermons, bawdy songs, addresses, epigrams, proclamations, poems, divinity-lectures, quack-bills, historical accounts, fables, and God knows what.

The moment I got down here I found myself quite clear from all those affairs; but really the hurry of business which came upon me after a state of idleness for six months must excuse me to you. Here I am absolute monarch of a circle of above a mile round, at least one hundred acres of ground, which (to speak in the style of one of your countrymen) is very populous in cattle, fish, and fowl.

To enjoy this power, which I relish extremely, and regulate this dominion, which I prefer to any other, has taken up my time from morning to night. There are yahoos in the neighbourhood; but having read in history that the southern part of Britain was long defended against the Picts by a wall, I have fortified my territories all round. That wise people the Chinese, you know, did the same thing to defend themselves against the Tartars. Now I think of it, as this letter is to be sent to you it will certainly be opened; and I shall have some observations made upon it, because I am within three miles of a certain castle. Therefore I do hereby declare that nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend so far; and furthermore, I think myself in honour bound to acknowledge that under our present just and prudent ministry I do not fear the least molestation from that quarter. Neither are the fortifications aforementioned in anywise designed to keep them out; for I am well satisfied they can break through much stronger fences than these if they should have a mind to it. Observe how naturally power and dominion are attended with fear and precaution. When I am in the herd I have as little of it about me as anybody; but now that I am in the midst of my own dominions I think of nothing but preserving them, and grow fearful lest a certain great man should take a fancy to them and transport them into Norfolk,[a] to place them as an island in one of his new-made fish-ponds. Or, if you take this for too proud a thought, I will only suppose it to be hung out under a great bow-window.

In either case I must confess to you that I do not like it. In the first place, I am not sure his new-made ground may hold good; in the latter case, I have some reason to doubt the foundations of his house are not so solid as he may imagine. Now, therefore, I am not so much in the wrong as you may conceive, to desire that my territory may remain where it is: for though I know you could urge many arguments to show the advantages I might reap by being so near him, yet I hold it as a maxim that he who is contented with what he has ought not to risk that, even though he should have a chance to augment it in any proportion. I learned this from our friend Erasmus; and the corrupt notions that money is power, and therefore every man ought to get as much as he can, in order to create more power to himself, have no weight with me.

But now, to begin my letter to you, I have received

[a] Frances lady Worsley, only daughter of Thomas lord viscount Weymouth, was the lady of sir Robert Worsley, bart., and mother to lady Carteret.

[b] The niece of sir Isaac Newton, and married first to colonel Barton, afterwards to Mr. Conduit. She is very frequently mentioned in the "Journal to Stella."

[a] To Houghton, the seat of sir Robert Walpole.

four bottles of usquebaugh and sent three of them to Mr. Pope; so that I have detained only one for myself. I do not believe such an instance of honesty, punctuality, disinterestedness, and self-denial can be given in this age. The whole being in my power, I have withheld but the quarter part. I expect, if ever I come to be a great man, you will write a vindication of me, whether I am aspersed or not. Till then I remain your most faithful and most obedient servant.

FROM MR. GAY.

Amesbury, July 4, 1730.

Dear Sir,—You tell me that I have put myself out of the way of all my old acquaintance, so that unless I hear from you I can know nothing of you. Is it not barbarous then to leave me so long without writing one word to me? If you will not write to me for my sake, methinks you might write for your own. How do you know what is become of your money? If you had drawn upon me when I expected it you might have had your money, for I was then in town; but I am now at Amesbury, at the duke of Queensberry's. The duchess sends you her services. I wish you were here: I fancy you would like her and the place. You might fancy yourself at home; for we have a cathedral near us, where you might find a bishop of the same name.* You might ride upon the Downs, and write conjectures upon Stonehenge. We are but five-and-twenty miles from the Bath; and I was told this very evening by general Dormer (who is here), that he heard somewhere or other that you had some intentions of coming there the latter season. I wish anything would bring us together but your want of health. I have left off wine and writing; for I really think that man must be a bold writer who trusts to wit without it. I took your advice; and some time ago took to love, and made some advances to the lady you sent me to in Soho, but I met no return; so I have given up all thoughts of it and have now no pursuit or amusement. A state of indolence is what I do not like; it is what I would not choose. I am not thinking of a court or preferment; for I think the lady I live with is my friend, so that I am at the height of my ambition. You have often told me there is a time of life that every one wishes for some settlement of his own. I have frequently that feeling about me, but I fancy it will hardly ever be my lot: so that I will endeavour to pass away life as agreeably as I can in the way I am. I often wish to be with you or you with me; and I believe you think I say true. I am determined to write to you, though those dirty fellows of the post-office do read my letters; for since I saw you I am grown of that consequence to be obnoxious to the men I despise; so that it is very probable in their hearts they think me an honest man. I have heard from Mr. Pope but once since I left London: I was sorry I saw him so seldom, but I had business that kept me from him. I often wish we were together again. If you will not write, come. I am, dear sir, yours most sincerely and affectionately.

FROM THE EARL OF OXFORD.

Dover-street, July 15, 1730.

Reverend Sir,—Mr. Clayton telling me he was going for Ireland, I could not forbear sending you a few lines by him, although I may punish you; yet it is so great a pleasure to me to think of you, and to converse with you even in this manner, that I must expect you will be so good as to forgive the trouble this gives you.

I do not know what notions you entertain of us here? I fear and believe you are in a very bad way: this is my thought, that devoured we certainly shall be; but only this will be the difference, we shall have that great favour and instance of mercy, that we shall have the honour to follow you, and be the last devoured; and though this is so plain and that demonstrable, yet we have so many unthinking, unaccountable puppies among us, that to them everything seems to go well as it should do; and are so pleased with this thought, or rather do not think at all, that it is in vain to say anything to them. This is a very disagreeable subject, and I will therefore leave it.

My wife is, I thank God, pretty well: her stomach is rather better than it was: Peggy is very well: both desire you will accept of their humble service. You mention your law-affairs: I know so much of that sort of people called lawyers that I pity most heartily any one that is obliged to be concerned with them; if you are not already, I hope you will be soon safe out of their hands.

I suppose master Whalley is by this time got safe to his living, and enjoying the fruit of his victory, peace and quietness. I believe he has enough of law, of lawyers, and of lords both spiritual and temporal. I hope he is well: if you see him my service to him.

I wish you would come over here that we might have the pleasure of seeing you. Why should you not pass the winter here? I should think it would be more agreeable to you than where you are.

Lord Bathurst has had a fever, but he is now well again. Pope I saw yesterday: he is pretty well. I am, with true respect and esteem, sir, your most affectionate humble servant, Oxford.

FROM LORD BATHURST.

Cirencester, September 9, 1730.

Dear Sir,—You have taken all the precaution which a reasonable man could possibly take to break off an impertinent correspondence, and yet it will not do. One must be more stupid than a Dutch burgomaster not to see through the design of the last letter. "I show all your letters to our Irish wits. One of them is going to write a treatise of English bulls and blunders." And for further security you add at last, "I am going to take a progress God knows where, and shall not be back again God knows when." I have given you a reasonable breathing-time, and now I must at you again. I receive so much pleasure in reading your letters, that, according to the usual good nature and justice of mankind, I can dispense with the trouble I give you in reading mine. But if you grow obstinate, and won't answer, I will plague and pester you, and do all I can to vex you. I will take your works to pieces, and show you that they are all borrowed or stolen. Have not you stolen the sweetness of your numbers from Dryden and Waller? Have not you borrowed thoughts from Virgil and Horace? At least, I am sure I have seen something like them in those books. As to your prose writings, which they make such a noise about, they are only some little improvements upon the humour you have stolen from Miguel de Cervantes and Rabelais. Well, but the style—a great matter indeed for an Englishman to value himself upon, that he can write English; why I write English too, but it is in another style.

But I would not forget your political tracts. You may say that you have ventured your ears at one time and your neck at another for the good of your country. Why, that other people have done in another manner, upon less occasion, and are not at all proud of it. You have overturned and supported ministers; you have set kingdoms in a flame by your pen. Pray what is there in that but having the knack of hitting the passions of mankind? With that alone, and a little knowledge of ancient and modern history, and seeing a little farther into the inside of things than the generality of men, you have made this bustle. There is no wit in any of them: I have read them all over, and do not remember any of those pretty flowers, those just antitheses, which one meets with so frequently in the French writers; none of those clever turns upon words, nor those apt quotations out of Latin authors which the writers of the last age among us abounded in; none of those pretty similes which some of our modern authors adorn their works with, that are not only a little like the thing they would illustrate, but are also like twenty other things. In short, as often as I have read any of your tracts, I have been so tired with them that I have never been easy till I got to the end of them. I have found my brain heated, my imagination fired, just as if I was drunk. A pretty thing indeed for one of your gown to value himself upon, that with sitting still an hour in his study he has often made three kingdoms drunk at once.

I have twenty other points to maul you upon if you provoke me; but if you are civil and good-natured, and will send me a long, a very long letter in answer to this, I will let you alone a good while. Well, adieu. If I had had a better pen I can tell you that I should not have concluded so soon.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.[a]

London, September 19, 1730.

Had I not been retired into the country yours should have been answered long ago. As to your poetess, I am her obliged servant, and must confess the fact is just as you state it. It is very true I was gaming; and upon the dapper youth's delivering me a paper, which I just opened, found they were verses, so slunk them into my pocket, and there truly they were kept exceeding private; for I cannot accuse myself of showing them to a mortal. But let me assure you it was not out of modesty but in great hopes that the author would have divulged them, which you know would have looked decenter than trumpeting my own fame. But it seems unhappily we were both bit, and judged wrong of each other. However, since you desire it, you may be very sure she should not fail of my entreaties to his grace of Dorset for her, though you have not yet let me into the secret what her request is; so till my lord Carteret does his part, or that I hear from you again, it will be but a blind sort of a petition. I have not seen his grace this great while, and he is now at Windsor, and I choose rather to speak to him on all accounts, having not so fine a talent at writing as that lord's lady; and whether just or no I will not attempt disputing with her ladyship. But as you are commonly esteemed by those who pretend to know you to have a tolerable share of honesty and brains, I do not question your doing what is right by him, nor his paying you all the civility and kindness you can desire. Nor will I hope their influence ever can make him do otherwise, though he has the unfashionable quality of esteeming his old friends; but however partial to them, yet not to be biassed against his own sense and judgment. The consequence of this, I hope, will be your coming to England, and meeting often with him (in lady Betty's chamber[a]) where "the happy composition"[b] should exert her skill in ordering dinner; and I would not mistake oil of amber for the spirit of it, but continue, as I ever was, your sincere friend, as well as faithful humble servant,

E. Germain.

FROM MR. GAY.

Amesbury, November 8, 1730.

Dear Sir,—So you are determined never to write to me again; but for all that you shall not make me hold my tongue. You shall hear from me (the post-office willing) whether you will or not. I see none of the folks you correspond with, so that I am forced to pick up intelligence concerning you as I can, which has been so very little that I am resolved to make my complaints to you as a friend, who I know loves to relieve the distressed; and in the circumstances I am in where should I apply but to my best friend? Mr. Pope, indeed, upon my frequent inquiries, has told me that the letters which are directed to him concern me as much as himself; but what you say of yourself, or of me, or to me, I know nothing at all. Lord Carteret was here yesterday in his return from the Isle of Wight, where he had been a-shooting, and left seven pheasants with us. He went this morning to the Bath to lady Carteret, who is perfectly recovered. He talked of you three hours last night, and told me that you talk of me: I mean that you are prodigiously in his favour, as he says; and I believe that I am in yours, for I know you to be a just and equitable person, and it is but my due. He seemed to take to me, which may proceed from your recommendation, though, indeed, there is another reason for it, for he is now out of employment, and my friends have been generally of that sort; for I take to them as being naturally inclined to those who can do no mischief. Pray do you come to England this year? He thinks you do. I wish you would, and so does the duchess of Queensberry. What would you have more to induce you? Your money cries, come, spend me; and your friends cry, come, see me. I have been treated barbarously by you. If you knew how often I talk of you, how often I think of you, you would now and then direct a letter to me, and I would allow Mr. Pope to have his share in it. In short, I do not care to keep any man's money that serves me so. Love or money I must have; and if you will not let me have the comfort of the one, I think I must endeavour to get a little comfort by spending some of the other. I must beg that you will call at Amesbury in your way to London, for I have many things to say to you; and I can assure you you will be welcome to a three-pronged fork. I remember your prescription, and I do ride upon the Downs; and at present I have no asthma. I have killed five brace of partridges and four brace and a half of quails; and I do not envy either sir Robert or Stephen Duck, who is the favourite poet of the court.[c] I hear sometimes from Pope, and from scarce anybody else. Were I to live ever so long, I believe I should never think of London, but I cannot help thinking of you. Were you here I could talk to [a] Alluding to the first line in Frances Harris's petition.

"And call'd the happy composition Floyd."

Biddy Floyd is mentioned in the ballad on the "Game of Traffic," as being one of the party at lord Berkeley's and at this time lived with lady Betty.

you, but I would not, for you shall have all your share of talk,* which was never allowed you at Twickenham. You know this was a grievance you often complained of; and so in revenge you make me write all, and answer nothing. I beg my compliments to Dr. Delany. I am, dear sir, yours most affectionately, J. GAY.

I ended the letter as above to go to the duchess, and she told me I might go down and come a quarter of an hour hence. I had a design to have asked her to sign the invitation that I have made you. As I do not know how much she may have to say to you, I think it will be prudent to leave off, that she may not be stinted for want of room. So much I will say, that whether she signs it or not, both the duke and duchess would be very glad you would come to Amesbury, and you must be persuaded that I say this without the least private view. For what is it to me whether you come or not? For I can write to you, you know.

P.S. BY THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

I would fain have you come. I cannot say you will be welcome, for I do not know you, and perhaps I shall not like you; but if I do not (unless you are a very vain person) you shall know my thoughts as soon as I do myself. C. Q.

TO MR. GAY.

Dublin, November 10, 1730.

WHEN my lord Peterborough, in the queen's time, went abroad upon his embassies, the ministry told me that he was such a vagrant they were forced to write at him by guess, because they knew not where to write to him. This is my case with you; sometimes in Scotland, sometimes at Hamwalks, sometimes God knows where. You are a man of business, and not at leisure for insignificant correspondence. It was I got you the employment of being my lord duke's premier ministre; for his grace, having heard how good a manager you were of my revenue, thought you fit to be intrusted with ten talents. I have had twenty times a strong inclination to spend a summer near Salisbury Downs, having ridden over them more than once, and with a young parson of Salisbury reckoned twice the stones of Stonehenge, which are either ninety-two or ninety-three. I desire you to present my most humble acknowledgments to my lady duchess in return of her civility. I hear an ill thing, that she is matre pulchra filia pulchrior: I never saw her since she was a girl, and would be angry she should excel her mother, who was long my principal goddess. I desire you will tell her grace that the ill-management of forks is not to be helped when they are only bidential, which happens in all poor houses, especially those of poets; upon which account a knife was absolutely necessary at Mr. Pope's, where it was morally impossible, with a bidential fork, to convey a morsel of beef, with the incumbrance of mustard and turnips, into your mouth at once. And her grace hath cost me thirty pounds to provide tridents for fear of offending her, which sum I desire she will please to return me. I am sick enough to go to the Bath, but have not heard it will be good for my disorder. I have a strong mind to spend my two hundred pounds next summer in France: I am glad I have it, for there is hardly twice that sum left in this kingdom. You want no settlement (I call the family where you live, and the foot you are upon, a settlement) till you increase your fortune to what will support you with ease and plenty, a good house and a garden. The want of this I much dread for you; for I have often known a she-cousin of a good family and small fortune passing months among all her relations, living in plenty and taking her circles till she grew an old maid, and everybody weary of her.* Mr. Pope complains of seldom seeing you; but the evil is unavoidable, for different circumstances of life have always separated those whom friendship will join. God hath taken care of this to prevent any progress toward real happiness here, which would make life more desirable, and death too dreadful. I hope you have now one advantage that you always wanted before, and the want of which made your friends as uneasy as it did yourself: I mean the removal of that solicitude about your own affairs which perpetually filled your thoughts and disturbed your conversation. For if it be true what Mr. Pope seriously tells me you will have opportunity of saving every groat of the interest you receive; and so by the time he and you grow weary of each other you will be able to pass the rest of your wineless life in ease and plenty, with the additional triumphal comfort of never having received a penny from those tasteless ungrateful people from whom you deserved so much, and who deserve no better geniuses than those by whom they are celebrated. If you see Mr. Cæsar present my humble service to him, and let him know that the scrub libel printed against me here, and reprinted in London, for which he showed a kind concern to a friend of us both, was written by myself, and sent to a Whig printer; it was in the style and genius of such scoundrels, when the humour of libelling ran in this strain against a friend of mine whom you know. But my paper is ended.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO LORD CHESTERFIELD.*

November 10, 1730.

MY LORD,—I was positively advised by a friend whose opinion has much weight with me, and who has a great veneration for your lordship, to venture a letter of solicitation; and it is the first request of this kind that I ever made since the public changes in times, persons, measures, and opinions, drove me into distance and obscurity.

There is an honest man whose name is Launcelot; he has been long a servant to my lord Sussex: he married a relation of mine, a widow with a tolerable jointure; which, depending upon a lease which the duke of Grafton suffered to expire about three years ago, sunk half her little fortune. Mr. Launcelot had many promises from the duke of Dorset while his grace held that office [lord-steward] which is now in your lordship; but they all failed, after the usual fate that the bulk of court suitors must expect.

I am very sensible that I have no manner of claim to the least favour from your lordship, whom I have hardly the honour to be known to, although you were always pleased to treat me with much humanity, and with more distinction than I could pretend to deserve. I am likewise conscious of that demerit which I have largely shared with all those who concerned themselves in a court and ministry whose maxims and proceedings have been ever since so much exploded. But your lordship will grant me leave to say that, in those times when any persons of the ejected party came to court and were of tolerable consequence, they never failed to succeed in any reasonable request they made for a friend. And when I sometimes added my poor solicitations I used to quote the then ministers a passage in the gospel, —"the poor" (meaning their own dependants) "you have always with you," &c.

* Mr. Gay was reserved in his conversation.

* The celebrated, accomplished, and witty Philip Dormer Stanhope, earl of Chesterfield.

This is the strongest argument I have to entreat your lordship's favour for Launcelot, who is a perfectly honest man, and as loyal as you could wish. His wife, my near relation, has been my favourite from her youth, and as deserving as it is possible for one of her level. It is understood that some little employments about the court may be often in your lordship's disposal, and that my lord Sussex will give Mr. Launcelot the character he deserves; and then let my petition be (to speak in my own trade) "a drop in the bucket."

Remember, my lord, that although this letter be long, yet what particularly concerns my request is but of a few lines.

I shall not congratulate with your lordship upon any of your present great employments, or upon the greatest that can possibly be given to you, because you are one of those very few who do more honour to a court than you can possibly receive from it; which I take to be a greater compliment to any court than it is to your lordship. I am, my lord, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.[a]

DEAR SIR,—The passage in Mr. Pope's letter about your health does not alarm me; both of us have had the distemper these thirty years. I have found that steel, the warm gums, and the bark, all do good in it. Therefore, first take the vomit A; then every day the quantity of a nutmeg in the morning of the electuary marked B, with five spoonful of the tincture marked D. Take the tincture, but not the electuary, in the afternoon. You may take one of the pills marked C at any time when you are troubled with it; or thirty of the drops marked E, in any vehicle, even water. I had a servant of my own that was cured merely with vomiting. There is another medicine not mentioned which you may try; the pulvis rad. valerianæ sylvestris, about a scruple of it twice a-day. How came you to take it in your head that I was queen's physician? When I am so you shall be a bishop or anything you have a mind to. Pope is now the great reigning poetical favourite. Your lord-lieutenant [the duke of Dorset] has a mind to be well with you. Lady Betty Germain complains you have not written to her since she wrote to you. I have showed as much civility to Mrs. Barber as I could, and she likewise to me. I have no more paper but what serves to tell you that I am, with great sincerity, your most faithful humble servant,

J. ARBUTHNOT.

I recommended Dr. Helsham to be physician to the lord-lieutenant. I know not what effect it will have. My respects to him and Dr. Delany.

TO MR. GAY.

Dublin, November 19, 1730.

I WROTE to you a long letter about a fortnight past, concluding you were in London, from whence I understood one of your former was dated; nor did I imagine you were gone back to Amesbury so late in the year, at which season I take the country to be only a scene for those who have been ill used by a court on account of their virtues; which is a state of happiness the more valuable because it is not accompanied by envy, although nothing deserves it more. I would gladly sell a dukedom to lose favour in the manner their graces have done.[a] I believe my lord Carteret,[b] since he is no lo[illegible]r lieutenant, may not wish me ill, and I have told him often that I only hated him as lieutenant. I confess he had a genteeler manner of binding the chains of this kingdom than most of his predecessors, and I confess at the same time that he had six times a regard to my recommendation by preferring so many of my friends in the church; the two last acts of his favour were to add to the dignities of Dr. Delany and Mr. Stopford, the last of whom was by you and Mr. Pope put into Mr. Pulteney's hands. I told you in my last that a continuance of giddiness (though not in a violent degree) prevented my thoughts of England at present. For in my case a domestic life is necessary, where I can with the centurion say to my servant, Go, and he goeth; and, Do this, and he doeth it. I now hate all people whom I cannot command, and consequently a duchess is at this time the hatefullest lady in the world to me one only excepted [the queen], and I beg her grace's pardon for that exception; for in the way I mean her grace is ten thousand times more hateful. I confess I begin to apprehend you will squander my money, because I hope you never less wanted it; and if you go on with success for two years longer I fear I shall not have a farthing of it left. The doctor hath ill informed me who says that Mr. Pope is at present the chief poetical favourite, yet Mr. Pope himself talks like a philosopher, and one wholly retired. But the vogue of our few honest folks here is that Duck is absolutely to succeed Eusden in the laurel; the contention being between Concannen, or Theobald, or some other hero of the "Dunciad." I never charged you for not talking, but the dubious state of your affairs in those days was too much the subject, and I wish the duchess had been the voucher of [a] After the success of the "Beggar's Opera," Gay produced another, with the name (now become so popular) of "Polly." This, as it contained severe and pointed sarcasms on the court and those in power, was forbid to be acted by the lord chamberlain. In consequence of the duke and duchess of Queensberry's warmly taking up Gay's cause, they were forbid the court. The following high-spirited letter was sent by the duchess to the king and queen, copies of which were circulated:—

"That the duchess of Queensberry is surprised, and well pleased, that the king has given her so agreeable a command as to stay from court, where she never came for diversion, but to bestow a great civility upon the king and queen.

"She hopes, by such an unprecedented order as this, that the king will see as few as he wishes at his court, particularly such as dare to think, or speak truth. I do not do otherwise nor ought not; nor could have imagined that it would not have been the very highest compliment I could possibly pay to the king to endeavour to support truth and innocence in his house.

"Particularly when the king and queen had both told me that they had not read Mr. Gay's play. I have certainly done right then to stand by my own word rather than by his grace of Grafton's, who has neither made use of truth, judgment, or honour, during this whole affair, either for himself or his friends."

[b] The lines which this nobleman quoted from Homer, on his death bed, to Mr. Wood, on occasion of the peace, were as happily applied as the apology he used to Swift for some harsh measures in Ireland:—

'—— Regni novitas me talia cogit
Moliri.'—DR. WARTON.

your amendment. Nothing so much contributed to my ease as the turn of affairs after the queen's death; by which, all my hopes being cut off, I could have no ambition left unless I would have been a greater rascal than happened to suit with my temper. I therefore sat down quietly at my morsel, adding only thereto a principle of hatred to all succeeding measures and ministries by way of sauce to relish my meat: and I confess one point of conduct in my lady duchess's life has added much poignancy to it. There is a good Irish practical bull toward the end of your letter, where you spend a dozen lines in telling me you must leave off that you may give my lady duchess room to write, and so you proceed to within two or three lines of the bottom; though I would have remitted you my 200*l*. to have left place for as many more.

TO THE DUCHESS.

MADAM,—My beginning thus low is meant as a mark of respect, like receiving your grace at the bottom of the stairs. I am glad you know your duty; for it has been a known and established rule above twenty years in England that the first advances have been constantly made by all ladies who aspired to my acquaintance, and the greater their quality the greater were their advances. Yet I know not by what weakness I have condescended graciously to dispense with you upon this important article. Though Mr. Gay will tell you that a nameless person* sent me eleven messages before I would yield to a visit: I mean a person to whom he is infinitely obliged for being the occasion of the happiness he now enjoys under the protection and favour of my lord duke and your grace. At the same time I cannot forbear telling you, madam, that you are a little imperious in your manner of making your advances. You say perhaps you shall not like me: I affirm you are mistaken, which I can plainly demonstrate; for I have certain intelligence that another person dislikes me of late, with whose likings yours have not for some time past gone together. However, if I shall once have the honour to attend your grace, I will out of fear and prudence appear as vain as I can that I may not know your thoughts of me. This is your own direction, but it was needless; for Diogenes himself would be vain to have received the honour of being one moment of his life in the thoughts of your grace. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE COUNTESS OF SUFFOLK.

November 21, 1730.

MADAM,—I do now pity the leisure you have to read a letter from me; and this letter shall be a history. First, therefore, I call you to witness that I did not attend on the queen till I had received her own repeated messages; which of course occasioned my being introduced to you. I never asked anything till upon leaving England the first time I desired from you a present worth a guinea, and from her majesty one worth ten pounds by way of a memorial. Yours I received, and the queen upon my taking leave of her made an excuse that she had intended a medal for me, which not being ready, she would send it me the Christmas following; yet this was never done nor at all remembered when I went back to England the next year, and by her commands attended her as I had done before. I must now tell you, madam, that I will receive no medal from her majesty, nor anything less than her picture at half-length, drawn by Jervas; and if he takes it from another original, the queen shall sit at least twice for him to touch it up. I desire you will let her majesty know this in plain words, although I have heard that I am under her displeasure. But this is a usual thing with princes as well as ministers upon every false representation; and so I took occasion to tell the queen, upon the quarrel Mr. Walpole had with our friend Gay, the first time I ever had the honour to attend her.

Against you I have but one reproach: that when I was last in England, and just after the present king's accession, I resolved to pass that summer in France, for which I had then a most lucky opportunity, from which those who seemed to love me well dissuaded me, by your advice; and when I sent you a note conjuring you to lay aside the character of a courtier and a favourite upon that occasion, your answer positively directed me not to go in that juncture; and you said the same thing to my friends who seemed to have power of giving me hints, that I might reasonably hope for a settlement in England; which God knows was no very great ambition, considering the station I should leave here of greater dignity, and which might have easily been managed to be disposed of as the queen pleased. If these hints came from you, I affirm you then acted too much like a courtier. But I forgive you, and esteem you as much as ever. You had your reasons which I shall not inquire into; because I always believed you had some virtues, besides all the accomplishments of mind and person that can adorn a lady.

I am angry with the queen for sacrificing my friend Gay to the mistaken piques of sir Robert Walpole about a libel written against him, although he were convinced at the same time of Mr. Gay's innocence; and although, as I said before, I told her majesty the whole story. Mr. Gay deserved better treatment among you upon all accounts, and particularly for his excellent, unregarded Fables, dedicated to prince William, which I hope his royal highness will often read for his instruction. I wish her majesty would a little remember what I largely said to her about Ireland, when before a witness she gave me leave and commanded me to tell here what she spoke to me upon that subject; and ordered me if I lived to see her in her present station to send her our grievances, promising to read my letter, and do all good offices in her power for this miserable and most loyal kingdom, now at the brink of ruin, and never so near as now. As to myself, I repeat again that I never asked anything more than a trifle as a memorial of some distinction which her majesty graciously seemed to make between me and every common clergyman; but that trifle was forgotten, according to the usual method of princes, although I was taught to think myself upon a foot of pretending to some little exception.

As to yourself, madam, I most heartily congratulate with you for being delivered from the toil, the envy, the slavery, and vexation of a favourite; where you could not always answer the good intentions that I hope you had. You will now be less teased with solicitations, one of the greatest evils in life. You possess an easy employment, with quiet of mind, although it be by no means equal to your merit; and if it shall please God to establish your health, I believe and hope you are too wise to hope for more. Mr. Pope has always been an advocate for your sincerity; and even I, in the character I gave you of yourself, allowed you as much of that virtue as could be expected in a lady, a courtier, and a favourite. Yet I confess I never heartily pledged your health as a toast upon any other regards than beauty, wit, good sense, and an unblemished character. For as to friendship, truth, sincerity, and other trifles of that kind, I never concerned myself about them; because I knew them to be only parts of the lower morals, which are altogether useless at courts. I am content that you should tell the queen all I have said of her; and in my own words if you please.

I could have been a better prophet in the character I gave you of yourself, if it had been good manners in the height of your credit to put you in mind of its mortality; for you are not the first by at least three ladies whom I have known to undergo the same turn of fortune. It is allowed that ladies are often very good scaffoldings; and I need not tell you the use that scaffoldings are put to by all builders as well political as mechanic. I should have begun this letter by telling you that I was encouraged to write it by my best friend and one of your great admirers; who told me "that from something that had passed between you he thought you would not receive it ill." After all, I know no person of your sex for whom I have so great an esteem as I do and believe I shall always continue to bear for you, I mean a private person; for I must except the queen, and it is not an exception of form; because I have really a very great veneration for her great qualities, although I have reason to complain of her conduct to me; which I could not excuse although she had fifty kingdoms to govern. I have but room to conclude with my sincere professions of being, with true respect, madam, your most obedient humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. GAY.

Amesbury, December 6, 1730.

DEAR SIR,—Both your letters to my great satisfaction I have received. You were mistaken as to my being in town, for I have been here ever since the beginning of May. But the best way is to direct your letters always to the duke's house in London, and they are sent hither by his porter. We shall stay here till after the holidays. You say we deserve envy; I think we do, for I envy no man either in town or out of it. We have had some visitors, and every one of them such as one would desire to visit. The duchess is a more severe check upon my finances than ever you were, and I submit as I did to you, to comply to my own good. I was a long time before I could prevail with her to let me allow myself a pair of shoes with two heels, for I had lost one, and the shoes were so decayed that they were not worth mending. You see by this that those who are the most generous of their own can be the most covetous for others. I hope you will be so good to me as to use your interest with her (for, whatever she says, you seem to have some) to indulge me with the extravagance suitable to my fortune.

The lady you mention that dislikes you has no discernment. I really think you may safely venture to Amesbury, though indeed the lady here likes to have her own way as well as you, which may sometimes occasion disputes; and I tell you beforehand that I cannot take your part. I think her so often in the right that you will have great difficulty to persuade me that she is in the wrong. Then there is another thing that I ought to tell you to deter you from this place, which is, that the lady of the house is not given to show civility to those she does not like. She speaks her mind and loves truth. For the uncommonness of the thing, I fancy your curiosity will prevail over your fear, and you will like to see such a woman. But I say no more till I know whether her grace will fill up the rest of the paper.

FROM THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

Write I must, particularly now, as I have an opportunity to indulge my predominant passion, contradiction. I do in the first place contradict most things Mr. Gay says of me to deter you from coming here, which if you ever do, I hereby assure you, that unless I like my own way better, you shall have yours; and in all disputes you shall convince me if you can. But, by what I see of you, this is not a misfortune that will always happen; for I find you are a great mistaker. For example, you take prudence for imperiousness; it is from this first that I determined not to like one who is too giddy-headed for me to be certain whether or not I shall ever be acquainted with. I have known people take great delight in building castles in the air, but I should choose to build friends upon a more solid foundation. I would fain know you, for I often hear more good likeable things than it is possible any one can deserve. Pray come, that I may find out something wrong; for I, and I believe most women have an inconceivable pleasure to find out any faults except their own. Mr. Cibber is made poet-laureat. I am, sir, as much your humble servant as I can be to any person I do not know. C. Q.

Mr. Gay is very peevish that I spell and write ill; but I do not care; for neither the pen nor I can do better. Besides, I think you have flattered me, and such people ought to be put to trouble.

MR. GAY'S POSTSCRIPT.

Now I hope you are pleased, and that you will allow, for so sma' a sum as 200*l.*, you have a lumping pennyworth.

FROM LORD CHESTERFIELD.

Hague, December 15, 1730.

SIR,—You need not have made any excuses to me for your solicitations; on the contrary, I am proud of being the first person to whom you have thought it worth your while to apply, since those changes which you say drove you into distance and obscurity. I very well know the person you recommend to me, having lodged at his house a whole summer at Richmond. I have always heard a very good character of him, which alone would incline me to serve him, but your recommendation, I can assure you, will make me impatient to do it. However, that he may not again meet with the common fate of court suitors, nor I lie under the imputation of making court promises, I will exactly explain to you how far it is likely I may be able to serve him.

When first I had this office* I took the resolution of turning out nobody; so that I shall only have the disposal of those places that the death of the present possessors will procure me. Some old servants that have served me long and faithfully have obtained the promises of the first four or five vacancies; and the early solicitations of some of my particular friends have tied me down for about as many more. But, after having satisfied those engagements, I do assure you, Mr. Launcelot shall be my first care. I confess his prospect is more remote than I could have wished it, but as it is so remote he will not have the uneasiness of a disappointment if he gets nothing, and if he gets something we shall both be pleased.

As for his political principles, I am in no manner of pain about them. Were he a Tory, I would venture to serve him in the just expectation, that should I ever be charged with having preferred a Tory, the person who was the author of my crime would likewise be the author of my vindication. I am, with real esteem, sir, your most obedient humble servant, CHESTERFIELD.

FROM LADY ELIZABETH GERMAIN.

December 24, 1730.

SINCE you, with a modest assurance, affirm you understand and practice good manners better than any other person in either kingdom, I wish you would therefore put into very handsome terms my excuse to dean Swift that I have not answered his letter I received before the last; for even prebendary Head assured my brother Harry that he, in all form and justice, took place of a colonel, as being a major-general in the church; and therefore you need not have called a council to know whether you or I were to write last; because, as being but a poor courtesy lady, I can pretend to no place but what other people's goodness gives me. This being settled, I certainly ought not to have written again; but, however, I fear I should have been wrong enough to have desired the correspondence to be kept up, but that I have been ill this fortnight, and of course lazy, and not in a writing mood."

First, as to Mrs. Barber, as I told you before, so I tell you the same again, that upon your recommendation I shall be very glad to serve her, though I never did see her; and as I had not your letter till I went from Tunbridge, she passed unmarked by me in the crowd; nor have I met with her since. She wrote to me to present ' *'s poems to the duke and duchess of Dorset. I answered her letter and obeyed her commands. And as to her own, I shall most willingly subscribe; though I am of the opinion we ladies are not apt to be good poets, especially if we cannot spell; but that is by way of inviolable secret between you and me. So much for this letter. Now to your last epistle, for which it seems I am to give you thanks for honouring me with your commands. Well I do so, because this gets a proof that after so many years' acquaintance there is one that will take my word; which is a certain sign that I have not often broke it. Therefore, behold the consequence is this; I have given my word to the duke of Dorset, that you would not so positively affirm this fact concerning Mr. Fox, without knowing the certain truth, that there is no deceit in this declaration of trust. And though it has been recommended to him, as you say, he never did give any answer to it, nor designed it till he was fully satisfied of the truth; and even then I believe would not have determined to have done it, because it is an easy way of securing a place for ever to a family; and were this to be an example, be it so many pence or so many pounds, for the future they would be inheritances.

So now not to show my power with his grace (in spite of his dependants, who may cast their eyes on it), for that I dare affirm there never will be need of where justice or good nature is necessary; but to shew you his dependance on your honour and integrity, he gives me leave to tell you it shall certainly be done; nor does this at all oblige you to give the thanks you seem so desirous to give; for at any time whensoever you have any business, service, or request to make to his grace of Dorset (whether my proper business or not), till you two are better acquainted with one another's merits, I shall be very glad to show how sincerely I am your friend and faithful humble servant,
E. GERMAIN.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

December 28, 1730.

You might give a better reason for restoring my book, that it was not worth keeping. I thought by the superscription that your letter was written by a man, for you have neither the scrawl nor the spelling of your sex. You live so far off, and I believe are so seldom at home, and I am so ill a visitor, that it is no wonder we meet so seldom: but if you knew what I say of you to others, you would believe it was not for want of inclination; I mean what I say of you as I knew you formerly; for as to what you are now, I know but little. I give you the good wishes of the season; and am with true esteem and affection, yours, &c.
JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO LADY SANTRY.

[1730, at a conjecture.]

MADAM,—My reason for waiting on you some time ago was grounded on the esteem I always had for you; which continued still the same, although I had hardly the least acquaintance with your lord, nor was at all desirous to cultivate it, because I did not at all approve of his conduct. In two or three days after I saw you at sir Compton Domville's [lady Santry's brother] house, all my acquaintance told me how full the town was of the visit I had made you, and of the cruel treatment you received from me, with relation to your son [lord Santry]. I will not believe your ladyship was so weak as to spread this complaint yourself; but I lay it wholly to those two young women who were then in the same room, I suppose as visitors. But if you were really discontented, and thought to publish your discontent in aggravating words, I must cut off at least nine-tenths of the friendship I had for you, and list you in the herd of Irish ladies whose titles, or those of their husbands, with me, never have the weight of a feather or the value of a pebble. I imagined you had so much sense as to understand that all I said was intended for the service both of you and your son. I have often spoken much more severely to persons of much higher quality than your son, and in a kingdom where to be a lord is of importance; and I have received hearty thanks, as well as found amendment. One thing I shall observe upon your account, which is never to throw away any more advice upon any Irish lord or his mother; because I thought you would be one of the last to deceive me.

I called four times at the house where you lodge, and you were always denied, by which, I suppose, you would have me think you are angry, whereas I am the person who ought to complain, because all I had said to you proceeded from friendship, and a desire of reforming your son. But that desire is now utterly at an end.
JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD.

January 5, 1731.

MY LORD,—I return your lordship my most humble thanks for the honour and favour of your letter, and desire your justice to believe that in writing to you a second time I have no design of giving you a second trouble. My only end at present is to beg your pardon for a fault of ignorance. I ought to have remembered that the arts of courts are like those of play; where if the most expert be absent for a few months, the whole system is so changed that he has no more skill than a new beginner. Yet I cannot but wish that your lordship had pleased to forgive one who has been an utter stranger to public life above sixteen years. Bussy Rabutin himself, the politest person of his age, when he was recalled to court after a long banishment, appeared ridiculous there; and what could I expect from my antiquated manner of addressing your lordship, in the prime of your life, in the height of fortune, favour, and merit; so distinguished by your active spirit and greatness of your genius? I do here repeat to your lordship that I lay the fault of my misconduct entirely on a friend whom I exceedingly love and esteem, whom I dare not name, and who is as bad a courtier by nature as I am grown by want of practice. God forbid that your lordship should continue in an employment, however great and honourable, where you only can be an ornament to the court so long until you have an opportunity to provide offices for a dozen low people like the poor man whom I took the liberty to mention! and God forbid that in one particular branch of the king's family there should ever be such a mortality as to take away a dozen of his meaner servants in less than a dozen years.

Give me leave, in further excuse of my weakness, to confess that, besides some hints from my friends, your lordship is in great measure to blame for your obliging manner of treating me in every place where I had the honour to see you; which I acknowledge to have been a distinction that I had not the least pretence to, and consequently as little to ground upon it the request of a favour.

As I am an utter stranger to the present forms of the world, I have imagined more than once that your lordship's proceeding with me may be a refinement introduced by yourself; and that as in my time the most solemn and frequent promises of great men usually failed against all probable appearances, so that single slight one of your lordship may by your generous nature early succeed against all visible impossibilities. I am, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

January 17, 1731.

I BEGIN my letter by telling you that my wife has been returned from abroad about a month, and that her health, though feeble and precarious, is better than it has been these two years. She is much your servant, and as she has been her own physician with some success imagines she could be yours with the same. Would to God you was within her reach. She would, I believe, prescribe a great deal of the medicina animi without having recourse to the books of Trismegistus. Pope and I should be her principal apothecaries in the course of the cure; and though our best botanists complain that few of the herbs and simples which go to the composition of these remedies are to be found at present in our soil, yet there are more of them here than in Ireland; besides, by the help of a little chemistry the most noxious juices may become salubrious and rank poison specific. Pope is now in my library with me, and writes to the world—to the present and to future ages—while I begin this letter which he is to finish to you. What good he will do to mankind I know not; this comfort he may be sure of, he cannot do less than you have done before him. I have sometimes thought that if preachers, hangmen, and moral writers keep vice at a stand, or so much as retard the progress of it, they do as much as human nature admits: a real reformation[a] is not to be brought about by ordinary means; it requires those extraordinary means which become punishments as well as lessons: national corruption must be purged by national calamities. Let us hear from you. We deserve this attention because we desire it, and because we believe that you desire to hear from us.

[a] Bolingbroke has enlarged on this topic in his philosophical orks, intending to depreciate christianity by showing that it [illegible] were founded, as it certainly is not.

FROM MR. PULTENEY.

London, February 9, 1731.

DEAR SIR,—Among the many compliments I have received from my friends on the birth of my son, I assure you none gave me greater pleasure than the kind letter you honoured me with on the occasion. When you were last in England your stay was so short that I scarce had time, and very few opportunities, to convince you how great a desire I had to bear some share of your esteem; but should you return this summer I hope you will continue longer among us. Lord Bolingbroke, lord Bathurst, Pope, myself, and others of your friends are got together in a country neighbourhood, which would be much enlivened if you would come and live among us. Mrs. Pulteney joins with me in the invitation, and is much obliged to you for remembering her. She bid me tell you that she is determined to have no more children unless you will promise to come over and christen the next: you see how much my happiness in many respects depends upon your promise. I have always desired Pope when he wrote to you to remember my compliments; and I can assure you with the greatest truth, though you have much older acquaintances, that you have not in England a friend that loves and honours you more than I do, or can be with greater sincerity than I am, your most humble and obedient servant, W. PULTENEY.

P.S.—If any of our pamphlets (with which we abound) are ever sent over to Ireland, and you think them worth reading, you will perceive how low they are reduced in point of argument on one side of the question. This has driven certain people to that last resort of calling names. Villain, traitor, seditious rascal, and such ingenious appellations have frequently been bestowed on a couple of friends of yours. Such usage has made it necessary to return the same polite language, and there has been more Billingsgate stuff uttered from the press within these two months than ever was known before. Upon this Dr. Arbuthnot has written a very humorous treatise, which he showed me this morning; wherein he proves from many learned instances that this sort of altercation is ancient, elegant, and classical; and that what the world falsely imagines to be polite, is truly gothic and barbarous. He shows how the gods and goddesses used one another; dog, bitch, and whore were pretty common expressions among them: kings, heroes, ambassadors, and orators abused one another much in the same way: and he concludes that it is a pity this method of objurgation should be lost. His quotations from Homer, Demosthenes, Æschines, and Tully are admirable; and the whole is very humorously conducted. I take it for granted he will send it you himself as soon as it is printed.

FROM LADY ELIZABETH GERMAIN.

February 23, 1731.

Now were you in vast hopes you should hear no more from me, I being slow in my motions: but do not flatter yourself; you began the correspondence, set my pen a-going, and God knows when it will end: for I had it by inheritance from my father ever to please myself when I could; and though I do not just take the turn my mother did of fasting and praying, yet to be sure that was her pleasure too, or else she would not have been so greedy of it. I do not care to deliver your messages this great while to lieutenant Head, he having been dead these two years; and though he had, as you say, a head, I loved him very well: but, however, from my dame Wadgar's[a] first impression have ever had a natural antipathy to spirits.

I have not acquaintance enough with Mr. Pope, which I am sorry for, and expect you should come to England in order to improve it. If it was the queen and not the duke of Grafton that picked out such a laureat [Colley Cibber], she deserves his poetry in her praises.

Your friend Mrs. Barber has been here. I find she has some request; but neither you nor she has yet let it out to me what it is: for certainly you cannot mean that by subscribing to her book; if so I shall be mighty happy to have you call that a favour; for surely there is nothing so easy as what one can do oneself, nor anything so heavy as what one must ask other people for; though I do not mean by this that I shall ever be unwilling when you require it, yet shall be much happier when it is in my own power to show how sincerely I am my old friend's most faithful humble servant, E. Germain.

Mrs. Lloyd is much yours; but dumber than ever, having a violent cold.

FROM MR. GAY.

March 20, 1731.

I think it is above three months since I wrote to you in partnership with the duchess. About a fortnight since I wrote to you from Twickenham for Mr. Pope and myself. He was then disabled from writing by a severe rheumatic pain in his arm, but is pretty well again, and at present in town. Lord Oxford, lord Bathurst, he, and I dined together yesterday at Barnes, with old Jacob Tonson, where we drank your health. I am again by the advice of physicians grown a moderate wine-drinker, after an abstinence of above two years; and now look upon myself as qualified for society as before.

I formerly sent you a state of the accounts between us. Lord Bathurst has this day paid me your principal and interest. The interest amounted to 12*l*., and I want your directions how to dispose of the principal, which must lie dead till I receive your orders. I had a scheme of buying two lottery-tickets for you and keeping your principal entire. And as all my good fortune is to come, to show you that I consult your advantage I will buy two more for myself, and you and I will go halves in the 10,000*l*. That there will be a lottery is certain: the scheme is not yet declared, but I hear it will not be the most advantageous one, for we are to have but 3*l*. per cent.

I solicit for no court favours, so that I propose to buy the tickets at the market-price when they come out; which will not be these two or three months. If you do not like to have your money thus disposed of, or if you like to trust to your own fortune rather than to share in mine, let me have your orders; and at the same time tell me what I shall do with the principal sum.

I came to town the 7th of January last with the duke and duchess, about business, for a fortnight: as it depended upon others we could not get it done till now. Next week we return to Amesbury in Wiltshire for the rest of the year; but the best way is always to direct to me at the duke's in Burlington-gardens, near Piccadilly. I am ordered by the duchess to grow rich in the manner of sir John Cutler. I have nothing at this present writing but my frock that was made at Salisbury and a bob periwig. I persuade myself that it is shilling weather as seldom as possible, and have found out that there are few court visits that are worth a shilling. In short, I am very happy in my present independency: I envy no man, but have the due contempt of voluntary slaves of birth and fortune. I have such a spite against you that I wish you may long for my company as I do for yours. Though you never write to me, you cannot make me forget you; so that, if it is out of friendship you write so seldom to me, it does not answer the purpose. Those who you like should remember you, do so whenever I see them. I believe they do it upon their own account, for I know few people who are solicitous to please or flatter me. The duchess sends you her compliments; and so would many more if they knew of my writing to you.

[a] The deaf housekeeper at lord Berkeley's.

FROM LORD BOLINGBOKE AND MR. POPE.

March 29, 1731.

I have delayed several posts answering your letter of January last, in hopes of being able to speak to you about a project which concerns us both, but me the most, since the success of it would bring us together. It has been a good while in my head and at my heart; if it can be set a-going you shall hear of it. I was ill in the beginning of the winter for near a week, but in no danger either from the nature of my distemper or from the attendance of three physicians. Since that bilious intermitting fever I have had, as I had before, better health than the regard I have paid to health deserves. We are both in the decline of life, my dear dean, and have been some years going down the hill; let us make the passage as smooth as we can. Let us fence against physical evil by care and the use of those means which experience must have pointed out to us: let us fence against moral evil by philosophy. I renounce the alternative you propose. But we may, nay (if we will follow nature, and do not work up imagination against her plainest dictates), we shall of course, grow every year more indifferent to life, and to the affairs and interests of a system out of which we are soon to go. This is much better than stupidity. The decay of passion strengthens philosophy, for passion may decay and stupidity not succeed. Passions (says Pope, our divine, as you will see one time or other) are the gales of life; let us not complain that they do not blow a storm. What hurt does age do us in subduing what we toil to subdue all our lives? It is now six in the morning; I recal the time (and am glad it is over) when about this hour I used to be going to bed, surfeited with pleasure or jaded with business; my head often full of schemes, and my heart as often full of anxiety. Is it a misfortune, think you, that I rise at this hour, refreshed, serene, and calm? that the past and even the present affairs of life stand like objects at a distance from me, where I can keep off the disagreeables so as not to be strongly affected by them, and from whence I can draw the others nearer to me? Passions in their force would bring all these, nay, even future contingencies, about my ears at once, and reason would but ill defend me in the scuffle.

I leave Pope to speak for himself, but I must tell you how much my wife is obliged to you. She says she would find strength enough to nurse you if you were here, and yet, God knows, she is extremely weak; the slow fever works under and mines the constitution; we keep it off sometimes, but still it returns and makes new breaches before nature can repair the old ones. I am not ashamed to say to you that I admire her more every hour of my life:

Death is not to her the king of terrors; she beholds him without the least. When she suffers much she wishes for him as a deliverer from pain; when life is tolerable she looks on him with dislike, because he is to separate her from those friends to whom she is more attached than to life itself.[a] You shall not stay for my next as long as you have for this letter; and in every one Pope shall write something much better than the scraps of old philosophers, which were the presents, munuscula, that stoical fop Seneca used to send in every epistle to his friend Lucilius.

P.S. BY MR. POPE.

My lord has spoken justly of this lady; why not I of my mother? Yesterday was her birthday, now entering on the ninety-first year of her age; her memory much diminished, but her senses very little hurt, her sight and hearing good; she sleeps not ill, eats moderately, drinks water, says her prayers; and this is all she does. I have reason to thank God for continuing so long to me a very good and tender parent, and for allowing me to exercise for some years those cares which are now as necessary to her as hers have been to me. An object of this sort daily before one's eyes very much softens the mind, but perhaps may hinder it from the willingness of contracting other ties of the like domestic nature when one finds how painful it is even to enjoy the tender pleasures. I have formerly made so strong efforts to get and to deserve a friend; perhaps it were wiser never to attempt it, but live extempore, and look upon the world only as a place to pass through, just pay your hosts their due, disperse a little charity, and hurry on. Yet am I just now writing (or rather planning) a book[b] to make mankind look upon this life with comfort and pleasure, and put morality in good humour. And just now too I am going to see one I love very tenderly; and to-morrow to entertain several civil people, whom if we call friends it is by the courtesy of England. Sic, sic juvat ire sub umbras.[c] While we do live we must make the best of life.

" Cantantes licet usque (minus via lædat) eamus,"[d] as the shepherd said in Virgil when the road was long and heavy. I am yours.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE AND MR. POPE.

You may assure yourself that if you come over this spring you will find me not only got back into the habits of study, but devoted to that historical task which you have set me these many years. I am in hopes of some materials which will enable me to work in the whole extent of the plan I propose to myself. If they are not to be had I must accommodate my plan to this deficiency. In the mean time Pope has given me more trouble than he or I thought of; and you will be surprised to find that I have been partly drawn by him, and partly by myself, to write a pretty large volume upon a very grave and very important subject; that I have ventured to pay no regard whatever to any authority except a sacred authority, and that I have ventured to start a thought which must, if it is pushed as successfully as I think it is, render all your metaphysical theology both ridiculous and abominable. There is an expression in one of your letters to me which makes me believe you will come into my way of thinking on this subject; and yet I am persuaded that divines and freethinkers would both be clamorous against it if it was to be submitted to their censure, as I do not intend that it shall. The passage I mean is that where you say you told Dr. Delany the grand points of christianity ought to be taken as infallible revelation, &c.[a]

It happened that while I was writing this to you the doctor came to make me a visit from London, where I heard he was arrived some time ago; he was in haste to return, and is, I perceive, in great haste to print. He left with me eight Dissertations,[b] a small part, as I understand, of his work, and desired me to peruse, consider, and observe upon them against Monday next, when he will come down again. By what I have read of the two first, I find myself unable to serve him. The principles he reasons upon are begged in a disputation of this sort, and the manner of reasoning is by no means close and conclusive. The sole advice I could give him in conscience would be that which he would take ill and not follow. I will get rid of this task as well as I can, for I esteem the man, and should be sorry to disoblige him where I cannot serve him.

As to retirement and exercise, your notions are true: the first should not be indulged so much as to render us savage, nor the last neglected so as to impair health. But I know men who, for fear of being savage, live with all who live with them; and who, to preserve their health, saunter away half their time. Adieu: Pope calls for the paper.

P.S. BY MR. POPE.

I hope what goes before will be a strong motive to your coming. God knows if ever I shall see Ireland: I shall never desire it if you can be got hither, or keep here. Yet I think I shall be, too soon, a free man [by his mother's death]. Your recommendations I constantly give to those you mention; though some of them I see but seldom, and am every day more retired. I am less fond of the world, and less curious about it, yet no way out of humour, disappointed, or angry, though in my way I receive as many injuries as my betters; but I do not feel them, therefore I ought not to vex other people, nor even to return

[a] She was niece to madame de Maintenon, educated at St. Cyr, and was a woman of a beautiful person and very agreeable manners. Her letters were written in very elegant French. She was a woman of much observation. Madame de Maintenon mentions her in her letters. Dr. Trapp told me that, lord Bolingbroke boasting one day of his former gallantries, she said to him, smiling, "When I look at you methinks I see the ruins of a fine old Roman aqueduct; but the water has ceased to flow."

[b] "The Essay on Man;" and alludes to the arguments he uses to make men satisfied even with their present state, without looking to another. Young wrote his "Night Thoughts" in direct opposition to this view of human life, but which, in truth, Young has painted in colours too dark and uncomfortable.

[c] "Thus, thus it pleases us to pass through life."

[d] "Let us still go singing on, to beguile the tediousness of the way."

[a] In this maxim all bigoted divines and freethinking politicians agree: the one, for fear of disturbing the established religion: the other, lest that disturbance should prove injurious to their administration of the state. And would they be content to take these points for granted themselves without injuring those in their fortunes and reputations who are for inquiring into and settling them on their right grounds, I think nobody would envy their piety or their wisdom; but when they begin to persecute those who venture to assume this natural liberty, then they unmask their hypocrisy and Machiavelianism.

[b] The work here alluded to was the first volume of Dr. Delany's "Revelation Examined with Candour," published 1732; a work written in a florid and declamatory style, and with a greater degree of learning and ingenuity than of sound reason and argument. The same may be said of the author's "Life of King David." Witness the first dissertation, on the forbidden fruit; the second, concerning the knowledge of the brute world conveyed to Adam; the third, of the knowledge of marriage given to Adam; the sixth, concerning the difficulties and objections that lie against the Mosaic account of the fall; the fifteenth, on some difficulties relating to Noah's ark considered. The best of his works seems to be his "Reflections on Polygamy." Dr. Delany was an amiable, benevolent, and virtuous man; a character far superior to that of the ablest controversial writer. His "Defence of Revelation" is of a very different cast from such solid and masterly works as the bishop of Llandaff's "Apology for the Bible," and archdeacon Paley's "Evidences of Christianity."

injuries. I pass almost all my time at Dawley and at home; my lord (of which I partly take the merit to myself) is as much estranged from politics as I am. Let philosophy be ever so vain, it is less vain now than politics, and not quite so vain at present as divinity: I know nothing that moves strongly but satire, and those who are ashamed of nothing else are so of being ridiculous. I fancy, if we three were together but for three years, some good might be done even upon this age.

I know you will desire some account of my health: it is as usual, but my spirits rather worse. I write little or nothing. You know I never had either taste or talent for politics, and the world minds nothing else. I have personal obligations which I will ever preserve to men of different sides; and I wish nothing so much as public quiet, except it be my own quiet. I think it a merit if I can take off any man from grating or satirical subjects merely on the score of party; and it is the greatest vanity of my life that I have contributed to turn my lord Bolingbroke to subjects moral, useful, and more worthy his pen. Dr. Delany's book is what I cannot commend so much as dean Berkeley's, though it has many things ingenious in it, and is not deficient in the writing part; but the whole book, though he meant it ad populum, is, I think, purely ad clerum. Adieu.

TO MR. GAY.

Dublin, April 13, 1731.

Your situation is an odd one; the duchess is your treasurer, and Mr. Pope tells me you are the duke's. And I had gone a good way in some verses on that occasion, prescribing lessons to direct your conduct in a negative way, not to do so and so, &c., like other treasurers; how to deal with servants, tenants, or neighbouring squires, which I take to be courtiers, parliaments, and princes in alliance, and so the parallel goes on, but grows too long to please me: I prove that poets are the fittest persons to be treasurers and managers to great persons, from their virtue and contempt of money, &c. Pray why did you not get a new heel to your shoe, unless you would make your court at St. James's by affecting to imitate the prince of Lilliput? But the rest of your letter being wholly taken up in a very bad character of the duchess, I shall say no more to you, but apply myself to her grace.

Madam,—Since Mr. Gay affirms that you love to have your own way, and since I have the same perfection, I will settle that matter immediately, to prevent those ill consequences he apprehends. Your grace shall have your own way in all places except your own house and the domains about it. There, and there only, I expect to have mine, so that you have all the world to reign in, bating only two or three hundred acres and two or three houses in town or country. I will likewise, out of my special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, allow you to be in the right against all humankind except myself, and to be never in the wrong but when you differ from me. You shall have a greater privilege in the third article of speaking your mind, which I shall graciously allow you now and then to do even to myself, and only rebuke you when it does not please me.

Madam, I am now got as far as your grace's letter, which having not read this fortnight (having been out of town, and not daring to trust myself with the carriage of it), the presumptuous manner in which you begin had slipped out of my memory. But I forgive you to the seventeenth line, where you begin to banish me for ever by demanding me to answer all the good character some partial friends have given me. Madam, I have lived sixteen years in Ireland, with only an intermission of two summers in England, and consequently am fifty years older than I was at the queen's death, and fifty thousand times duller, and fifty millions times more peevish, perverse, and morose; so that under these disadvantages I can only pretend to excel all your other acquaintance about some twenty bars' length. Pray, madam, have you a clear voice? and will you let me sit at your left hand at least within three of you, for of two bad ears my right is the best? My groom tells me that he likes your park, but your house is too little. Can the parson of the parish play at backgammon and hold his tongue? is any one of your women a good nurse if I should fancy myself sick for four-and-twenty hours? how many days will you maintain me and my equipage? When these preliminaries are settled, I must be very poor, very sick, or dead, or to the last degree unfortunate, if I do not attend you at Amesbury. For I profess you are the first lady that ever I desired to see since the first of August, 1714,[a] and I have forgot the date when that desire grew strong upon me, but I know I was not then in England, else I would have gone on foot for that happiness as far as to your house in Scotland. But I can soon recollect the time by asking some ladies here the month, the day, and the hour, when I began to endure their company, which, however, I think was a sign of my ill judgment, for I do not perceive they mend in anything but envying or admiring your grace. I dislike nothing in your letter but an affected apology for bad writing, bad spelling, and a bad pen, which you pretend Mr. Gay found fault with, wherein you affront Mr. Gay, you affront me, and you affront yourself. False spelling is only excusable in a chambermaid, for I would not pardon it in any of your waiting-women. Pray God preserve your grace and family, and give me leave to expect that you will be so just to remember me among those who have the greatest regard for virtue, goodness, prudence, courage, and generosity; after which you must conclude that I am, with the greatest respect and gratitude, madam, your grace's most obedient and most humble servant, &c.

TO MR. GAY.

I have just got yours of February 24, with a postscript by Mr. Pope. I am in great concern for him; I find Mr. Pope dictated to you the first part, and with great difficulty some days after added the rest. I see his weakness by his hand-writing. How much does his philosophy exceed mine! I could not bear to see him: I will write to him soon.

FROM LORD BATHURST.

April 19, 1731.

I never designed to have written to you any more, because you bantered and abused me so grossly in your last. To flatter a man from whom you can get nothing, nor expect anything, is doing mischief for mischief sake, and consequently highly immoral. However, I will not carry my resentments so far as to stand by and see you undone without giving you both notice and advice. Could any man but you think of trusting John Gay with his money? None of his friends would ever trust him with his own whenever they could avoid it. He has called in the 200*l*. I had of yours: I paid him both principal and interest. I suppose by this time he has lost it. I give you notice you must look upon it as annihilated.

[a] The day on which queen Anne died, when all his hopes of more preferment were lost.

Now, as I have considered your deanery brings you in little or nothing, and that you keep servants and horses, and frequently give little neat dinners, which are more expensive than a few splendid entertainments; besides which you may be said to water your flock with French wine, which altogether must consume your substance in a little while; I have thought of putting you in a method that you may retrieve your affairs. In the first place, you must turn off all your servants and sell your horses; I will find exercise for you. Your whole family must consist of only one sound wholesome wench. She will make your bed and warm it, besides washing your linen and mending it, darning your stockings, &c. But to save all expense in housekeeping you must contrive some way or other that she should have milk; and I can assure you it is the opinion of some of the best physicians that women's milk is the wholesomest food in the world.

Besides, this regimen, take it altogether, will certainly temper and cool your blood. You will not be such a boutefeu as you have been, and be ready, upon every trifling occasion, to set a whole kingdom in a flame. Had the drapier been a milksop, poor Wood had not suffered so much in his reputation and fortune. It will allay that fervour of blood, and quiet that hurry of spirits, which breaks out every now and then into poetry, and seems to communicate itself to others of the chapter. You would not then encourage Delany and Stopford in their idleness, but let them be as grave as most of their order are with us. I am convinced they will sooner get preferment then than in the way they now are. And I shall not be out of hopes of seeing you a bishop in time, when you live in that regular way which I shall propose. In short, in a few years you may lay up money enough to buy even the bishopric of Durham. For if you keep cows instead of horses in that high-walled orchard, and cultivate by your own industry a few potatoes in your garden, the maid will live well, and be able to sell more butter and cheese than will answer her wages. You may preach then upon temperance with a better grace than now that you are known to consume seven or eight hogsheads of wine every year of your life. You will be mild and meek in your conversation, and not frighten parliament-men, and keep even lord-lieutenants in awe. You will then be qualified for that slavery which the country you live in and the order you profess seem to be designed for. It will take off that giddiness in your head which has disturbed yourself and others. The disputes between sir Arthur[a] and my lady will for the future be confined to prose; and an old thorn may be cut down in peace and warm the parlour chimney without heating the heads of poor innocent people and turning their brains.

You ought to remember what St. Austin says, Poesis est vinum dæmonum. Consider the life you now lead: you warm all that come near you with your wine and conversation; and the rest of the world with your pen dipped deep in St. Austin's vinum dæmonum.

So far for your soul's health. Now, as to the health of your body: I must inform you that part of what I prescribe to you is the same which our great friar Bacon prescribed to the pope who lived in his days. Read his "Cure of Old Age and Preservation of Youth," chapter the 12th. You used to say that you found benefit from riding. The French, an ingenious people, used the word chevaucher instead of monter à cheval, and they look upon it as the same thing in effect.

Now if you will go on after this in your old ways, and ruin your health, your fortune, and your reputation, it is no fault of mine. I have pointed out the road which will lead you to riches and preferment; and that you may have no excuse from entering into this new course of life, upon pretence of doubting whether you can get a person properly qualified to feed you and compose your new family, I will recommend you to John Gay, who is much better qualified to bring increase from a woman than from a sum of money. But if he should be lazy (and he is so fat that there is some reason to doubt him) I will, without fail, supply you myself, that you may be under no disappointments. Bracton says, Conjunctio maris et fœminæ est jure naturæ. Vide Coke upon Littleton. Calvin's case, 1st vol. Reports.

This I send you from my closet at Richkings,[a] where I am at leisure to attend serious affairs; but when one is in town there are so many things to laugh at that it is very difficult to compose one's thoughts even long enough to write a letter of advice to a friend. If I see any man serious in that crowd I look upon him for a very dull or designing fellow. By the bye, I am of opinion that folly and cunning are nearer allied than people are aware of. If a fool runs out his fortune and is undone we say the poor man has been outwitted. Is it not as reasonable to say of a cunning rascal who has lived miserably and died hated and despised to leave a great fortune behind him, that he has outwitted himself? In short, to be serious about those trifles which the majority of mankind think of consequence seems to me to denote folly, and to trifle with those things which they generally treat ludicrously may denote knavery. I have observed that in comedy the best actor plays the part of the droll, while some scrub rogue is made the hero or fine gentleman. So in this farce of life, wise men pass their time in mirth, while fools only are serious. Adieu. Continue to be merry and wise; but never turn serious or cunning.

FROM MR. GAY.

Dear Sir,—The fortune of the person you interest yourself in amounts to at present (all debts paid) about 3400*l.*; so that, whatever other people think, I look upon him, as to fortune, to be happy; that is to say, an independent creature. I have been in expectation, post after post, to have received your directions about the disposal of your money, which lord Bathurst paid into my hands some time ago. I left that sum, with 200*l.* of my own, in Mr. Hoare's hands at my coming out of town. If I hear nothing from you I shall do with it as I do with my own. I made you a proposal about purchasing lottery-tickets in partnership with myself; that is to say, four tickets between us. This can be done with the overplus, with the interest-money I have received; but in this I will do nothing till I hear from you.

I am now got to my residence at Amesbury; getting health and saving money. Since I have got over the impediment to a writer, of water-drinking, if I can persuade myself that I have any wit, and find I have inclination, I intend to write, though, as yet, I have another impediment, for I have not provided myself with a scheme. Ten to one but I shall have a propensity to write against vice, and who can tell how far that may offend? But an author should consult his genius rather than his interest if he cannot reconcile them. Just before I left London I made a visit to Mrs. Barber. I wish I could anywise have contributed to her subscription. I have always found myself of no consequence, and am now of less than ever; but I have found out a way, in one respect, of making myself of more consequence, which is by considering other people of less. Those who have given me up I have given up; and in short, I seek after no friendships, but am content with what I have in the house. And they have subscribed, and I proposed it before Jo. Taylor, who, upon hearing she was a friend of yours, offered his subscription, and desired his compliments to you. I believe she has given you an account that she has some prospect of success from other recommendations to those I know; and I have not been wanting upon all occasions to put in my good word, which I fear avails but little. Two days ago I received a letter from Dr. Arbuthnot, which gave me but a bad account of Mr. Pope's health. I have written to him, but have not heard from him since I came into the country. If you knew the pleasure you gave me you would keep your contract of writing more punctually; and especially you would have answered my last letter, as it was about a money affair, and you have to do with a man of business.

Your letter was more to the duchess than to me, so I now leave off to offer her the paper.

POSTSCRIPT BY THE DUCHESS.

It was Mr. Gay's fault that I did not write sooner, which, if I had, I should hope you would have been here by this time; for I have to tell you all your articles are agreed to, and that I only love my own way when I meet not with others whose ways I like better. I am in great hopes that I shall approve of yours, for, to tell you the truth, I am at present a little tired of my own. I have not a clear or distinct voice except when I am angry; but I am a very good nurse when people do not fancy themselves sick. Mr. Gay knows this, and he knows too how to play at backgammon. Whether the parson of the parish can I know not; but if he cannot hold his tongue I can. Pray set out the first fair wind, and stay with us as long as ever you please. I cannot name any fixed time that I shall like to maintain you and your equipage; but if I do not happen to like you I know I can so far govern my temper as to endure you for about five days. So come away directly; at all hazards you will be allowed a good breathing-time. I shall make no sort of respectful conclusions; for till I know you I cannot tell what I am to you.

MR. GAY'S POSTSCRIPT.

The direction is to the duke of Queensberry's, in Burlington-gardens, Piccadilly. Now I have told you this you have no excuse from writing but one, which is coming; get over your lawsuit and receive your money.

The duchess adds, "He shall not write a word more from Amesbury, in Wiltshire. Your groom was mistaken, for the house is big enough, but the park is too little."

FROM MR. GAY.

Amesbury, April 27, 1731.

Dear Sir,—Yours without a date I received two days after my return to this place from London, where I stayed only four days. I saw Mr. Pope, who is much better. I dined with him at lord Oxford's; who never fails drinking your health and is always very inquisitive after everything that concerns you. Mr. Pulteney had received your letter, and seemed very much pleased with it; and I thought you very much too in the good graces of the lady. Sir William Wyndham, who you will by this time have heard has buried lady Catherine, was at Dawley in great affliction. Dr. Arbuthnot I found in good health and spirits. His neighbour, Mr. Lewis, was gone to Bath. Mrs. Patty Blount I saw two or three times; who will be very much pleased when she knows you so kindly remember her. I am afraid Mrs. Howard will not be so well satisfied with the compliments you send her. I breakfasted twice with her at Mrs. Blount's, and she told me that her indisposition had prevented her answering your letter. This she desired me to tell you, that she would write to you soon; and she desires you will accept of her compliments in the mean time by me. You should consider circumstances before you censure. It will be too long for a letter to make her apology; but when I see you I shall convince you that you mistake her.[a] This day before I left London I gave orders for buying two South-Sea or India bonds for you, which carry 4*l.* per cent., and are as easily turned into ready money as bank-bills, which by this time I suppose is done. I shall go to London again for a few days in about a fortnight or three weeks, and then I will take care of the twelve pound affair with Mrs. Launcelot, as you direct; or, if I hear of Mr. Pope's being in town, I will do it sooner, by a letter to him. When I was in town (after a bashful fit for having writ something like a love-letter, and in two years making one visit) I wrote to Mrs. Drelincourt to apologise for my behaviour, and received a civil answer, but had not time to see her; they are naturally very civil; so that I am not so sanguine to interpret this as any encouragement. I find by Mrs. Barber that she very much interests herself in her affair, and indeed from everybody who knows her she answers the character you first gave me.

Whenever you come to England, if you will put that confidence in me to give me notice, I will meet you at your landing-place and conduct you hither. You have experience of me as a traveller; and I promise you I will not drop you on the road for any visit whatever. You tell me of thanks that I have not given. I do not know what to say to people who will be perpetually laying one under obligations: my behaviour to you shall convince you that I am very sensible of them, though I never once mention them. I look upon you as my best friend and counsellor. I long for the time when we shall meet and converse together. I will draw you into no great company, besides those I live with. In short, if you insist upon it, I will give up all great company for yours. These are conditions that I can hardly think you will insist upon after your declarations to the duchess, who is more and more impatient to see you: and all my fear is that you will give up me for her, which, after my ungallant declaration, would be very ungenerous. But we will settle this matter together when you come to Amesbury. After all, I find I have been saying nothing; for speaking of her I am talking as if I were in my own power. You used to blame me for over-solicitude about myself. I am now grown so rich, that I do not think myself worth thinking on: so that I will promise you never to mention myself or my own affairs; but you owed it all to the inquisitiveness of your friendship, and ten to one but you will every now and then draw me in to talk of myself again. I sent you a gross state of my fortune already. I have not room to draw it out in particulars. When you come over the duchess will state it you. I have left no room for her to write, so that I will say nothing till my letter is gone; but she would not forgive me if I did not send her compliments.

TO VENTOSO.

April 28, 1731.

SIR,—Your letter has lain by me without ackowledging it longer than I intended, not for want of civility, but because I was wholly at a loss what to say; for, as your scheme of thinking, conversing, and living, differs in every point diametrically from mine, so I think myself the most improper person in the world to converse or correspond with you. You would be glad to be thought a proud man, and yet there is not a grain of pride in you; for you are pleased that people should know you have been acquainted with persons of great names and titles, whereby you confess that you take it for an honour, which a proud man never does; and besides you run the hazard of not being believed. You went abroad and strove to engage yourself in a desperate cause, very much to the damage of your fortune, and might have been to the danger of your life if there had not been, as it were, a combination of some who would not give credit to the account you gave of your transactions, and of others who, either really or pretending to believe you, have given you out as a dangerous person: of which last notion I once hinted something to you; because, if what you repeated of yourself were true, it was necessary that you had either made your peace, or must have been prosecuted for high treason. The reputation (if there be any) of having been acquainted with princes and other great persons arises from its being generally know to others, but never once mentioned by ourselves, if it can possibly be avoided. I say this perfectly for your service; because an universal opinion among those who know or have heard of you, that you have always practised a direct contrary proceeding, has done you more hurt than your natural understanding left to itself could ever have brought upon you. The world will never allow any man that character which he gives to himself, by openly confessing it to those with whom he converses. Wit, learning, valour, great acquaintance, the esteem of good men, will be known, although we should endeavour to conceal them, however they may pass unrewarded; but I doubt our own bare assertions upon any of those points will very little avail, except in tempting the hearers to judge directly contrary to what we advance. Therefore, at this season of your life, I should be glad you would act after the common custom of mankind, and have done with thoughts of courts, of ladies, of lords of politics, and all dreams of being important in the world. I am glad your country life has taught you Latin, of which you were altogether ignorant when I knew you first; and I am astonished how you came to recover it. Your new friend Horace will teach you many lessons agreeable to what I have said, for which I could refer to a dozen passages in a few minutes. I should be glad to see the house wholly swept of these cobwebs, and that you would take an oath never to mention a prince or princess, a foreign or domestic lord, an intrigue of state or of love; but suit yourself to the climate and company where your prudence will be to pass the rest of your life. It is not a farthing matter to you what is doing in Europe, more than to every alderman who reads the news in a coffeehouse. If you could resolve to act thus, your understanding is good enough to qualify you for any conversation in this kingdom. Families will receive you without fear or restraint; nor watch to hear you talk in the grand style, laugh when you are gone, and tell it to all their acquaintance. It is a happiness that this quality may, by a man of sense, be as easily shaken off as it is acquired, especially when he has no proper claim to it; for you were not bred to be a man of business; you never were called to any employments at courts; but destined to be a private gentleman, to entertain yourself with country business and country acquaintance; or at best with books of amusement in your own language. It is an uncontrolled truth, that no man ever made an ill figure who understood his own talents, nor a good one who mistook them. I am, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

I FANCY you have comforted yourself a long time with the hopes of hearing no more from me; but you may return your thanks to a downright fit of the gout in my foot, and as painful a rheumatism that followed immediately after in my arm, which bound me to my good behaviour. So you may perceive I should make a sad nurse to Mr. Pope, who finds the effects of age and a crazy carcase already. However, if it is true what I am informed, that you are coming here soon, I expect you should bring us together; and if he will bear me with patience, I shall hear him with pleasure.

I do not know what number of chaplains the duke of Dorset intends to carry over; but as yet I have heard of but one that he has sent, and he as worthy, honest, sensible a man as any I know,—Mr. Brandreth, who I believe was recommended to your acquaintance. I have not been in a way of seeing Mrs. Barber this great while; but I hear (and I hope it is so) that she goes on in her subscription very well; nor has the lady she so much feared done her any harm, if she endeavoured it, which is more than I know that she did. I believe you will find by my writing that it is not quite easy to me, so I will neither teaze you nor trouble myself longer, who am most sincerely, your faithful humble servant,

E. GERMAIN.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, June 12, 1731.

I DOUBT habit has little power to reconcile us with sickness attended by pain. With me the lowness of spirits has a most unhappy effect; I am grown less patient with solitude, and harder to be pleased with company, which I could formerly better digest, when I could be easier without it than at present. As to sending you anything that I have written since I left you (either verse or prose), I can only say that I have ordered by my will, that all my papers of any kind shall be delivered you to dispose of as you please. I have several things that I have had schemes to finish or to attempt, but I very foolishly put off the trouble, as sinners do their repentance; for I grow every day more averse from writing, which is very natural, and when I take a pen, say to myself a thousand times non est tanti. As to those papers of four or five years past, that you are pleased to require soon, they consist of little accidental things writ in the country, family amusements never intended further than to divert ourselves and some neighbours; or some effects of anger on public grievances here, which would be insignificant out of this kingdom. Two or three of us had a fancy, three years ago, to write a weekly paper, and call it an "Intelligencer." But it continued not long, for the whole volume (it was reprinted in London, and I find you have seen it) was the work only of two, myself and Dr. Sheridan. If we could have got some ingenious young man to have been the manager, who should have published all that might be sent to him, it might have continued longer, for there were hints enough. But the printer here could not afford such a young man one farthing for his trouble, the sale being so small, and the price one halfpenny; and so it dropped. In the volume you saw (to answer your questions), the 1, 3, 5, 7, were mine. Of the 8th I writ only the verses (very uncorrect, but against a fellow [Richard Tighe] we all hated), the 9th mine, the 10th only the verses, and of those not the four last slovenly lines; the 15th is a pamphlet of mine printed before, with Dr. Sheridan's preface, merely for laziness, not to disappoint the town; and so was the 19th, which contains only a parcel of facts relating purely to the miseries of Ireland, and wholly useless and unentertaining. As to other things of mine, since I left you; there are in prose, a "View of the State of Ireland;" a "Project for Eating Children;" and a "Defence of Lord Carteret:" in verse, a "Libel on Dr. Delany and Lord Carteret;" a "Letter to Dr. Delany on the Libels writ against him;" the "Barrack" (a stolen copy); the "Lady's Journal;" the "Lady's Dressing-room" (stolen copy); the "Plea of the Damned" (a stolen copy): all these have been printed in London. (I forgot to tell you that the "Tale of Sir Ralph" was sent from England.) Besides these there are five or six (perhaps more) papers of verse written in the north, but perfectly family things,[a] two or three of which may be tolerable, the rest but indifferent, and the humour only local, and some that would give offence to the times. Such as they are, I will bring them, tolerable or bad, if I recover this lameness, and live long enough to see you either here or there. I forget again to tell you that the "Scheme of paying Debts by a Tax on Vices," is not one syllable mine, but of a young clergyman whom I countenance; he told me it was built upon a passage in Gulliver, where a projector hath something upon the same thought. This young man[b] is the most hopeful we have; a book of his poems was printed in London; Dr. Delany is one of his patrons; he is married and has children, and makes up about 100*l.* a-year, on which he lives decently. The utmost stretch of his ambition is, to gather up as much superfluous money as will give him a sight of you and half an hour of your presence; after which he will return home in full satisfaction, and in proper time die in peace.

My poetical fountain is drained, and I profess I grow gradually so dry that a rhyme with me is almost as hard to find as a guinea, and even prose speculations tire me almost as much. Yet I have a thing in prose,[c] begun above twenty-eight years ago and almost finished. It will make a four-shilling volume, and is such a perfection of folly that you shall never hear of it till it is printed, and then you shall be left to guess. Nay, I have another of the same age,[d] which will require a long time to perfect, and is worse than the former, in which I will serve you the same way. I heard lately from Mr. ——, who promises to be less lazy in order to mend his fortune. But women who live by their beauty, and men by their wit, are seldom provident enough to consider that both wit and beauty will go off with years, and there is no living upon the credit of what is past.

I am in great concern to hear of my lady Bolingbroke's ill health returned upon her, and I doubt my lord will find Dawley too solitary without her. In that neither he nor you are companions young enough for me, and I believe the best part of the reason why men are said to grow children when they are old is because they cannot entertain themselves with thinking; which is the very case with little boys and girls, who love to be noisy among their playfellows. I am told Mrs. Pope is without pain, and I have not heard of a more gentle decay, without uneasiness to herself or friends; yet I cannot but pity you, who are ten times the greater sufferer, by having the person you most love so long before you and dying daily; and I pray God it may not affect your mind or your health. JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] A very excellent, because perfect, sort of primitive verses, which never rose above daily topics and the chat of the times. The greatest part of Swift's poetry is of this kind. I know not of any work of the dean's that can be strictly called poetical. Our bards of this species are numerous.

[b] His name was Pilkington; and he was husband of the lady who wrote "Memoirs of her own Life."

A COUNTERFEIT LETTER TO THE QUEEN.[a]

Dublin, June 22, 1731.

MADAM,—I have had the honour to tell your majesty, on another occasion, that provinces labour under one mighty misfortunne, which is, in a great measure, the cause of all the rest; and that is, that they are for the most part far removed from the prince's eye: and, of consequence, from the influence both of his wisdom and goodness. This is the case of Ireland beyond expression!

There is not one mortal here who is not well satisfied of your majesty's good intentions to all your people: and yet your subjects of this isle are so far from sharing the effects of your good dispositions in any equitable degree; are so far from enjoying all the good to which they are entitled from your majesty's most gracious inclinations; that they often find great difficulty how to enjoy even the relief of complaint.

To omit a thousand other instances, there is one person of Irish birth, eminent for genius and merit of many kinds, an honour to her country and to her sex: I will be bold to say, not less so in her sphere than your majesty in yours. And yet all talents and virtues have not yet been able to influence any one person about your majesty so far as to introdnce her into your least notice. As I am your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subject, it is a debt I owe your majesty to acquaint you that Mrs. Barber, the best female poet of this or perhaps of any age, is now in your majesty's capital; known to lady Hertford, lady Torrington, lady Walpole, &c.; a woman whose genius is honoured by every man of genius in this kingdom, and either honoured or envied by every man of genius in England.

Your majesty is justly reverenced for those great abilities with which God has blessed you; for your regard to learning and your zeal for true religion. Complete your character by your regard to persons of genius; especially those who make the greatness of their talents, after your majesty's example, subservient to the good of mankind and the glory of God; which is most remarkably Mrs. Barber's case and character.

Give me leave to tell you, madam, that every subject of understanding and virtue throughout your dominions is appointed by Providence of your council. And this, madam, is an open and an honest apology for this trouble; or, to speak more properly, for this dutiful information. It is your true interest, that all your subjects should see that merit is regarded by you in one instance; or rather, that it is not disregarded in any instance. Let them daily bless God for every gift of wisdom and goodness bestowed upon you, and pray incessantly for the long continuance of them; as doth your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subject and servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] Thus indorsed by Dr. Swift: "Counterfeit letter from me to the queen, sent to me by Mr. Pope; dated June 22, 1731; received July 19, 1731; given by the countess of Suffolk."

TO MR. GAY.

Dublin, June 29, 1731.

Ever since I received your letter I have been upon a balance about going to England, and landing at Bristol, to pass a month at Amesbury, as the duchess has given me leave. But many difficulties have interfered: first, I thought I had done with my lawsuit, and so did all my lawyers, but my adversary, after being in appearance a protestant these twenty years, has declared he was always a papist, and consequently by the law here cannot buy nor (I think) sell; so that I am at sea again, for almost all I am worth. But I have still a worse evil; for the giddiness I was subject to, instead of coming seldom and violent, now constantly attends me more or less, though in a more peaceable manner, yet such as will not qualify me to live among the young and healthy: and the duchess, in all her youth, spirit, and grandeur, will make a very ill nurse, and her women not much better. Valetudinarians must live where they can command and scold: I must have horses to ride; I must go to bed and rise when I please, and live where all mortals are subservient to me. I must talk nonsense when I please, and all who are present must commend it. I must ride thrice a-week, and walk three or four miles besides every day.

I always told you Mr. ——— was good for nothing but to be a rank courtier. I care not whether he ever writes to me or no. He and you may tell this to the duchess, and I hate to see you so charitable, and such a cully; and yet I love you for it because I am one myself.

You are the silliest lover in Christendom: If you like Mrs. ———, why do you not command her to take you? if she does not, she is not worth pursuing; you do her too much honour; she has neither sense nor taste if she dares to refuse you, though she had 10,000*l.* I do not remember to have told you of thanks that you have not given, nor do I understand your meaning, and I am sure I had never the least thoughts of any myself. If I am your friend, it is for my own reputation, and from a principle of self-love; and I sometimes reproach you for not honouring me in letting the world know we are friends.

I see very well how matters go with the duchess in regard to me. I heard her say, "Mr. Gay, fill your letter to the dean, that there may be no room for me; the frolic is gone far enough, I have written thrice, I will do no more; if the man has a mind to come let him come; what a clutter is here! Positively I will not write a syllable more." She is an ungrateful duchess, considering how many adorers I have procured her here, over and above the thousands she had before. I cannot allow you rich enough till you are worth 7000*l.*, which will bring you 300*l.* per annum, and this will maintain you, with the perquisite of sponging while you are young, and when you are old will afford you a pint of port at night, two servants and an old maid, a little garden, and pen and ink—provided you live in the country. Have you no scheme either in verse or prose? The duchess should keep you at hard meat, and by that means force you to write; and so I have done with you.

Madam,—Since I began to grow old I have found all ladies become inconstant, without any reproach from their conscience. If I wait on you, I declare that one of your women (whichever it is that has designs upon a chaplain) must be my nurse, if I happen to be sick or peevish at your house; and in that case you must suspend your domineering claim till I recover. Your omitting the usual appendix to Mr. Gay's letters has done me infinite mischief here; for while you continued them you would wonder how civil the ladies here were to me, and how much they have altered since. I dare not confess that I have descended so low as to write to your grace, after the abominable neglect you have been guilty of; for if they but suspected it I should lose them all. One of them, who had but an inkling of the matter, (your grace will hardly believe it,) refused to beg my pardon upon her knees for once neglecting to make my rice-milk. Pray, consider this, and do your duty, or dread the consequence. I promise you shall have your will six minutes every hour at Amesbury, and seven in London, while I am in health: but if I happen to be sick I must govern to a second. Yet, properly speaking, there is no man alive with so much truth and respect your grace's most obedient and devoted servant,

Jonathan Swift.

FROM THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY AND MR. GAY.

THE DUCHESS.

July 18, 1731.

You are my dear friend, I am sure, for you are hard to be found: that you are so is certainly owing to some evil genius. For if you say true, this is the very properest place you can repair to. There is not a head here upon any of our shoulders that is not at some times worse than yours can possibly be at the worst; and not one to compare with yours when at best, except your friends are your sworn liars. So in one respect at least you will find things just as they could be wished. It is further necessary to assure you that the duchess is neither healthy nor young; she lives in all the spirits she can, and with as little grandeur as she can possibly. She too, as well as you, can scold and command; but she can be silent and obey if she pleases; and then for a good nurse, it is out of dispute that she must prove an excellent one, who has been so experienced in the infirmities of others and of her own. As for talking nonsense, provided you do it on purpose, she has no objection: there is some sense in nonsense, when it does not come by chance. In short, I am very sure that she has set her heart upon seeing you at this place. Here are women enough to attend you, if you should happen not to approve of her. She has not one fine lady belonging to her or her house. She is impatient to be governed, and is cheerfully determined that you shall quietly enjoy your own will and pleasure as long as ever you please.

MR. GAY.

You shall ride, you shall walk, and she will be glad to follow your example: and this will be doing good at the same time to her and yourself. I had not heard from you so long, that I was in fears about you, and in the utmost impatience for a letter. I had flattered myself your lawsuit was at an end, and that your own money was in your own pocket; and about a month ago I was every day expecting a summons to Bristol. Your money is either getting or losing something; for I have placed it in the funds. For I am grown so much a man of business, that is to say, so covetous, that I cannot bear to let a sum of money lie idle. Your friend Mrs. Howard is now countess of Suffolk. I am still so much a dupe that I think you mistake her. Come to Amesbury, and you and I will dispute this matter; and the duchess will be judge. But I fancy you will object against her; for I will be so fair to you as to own that I think she is of my side; but in short, you shall choose any impartial referee you please. I have heard from her; Mr. Pope has seen her; I beg you would suspend your judgment till we talk over this affair together; for I fancy by your letter you have neither heard from her nor seen her; so that you cannot at present be as good a judge as we are. I will be a dupe for you at any time: therefore I beg it of you that you would let me be a dupe in quiet.

As you have had several attacks of the giddiness you at present complain of, and that it has formerly left you, I will hope that at this instant you are perfectly well; though my fears were so very great before I received your letter, that I may probably flatter myself, and think you better than you are. As to my being a manager for the duke, you have been misinformed. Upon the discharge of an unjust steward, he took the administration into his own hands. I own, I was called in to his assistance, when the state of affairs was in the greatest confusion. Like an ancient Roman, I came, put my helping hand to set affairs right, and as soon as it was done I am retired again as a private man.

THE DUCHESS.

What you imagined you heard her say was a good deal in her style: it was a thousand to one she had said so; but I must do her the justice to say that she did not either in thought or word. I am sure she wants to be better acquainted with you; for which she has found out ten thousand reasons, that we will tell you if you will come.

MR. GAY.

By your letter I cannot guess whether we are likely to see you or not. Why might not the Amesbury Downs make you better?

THE DUCHESS.

Dear Sir,—Mr. Gay tells me I must write you his line for fear of taking up too much room. It was his fault that I omitted my duty in his last letter, for he never told me one word of writing to you till he had sent away his letter. However, as a mark of my great humility, I shall be ready and glad to ask your pardon upon my knees as soon as ever you come, though not in fault. I own this is a little mean-spirited; which I hope will not make a bad impression, considering you are the occasion. I submit to all your conditions; so pray, come; for I have not only promised myself, but Mr. Gay also, the satisfaction to hear you talk as much nonsense as you can possibly utter.

MR. GAY.

You will read in the Gazette of a friend of yours who has lately had the dignity of being disgraced;[a] for he, and everybody, except five or six, look upon it in the same light. I know, were you here, you would congratulate him upon it. I paid the twelve pounds to Mrs. Launcelot, for the uses you directed. I have no scheme at present, either to raise my fame or fortune. I daily reproach myself for my idleness. You know one cannot write when one will. I think and reject: one day or other, perhaps, I may think on something that may engage me to write. You and I are alike in one particular, I wish to be so in many; I mean, that we hate to write upon other folks' hints. I love to have my own scheme, and to treat it in my own way. This, perhaps, may be taking too much upon myself, and I may make a bad choice; but I can always enter into a scheme of my own with more ease and pleasure than into that of any other body. I long to see you; I long to hear from you: I wish you health; I wish you happiness; and I should be very happy myself to be witness that you enjoyed my wishes.

TO MR. POPE.

July 20, 1731.

Dear Sir,—I wrote you a long letter not many days ago, which therefore did not arrive until after your last that I received yesterday, with the enclosed from me to the queen. You hinted something of this in a former letter: I will tell you sincerely how the affair stands. I never was at Mrs. Barber's house in my life, except once that I chanced to pass by her shop, was desired to walk in, and went no farther, nor stayed three minutes. Dr. Delany has been long her protector; and he, being many years my acquaintance, desired my good offices for her, and brought her several times to the deanery. I knew she was poetically given, and, for a woman, had a sort of genius that way. She appeared very modest and pious, and I believe was sincere, and wholly turned to poetry. I did conceive her journey to England was on the score of her trade, being a woollen-draper, until Dr. Delaney said she had a design of printing her poems by subscription, and desired I would befriend her; which I did, chiefly by your means; the doctor still urging me on: upon whose request I wrote to her two or three times, because she thought that my countenancing her might be of use. Lord Carteret very much befriended her, and she seems to have made her way not ill. As for those three letters you mention, supposed all to be written by me to the queen on Mrs. Barber's account, especially the letter which bears my name, I can only say that the apprehensions one may be apt to have of a friend's doing a foolish thing is an effect of kindness: and God knows who is free from playing the fool some time or other. But in such a degree as to write to the queen, who has used me ill without any cause, and to write in such a manner as the letter you sent me, and in such a style, and to have so much zeal for one almost a stranger, and to make such a description of a woman as to prefer her before all mankind; and to instance it as one of the greatest grievances of Ireland that her majesty has not encouraged Mrs. Barber, a woollen-draper's wife, declined in the world, because she has a knack at versifying; was to suppose or fear a folly so transcendant that no man could be guilty of who was not fit for Bedlam. You know the letter you sent enclosed is not my hand; and why I should disguise, and yet sign my name, should seem unaccountable: especially when I am taught, and have reason to believe, that I am under the queen's displeasure on many accounts, and one very late, for having fixed up a stone over the burying-place of the duke of Schomberg, in my cathedral: which, however, I was assured by a worthy person, who solicited that affair last summer with some relations of the duke, "that her majesty, on hearing the matter, said they ought to erect a monument." Yet I am told assuredly, that the king, not long ago, on the representation and complaint of the Prussian envoy, (with a hard name,) who has married a grand-daughter of the duke, said publicly in the drawing-room "that I had put up that stone out of malice, to raise a quarrel between his majesty and the king of Prussia." This perhaps may be false, because it is absurd: for I thought it was a Whiggish action to honour duke Schomberg, who was so instrumental in the revolution, and was stadtholder of Prussia, and otherwise in the service of that electorate, which is now a kingdom. You will observe the letter sent me concluded "your majesty's loyal subject;" which is absolutely absurd; for we are only subjects to the king, and so is her majesty herself. I have had the happiness to be known to you above twenty years; and I appeal whether you have known me to exceed the common indiscretions of mankind; or that, when I conceived myself to have been so very ill-used by her majesty, whom I never attend but on her own commands, I should turn solicitor to her for Mrs. Barber? If the queen had not an inclination to think ill of me, she knows me too well to believe in her own heart that I should be such a coxcomb. I am pushed by that unjust suspicion to give up so much of my discretion as to write next post to my lady Suffolk on this occasion, and to desire she will show what I write to the queen; although I have as much reason to complain of her as of her majesty, upon the score of her pride and negligence, which make her fitter to be an Irish lady than an English one. You told me "she complained that I did not write to her;" when I did, upon your advice, and a letter that required an answer, she wanted the civility to acquit herself. I shall not be less in the favour of God, or the esteem of my friends, for either of their majesties' hard thoughts, which they only take up from misrepresentations. The first time I saw the queen, I took occasion, upon the subject of Mr. Gay, to complain of that very treatment which innocent persons often receive from princes and great ministers, that they too easily receive bad impressions; and although they are demonstrably convinced that those impressions had no grounds, yet they will never shake them off. This I said upon Sir Robert Walpole's treatment of Mr. Gay about a libel; and the queen fell entirely in with me, yet now falls into the same error. As to the letter[a] * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * of accidents, and out of perfect commiseration, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE COUNTESS OF SUFFOLK.

July 24, 1731.

MADAM,—I give you joy of your new title, and of the consequences it may have, or hath had, on your rising at court, whereof I know nothing but by common fame; for, you remember how I prophesied of your behaviour, when you should come to be a great lady, at the time I drew your character; and hope you have kept it. I wrote to you some time ago, by the advice of Mr. Pope: I wrote to you civilly; but you did not answer my letter, although you were not then a countess; and if you were, your neglect was so much the worse; for your title has not increased your value with me, and your conduct must be very good if it will not lessen you. Neither should you have heard from me now if it were not on a particular occasion. I find, from several instances, that I am under the queen's displeasure; and, as it is usual among princes, without any manner of reason. I am told there were three letters sent to her majesty in relation to one Mrs. Barber, who is now in London and soliciting for a subscription to her poems. It seems the queen thinks that these letters were written by me: and I scorn to defend myself even to her majesty, grounding my scorn upon the opinion I had of her justice, her taste, and good sense; especially when the last of those letters, whereof I have just received the original from Mr. Pope, was signed with my name: and why I should disguise my hand, which you know very well, and yet write my name, is both ridiculous and unaccountable. Last post I wrote my whole sentiments on the matter to Mr. Pope, who tells me, "that you and he vindicated me on all the three letters;" which, indeed, was but bare justice in you both, for he is my old friend, and you are in my debt on account of the esteem I had for you. I desire you would ask the queen, "whether, since the time I had the honour to be known to her, I ever did one single action, or said one single word, to disoblige her?" I never asked her for anything: and you well know that when I had an intention to go to France, about the time that the late king died, I desired your opinion (not as you were a courtier) whether I should go or not: and that you absolutely forbid me, as a thing that would look disaffected, and for other reasons, wherein, I confess, I was your dupe as well as somebody's else: and, for want of that journey, I fell sick, and was forced to return hither to my unenvied home. I hear the queen has blamed me for putting a stone, with a Latin inscription, over the duke of Schomberg's burying-place in my cathedral; and that the king said publicly I had done it in malice, to create a quarrel between him and the king of Prussia. But the public prints, as well as the thing itself, will vindicate me: and the hand the duke had in the revolution made him deserve the best monument. Neither could the king of Prussia justly take it ill, who must needs have heard that the duke was in the service of Prussia, and stadtholder of it, as I have seen in his titles. The first time I saw the queen I talked to her largely upon the conduct of princes and great ministers, (it was on a particular occasion,) that when they receive an ill account of any person, although they afterward have the greatest demonstration of the falsehood, yet will they never be reconciled. And although the queen fell in with me upon the hardship of such a proceeding, yet now she treats me exactly in the same manner. I have faults enough, but never was guilty of any either to her majesty or to you; and as little to the king, whom I never saw but when I had the honour to kiss his hand. I am sensible that I owe a great deal of this usage to sir Robert Walpole; whom yet I never offended, although he was pleased to quarrel with me very unjustly: for which I showed not the least resentment, (whatever I might have in my heart,) nor was ever a partaker with those who have been battling with him for some years past. I am contented that the queen should see this letter; and would please to consider how severe a censure it is to believe I should write three to her, only to find fault with her ministry, and recommend Mrs. Barber, whom I never knew until she was recommended to me by a worthy friend, to help her to subscribers, which, by her writings, I thought she deserved. Her majesty gave me leave, and even commanded me, above five years ago, if I lived until she was queen, to write to her on behalf of Ireland: for the miseries of this kingdom she appeared then to be much concerned. I desired the friend who introduced me to be a witness of her majesty's promise. Yet that liberty I never took, although I had too many occasions; and is it not wonderful that I should be suspected of writing to her in such a style, in such a counterfeit hand, and my name subscribed, upon a perfect trifle, at the same time that I well knew myself to be very much out of her majesty's good graces? I am, perhaps, not so very much awed with majesty as others, having known courts more or less from my early youth. And I have more than once told the queen that I did not regard her station half so much as the good understanding I heard and found to be in her; neither did I ever once see the late king, although her majesty was pleased to chide me on that account for my singularity. In this I am a good Whig, by thinking it sufficient to be a dutiful subject, without any personal regard for princes, farther than as their virtues deserve; and upon that score had a most particular respect for the queen, your mistress. One who asks nothing may talk with freedom; and that is my case. I have not said half that was in my heart, but I will have done: and, remembering that you are a countess, will borrow so much ceremony as to remain, with great respect, madam, your ladyship's most obedient and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

August 2, 1731.

I AM indebted to you, my reverend dean, for a letter of a very old date; the expectation of seeing you from week to week, which our friend Gay made me entertain, hindered me from writing to you a good while;

[a] Here the paper is accidentally torn. There seem to be wanting eight small quarto lines, which conclude with those few words on the back of the page, which follow the asterisks and I have since deferred it by waiting an opportunity of sending my letter by a safe hand. That opportunity presents itself at last, and Mr. Echlin will put this letter into your hands. You will hear from him and from others of the general state of things in this country, into which I returned, and where I am confined for my sins. If I entertained the notion which, by the way, I believe to be much older than popery, or even than christianity, of making up an account with Heaven, and demanding the balance in bliss, or paying it by good works and sufferings of my own, and by the merits and sufferings of others, I should imagine that I had expiated all the faults of my life one way or other, since my return into England, ... the circumstances of my situation which have afflicted me most, and which afflicts me still so, ... absolute inutility I am of to those whom I should be the best pleased to serve. Success in serving my friends would make me amends for the want of it in disserving my enemies. It is intolerable to want it in both, and yet both go together generally.

I have had two or three projects on foot for making such an establishment here as might tempt you to quit Ireland. One of them would have succeeded, and would have been agreeable in every respect, if engagements to my lady's kinsman (who did not, I suppose, deserve to be your clerk) had not prevented it. Another of them cannot take place without the consent of those who would rather have you a dean in Ireland than a parish priest in England; and who are glad to keep you where your sincere friend, my late lord Oxford, sent you. A third was wholly in my power; but when I inquired exactly into the value I found it less than I had believed; the distance from these parts was great; and beside all this, an unexpected and groundless dispute about the right of presentation (but still such a dispute as the law must determine) had arisen. You will please to believe that I mention these things for no other reason than to show you how much those friends deserve you should make them a visit at least, who are so desirous to settle you among them. I hope their endeavours will not be always unsuccessful.

I received some time ago a letter from Dr. Delany, and very lately Mr. Pope sent me some sheets, which seem to contain the substance of the sermons of that gentleman's. The philosophia prima is above my reach, and especially when it attempts to prove that God has done or does so and so, by attempting to prove that doing so and so is essential to his attributes or necessary to his design; and that the not doing so and so would be inconsistent with the former or repugnant to the latter. I content myself to contemplate what I am sure he has done, and to adore him for it in humble silence. I can demonstrate that every cavil which has been brought against the great system of the world, physical and moral, from the days of Democritus and Epicurus to this day, is absurd; but I dare not pronounce why things are made as they are, state the ends of infinite wisdom, and show the proportion of the means.[a]

Dr. Delany, in his letter to me, mentioned some errors in the critical parts of learning which he hoped he had corrected by showing the mistakes, particularly of sir John Marsham, on whose authority those errors were built. Whether I can be of use to him even in this part I know not; for having fixed my opinion long ago concerning all ancient history and chronology, by a careful examination into the first principles of them, I have ever since laid that study totally aside. I confess, in the letter I wrote lately to the doctor, notwithstanding my great respect for sir John Marsham, that his authority is often precarious, because he leans often on other authorities which are so. But to you I will confess a little more: I think, nay, I know, that there is no possibility of making any system of that kind without doing the same thing; and that the defect is in the subject, not in the writer. I have read the writings of some who differ from him, and of others who undertook particularly to refute him. It seems plain to me that this was the case. All the materials of this sort of learning are disjointed and broken. Time has contributed to render them so, and the unfaithfulness of those who have transmitted them down to us, particularly of that vile fellow Eusebius,[a] has done even more than time itself. By throwing these fragments into a different order, by arbitrary interpretations (and it is often impossible to make any others), in short, by a few plausible guesses for the connection and application of them, a man may, with tolerable ingenuity, prove almost anything by them. I tried formerly to prove, in a learned dissertation, by the same set of authorities, that there had been four Assyrian monarchies; that there had been but three; that there had been but two; that there had been but one; and that there never had been any. I puzzled myself and a much abler man than myself, the friend to whom I lent the manuscript, and who has, I believe, kept it. In short, I am afraid that I shall not be very useful to Dr. Delany in making remarks on the work he is about. His communication of this work may be useful, and I am sure it will be agreeable to me. If you and he are still in Ireland, pray give my best services to him; but say no more than may be proper of all I have writ to you.

I know very well the project you mean, and about which you say that Pope and you have often teazed me. I could convince you, as he is convinced, that a publication of anything of that kind would have been wrong on many accounts, and would be so even now. Besides, call it pride if you will, I shall never make, either to the present age or to posterity, any apology for the part I acted in the late queen's reign.[b] But I will apply myself very seriously to the composition of just and true relations of the events of those times in which both I and my friends and my enemies must take the merit or the blame which an authentic and impartial deduction of facts will assign to us. I will endeavour to write so as no man could write who had not been a party in those transactions, and as few men would write who had been concerned in them. I believe I shall go back, in considering the political interests of the principal powers in Europe, as far as the Pyrenean treaty; but I shall not begin a thread of history till the death of Charles II. of Spain and the accession of queen Anne to the throne of England. Nay, even from that time downward, I shall render my relations more full or piu magra (the word is father Paul's) just as I have or have not a stock of authentic materials. These shall regulate my work, and I will neither indulge my own vanity nor other men's curiosity in going one step further than they carry me. You see, my dear Swift, that I open a large field to myself; with what success I shall expatiate in it I a Yet this appears to have been the attempt of Mr Pope, in his "Essay on Man," in which he professes to have adopted lord Bolingbroke's principles—and which lord Bolingbroke, in a subsequent part of this letter, says was undertaken at his instigation; approving, at the same time, of the first three books, which he had seen and considered.

"Thou wert my guide, philosopher, and friend;"

a The learned bishop of Cæsarea, in the fourth century, in his "Chronicon," published by Joseph Scaliger, with notes, at Leyden, in 1606, folio, and reprinted at Amsterdam, with great additions to the notes, in 1658.

b This probably alludes to a tract called "Letters on the Spirit of Patriotism," of which lord Bolingbroke permitted a few copies to be taken for his particular friends, and which afterwards found its way into the world by Mr. Pope's means.

know as little as I know whether I shall live to go through so great a work; but I will begin immediately, and will make it one principal business of the rest of my life. This advantage, at least, I shall reap from it, and a great advantage it will be, my attention will be diverted from the present scene. I shall grieve less at those things which I cannot mend; I shall dignify my retreat; and shall wind up the labours of my life in serving the cause of truth.

You say that you could easily show, by comparing my letters for twenty years past, how the whole system of my philosophy changes by the several gradations of life. I doubt it. As far as I am able to recollect, my way of thinking has been uniform enough for more than twenty years. True it is, to my shame, that my way of acting has not been always conformable to my way of thinking. My own passions, and the passions and interests of other men still more, have led me aside. I launched into the deep before I had loaded ballast enough. If the ship did not sink, the cargo was thrown overboard. The storm itself threw me into port. My own opinion, my own desires would have kept me there; the opinion, the desires of others sent me to sea again. I did, and blamed myself for doing what others, and you among the rest, would have blamed me if I had not done. I have paid more than I owed to party, and as much, at least, as was due to friendship. If I go off the stage of public life without paying all I owe to my enemies, and to the enemies of my country, I do assure you the bankruptcy is not fraudulent. I conceal none of my effects.

Does Pope talk to you of the noble work which, at my instigation, he has begun in such a manner that he must be convinced by this time I judged better of his talents than he did? The first epistle, which considers man, and the habitation of man, relatively to the whole system of universal being: the second, which considers him in his own habitation, in himself, and relatively to his particular system: and the third, which shows how—how man, and beast, and vegetables are linked in a mutual dependency, parts necessary to each other, and necessary to the whole; how human societies were formed; from what spring true religion and true policy are derived; how God has made our greatest interest and our plainest duty indivisibly the same:—these three epistles, I say, are finished. The fourth he is now intent upon. It is a noble subject; he pleads the cause of God, I use Seneca's expression, against that famous charge which atheists in all ages have brought, the supposed unequal dispensations of Providence; a charge which I cannot heartily forgive your divines for admitting.[a] You admit it indeed for an extreme good purpose, and you build on this admission the necessity of a future state of rewards and punishments. But what if you should find that this future state will not account, in opposition to the atheist, for God's justice in the present state,[a] which you give up? Would it not have been better to defend God's justice in this world, against these daring men, by irrefragable reasons, and to have rested the proof of the other point on revelation? I do not like concessions made against demonstration, repair or supply them how you will. The epistles I have mentioned will compose a first book; the plan of the second is settled. You will not understand by what I have said that Pope will go so deep into the argument, or carry it so far as I have hinted.

> - A universal cause
> Works to one end, but works by various laws,

You inquire so kindly after my wife that I must tell you something of her. She has fallen upon a remedy, invented by a surgeon abroad, and which has had great success in cases similar to hers. This remedy has visibly attacked the original cause of all her complaints, and has abated, in some degree, by one gentle and uniform effect, all the grievous and various symptoms. I hope, and surely with reason, that she will receive still greater benefit from this method of cure, which she will resume as soon as the great heat is over. If she recovers, I shall not for her sake abstract myself from the world more than I do at present in this place. But if she should be taken from me, I should most certainly yield to that strong desire which I have long had of secluding myself totally from the company and affairs of mankind; of leaving the management even of my private affairs to others; and of securing by these means for the rest of my life an uninterrupted tenour of philosophical quiet.

I suppose you have seen some of those volumes of scurrility which have been thrown into the world against Mr. Pulteney and myself, and the "Craftsman," which gave occasion to them. I think, and it is the sense of all my friends, that the person who published the "Final Answer,"[b] took a right turn in a very nice and very provoking circumstance. To answer all the falsities, misrepresentations, and blunders which a club of such scoundrels as Arnall, Concanen, and other pensioners of the minister crowd together, would have been equally tedious and ridiculous, and must have forced several things to be said neither prudent, nor decent, nor perhaps strictly honourable to be said. To have explained some points and to have stopped at others would have given strength to that impertinent suggestion. Guilt alone is silent in the day of inquiry. It was therefore right to open no part of the scene of the late queen's reign, nor submit the passages of her administration, and the conduct of any of her ministers to the examination of so vile a tribunal. This was still the more right because, upon such points as relate to subsequent transactions, and as affect me singly, what the "Craftsman" had said was justified unanswerably, and what the remarker had advanced was proved to be infamously false. The effect of this paper has answered the design of it, and, which is not common, all sides agree that the things said ought to have been said. The public writers seem to be getting back from these personal altercations to national affairs, much against [a] To prove that the dispensations of Providence in the present state are not unequal is certainly very desirable, but there is reason to fear that those who blame divines for admitting an inequality have not succeeded in the attempt. The philosophers both ancient and modern, who have endeavoured to justify the ways of God to man, by proving that happiness does not consist in externals, in order to show that his dispensations are equal, have yet placed happiness in virtue chiefly, as a principle of active benevolence.

> "Happier as kinder in each due degree,
> And height of bliss but height of charity."

Now there seems to be an inconsistency between these two principles, of which they are not aware.

It may reasonably be asked what virtue, as a principle of active benevolence, has to bestow? Can it bestow upon others anything more than externals? If not, it either has not the power of communicating happiness, or happiness is to be communicated in externals. If it has not the power of communicating happiness, it is indeed a mere name, the subject receives nothing: the agent gives nothing. The bliss of charity is founded on a delusion; on the false supposition of a benefit communicated by externals, which externals cannot communicate. If happiness can be communicated by externals, and consequently is dependent upon them, and these externals are unequally distributed, how is the dispensation of Providence with respect to happiness in the present state equal?

[a] That is, will not reconcile the present unequal dispensation to the divine justice.

[b] This pamphlet was written by lord Bolingbroke in his own vindication, 1731. It is intitled, "A Final Answer to the Remarks on the 'Craftsman's' Vindication of his two honourable Patrons, and to all the Libels which have come or may come from the same Quarter against the Person last mentioned in the 'Craftsman' of 22nd of May."

the grain of the minister's faction. What the effect of all this writing will be I know not; but this I know, that when all the information which can be given is given; when all the spirit which can be raised is raised; it is to no purpose to write any more. Even you men of this world have nothing else to do but to let the ship drive till she is cast away, or till the storm is over. For my own part, I am neither an owner, an officer, nor a foremast-man. I am but a passenger, said my lord Carbury.

It is well for you I am got to the end of my paper, for you might else have a letter as long again from me. If you answer me by the post, remember while you are writing that you write by the post. Adieu, my reverend friend.

TO MR. GAY AND THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

August 28, 1731.

You and the duchess use me very ill, for I profess I cannot distinguish the style or the hand-writing of either. I think her grace writes more like you than herself; and that you write more like her grace than yourself. I could swear the beginning of your letter writ by the duchess, though it is to pass for yours; because there is a cursed lie in it, that she is neither young nor healthy, and besides, it perfectly resembles the part she owns. I will likewise swear that what I must suppose is written by the duchess is your hand; and thus I am puzzled and perplexed between you, but I will go on in the innocency of my own heart. I am got eight miles from our famous metropolis to a country parson's, to whom I lately gave a city living such as an English chaplain would leap at. I retired thither for the public good, having two great works in hand:[a] one to reduce the whole politeness, wit, humour, and style of England into a short system for the use of all persons of quality, and particularly the maids of honour. The other is of almost equal importance; I may call it the whole duty of servants, in about twenty several stations, from the steward and waiting-woman down to the scullion and pantry-boy. I believe no mortal had ever such fair invitations as, to be happy in the best company of England. I wish I had liberty to print your letter with my own comments upon it. There was a fellow in Ireland who, from a shoe-boy, grew to be several times one of the chief governors, wholly illiterate, and with hardly common sense; a lord-lieutenant told the first king George that he was the greatest subject he had in both kingdoms; and truly this character was gotten and preserved by his never appearing in England, which was the only wise thing he ever did, except purchasing 16,000*l*. a-year—why, you need not stare; it is easily applied; I must be absent in order to preserve my credit with her grace—Lo, here comes in the duchess again (I know her by her d d's, but am a fool for discovering my art,) to defend herself against my conjecture of what she said. —Madam, I will imitate your grace, and write to you upon the same line. I own it is a base unromantic spirit in me to suspend the honour of waiting at your grace's feet till I can finish a paltry lawsuit. It concerns, indeed, almost all my whole fortune; it is equal to half Mr. Pope's, and two-thirds of Mr. Gay's, and about six weeks' rent of your grace's. This cursed accident has drilled away the whole summer. But, madam, understand one thing, that I take all your ironical civilities in a literal sense, and whenever I have the honour to attend you, shall expect them to be literally performed; though perhaps I shall find it hard to prove your hand-writing in a court of justice; but that will not be much for your credit. How miserably has your grace been mistaken in thinking to avoid envy by running into exile, where it haunts you more than ever it did even at court? Non te civitas, non regia domus in exilium miserunt, sed tu utrasque. So says Cicero (as your grace knows), or so he might have said.

I am told that the "Craftsman" in one of his papers, is offended with the publishers of (I suppose) the last edition of the "Dunciad;" and I was asked whether you and Mr. Pope were as good friends to the new disgraced person as formerly? This I knew nothing of, but suppose it was the consequence of some mistake. As to writing, I look on you just in the prime of life for it, the very season when judgment and invention draw together. But schemes are perfectly accidental;[a] some will appear barren of hints and matter but prove to be fruitful; and others the contrary; and what you say is past doubt, that every one can best find hints for himself; though it is possible that sometimes a friend may give you a lucky one just suited to your own imagination. But all this is almost past with me; my invention and judgment are perpetually at fisty-cuffs, till they have quite disabled each other; and the merest trifles I ever wrote are serious philosophical lucubrations in comparison to what I now busy myself about; as (to speak in the author's phrase) the world may one day see.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

Drayton, September 7, 1731.

To show how strictly I obey your orders, I came from the duchess of Dorset's county-house to my own, where I have rid and walked as often as the weather permitted me. Nor am I very nice in that; for, if you remember, I was not bred up very tenderly, nor a fine lady; for which I acknowledge myself exceedingly obliged to my parents; for had I had that sort of education, I should not have been so easy and happy as I thank God I now am. As to the gout, indeed, I believe I do derive it from my ancestors; but I may forgive even that, since it waited upon me no sooner; and especially since I see my elder and two younger brothers so terribly plagued with it; so that I am now the only wine drinker in my family; and upon my word I am not increased in that since you first knew me.

I am sorry you are involved in lawsuits; it is the thing I most fear. I wish you had met with as complaisant an adversary as I did; for my lord Peterborough plagued sir John[b] all his life-time; but declared if ever he gave the estate to me, he would have done with it; and accordingly has kept his word like an honourable man. I saw Mrs. Barber the day before I came out of town, and should be mighty glad to serve her; but cannot say so much by her husband, whom, for her sake, I recommended to the duke of Dorset to buy his liveries of. The first thing he did was to ask a greater price than anybody else; and when we were at Whitchurch, where I attended their graces, he was informed he had not cloth enough in his shop, and he feared they would not be ready against he came over.

I hope in God I shall soon hear of their safe landing;[c] and I do not question the people of Ireland's liking them as well as they deserve. I desire no better for them; for, if you do not spoil him there, which I think he has too good sense to let happen, he is the most worthy, honest, good-natured, great-souled man that ever was born. As to my duchess, she is so reserved that perhaps she may not be at first so much admired; but, upon knowledge, I will defy anybody upon earth with sense, judgment, and good nature, not only not to admire her, but must love and esteem her as much as I do, and every one else; that is really acquainted with her. You know him a little; so for his own sake you must like him: and till you are better acquainted with them both, I hope you will like them for mine. Your friend Biddy [Biddy Floyd] is just the same as she was; laughs sedately and makes a joke slily. And I am, as I ever was, and hope I ever shall be, your most sincere friend and faithful humble servant,

E. GERMAIN.

TO MR. GAY AND THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

September 10, 1731.

If your ramble was on horseback, I am glad of it on account of your health: but I know your arts of patching up a journey between stage-coaches and friends' coaches; for you are as arrant a cockney as any hosier in Cheapside. One clean shirt with two cravats, and as many handkerchiefs, make up your equipage; and as for night-gown, it is clear from Homer that Agamemnon rose without one. I have often had it in my head to put it into yours, that you ought to have some great work in scheme, which may take up seven years to finish, beside two or three under ones that may add another 1000*l.* to your stock; and then I shall be in less pain about you. I know you can find dinners, but you love twelvepenny coaches too well without considering that the interest of a whole 1000*l.* brings you but half-a-crown a-day. I find a greater longing than ever to come among you; and reason good when I am teased with dukes and duchesses for a visit, all my demands complied with, and all excuses cut off. You remember "O happy Don Quixote! queens held his horse, and duchesses pulled off his armour," or something to that purpose. He was a mean-spirited fellow; I can say ten times more: O happy, &c., such a duchess was designed to attend him, and such a duke invited him to command his palace. Nam istos reges ceteros memorare nolo, hominum mendicabula: go read your Plautus, and observe Strobilus vapouring after he had found the pot of gold. I will have nothing to do with that lady: I have long hated her on your account, and the more because you are so forgiving as not to hate her: however, she has good qualities enough to make her esteemed; but not one grain of feeling. I only wish she were a fool. I have been several months writing near five hundred lines on a pleasant subject, only to tell what my friends and enemies will say on me after I am dead.[a] I shall finish it soon, for I add two lines every week, and blot out four and alter eight. I have brought in you and my other friends, as well as enemies and detractors. It is a great comfort to see how corruption and ill conduct are instrumental in uniting virtuous persons and lovers of their country of all denominations: Whig and Tory, high and low church, as soon as they are left to think freely, all joining in opinion. If this be disaffection, pray God send me always among the disaffected! and I heartily wish you joy of your scurvy treatment at Court, which has given you leisure to cultivate both public and private virtue; neither of them likely to be soon met within the walls of St. James's or Westminster. But I must here dismiss you, that I may pay my acknowledgments to the duke for the great honour he has done me.

MY LORD,—I could have sworn that my pride would be always able to preserve me from vanity; of which I have been in great danger to be guilty for some months past, first by the conduct of my lady duchess, and now by that of your grace, which had like to finish the work: and I should have certainly gone about showing my letter under the charge of secrecy to every blab of my acquaintance, if I could have the least hope of prevailing on any of them to believe that a man in so obscure a corner, quite thrown out of the present world and within a few steps of the next, should receive such condescending invitations from two such persons to whom he is an utter stranger, and who know no more of him than what they have heard by the partial representations of a friend. But in the mean time I must desire your grace not to flatter yourself that I waited for your consent to accept the invitation. I must be ignorant indeed not to know that the duchess, ever since you met, has been most politically employed in increasing those forces and sharpening those arms with which she subdued you at first, and to which, the braver and wiser you grow, you will more and more submit. Thus I knew myself on the secure side, and it was a mere piece of good manners to insert that clause, of which you have taken the advantage. But as I cannot forbear of informing your grace that the duchess's great secret in her art of government has been to reduce both your wills into one; so I am content, in due observance to the forms of the world, to return my most humble thanks to your grace for so great a favour as you are pleased to offer me, and which nothing but impossibilities shall prevent me from receiving, since I am with the greatest reason, truth, and respect, my lord, your grace's most obedient, &c.

MADAM,—I have consulted all the learned in occult sciences of my acquaintance, and have sat up eleven nights to discover the meaning of those two hieroglyphic lines in your grace's hand at the bottom of the last Amesbury latter, but all in vain. Only it is agreed hat the language is Coptic, and a very profound Behmist assures me the style is poetic, containing an invitation from a very great person of the female sex to a strange kind of man whom she never saw, and this is all I can find, which, after so many former invitations, will ever confirm me in that respect, wherewith I am, madam, your grace's most obedient, &c. FROM THE COUNTESS OF SUFFOLK.[a]

Hampton Court, September 25, 1731.

SIR,—You seem to think that you have a natural right to abuse me because I am a woman and a courtier. I have taken it as a woman and as a courtier ought, with great resentment, and a determined resolution of revenge. The number of letters that have been sent, and thought by many to be yours, (and thank God they were all silly ones,) has been a fair field to execute it. Think of my joy to hear you suspected of folly; think of my pleasure when I entered the list for your justification! Indeed I was a little disconcerted to find Mr. Pope took the same side; for I would have had the man of wit, the dignified divine, the Irish drapier, have found no friend but the silly woman and the courtier. Could I have preserved myself alone in the list, I should not have despaired, that this monitor of princes, this Irish patriot, this excellent man at speech and pen, should have closed the scene under suspicion of having a violent passion for Mrs. Barber; and lady M—[b] or Mrs. Haywood[c] have writ the progress of it. Now, to my mortification, I find everybody inclined to think you had no hand in writing those letters; but I every day thank Providence that there is an epitaph in St. Patrick's cathedral,[d] that will be a lasting monument of your imprudence. I cherish this extremely: for, say a Three letters recommending Mrs. Barber (the wife of a tradesman in Ireland who had failed) to the queen, in order to forward a subscription for some poems, were forged in the dean's name, and sent to her majesty. The dean wrote an account of the fraud, and a justification of himself, to the countess of Suffolk, July 24, 1731, to which this is an answer.

b Probably lady Mary Wortley Montague.

c Mrs. Haywood, a well-known writer of scandal in novels.

d On the duke of Schomberg, often mentioned in this correspondence what you can to justify it, I am convinced I shall as easily argue the world into the belief of a courtier's sincerity as you (with all your wit and eloquence) will be able to convince mankind of the prudence of that action. I expect to hear if peace shall ensue, or war continue between us. If I know but little of the art of war, yet you see I do not want courage; and that has made many an ignorant soldier fight successfully. Besides I have a numerous body of light-armed troops to bring into the field, who, when single, may be as inconsiderable as a Lilliputian, yet ten thousand of them embarrassed captain Gulliver. If you send honourable articles they shall be signed. I insist that you own that you have been unjust to me; for I have never forgot you; for I have made others send my compliments, because I was not able to write myself. If I cannot justify the advice I gave you, from the success of it, I gave you my reasons for it: and it was your business to have judged of my capacity by the solidity of my arguments. If the principle was false, you ought not to have acted upon it. So you have been only the dupe of your own ill judgment, and not my falsehood. Am I to send back the crown and the plaid well packed up in my own character? or am I to follow my own inclination, and continue very truly and very much your humble servant, H. SUFFOLK.

TO SIR CHARLES WOGAN *

SIR,—I received your packet at least two months ago, and took all this time not only to consider maturely myself, but to show it to the few judicious friends I have in this kingdom. We all agreed that the writer was a scholar, a man of genius and of honour. We guessed him to have been born in this country, from some passages; but not from the style which we were surprised to find so correct, in an exile, a soldier, and a native of Ireland. The history of yourself, although part of it be employed in your praise and importance, we did not dislike, because your intention was to be wholly unknown; which circumstance exempts you from any charge of vanity. However, although I am utterly ignorant of present persons and things, I have made a shift, by talking in general with some persons, to find out your name, your employments, and some of your actions, with the addition of such a character as would give full credit to more than you have said (I mean of yourself) in the dedicatory epistle.

You will pardon a natural curiosity on this occasion, especially when I began with so little, that I did not so much as untie the strings of the bag for five days after I received it, concluding it must come from some Irish friar in Spain, filled with monastic speculations, of which I have seen some in my life; little expecting a history, a dedication, a poetical translation of the penitential psalms, Latin poems, and the like, and all from a soldier. In these kingdoms you would be a most unfashionable military man among troops where the least pretension to learning, or piety, or common morals would endanger the owner to be cashiered. Although I have no regard for your trade, from the judgment I make of those who profess it in these kingdoms, yet I cannot but highly esteem those gentlemen of Ireland, who with all the disadvantages of being exiles and strangers, have been able to distinguish themselves by their valour and conduct in so many parts of Europe, I think, above all other nations; which ought to make the English ashamed of the reproaches they cast on the ignorance, the dulness, and the want of courage in the Irish natives; those defects, wherever they happen, arising only from the poverty and slavery they suffer from their inhuman neighbours, and the base corrupt spirits of too many of the chief gentry, &c. By such events as these, the very Grecians are grown slavish, ignorant, and superstitious. I do assert, that from several experiments I have made in travelling over both kingdoms I have found the poor cottagers here, who could speak our language, to have a much better natural taste for good sense, humour, and raillery, than ever I observed among people of the like sort in England. But the millions of oppressions they lie under, the tyranny of their landlords, the ridiculous zeal of their priests and the general misery of the whole nation, have been enough to damp the best spirits under the sun. I return to your packet.

Two or three poetical friends of mine have read your poems with very good approbation; yet we all agree some corrections may be wanting, and at the same time we are at a loss how to venture on such a work. One gentleman of your own country, name, and family, who could do it best, is a little too lazy; but, however, something shall be done, and submitted to you. I have been only a man of rhymes, and that upon trifles; never having written serious couplets in my life; yet never any without a moral view. However, as an admirer of Milton, I will read yours as a critic, and make objections where I find anything that should be changed. Your directions about publishing the epistle and the poetry will be a point of some difficulty. They cannot be printed here with the least profit to the author's friends in distress. Dublin booksellers have not the least notion of paying for a copy. Sometimes things are printed here by subscription; but they go on so heavily, that few or none make it turn to account. In London it is otherwise; but even there the authors must be in vogue, or, if not known, be discovered by the style; or the work must be something that hits the taste of the public, or what is recommended by the presiding men of genius.

When Milton first published his famous poem, the first edition was very long going off; few either read, liked, or understood it; and it gained ground merely by its merit. Nothing but an uncertain state of my health (caused by a disposition to giddiness, which, although less violent, is more constant) could have prevented my passing this summer into England to see my friends, who hourly have expected me; in that case I could have managed this affair myself, and would have

* Mr. Wogan, a gentleman of an ancient and good family in Ireland, sent a present of a cask of Spanish Cassalia wine to the dean, also a green velvet bag, with gold and silk strings, in which were enclosed a paraphrase, in Miltonic verse on the seven penitential Psalms of David, and several original pieces in verse and prose, particularly the "Adventures of Eugenius," and an "Account of the Courtship and Marriage of the Chevalier to the Princess Sobieski," wherein he represents himself to have been a principal negotiator; it was written in the novel style, but a little heavily. His letter to the dean contained also remarks on the "Beggar's Opera," in which he censures the taste of the people of England and Ireland; and concluded with paying the dean the compliment of entreating him to correct his writings. The dean receiving them about the time (1732) Mr Pilkington was coming to London as chaplain to alderman Barber, he put them into Mr. Pilkington's hands to look over at his leisure; but quickly recalled them into his own custody. See "Pilkington's Memoirs," vol. iii p. 168 They were afterward in possession of dean Swift • This Mr. Wogan was a gentleman of great bravery and courage, and distinguished himself in several battles and sieges He embarked in the insurrection of 1715. He was appointed by the chevalier de St. George, in the year 1718, to take the princess Sobieski (grand-daughter of the famous James Sobieski, king of Poland, who raised the siege of Vienna,) to whom he was married by proxy in Poland; who, in her journey to Rome, was, by order of the imperial court, made a prisoner in Tyrol, and closely confined in the castle of Inspruck for some time, when Mr. Wogan undertook to set her at liberty and bring her safe to Rome, which he effectually performed by carrying her through all the guards; for which dangerous and gallant service he was made a Roman knight an honour that was not conferred on a foreigner for many centuries before This gentleman soon after went into the service of Spain, where he got a government and other military commands, and distinguished himself in many engagements, being well known all over Europe by the name of chevalier or sir Charles Wogan readily consented that my name should have stood at length before your epistle; and by the caprice of the world, that circumstance might have been of use to make the thing known; and consequently better answer the charitable part of your design, by inciting people's curiosity. And in such a case I would have written a short acknowledgment of your letter, and published it in the next page after your epistle; but giving you no name, nor confessing my conjecture of it. This scheme I am still upon, as soon as my health permits me to return to England.

As I am conjectured to have generally dealt in raillery and satire both in prose and verse, if that conjecture be right, although such an opinion has been an absolute bar to my rising in the world; yet that very world must suppose that I followed what I thought to be my talent; and charitable people will suppose I had a design to laugh the follies of mankind out of countenance, and as often to lash the vices out of practice. And then it will be natural to conclude, that I have some partiality for such kind of writing, and favour it in others. I think you acknowledge that in some time of your life you turned to the rallying part; but I find at present your genius runs wholly into the grave and sublime; and therefore I find you less indulgent to my way by your dislike of the "Beggar's Opera," in the persons particularly of Polly Peachum and Macheath; whereas we think it a very severe satire upon the most pernicious villanies of mankind. And so you are in danger of quarrelling with the sentiments of Mr. Pope, Mr. Gay the author, Dr. Arbuthnot, myself, Dr. Young, and all the brethren whom we own. Dr. Young is the gravest among us, and yet his satires have many mixtures of sharp raillery.[a] At the same time you judge very truly, that the taste of England is infamously corrupted by shoals of wretches who write for their bread; and therefore, I had reason to put Mr. Pope on writing the poem called the "Dunciad;" and to hale those scoundrels out of their obscurity by telling their names at length, their works, their adventures, sometimes their lodgings and their lineage; not with A's and B's according to the old way, which would be unknown in a few years.

As to your blank verse, it has too often fallen into the same vile hands of late. One Thomson, a Scotchman, has succeeded the best in that way, in four poems he has writ on the four seasons: yet I am not over fond of them, because they are all description, and nothing is doing; whereas Milton engages me in actions of the highest importance: Modo me Romæ, modo ponit Athenis: and yours on the seven psalms, &c. have some advantages that way.

You see, Pope, Gay, and I, use all our endeavours to make folks merry and wise, and profess to have no enemies, except knaves and fools. I confess myself to be exempted fr m them in one article, which was engaging with a ministry, to prevent if possible the evils that have overrun the nation, and my foolish zeal in endeavouring to save this wretched island. Wherein though I succeeded absolutely in one important article;[b] yet even there I lost all hope of favour from those in power here, and disobliged the court of England, and have in twenty years drawn above one thousand scurrilous libels on myself, without any other recompense than the love of the Irish vulgar, and two or three dozen sign-posts of the Drapier in this city, besides those that are scattered in country towns; and even these are half worn out. So that whatever little genius God has given me, I may justly pretend to have been the worst manager of it to my own advantage of any man upon earth.

August 2.

What I have above written has long lain by me, that I might consider further: but I have been partly out of order, and partly plagued with a lawsuit of ten years' standing, and I doubt very ill closed up, although it concerns two-thirds of my little fortune. Think whether such periods of life are proper to encourage poetical or philosophical speculations.

I shall not therefore tire you any longer; but, with great acknowledgment for the distinction you please to show me, desire to be always thought, with great truth and a most particular esteem, sir, your most obedient and obliged servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

We have sometimes editions printed here of books from England, which I know not whether you are in a way of getting. I will name some below, and if you approve of any, I shall willingly increase your library; they are small, consequently more portable in your marches, and, which is more important, the present will be cheaper for me. Dr. Young's Satires, Mr. Gay's Works, Mr. Pope's Works, Pope's "Dunciad," Gay's "Fables," "Art of Politics," and some other trifles in verse, &c.

TO MR. GAY, AND THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

Dublin, October 3, 1731.

I USUALLY write to friends after a pause of a few weeks, that I may not interrupt them in better company, better thoughts, and better diversions. I believe, I have told you of a great man, who said to me, that he never once in his life received a good letter from Ireland; for which there are reasons enough without affronting our understandings. For there is not one person out of this country who regards any events that pass here, unless he has an estate or employment. I cannot tell that you or I ever gave the least provocation to the present ministry and much less to the court; and yet I am ten times more out of favour than you. For my own part, I do not see the policy of opening common letters, directed to persons generally known; for a man's understanding would be very weak to convey secrets by the post, if he knew any, which I declare I do not: and besides, I think the world is already so well informed by plain events, that I question whether the ministers have any secrets at all. Neither would I be under any apprehension if a letter should be sent me full of treason; because I cannot hinder people from writing what they please, nor sending it to me; and although it should be discovered to have been opened before it came to my hand, I would only burn it and think no further. I approve of the scheme you have to grow somewhat richer, though, I agree, you will meet with discouragements; and it is reasonable you should, considering what kind of pens are at this time only employed and encouraged. For you must allow that the bad painter was in the right, who, having painted a cock, drove away all the cocks and hens, and even the chickens, for fear those who passed by his shop might make a comparison with his work. And I will say one thing in spite of the post-officers, that since wit and learning began to be made use of in our kingdoms, they were never professedly thrown aside, contemned and punished, till within your own memory; nor dulness and ignorance ever so openly encouraged and promoted. In answer to what you say of my living among you, if I could do it to my ease: perhaps you have heard of a scheme for an exchange in Berkshire proposed by two of our friends; but, beside the difficulty of adjusting certain circumstances, it would not answer. I am at a time of life that seeks ease and independence: you will hear my reasons when you see those friends, and I concluded them with saying: that I would rather be a freeman among slaves, than a slave among freemen. The dignity of my present station damps the pertness of inferior puppies and 'squires, which, without plenty and ease on your side the Channel, would break my heart in a month.

MADAM,—See what it is to live where I do. I am utterly ignorant of that same Strado del Poe; and yet, if that author be against lending or giving money, I cannot but think him a good courtier; which I am sure your grace is not,—no not so much as to be a maid of honour. For I am certainly informed, that you are neither a freethinker nor can sell bargains; that you can neither spell, nor talk, nor write, nor think like a courtier. Then you pretend to be respected for qualities which have been out of fashion ever since you were almost in your cradle; that your contempt for a fine petticoat is an infallible mark of disaffection; which is further confirmed by your ill taste for wit, in preferring two old-fashioned poets before Duck or Cibber. Besides, you spell in such a manner as no court lady can read, and write in such an old-fashioned style, as none of them can understand. You need not be in pain about Mr. Gay's stock of health. I promise you he will spend it all upon laziness, and run deep in debt by a winter's repose in town; therefore I entreat your grace will order him to move his chops less and his legs more, for the six cold months, else he will spend all his money in physic and coach-hire. I am in much perplexity about your grace's declaration of the manner in which you dispose what you call your love and respect, which, you say, are not paid to merit, but to your own humour. Now, madam, my misfortune is, that I have nothing to plead but abundance of merit; and there goes an ugly observation, that the humour of ladies is apt to change. Now, madam, if I should go to Amesbury with a great load of merit, and your grace happen to be out of humour, and will not purchase my merchandise at the price of your respect, the goods may be damaged, and nobody else will take them off my hands. Besides, you have declared Mr. Gay to hold the first part, and I, but the second; which is hard treatment, since I shall be the newest acquaintance by some years; and I will appeal to all the rest of your sex, whether such an innovation ought to be allowed? I should be ready to say in the common forms, that I was much obliged to the lady who wished she could give me the best living, &c., if I did not vehemently suspect it was the very same lady who spoke many things to me in the same style, and also with regard to the gentleman at your elbow when you writ, whose dupe he was, as well as of her waiting woman; but they were both arrant knaves, as I told him and a third friend, though they will not believe it to this day. I desire to present my most humble respects to my lord duke, and with my heartiest prayer for the prosperity of the whole family, remain your grace's, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE COUNTESS OF SUFFOLK.

October 26, 1731.

MADAM,—Your ladyship's last letter made me a little grave, and in going to answer it, I was in danger of leaning on my elbow (I mean my left elbow) to consider what I should write; which posture I never used except when I was under a necessity of writing to fools, or lawyers, or ministers of state, where I am to consider what is to be said. But as I write to a person whom I esteem, I am in no pain at all.

It would be an injury to you or Mr. Pope, to give thanks to either of you for justifying me about those letters sent to the queen, because to think me guilty would disgrace your understandings; and, as he is my best friend, so your ladyship owes me no malice, except that of raillery; and good raillery is always sincere. And if her majesty were deceived, it would lessen my opinion of her judgment; which would no otherwise affect me than by making me sorry upon her own account. But what your ladyship would have me discover, through all your refined civilities, is my great imprudence in ordering that monument to be fixed in my cathedral. I shall not trouble you with a long story—but if ever a numerous venerable body of dignified clergymen had reason to complain of the highest repeated indignity, in return of the greatest honour offered by them to persons they were wholly strangers to, then my chapter is not to be blamed, nor I who proposed the matter to them: which, however, I could have done by my own authority, but rather chose it should be the work of us all. And I will confess it was upon their advice that I omitted the only two passages which had much bitterness in them; and which a bishop here, one after your own heart, blamed me very much for leaving out; declaring that the treatment given us by the Schomberg family deserved a great deal worse. Indeed, madam, I shall not attempt to convince England of anything that relates to this kingdom. The drapier, whom you mention, could not do it in relation to the halfpence. Neither can the parliament here convince you that we ought not to be just now in so miserable condition in every article of distress. Why should the Schomberg family be so uneasy at a thing they were so long warned of, and were told they might prevent for 50*l.*? But here I wish your ladyship would put the queen in mind of what passed between her majesty and me upon the subject of Ireland, when she was princess of Wales, and appeared so much to pity this distressed kingdom, and gave me leave to write to her if ever I should live to see her queen; that she would answer my letter, and promised, that in such a case she would use all her credit to relieve it. Whereupon I desired Dr. Arbuthnot, who was present, to be witness of what she said: and her majesty confirmed it. I will not ask what the event has been. ——If any state scribble writ here should happen to reach London, I entreat your ladyship would continue to do me the justice of believing my innocence, because I lately assured the duke of Dorset that I would never have a hand in any such thing. But I gave him my reason before his secretary; that looking upon this kingdom's condition as absolutely desperate, I would not prescribe a dose to the dead. Some parts of your letter I do not understand. Mrs. Barber was recommended to me by Dr. Delany, who is now in London, and whom I once presented to you at Marble-hill. She seems to be a woman of piety and genius; and though I never visited her in my life, yet was I disposed to do her good offices on the doctor's account, and her own good character. By Lady M—— I cannot guess whom you mean. Mrs. Haywood I have heard of as a stupid, infamous, scribbling woman, but have not seen any of her productions. And now, madam, I utterly acquit your ladyship of all things that may concern me, except your good opinion, and that very little share I can pretend to in your memory. I never knew a lady who had so many qualities to beget esteem; but how you act as a friend is out of my way to judge. As to the queen, whom I never offended, since it would be presumption in me to imagine I ever came voluntarily into her thoughts, so it must be a mortification to think, when I happen to be named in her presence, it is usually to my disadvantage. I remember to have once told her majesty, how hard a thing it was that when a prince or great minister had once received an ill impression of any person, although from the most false information, although the prince were demonstrably convinced of the person's innocence, yet the impression still continued; and her majesty condemned the severity of such a proceeding. I had said the same thing before to sir R. Walpole; who, upon reporting it to others, was pleased to give it a turn that I did not deserve. I remember the plaid, but I forgot the crown, and the meaning of it. If you had thought fit to have sent me as much of the plaid as would have made me a morning-cap before it fell to the share of the lowest of your women, I should have been proud that my head should have worn your livery. But if you are weary of your character, it must lie upon my hands, for I know no other whom it will fit. And if your ladyship will not allow it to be a character, I am sure it may pass for a prediction. If you should put the same fancy into the queen's head, I must send her a much larger character, and in royal paper, otherwise she will not be able to wrap the bundle in it. I fear so long a letter is beyond your mercy to forgive; but your ladyship is sure to be easy till Mr. Pope shall tell me that you are content to receive another. I should be heartily sorry if your increase in honour and employment has not been accompanied with increase of health. Let Mr. Pope in all his letters give me a particular account on this head, and pray God I may never have the least motive to pity you. For as a courtier, I forgive your ame endurcie; which I once charged on my lord Chesterfield, and I did not dislike it. And you have not a favourite or flatterer who makes more outward offers of wishes for your ease and happiness than I do prayers from the bottom of my heart, which proceed entirely from that respect and esteem wherewith I am, madam, your ladyship's most obedient humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

November 4, 1731.

I BELIEVE in my conscience, that though you had answered mine before, the second was nevertheless welcome.

So much for your topscript, not postscript; and in very sincere earnest I heartily thank you for remembering me so often. Since I came out of the country my riding days are over; for I never was for your Hyde-park courses, although my courage serves me very well at a hand-gallop in the country, six or seven miles, with one horseman and a ragged lad, a labourer's boy, that is to be clothed when he can run fast enough to keep up with my horse, who has yet only proved his dexterity by escaping from school. But my courage fails me for riding in town, where I should have the happiness to meet with plenty of your very pretty fellows that manage their own horses to show their art; or that think a postilion's cap with a white frock the most becoming dress. These and their grooms I am most bitterly afraid of, because, you must know, if my complaisant friend, your Presbyterian housekeeper,[a] can remember anything like such days with me, that is a very good reason for me to remember that time is past; and your toupets would rejoice to see a horse throw an ancient gentlewoman.

I am sorry to hear you are no wiser in Ireland than we English; for our birthday was as fine as hands could make us; but I question much whether we all paid ready money. I mightily approve of my duchess's being dressed in your manufacture;[b] if your ladies will follow her example in all things, they cannot do amiss. And I dare say you will soon find that the more you know of them both the better you will like them; or else Ireland has strangely depraved your taste, and that my own vanity will not let me believe since you still flatter me.

Why do you tantalize me? Let me see you in England again if you dare; and choose your residence, summer or winter, St. James's-square or Drayton. I defy you in all shapes, be it dean of St. Patrick's governing England or Ireland, or politician drapier. But my choice should be "the parson in lady Betty's chamber."

Make haste then if you have a mind to oblige your ever sincere hearty old friend, LADY BETTY.

[a] Mrs. Brent, widow of a printer in Dublin, with whom the dean lodged when a young man.

[b] The duchess of Dorset appeared at the castle of Dublin wholly clad in the manufactures of Ireland on his majesty's birthday in 1753, when the duke was a second time lord-lieutenant.

FROM MR. GAY AND THE DUKE OF QUEENSBERRY.[a]

FOR about this month or six weeks past I have been rambling from home, or have been at what I may not improperly call other homes, at Dawley and at Twickenham; and I really think at every one of my homes you have as good a pretension as myself; for I find them all exceeding disappointed by the lawsuit that has kept you this summer from us. Mr. Pope told me that affair was now over, that you have the estate which was your security; I wish you had your own money; for I wish you free from every engagement that keeps us from one another. I think you deciphered the last letter we sent you very judiciously. You may make your own conditions at Amesbury, where I am at present; you may do the same at Dawley; and Twickenham you know is your own. But if you rather choose to live with me (that is to say, if you will give up your right and title) I will purchase the house you and I used to dispute about over against Ham-walks, on purpose to entertain you. Name your day, and it shall be done. I have lived with you; and I wish to do so again in any place and upon any terms. The duchess does not know of my writing, but I promised to acquaint the duke the next time I wrote to you, and for aught I know he may tell the duchess, and she may tell sir William Wyndham, who is now here; and for fear they should all have something to say to you, I leave the rest of the paper till I see the duke.

THE DUKE.

MR. GAY tells me you seem to doubt what authority my wife and he have to invite a person hither, who by agreement is to have the government of the place during his stay; when at the same time it does not appear that the present master of these demesnes has been consulted in it. The truth of the matter is this; I did not know whether you might not have suspected me for a sort of a pert coxcomb had I put in my word in the late correspondence between you and my wife. Ladies (by the courtesy of the world) enjoy privileges not allowed to men; and in many cases the same thing is called a favour from a lady which might perhaps be looked upon as impertinence from a man. Upon this reflection I have hitherto refrained from writing to you, having never had the pleasure of conversing with you otherwise; and as that is a thing I most sincerely wish, I would not venture to meddle in a negotiation that seemed to be in so fair a way of producing that desirable end. But our friend John has not done me justice if he has never mentioned to you how much I wish for the pleasure of seeing you here; and though I have not till now avowedly taken any steps toward bringing it about, what has passed conducive to it has been all along with my privity and consent, and I do now formally ratify all the preliminary articles and conditions agreed to on the part of my wife, and will undertake for the due observance of them. I depend upon my friend John to answer for my sincerity. I

THE REV. MR. PILKINGTON TO MR. BOWYER THE PRINTER.

November 9, 1731.

SIR,—I have been much surprised at your long silence, and perhaps you have been affected in the same manner at mine. But as I hope always to preserve the friendship we have begun, I must acquaint you with the reasons of my conduct.

I have the misfortune to live in a scene of great hurry; and between attending those who live in high stations who honour me with their friendship, and discharging the duties of my profession, I have scarce a moment disengaged; yet I constantly desired my friend Faulkner to write to you in my name, because I imagined it would save postage; and I thought it unreasonable to trouble you with my letters when I had no very urgent business to write to you upon, and had too many obligations to you to think of adding to your expense. But I cannot imagine what you can plead in your case for your neglect of writing to me, who am desirous to continue a constant correspondence; I shall be glad to hear you justify yourself.

Yesterday I saw a letter of yours to Mr. Faulkner, and on so distressful a subject that I very sensibly shared in your affliction.[b] I am naturally apt to pity the woes of my fellow creatures, but the wounds of my friend are my own. Here my office ought to be to administer comfort to you in so great a calamity, but I know how much easier it is to preach patience and resignation than to practise either. The strongest reason acts but feebly upon the heart that is loaded with grief, nor is the highest eloquence powerful enough to heal a wounded spirit. Time and a firm trust in Divine Providence, which undoubtedly orders all things for the best, are the only ministers of comfort in our misfortunes; and I hope your own virtue will enable you to bear this affliction with the resolution of a Christian, though joined with all the tenderness of a friend and the fondest esteem for the memory of that relation you have lost.

I desired Mr. Faulkner, about six weeks ago, to return you my thanks for your kindness in procuring me the books from Mr. Giles's, which I received safe, and also the box of those writings of mine; and I am extremely grieved to find that Faulkner neglected mentioning either. I had not known it only for your postscript wherein you desire to know whether I received them. I would have wrote to you before this if I had not believed that your charge was paid; for Dr. Delany is, I believe, by this time in London; and he wrote to me from Bath for directions where to find you in London, that he might pay off his bill, and return you his thanks for your kindness to us. Let me beg the favour of you to acquaint Mr. Giles with this, because I would not for any consideration seem to forget my creditors, though in another country. If Dr. Delany be not come to you, I desire you will inquire out his lodgings; and I believe you may be informed either at lord Bolingbroke's or Mr. Percival's, in Conduit-street. Tell him your name whenever you go to wait upon him, and I assure you the doctor will be extremely friendly to you, and glad to see you, for I have often talked to him of you.

I received ninety-four books[c] from you, but I believe you must commit them to the charge of Mr. Faulkner, because I have no opportunity of selling but bestowing them; for when any of my friends are desirous to have one, and ask me where they are to be had, I am always too generous or too bashful (which is a great rarity among us Irish) to accept of payment for them; and by this means I shall be under the necessity of giving all away, which would be too expensive an article to me. Now what I think would answer, would be to send what I have not bestowed to Mr. Faulkner, and let him publish in his newspaper that he has imported some of those books, and let him be accountable to you for the sale. I wrote to you for thirty, which I expected to give away, and I believe I have distributed so many. When I receive your answer, I will give you a particular account, and remit you the money for them the first opportunity. If I find Dr. Delany's lodgings out from any friends here, or from his letters to me, I will give you immediate notice. I should be glad to have any catalogues that were now selling in London; and if you could send any of them, or any other little pamphlets, they may be directed to the lord-bishop of Killala, in Dublin, for me. I never received either the "Monthly Chronicle" for March, nor the "Historia Literaria" for ditto; I believe it miscarried by being directed to Faulkner; they were not for Dr. Delany, but for another gentleman in town; but I had forgot, till the gentleman asked me for them the other day. I shall be glad to hear from you soon; and am your most sincere friend,

MATT. PILKINGTON.

There is one Green, a bookseller, lately come from London to this town, who has imported a very curious collection of books, but he has rated them so excessively dear, and seems to act so haughtily in the sale of them, that I believe above three-fourths of them will be sent back to-morrow to England again. I made the dean of St. Patrick's go with me there the first morning; but all the books were too dear for either of us.

FROM MR. GAY AND MR. POPE.

December 1, 1731.

You used to complain that Mr. Pope and I would not let you speak; you may now be even with us, and take it out in writing. If you do not send to me now and then, the post-office will think me of no consequence, for I have no correspondent but you. You may keep as far from us as you please, you cannot be forgotten by those who ever knew you, and therefore please me by sometimes showing that I am not forgot by you. I have nothing to take me off my friendship to you; I seek no new acquaintance, and court no favour; I spend no shillings in coaches or chairs to levees or great visits, and as I do not want the assistance of some that I formerly conversed with, I will not so much as seem to seek to be a dependant. As to my studies, I have not been entirely idle, though I cannot say that I have yet perfected anything. What I have done is something in the way of those fables I have already published. All the money I get is by saving, so that by habit there may be some hopes (if I grow richer) of my becoming a miser. All misers have their excuses; the motive to my parsimony is independence. If I were to be represented by the duchess, (she is such a downright niggard for me,) this character might not be allowed me; but I really think I am covetous enough for any who lives at the court end of the town, and who is as poor as myself; for I do not pretend that I am equally saving with S——k. Mr. Lewis desired you might be told that he has 5*l.* of yours in his hands, which he fancies you may have forgot, for he will hardly allow that a verseman can have a just knowledge of his own affairs. When you got rid of your lawsuit I was in hopes that you had got your own and was free from every vexation of the law; but Mr. Pope tells me you are not entirely out of your perplexity, though you have the security now in your own possession; but still your case is not so bad as captain Gulliver's, who was ruined by having a decree for him with costs. I have had an injunction for me against pirating booksellers, which I am sure to get nothing by, and will, I fear, in the end drain me of some money. When I began this prosecution, I fancied there would be some end of it; but the law still goes on, and it is probable I shall some time or other see an attorney's bill as long as the book. Poor duke Disney is dead, and has left what he had among his friends, among whom are lord Bolingbroke, 500*l.*; Mr. Pelham, 500*l.*; sir William Wyndham's youngest son, 500*l.*; gen. Hill, 500*l.*; lord Masham's son, 500*l.*

[a] This is another hand; possibly sir W. Wyndham's.
[b] The death of Mrs. Bowyer.

You have the good wishes of those I converse with; they know they gratify me when they remember you; but I really think they do it purely for your own sake. I am satisfied with the love and friendship of good men, and envy not the demerits of those who are most conspicuously distinguished. Therefore as I set a just value upon your friendship, you cannot please me more than letting me now and then know that you remember me; the only satisfaction of distant friends!

P.S. Mr. Gay's is a good letter; mine will be a very dull one; and yet what you will think the worst of it is what should be its excuse, that I write in a headach that has lasted three days. I am never ill but I think of your ailments, and repine that they mutually hinder our being together; though in one point I am apt to differ from you, for you shun your friends when you are in those circumstances and I desire them; your way is the more generous, mine the more tender. Lady Suffolk took your letter very kindly, for I had prepared her to expect no answer under a twelvemonth; but kindness perhaps is a word not applicable to courtiers. However, she is an extraordinary woman here. who will do you common justice. For God's sake, why all this scruple about lord Bolingbroke's keeping your horses, who has a park: or about my keeping you on a pint of wine a-day? We are infinitely richer than you imagine; John Gay shall help me to entertain you, though you come like a king Lear with fifty knights.—Though such prospects as I wish cannot now be formed for fixing you with us, time may provide better before you part again; the old lord[a] may die, the benefice may drop, or, at worst, you may carry me into Ireland. You will see a work of lord Bolingbroke's and one of mine; which, with a just neglect of the present age, consult only posterity; and, with a noble scorn of politics, aspire to philosophy. I am glad you resolve to meddle no more with the low concerns and interests of parties even of countries (for countries are but larger parties), Quid verum atque decens, curare, et rogare, nostrum sit. I am much pleased with your design upon Rochefoucault's maxim, pray finish it.[b] I am happy whenever you join our names together; so would Dr. Arbuthnot be, but at this time he can be pleased with nothing, for his darling son is dying in all probability, by the melancholy account I received this morning.

The paper you ask me about is of little value. It might have been a seasonable satire upon the scandalous language and passion with which men of condition have stooped to treat one another: surely they sacrifice too much to the people when they sacrifice their own characters, families, &c., to the diversion of that rabble of readers. I agree with you in my contempt of most popularity, fame, &c. Even as a writer I am cool in it; and whenever you see what I am now writing,[a] you will be convinced I would please but a few, and (if I could) make mankind less admirers, and greater reasoners. I study much more to render my own portion of being easy, and to keep this peevish frame of the human body in good humour. Infirmities have now quite unmanned me, and it will delight you to hear they are not increased, though not diminished. I thank God I do not very much want people to attend me, though my mother now cannot. When I am sick, I lie down; when I am better, I rise up: I am used to the headache, &c. If greater pains arrive, (such as my late rheumatism,) the servants bathe and plaster me, or the surgeon scarifies me, and I bear it, because I must. This is the evil of nature, not of fortune. I am just now as well as when you were here: I pray God you were no worse. I sincerely wish my life were passed near you, and such as it is, I would not repine at it.

All you mention remember you, and wish you here.

b The dean's poem on his own death.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

January 11, 1732.

It is well for Mr. Pope your letter came as it did, for otherwise I had called for my coach, and was going to make a thorough search at his house; for that I was most positively assured that you were there in person the duke of Dorset can tell you. Non credo is all the Latin I know, and the most useful word upon all occasions to me. However, like most other people, I can give it up for what I wish; so for once I believed, or at least went half way in what I hoped was true, and then, for the only time, your letter was unwelcome. You tell me you have a request, which is purely personal to me; non credo for that; for I am sure you would not be so disagreeable as not to have made it, when you know it is a pleasure and satisfaction to me to do anything you desire, by which you may find you are not sans consequence to me.

I met with your friend Mr. Pope the other day. He complains of not being well, and indeed looked ill. I fear that neither his wit or sense do arm him enough against being hurt by malice; and that he is too sensible of what fools say: the run is much against him on the duke of Chandos's[b] account: but I believe their rage is not kindness to the duke, but glad to give it vent with some tolerable pretence. I wish your presence would have such a miraculous effect as your design on Biddy's [Floyd] speech; you know formerly her tongue was not apt to run much by inclination; but now every winter is kept still perforce, for she commonly gets a violent cold that lasts her all winter. But as to that quarrelsome friend of the duke of Dorset's, I will let her loose at you, and see which can get the better. Miss Kelly[c] was a very pretty girl when she went from hence, and the beaux showed there good taste by liking her. I hear her father is now kind to her; but, if she is not mightily altered, she would give up some of her airs and equipage to live in England.

Since you are so good as to inquire after my health, I ought to inform you I never was better in my life than this winter. I have escaped both headaches and gout; and, that yours may not be in danger by reading such a long letter, I will add no more, but bid adieu to my dear dean. E. GERMAIN.

a This was said whilst he was employed on the "Essay on Man," not yet published, 1731.
b There is no doubt but Mr. Pope intended the character of Timon, in his Epistle on the Use of Riches in works of taste, addressed to the earl of Burlington, for the Duke of Chandos.
c Daughter of Dennis Kelly, esq., a gentleman of very good estate in Ireland, who was committed to the Tower of London in 1722, on suspicion of corresponding with the pretender; but nothing could be proved against him.

FROM MR. GAY.

London, January 18, 1732.

DEAR SIR,—It is now past nine o'clock. I deferred sitting down to write to you, in expectation to have seen Mr. Pope, who left me two or three hours, again to try to find lord Burlington, within whose walls I have not been admitted this year and a half; but for what reason I know not. Mr. Pope is just this minute come in, but had not the good luck to find him: so that I cannot give you any satisfaction in the affair you writ last about. He designs to see him to-morrow; and, if anything can be done, he says you shall hear from him.

By the beginning of my letter, you see how I decline in favour; but I look upon it as my particular distinction, that as soon as the court gains a man, I lose him. It is a mortification I have been used to, so I bear it as a philosopher should.

The letter which you writ to me and the duke, I received; and Mr. Pope showed me that directed to him, which gave me more pleasure than all the letters you have writ since I saw you, as it gives me hopes of seeing you soon.

Were I to acquaint the duke and duchess of my writing, I know that they would have something to say to you, and perhaps would prevent my sending the letter this post, so I choose to say nothing about it. You are in great favour and esteem with all, that love me, which is one great reason that I love and esteem them.

Whenever you will order me to turn your fortune into ready money, I will obey you; but I choose to leave it where it is till you want it, as it carries some interest; though it might be now sold to some advantage, and is liable to rises and falls with the other stocks. It may be higher as well as lower; so I will not dispose of it till I hear from you. I am impatient to see you, so are all your friends. You have taken your resolution, and I shall henceforth every week expect an agreeable surprise. The bellman rings for the letter, so I can say no more.

MR. PILKINGTON TO MR. BOWYER

February 5, 1732.

SIR,—I find you are resolved to lay me under so many obligations to you, that, upon principles of gratitude, I must be always desirous to promote your interest to the utmost of my power. I think you have nothing more left to do but to make the experiment, by putting it in my way to return your favours. I sent sixty-five books to Mr. Faulkner's, and hope, some time or other, to have it in my power to make acknowledgments. I find Mr. Faulkner sent you a little pamphlet of my writing, called "An Infallible Scheme to pay the Debts of this Nation." I have the honour to see it mistaken for the dean's, both in Dublin and in your part of the world; but I am still diffident of it, whether it will merit esteem or contempt. It was a sudden whim; and I was tempted to send it into the world by the approbation which the dean (my wisest and best friend) expressed when he read it: if you were concerned in the printing of it, I hope you will be no sufferer. I am very much obliged to you for receiving the young printer, whom I recommended to you, in so friendly a manner. If I can, on this side of the water, be serviceable to any friend of yours, command me.

I am much pleased to hear of your acquaintance with Dr. Delany, who is the best of friends; and I do not doubt but your affection for him will increase with your intimacy with him. I desire you to present my service to him; and tell him that the dean designs to trouble him to buy a convenient microscope, that he may find out both myself and my house with greater ease than he can at present, because we are both so excessively small, that he can scarce discover either. I hope to hear soon from you, although it be parliament time, and you hurried with business; and shall always be your sincere friend and servant,

MATT. PILKINGTON.

TO THE REV. MR. WINDAR.

Dublin, February 19, 1732.

SIR,—I had the favour of yours of the 6th instant. I have been above a fortnight confined by an accidental strain, and neither read nor walk, nor easily write, else you should have heard from me sooner. I am heartily sorry for your disorder, and am the more sensible by those I have myself, though not of the same kind, but a constant disposition to giddiness, which I fear my present confinement, with the want of exercise, will increase. I am afraid you could not light upon a more unqualified man to serve you, or my nearest friends, in any manner, with people in power; for I have the misfortune to be not only under the particular displeasure both of the king and queen, as everybody knows, but likewise of every person, both in England and Ireland, who are well with the court, or can do me good or hurt. And although this and the two last lieutenants were of my old acquaintance, yet I never could prevail with any of them to give a living to a sober grave clergyman, who married my near relation, and has been long in the church; so that he is still my curate; and I reckon this present governor will do like the rest. I believe there is not any person you see from this town who does not know that my situation is as I describe. If you or your son were in favour with any bishop or patron, perhaps it might be contrived to have them put in mind, or solicited; but I am no way proper to be the first mover, because there is not one spiritual or temporal lord in Ireland whom I visit, or by whom I am visited, but am as mere a monk as any in Spain; and there is not a clergyman on the top of a mountain who so little converses with mankind, or is so little regarded by them, on any other account except showing malice. All this I bear as well as I can; eat my morsel alone like a king, and am constantly at home when I am not riding or walking, which I do often, and always alone.

I give you this picture of myself out of old friendship: from whence you may judge what share of spirits and mirth is now left me. Yet I cannot read at nights, and am therefore forced to scribble something, whereof nine things in ten are burned next morning. Forgive this tediousness in the pen, which I acquire by the want of spending it in talk; and believe me to be, with true esteem and friendship, your most obedient humble servant, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

February 23, 1732.

I LIKE to know my power, (if it is so,) that I can make you uneasy at my not writing; though I shall not often care to exert it, lest you should grow weary of me and my correspondence; but the slowness of my answer does not come from the emptiness of my heart, but the emptiness of my head; and that you know, is nature's fault, not mine. I was not learned enough to know non credo has been so long in fashion; but every day convinces me more of the necessity of it, not but that I often wish against myself; as, for example, I would fain believe you are coming to England, because most of your acquaintance tell me so; and yet I turn, and wind, and sift your letters to find anything like it being true; but instead of that, there I find a lawsuit, which is a worse tie by the leg than your lameness. And, pray, what is this "hurt above my heal?" Have you had a fellow-feeling with my lord-lieutenant [the duke of Dorset] of the gout, and call it a sprain, as he does? who has lied so long and often to disguise it, that I verily think he has not a new story left. Does he do the same in Ireland? for there I hoped he would have given a better example.

I find you are grown a horrid flatterer, or else you could never have thought of anything so much to my taste as this piece of marble you speak of for my sister Penelope,[a] which I desire may be at my expense. I cannot be exact, neither as to the time nor year, but she died soon after we came there, and we did not stay quite two years, and were in England some months before king William died. I wish I had my dame Wadgar's, or Mr. Ferris's memorandum head, that I might know whether it was "at the time of gooseberries."[b]

Surely your Irish air is very bad for darts; if Mrs. Kelly's are blunted already, make her cross father let her come over, and we would not use her so in England. If my duchess[c] sees company in a morning, you need not grumble at the hour; it must be purely from great complaisance, for that never was her taste here, though she is as early a riser as the generality of ladies are: and I believe there are not many dressing-rooms in London but mine where the early idle come.

Adieu abruptly: for I will have no more formal humble servants, with your whole name at the bottom, as if I was asking you your catechism.

FROM SIR CHARLES WOGAN.[d]

February 27, 1732.

I HAVE the honour of a very obliging letter from a person whose penetration I flattered myself I could have escaped: although I might assure him, with great sincerity, that I never had a more earnest desire for any man's acquaintance and friendship than for his. Upon the late occasion, it is true, my design was to have travelled and been received incognito. I had taken my measures for it in the best manner I could devise. But all my art and travestie was vain. His Mentor was superior to my Uranius, who could not avoid being discovered, as in the story of Telemachus, and striking sail to a more exalted divinity. I own I am somewhat concerned at my being seen in my undress, through all the magnificence of those disguises I had put on. But Mentor has so much the air of a benign and friendly spirit, that my confusion was soon over: and methinks I could be exposed in the midst of all my defects without any concern, provided it were only to those whom he judges worthy of his intimacy.

Nothing can be more distinguishing, in regard of an unhappy people, than his character of those abroad; nor more just than his remarks upon the genius and sufferings of those at home. But jacta est alea: the set of people he means can no longer be looked upon as a nation, either in or out of their country. Those who have chosen a voluntary exile, to get rid of oppression, have given themselves up with great gaiety of spirit, to the slaughter in foreign and ungrateful service, to the number of above 120,000 men, within these forty years. The rest, who have been content to stay at home, are reduced to the wretched condition of the Spartan helots. They are under a double slavery. They serve their inhuman lordliness, who are the more severe upon them because they dare not yet look upon the country as their own; while all together are under the supercilious dominion and jealousy of another over-ruling power.

To turn to our exiles: Mentor certainly does them that justice which cannot be denied them by any of those nations among whom they have served; but it is seldom or ever allowed them by those who can write or speak English correctly. They have shown a great deal of gallantry in the defence of foreign states and princes, with very little advantage to themselves but that of being free, and without half the outward marks of distinction they deserved. These southern governments are very slow in advancing foreigners to considerable or gainful preferments. Their chief attention is reserved for their own subjects, to make them some amends for the heavy yoke they have laid over them. The only fruit the Irish have reaped by their valour is their extinction; and that general fame, which they have lost themselves, to acquire for their country, already lost, with respect to them. They had the honour of Ireland at heart; while those who actually possessed their country, were little affected with any other glory than that of England; which they advanced with great bravery during all the late wars. They were content to forget they were Irishmen; and England, in return for that compliment, has graciously conferred upon them, as she still does, the first employments both at sea and land; whereby they have been enabled to leave very comfortable establishments to their children: whereas the Irish exiles can only be said to have buried the synagogue with honour. They were undoubtedly the flower of the Catholic distinction of subjects. They are extinct to a very inconsiderable number, and have not left one single settlement in all the continent to any of their posterity. They had always the post of honour allowed them, where it was mixed with danger; and lived in perpetual fire, which was all they could bequeath as an inheritance to their issue, who are extremely few, on account of the little encouragement given for begetting them. The very scum of French refugees have had much better treatment and fortune in those countries, where they were only a charge to the government, than the Irish nobility and gentry have met with, where their courage and fidelity were in a great measure its support. Had it not been much better for them to have gone in search of new establishments out of the known world, and made some settlement for themselves and their posterity in the antipodes?

As I was but a new comer among them, I have often a Lady Penelope Berkeley died in Dublin, while her father was in the government, and was interred in St. Andrew's church, under the altar. No monument was erected to her memory till about this time, when Dr. Swift caused a plate of black marble to be fixed in the wall over the altar-piece, with this inscription:—

"Underneath lieth the body of the Lady Penelope Berkeley, daughter of the Right Hon. Charles, Earl of Berkeley.
She died September the 3rd, 1669."

b In the Petition of Frances Harris to the lords-justices, upon losing her purse, printed in this collection, there are these verses:—

"Yes," says th steward, "I remember, when I was at my Lady Shrewsbury's,
Such a thing as this happened, just about the time of gooseberries."

This steward was Mr. Ferris; and dame Wadgar was the old deaf housekeeper in lord Berkeley's family, when he was one of the lords-justices of Ireland.

c The duchess of Dorset.

d This tract, written in the epistolary style, was addressed to Dr. Swift by its author, sir Charles Wogan, a gentleman at that time of high reputation, and much distinguished at most of the courts of Europe. He was of an ancient Irish family, and nephew to the famous duke of Tyrconnel, who was first minister to king James II., and commander in-chief of his forces, during his residence in Ireland. Of course he was bred up in all the principles of Jacobitism, and being also a Roman Catholic, was tinctured with all the bigotry of the times. He followed his unfortunate master into exile, where he continued to serve him with a zeal worthy a better cause. See an account of him at the end of September, 1732, where the dean's letter here alluded to is printed; and a second letter from sir Charles Wogan, dated in June, 1735.

blamed their men of chief distinction and sense for having rejected the terms offered by the prince of Orange to my uncle Tyrconnel, in favour of the Irish Catholics in general, before the decisive battle of Aghrim; which, by the by, till the sudden fall of their general, was fought with more bravery on their side than any battle has been, perhaps, for some centuries past by any people under equal disadvantages. The prince was touched with the fate of a gallant nation, that had made itself a victim to French promises, and ran headlong to its ruin for the only purpose, in fact, of advancing the French conquests in the Netherlands, under the favour of that hopeless diversion in Ireland, which gave work enough to 40,000 of the best troops of the grand alliance of Augsbourgh. He longed to find himself at the head of the confederate army with so strong a reinforcement. In this anxiety he offered the Irish Catholics the free exercise of their religion; half the churches of the kingdom; half the employments, civil and military too, if they pleased, and even the moiety of their ancient properties. These proposals, though they were to have had an English act of parliament for their sanction, were refused with universal contempt. Yet the exiles, in the midst of their hard usage abroad, could not be brought to repent of their obstinacy. Whenever I pressed them upon the matter, their answer was generally to this purpose: "If England can break her public faith, in regard of the wretched articles of Limerick, by keeping up a perpetual terror and persecution over that parcel of miserable, unarmed peasantry, and dastard gentry we have left at home, without any other apology or pretence for it, but her wanton fears and jealousies: what could have been expected by the men of true vigour and spirit, if they had remained in their country, but a cruel war, under greater disadvantages, or such a universal massacre as our fathers have often been threatened with by the confederate rebels of Great Britain?"—Ad quod non fuit responsum.—Yet their liberty and glory abroad is but the price of their blood; and, even at that expense, they have only purchased a more honourable haceldama [Field of Blood].

It was impossible for a people to thrive, after having been driven by their too warrantable distrust of their enemies into the snares laid for them by their false friends. France, upon their arrival, gave them a cruel reduction of their officers and of their pay for a welcome, by a scandalous breach of faith; sacrificed them to her wars; made their zeal and spirit the dupes of her idle pretences; and, at last, inhumanly disbanded great numbers of them to the wide world, after the peace of Ryswick. Had they been kept together in one body from the beginning, to the number of 30,000 men, according to the promise that tempted them partly to quit their country, they had made a much better figure in the world. Richelieu's politics were against it. He was a great master, particularly in the judgment he had formed of the valour of his countrymen; since he has left it on record, that bodies of foreign troops must be mixed with French, in order to give them emulation. Upon this account the Irish were parcelled by brigades among the many armies entertained by the French king. Although this repartition was very mortifying to them, they ever behaved in their several bands apart with particular distinction. They never found themselves in any engagement where they did not pierce the opposite enemy. Not one regiment of them ever fled, till it was in a manner left alone; and during all the late wars, in which their principals were generally worsted, they cannot be said to have lost two pair of colours. The French never gained a victory, to which those handsful of Irish were not known to have contributed in a singular manner; nor lost a battle in which they did not preserve, or rather augment, their reputation, by carrying off colours and standards from the victorious enemy. From this we may conclude, without any great vanity, that they had been an impenetrable phalanx, if they had been allowed to continue in one body; and that, instead of acquiring glory by detail, they had gained complete victories, as one single brigade of them did at Mellazo, having driven the whole German army into the town, or the sea, after they had been deserted by the Spanish troops and generals to a man. Yet their principal officers, who have signalized themselves equally upon all occasions have been advanced to no higher preferment than that of lieutenant-general; whereas, Scots, Germans, Livonians, Italians, have been promoted to the dignity of maréchals of France. But as the valour of the Irish is already taken for granted abroad, and their zeal turned into a sort of ridicule, on account of the unprecedented usage it has met with at home, it is modestly presumed all over the world, that they scarce need any reward for their virtue, but their virtue alone.

I have often been at a loss for the cause of this odd destiny that attends the Irish Catholics in all foreign courts and countries. They are the first called upon for any service that requires fidelity and resolution: the last distinguished with any eminent marks of honour or advantage. Let them behave ever so well, if it be thought fit to give them any recompense, it is always inferior to what might be judged sufficient for men of any other country in the like case. Whatever others might be entitled to grumble at as a reward, must be received by them as a gift. Whatever is taken from them, either at home or abroad, is lawful prize. Their zeal, in regard of loyalty and religion, has been so cruelly misrepresented, and their unparalleled sufferings so involved in shades, or clad with an air of justice, that they are become a by-word in all countries alike; which are perfectly agreed to keep them low, after the example of their own princes, upon a presumption that they could not have been used so extremely ill if they had not in some measure deserved it. A long and perpetual train of misfortunes has a strange tendency toward putting a people in the wrong; or, at best, making them the objects of ridicule. The Irish for having been steady to their principles, and not as cunning knaves as the two neighbouring nations, have groaned, during the two last centuries, under all the weight of injustice, calumny, and tyranny, of which there is no example, in equal circumstances, to be shown in any history of the universe. All this calumny has been sounded into the ears of all Europe by their enemies, both foreign and domestic; and thereby gained credit, more or less, on account of not having been sufficiently controverted or refuted in time. Their constant misfortunes have given a sort of sanction to all this imposture and iniquity. They could not defend themselves in the midst of so much division at home, from so many powerful and confederated enemies, who had alienated the hearts of their very sovereigns from them, in order to make him the first, and them the last victims of the tragedy. In the mean time they were involved in too much war, or in too much misery, to be the relaters of their own story with any advantage; or found the English language as backward as the English nation and government, to do them common justice. Their enemies have spared them the labour with a vengeance.

The mongrel historians of the birth of Ireland, from Stanihurst and Dr. King down to the most wretched scribbler, cannot afford them a good word, in order to curry favour with England. Our callow bards of the drama, with the same view, draw their first pens against their country, and force their way into the world through their mother's womb. The English writers take the hints from them with pleasure; and delight in gratifying the flattest nonsense, and most silly artifices, upon teigueism, to divert that honest generation of numskulls, the mobs of England, from the Land's End to Berwick-upon-Tweed, in regard of improprieties in the turn of a foreign speech or accent, totus mundus egit histrionem; but the genuine characters of a nation ought to be as sacred, even upon the stage, as in history. In the days of king Charles II. the Irish bravery and fidelity had the applause of whole theatres; but now nothing but Irish stupidity, and wretched small craft, will go down even upon that of Dublin.

As all the honour the Protestant Irish have acquired by their pen or their swords, passes generally for English, so the English, and their adherents in Ireland, have been in a long confederacy, before Clarendon appeared, to suppress or tarnish all the renown accruing to that unhappy country, from the worth and gallant actions of the Catholics. Their pens are ever dipped in bitterness and detraction, as if whatever could be reckoned valuable in that unfortunate people were a lessening to the honour of the English nation, to which all their incense is addressed. However, though they have done horrible outrages to justice and veracity, by propagating lies, more or less, all over the world, they must be allowed to have acted with great sagacity in favour of themselves. For if the Irish had not been represented with uncommon industry, and in full cry, as a barbarous and stupid people, breakers of public faith, cowards, murderers of the innocents, without any provocation, in every corner of their country; rebels to their lawful sovereigns, in whose defence they have ruined and annihilated themselves, all these attributes (except that of folly) had necessarily fallen to the share of England; and she must have been looked upon by the whole universe as the most lawless and inhuman tyrant upon the face of the earth. Yet all this villany ought not, in strict justice, to be imputed to her. She had not gone all those lengths of cruelty and iniquity, if she had not been under the force of Cromwell and the influence of a Clarendon.

In the mean time Ireland is left to trapes in her old draggle-tailed weeds by her own children; bribed, by their attention and respect for England, to abandon her to all the dirt and barbarism laid at her door by her ancient and modern enemies; while other countries are brightening up in their story and character by the industry of their writers successively labouring to adorn them. The newest accounts given all over Europe, of the soil, genius, improvement, and customs of Ireland, may be dated 400 years ago. She is still reckoned as savage as she was under the oppression of the Danes, or after the first incursion of the English, who drove her, in spite of her voluntary submission, into wildness. For, after all, if I invite people civilly into my house, and they will not admit me to sit at my own fire, but rather will grow insolent, and force my family to herd in the bare court among my cattle, which I cannot reckon my own, but upon the foot of their will and pleasure, I must either quit my dwelling altogether, or lay about me like a madman till I can repossess it.

On account of this perpetual silence about Ireland, all Europe looks upon her as under a constant fog the seat of dulness, and the dismal mansion of ignorance and distress. Scarce any people are taken for mere Irish, either in England or on the continent, but the vulgar of the country and the few unfortunate exiles. The very distinction carries in the face of it a lessening, and strikes the fancy with the ungrateful idea of misery. Besides, the arms of Whiggism are extremely long, and reach them to their remotest haunts. There are a thousand instances of this enchantment; and notwithstanding the known ingratitude of France, some of the Irish had been maréchals of France before now; the whole voice of that nation was for them; but the fear of disobliging the present government of England gave a check to their promotion. As for the new nobility and gentry of Ireland, they pass currently for English abroad; and Dublin, the fourth city in Christendom, is still taken for no more than the Eblana of Ptolemy.

Thus Ireland has not only lost all her ancient progeny of any distinction, and seen them buried under the ruins of calumny and distress, by the overbearing pride and power of those several swarms of inmates thrown in upon her, at several times, and supported by her masters of Great Britain; those very colonies are no sooner settled in that country, and warmed into affection for it, than they are taken for mere Irish too; and so must be driven off to make room for new ones. Yet all this is not enough. Ireland might still have some name in the world if she were allowed what belongs to her; but she is stripped into the bargain, of all the honour and merit that might redound to her, either from the actions or geniuses of her latter offspring. The very name of Irish carries so uncouth an idea along with it, especially in England, that all those who depend chiefly upon her for their fortune or their fame, are shy, at their first setting out, of making an open confession of their country, and suffer themselves to pass for English; while England permits the cheat to pass upon the rest of the world, and naturalizes them by a tacit consent, upon the modest presumption that wit and merit, such as theirs, can be only of her own growth. Thus England, without being at the pains of assuming it, is allowed a right to all those who have either written or fought in English with any distinction, as Scotland impudently whips away from Ireland all her old saints and her sophists, on account of having shared with her the same name of Scotia. The Ushers, Boyles, Congreves, Garths, Denhams, Swifts, Ormonds, Cadogans, Aylmers, &c. are all taken for English in foreign countries. MacFlecno, and all the wretched adepts in metaphysics are counted Irish of course. We have but one dunce of irrefragable fame, the father of dunces by thousands all over Europe: and the Scots have kidnapped him from us, by the consent or connivance of all modern dictionaries, notwithstanding the number of sheriffs and sheriffs' bailiffs of the same name upon the records of our ancient city of Dublin. In short, what can Ireland have left her, but her bogs and her stupidity, since England and Scotland have swept away the stakes? If we must give up all our great men of war and figure to England, let her even show us the example, and resign to the Normans her Plantagets, Talbots and Nevills, conquerors of France.

However, we will not stick out in our controversy about these mighty men. They shall belong to England, since they have made her a present of their arms and allegiance. But in the name of wonder, let us have our men of parts and letters. Let not the English wits, and particularly my friend Mr. Pope, (whom I had the honour to bring up to London, from our retreat in the forest of Windsor, to dress à la mode, and introduce at Will's coffeehouse,) run down a country as the seat of dulness to whose geniuses he owns himself so much indebted. What encomiums does he not lay out upon Roscommon and Walsh, in the close of his excellent "Essay on Criticism?" How gratefully does he express his thanks to Dr. Swift, sir Samuel Garth, Mr. Congreve, and my poor friend and neighbour, Dr. Parnell, in the Preface to his admirable translation of the Iliad, in return for the many lights and lessons they administered to him, both in the opening and the prosecution of that great undertaking? Is it possible that these heroes of wit and learning, whom he commemorates with so much applause, and of whom he glories in having been the pupil, could have been of the birth of Ireland? while England could only furnish him with titled pageants and names of quality, fitter to swell and encourage the subscription than to polish or enrich the performance? But granting they were Irishmen that, it seems, is no manner of argument in favour of their country. Were not all those lights and lessons given by them to Mr. Pope, in the purer air of England? Was it not to that air alone they owed the refinement and elevation of their geniuses? Mr. Pope, though the best-natured man living, to my knowledge, had laughed at them with great gaiety, had they pretended to forward any notices or instructions to him by letters written under their native fogs.

I remember to have been present at a scene, humorous enough, upon this very subject at Will's coffee-house. The sages there, in profound contemplation, were very gravely offering their several reasons why wit could not be the growth of Ireland. Some would have it owing to the bogginess of the soil, which must undoubtedly and imperceptibly convey too much humidity to the brain; others to the perpetual cloudiness of the sky, that must, of all necessity, cast a dull influence, infusing melancholy, sloth, and heaviness to the understanding; many to the want of sunshine, so sovereign in invigorating and giving cheerfulness and alacrity to the spirits. Among such a number of shining geniuses, who brightened up under the continual mist over London, it was hard to end the dispute about the cause while all were agreed about the fact. At length the wag, Bob Dodwell, (who had a little before forced a company of foot from lord Peterborough as a sort of amends for a severe joke upon his country,) rose up with a very demure countenance as demanding audience of the very oaf-full assembly; which being granted———

"My lords and gentlemen," says he, "it is a very moot point to which of those causes we may ascribe the universal dulness of the Irish. It may be owing perhaps to some one; perhaps to the combination of all together: God only knows, who was pleased to order it so from the beginning. But that the case is, as you agree it in your great wisdom, I shall offer a familiar and unanswerable proof. My father had studied with great applause in Oxford; (for had he studied in Dublin, where he was born, he had made but a very slender progress in learning, as you shall find by the sequel;) in short he was allowed, in that famous university, to be both an excellent divine, and a most eloquent preacher. From thence he removed to Dublin: where, on account of the reputation he had justly acquired abroad, he was instantly preferred to the parish of St. Mican's. Great was the concourse to hear him; but much greater the surprise to find how little his sermons answered the character the world had given him. This could not miss being whispered to him: he made several efforts in vain to regain his credit; his sermons were still worse and worse liked: at length his church was almost forsaken, and he left to hold forth to very few but the old women.

"The man was at his wit's end to find the cause of this unaccountable change in him: at last he wisely judged it must be owing to the climate in which he writ; and to make proof of it, set out one Monday morning in the packet-boat for Holyhead; there composed his sermon for next Sunday; and returning to Dublin on the eve, after having begged of some friends, out of mere charity, to assist at it, preached divinely well, to the utter astonishment of his auditory, charmed at the excellency of his performance. This miracle rung immediately over the whole city; and he, making use of the same happy stratagem every week, of composing at Holyhead what he was to deliver from the pulpit in Dublin, the doctor's name was up: all Dublin thronged to hear him: and persons of the best distinction resorted thither from all parts of the kingdom to see this second Livy.

"However, as the devil owed the doctor a spite, it chanced unfortunately for him that he was obliged, for some slight indispositions, to take physic two or three several times on the very days the packet-boat set out; and being thereby under the unhappy necessity of penning his sermons for the week in Dublin, his auditory were astonished, on those occasions, to find them good for nothing. By these ups and downs of the doctor the mystery at length came out; and whenever the packet-boat sailed for Holyhead, the common question over the whole city was, whether the doctor had gone on board? If the answer was in the affirmative, there was an universal joy throughout; all were sure of being charmed the next Sunday. If in the negative, the poor doctor was left on that day to preach to the bare walls."

While Bob held forth in this manner, with a very grave phiz that carried a wicked undersneer, very natural to him, the scene (I must own) was admirable, in regard of the auditory; and could give a bystander room to form a certain judgment of the weight of brains that came to the share of every one of them. Upon the opening of the discourse, all ears were alert: it was a solemn silence and profound attention! for when that Demogorgon, Ireland, is to be run down, it is wonderful how almost every English heart bounds for joy. Before Bob had brought his father back from Holyhead the first time, some had sense enough to see the ridicule levelled at themselves, and sneaked off. Others were so numskulled as to wait for the sermon composed in Anglesey, and delivered with applause at St. Mican's, whereat a sudden light broke in upon their noddles; they could stand the joke no longer, and slunk away too. But when it came to the unhappy consequences of the doctor's taking physic, the whole shoal of virtuosoes were sensible to the stroke, and voided the room at once, except one blue, one green ribbon, and a lieutenant-general of the queen's army that had courage and insipidity enough to hear the poor doctor preach to the bare walls. Then the cloud that had hung so long and so obstinately over their intellectuals disappeared. However, they were too stout to quit the field, as their betters had done, and so contented themselves with casting sheep's eyes and silly leers at each other, while Bob and I enjoyed their stupidity.

This received notion of dulness in the Irish has not taken its rise from the mob, though they gladly join in the cry. The English populace, the bluntest and most unenlightened race of people in Europe, are incapable of making so nice a discovery. They can readily imagine that the Irish have horns and hoofs: and it has been found easy, and of excellent use in politics, not very long ago, to persuade them that every Irishman was somewhat more than of Venner's gang; since, instead of only chasing, he was to have slain his thousands. What affects the English mob, with regard to Irishmen, is terror. Our English ancestors despatched into Ireland, and their descendants have taken effectual care to fasten this bugbear upon their mother-country, and represent the Irish as monsters and cannibals in order to justify their own more barbarous oppressions upon that people. These dreadful ideas have left so strong an impression that even at this day, when the nations are more mixed than they have been formerly, an Irishman is looked upon by the vulgar in England, remote from great towns, as a raw-head and bloody-bones! It is therefore that the rumour spread of an Irish massacre had been found, of all stratagems, the most effectual toward promoting any change of government in England, by the extreme facility of raising a fright in the good people there, whenever the Trojan horse is supposed to be filled with Irishmen. This may suffice to excuse that honest generation of mortals (for whom I have a great regard, as I have a real concern for all men that are easily thrown into a panic fear) from having had any hand in introducing the opinion of Irish dulness. That grand arcanum could be discovered only by the sublimer geniuses of England.

However, this opinion, foolishly attributed to the climate, has some truth in it, with regard to those remnants of old nobility and gentry, who have been stripped by the iniquity of Cromwell, and the greater one of Clarendon, of all they had a title to, except the blood and spirit of their ancestors. These are a severe and a very inconvenient burden to them at home, where they are obliged to keep them under hatches in the neighbourhood of barracks, and of more tyrannical justices of peace. There are in Ireland a thousand well-born Brutuses of this kind, whose souls are stupified by the perpetual dread of persecution, and dare not peep out of their bodies lest they should fall under the lash of the penal laws. But snatch these potato-mongers from their immediate slavery, or from the ploughshares to which their fathers have been reduced, into an air of liberty and politeness; transplant them but for one month into the hot-beds of London, how sudden is the change! how surprising the improvement! The booby instantly commences beau, bully, sharper, and cuckold-maker with a vengeance! he is passe, presto, vite, Jack of all trades; all fire, all mercury in the turn of a hand! With what dexterity does he empty the pockets of that notable son of earth, the English 'squire, at seven or eleven! What a sturdy back is he to a bashful English peer! What an awe does his modest assurance create in all the assemblies of men! How do the London ladies fall into fits at his approach, alarmed at the sight of his broad shoulders, and engaging, though somewhat rough, addresses. But, to conclude, this wonderful metamorphose of mere animals into smart and dexterous fellows, by the change of air, though it may go against one's stricter morals to justify their industry; it is hard to blame them for taking what reprisals they can upon the public in England, by way of revenge, or at least some amends for the irreparable wrongs and losses at home.

In the mean time it is impossible for an upright and good-natured spirit not to look with concern upon the inhuman slavery of the poor in Ireland. Since they have neither liberty nor schools allowed them; since their clergy, generally speaking, can have no learning but what they scramble for through the extremities of cold and hunger in the dirt and egotism of foreign universities; since all together are under the perpetual dread of persecution, and have no security for the enjoyment of their lives or their religion against the annual thunders of the English vatican, but the present moment: how can it be expected they should keep clear of superstition which is so elegantly and so truly called by a modern author the spleen of the soul? But that of my spirit is up, and I must out with it, after having asked pardon of my friend Mr. Pope, for having animadverted upon his jokes in the "Dunciad" with regard to Ireland. Those railleries are so agreeable to the humour of the world in general that, like favourite vices, they carry their excuse along with them.

The remains of the Irish (Reliquiæ Danaûm atque immitis Achillei) labour under another very great inconvenience. They are far from partaking of the indulgence, or other privilege, allowed to all other people, by an exemption from any general charge on account of personal defects or villanies. If one Irishman of any distinction be found a blockhead, a knave, a traitor, or coward, there arises a certain mirth upon the discovery among strangers of all kinds, especially the English; as if they were glad to light upon an example in that nation of what is a pretty general rule in most countries at this time of day. But where they dare joke upon it, the single blot is imputed with great gaiety to that whole people. Thus all Ireland is made answerable for the faults of every one of her children; and every one of these bears the whole weight of his country upon his shoulders. This is the greatest of all compliments if taken in a right light. It presupposes a certain infallibility annexed to the Irish alone, which makes the world enjoy any exception from it with so much pleasure. In this uncouth attitude the Irishman must, in his own defence and that of his whole country, be braver, and more nice in regard of his reputation than it is necessary for any other man to be. All that he gets generally for his pains is the character of having behaved as might be expected from an Irishman: yet if there be any crime or mistake in his conduct, not only he but his whole country is sure to pay for it. This, in strictness, regards only the Irishmen abroad; those at home may be Englishmen, and join in the banter when they please.

All this is owing to the calumny dispersed, time out of mind, by the tongues and pens of the two neighbouring nations, in order to justify their own barbarous proceedings in regard of that unhappy people. But, not to misspend our time upon those wretched historians and geographers who have continued so long to mislead the world in that respect, there has appeared of late a writer of importance, the malignity of whose aspersions upon the Irish has spread itself with an air both at home and abroad. This is the famous lord Clarendon, whose long legend is translated into French. He was the man generally employed by king Charles I. in that ruinous paper war he unfortunately waged with his parliamentarians, who never entered into negotiation with him but with a view of imposing upon the people, and procuring a respite for themselves when they were inferior in the field. In this fatal medley of war and peace, both out of their proper season, the king was undone, as well as the church and monarchy, by the mixture of fear and corruption that reigned in Clarendon, and his fellows of the privy-council. They engaged him to strip himself of his rights in favour of his rebels: and then took effectual care to alienate his mind from the most loyal subjects, especially the Irish, whom they represented as a parcel of inhuman, intractable, and senseless brutes, in order to deter him from accepting all they were worth in men and money, to support his sinking cause. These notable counsellors, after having done all the vile work inspired to them by their cowardice, or their hollow intrigues with parliament, fled generally to it, and became its dupes at last. The king, robbed by their infusions of the assistance of his most gallant and loyal friends, both in England and Ireland, found himself obliged to fly to the Scots, who soon delivered him up to his mortal enemies.

Clarendon followed the fate of the royal son, and would not suffer him to transport himself into Ireland at the instance of that English hero, lord Digby, in order to vindicate his own cause, and that of his father while he was yet alive. By his removal into France that was then, and a long time before, in a tacit confederacy with the parliament, the father lost his life upon the scaffold; the loyalists, and especially the Irish, were devoted to destruction soon after, for having been willing to support the king, in spite of his council. They lost their lives, and all their lands at home under the violence of a triumphant rebellion, when they had no prince to countenance or unite them. Numbers followed the royal exile; changed sides with him as he was obliged to change protection with the contending powers of France and Spain; served him faithfully, and assisted him in his distress. But the Clarendons of the council had contrived matters so well, that the father king could not maintain his rights, because they would not let him trust his friends; nor the son ever be restored, but by the declared enemies and assassins of his father.

At the Restoration, that ought to have settled the fundamentals both of church and state upon a basis no more to be shaken by popular commotions, the joy was so universal throughout upon the meeting of the king and his people, that they unhappily passed their time in capping of courtesy and compliments with each other. The king would exact nothing from them with an air of resolution, out of pure modesty and grateful deference to his restorers. Though he was very hard put to it for the maintaining of his own family, and in no manner of condition to reward his fellow-sufferers, he was advised, forsooth, only to recommend to his people, with great humility, what he should have demanded with authority for the redress of his and their former wrongs, and the further security both of the temporal and spiritual establishment. The people, on the other hand, were grown so weary of their past servitude, and so charmed to see their lawful prince among them, that they waited only for his commands to show their prompt obedience, and looked upon all his slight overtures, as things he had very little at heart.

In this giddy interval, the occasion of securing the rights both of church and state was lost: and the prime-minister Clarendon, who was taken for the king's second self, profited by the mutual ecstasy of king and people to advance the ends of his own avarice and ambition. While the prince, after so tedious an exile, gave himself up to the enjoyment of his present happiness, the subjects squared all the regulations of government, and the measures of justice, by the standard of Clarendon, whom they reckoned the faithful echo of their master's intentions. The plans of ecclesiastical and civil establishments were equally committed to his care; and he has left such a gangrene in both as has since reached their very vitals. The church, it is true, was restored to her livings; but her pales were so ill fenced, that an inundation of all those sectaries, who had so lately borne her down to the ground, has forced its way into her very sanctuary; and while they graciously suffer her name to subsist, appropriate to themselves all her riches and authority. Clarendon, in that happy conjuncture, might have gone the lengths of Laud and Strafford with success. But their undaunted zeal never could inhabit such a heart as his. They had rendered her one of the most firm and amiable societies in the universe, free from tyranny, inaccessible to heresy: whereas, in her present state, she is become the helpless victim of Clarendon's politics, and neither durst stand by her principles nor assert her doctrine, while all her hierarchy is in heterodox hands. Whatever the appearances may be, she has, in fact, changed places with her adversary. Presbytery is become episcopal; and she is reduced, in regard of her authority and livings, to be only presbyterian; in short, she has taken a huge dose of laudanum; and is in no danger, though she have no pulse, because she has been forced to sleep extremely sound.

All this has befallen the church, as a necessary consequence of Clarendon's horrible prevarications and injustices with respect to the state. In all national churches, loyalty and religion are linked in a very close union, and tend naturally to the support of each other. Where the one is wounded in any essential part, the evil is taking, and the other suffers of course. Clarendon opened the administration of king Charles II. with the most unexampled and impolitic scene, in regard of monarchy, that ever appeared in the world. The church and monarchy had just been rescued from the claws of a horrid rebellion. Those loyalists, whom neither the corruption of the former privy-council nor the terrors of the parliament had withdrawn from their zeal for the royal cause, had been long groaning under cruel oppression or miserable exile. They had now reason to flatter themselves, not only with the repossession of their land, but the reward of their sufferings and services. But though thousands of loyal families had been undone by the rebellion, Clarendon, by imposing on his master's indolence and facility, ordered matters so, that he was the only considerable gainer by the Restoration, and made his fortune by perpetuating the distress and unaccountable hard fate of the cavaliers, after the return of their prince. Those men of quality alone, who had the king's immediate favour, or cunning enough to deal with the chancellor in his own way, were reinstated in their lands. The rest, and the far greater number, were left to the wide world, or the permission of sharping by a lottery, which unworthy resource was soon taken from them. The rebels and their issue, the spawn of fanaticism and rebellion, were continued in their ill-gotten possessions, and consequently, as they had art enough to dissemble their old religion and principles, were gaily admitted into the best preferments both in church and state, and lent a helping hand to all their brethren in iniquity, under the same mask. The abandoned cavaliers and their disinherited offspring must even make the best of a bad world; and since they were undone by loyalty, endeavour to repair their broken fortunes by faction, and lie in wait for an opportunity to be revenged of the royal family. This could not be long missing in a government the majority of whose supporters were divided against it by their rotten and antimonarchical principles; and therefore it is observable that the most strenuous opposers of the royal cause since the Restoration were, and still are, the descendants of those families that had behaved with the stanchest loyalty in the days of king Charles I.

Thus the proceedings of Clarendon, upon the Restoration, only laid in seed for a large crop of rebellion. How could the church and monarchy thrive, by fostering their covert foes in their very bosom, and obliging their only friends to become their inveterate enemies? No loyalty in the universe but the Irish alone could be proof against such usage. No church in Christendom, not even the Catholic, could stand firm and united if sectaries of all the present denominations were admitted, upon the merit of one ceremony, or rather chosen to make up her hierarchy. And thus Clarendon, by his unjust and interested politics, has been the real father of Whiggism, the second edition corrected and amended of the Roundheads, that has found the way to make an indisputable property of Ireland, and to turn the natural frame of the church and state of England hors de page, by the address of stepping into their places.

This may seem hard upon the memory of that gentleman; but after the most impartial reflection it will be found undoubted truth. The gallant lord Digby opened the charge against him in parliament, the third year of his maladministration, to no purpose: his ascendant was still too prevalent over the king and the English nation. Most of the rebellious members, who owed their all to him, were yet alive; and the universities had not yet had time to form the youth to the ancient principles of honour and integrity. At length the veil was drawn off, and the eyes of the whole nation opened upon the iniquity of Clarendon, during the most loyal and wise session of parliament that perhaps ever was seen in England. But it was too late. Foundations could not be removed then, without threatening the whole building once again. The only redress that could be found for such a heap of crying injustices, that are and ever must be in force, was the head of Clarendon, that contrived and established them—an admirable state-mender, who had found no other expedient for the support of the monarchy but that of putting loyalty to death!

He fled his country and his master, after he had done them all the mischief he could, because he durst not stand his trial. He vanished, and left a horrible stench behind him to this day. The few friends he had, upon his impeachment, could find no defence for him against the vile treachery of having kept correspondence with his master's enemies during his exile, and made a visit, incognito, to Cromwell, upon his return from his embassy in Spain. He had no pretence to secure him from the vengeance due to his former crimes, but that ample act of oblivion he had penned himself upon the Restoration, and had made so vastly comprehensive in order to find room in it for his own iniquity. But that mare magnum could not save him from the prodigious charge of having sold, not settled, the whole kingdom of Ireland afterward. His flight alone could rescue him from the wrath of the whole English nation against him, for his having doomed so many thousands of innocent, or rather of meriting people, to the utmost extremities of shame, cold, and hunger, to serve the purposes of his own corruption, and to make rebellion as lasting as the world.

Not all the mutual cruelty of the civil war, not the massacre acted in Ireland, first under the connivance of the roundhead justices at Clontarf, Ballock &c.; next by the Scots in the island of Maggee, near Carrickfergus, and then by sir Phelim O'Neil's brutal revenge in a part of the north, which was retaliated more than tenfold by Coote, Ireton, and Cromwell, over that whole kingdom, can equal the list of those loyal Irish families which have been rased out of the world in miserable infamy by the pen of Clarendon! The rump parliament, and all its emissaries, were but transient plagues, that rioted for a while over the church, the state, and the royal family of England. The hand of God soon overtook them. They died, and all their iniquities and abominations had died with them, had not the church, the state, and the royal family, found their bane perpetuated to immortality by the single corruption of Mr. Hyde, the chancellor of the exchequer and the lord high-chancellor of England.

During his voluntary exile, Clarendon, to justify himself and his amphibious companions of the former privy-council, digested at Rouen that long and eloquent satire he had composed, for the most part, in the isle of Jersey, upon the king's father and all his friends, but especially the Irish; because they never can forgive who do the wrong. He has taken a vast deal of pains to blanch rebellion in all its promoters, and cast invidious colours upon the most eminent loyalists. He can scarce find a man of thorough worth and sense in the royal party in England, except Mr. Hyde, the chancellor of the exchequer, and the lord Falkland. No Irishman has the honour of his approbation but Daniel O'Neil[a] and colonel Wogan.[b] However, though he allows the former more sense than came to his share of all his countrymen together, he vitiates that sense with a mxiture of too much cunning, whereby he mounted to the sublime post of groom of the bedchamber, which, in his opinion, ought to be inaccessible to an Irishman. As for colonel Wogan, he is so much in love with him that he sinks the mention of his country; and though he executed his purpose with wonderful courage and dexterity, he looks upon him as a little out of his senses because he was extremely loyal and brave. He omits, however, giving him the honour of having saved the king's life at the battle, or rather flight, of Worcester, by the desperate stand he made at the head of 300 horse against Cromwell's whole army, in the suburbs of that town, till the king and colonel Careless were out of sight. How could the father king be maintained on his throne, or the son be restored to it by his friends, since, in the language of their dastard or corrupt counsellors, all that was brave was mad, and all that was thoroughly loyal and firm savoured of popery: but as an instance of the unfair dealing of the English historians, the glory of the escape at Worcester has always been ascribed to their countryman Careless, as if it were more honourable to fly with the king than to stop those that are in full chase after him. The rest of the Irish, according to Clarendon, were a horrid compound of stupidity and barbarism, except the marquises of Ormond and Clanricard, who were still more cunning than Daniel O'Neil, and not half so mad as Wogan. Yet if the privy-council of king Charles I. had been as wise or as honest as the supreme council of Kilkenny,* he had never been engaged to divest himself of his own will and prerogative till he was forced to maintain his cause with the wretched remains; he had never been sold by one people, or beheaded by another, who had nothing but treason in their hearts and cant in their religion.

But, on the other hand, Clarendon so kindly recommends the persons, and mixes such shining colours in the talents and characters of the most notorious traitors, that one can hardly find in his heart to detest them for their villanies. The virtues of the bravest cavaliers are tarnished, and the vices of the blackest republicans brightened up in his hands. Milton engages our fancies, perhaps too far, in favour of the devils, by the lively and beautiful images he often mixes with their characters; but if he had dealt with the angels as Clarendon has with the cavaliers, the devils had undoubtedly been the heroes of his poem. In short, he has left a legend to all posterity, the best lesson that has ever yet been given to wicked subjects, and the most encouraging, to dethrone or destroy their kings.

If justice had been done to that voluminous treatise, it should have had the same fate with the petition he left behind him in London, addressed to the house of lords, by way of justification, which was unanimously voted by both houses a malicious and scandalous paper, and a reproach to the justice of the nation.

But that posthumous work came out in excellent season for him. The church was wonderfully perverted for him, which made her overlook the mortal wound he has given her through the side of the state. The state was possessed by his grandchild. The witnesses against his falsehoods and calumnies were no more in being. That England, which had him in the greatest detestation in 1667, and for many years after, subsisted no longer. The lists, both ecclesiastical and civil, were thronged either with the unwary admirers of his style, or with those that owed their fortunes to his motley establishments. His perpetual running down of the Irish was no small help toward gaining him a general benevolence among the English and Scots, whose rank treasons he had taken so much pains to soften or to spare. His books had frontlets of Scripture to recommend and sanctify all their venom. This is but the second part of the Spanish hypocrisy in America, while they murdered whole nations in cold blood with their beads in their hands.

How could any better dealings be expected from a man who had resolved to make his fortune at any rate, nay at the expense of his trust, honour, and loyalty, when abroad; as most of his companions in the former privy-council had done before him, to keep their estates at home? He had none to lose that could be as beneficial to him as his attendance on his exiled master. However, in order to bid fair for one, it is notorious that, in the year 1657, when he found his master's affairs desperate, he made his peace and terms with Cromwell, by the mediation of Mr. secretary Thurloe, whom he was afraid, on account of that confidence, not to protect after the Restoration; and then, since he could not sell his master during his exile, he made himself more than amends after his return. He first sold one of his kingdoms, with all its loyal subjects (who had ruined themselves by their endeavours to serve and assist him, both in and out of their country), to his known enemies: he then, by his base and faithless moderation, sold the church and state of England to their false friends: and, lastly, did worse, by the rotten foundations he laid, than Cromwell and all his accomplices could ever have compassed, since he sold the royal family of England to distress and exile for all eternity.

As I am under voluntary articles neither to conceal nor disguise any of my thoughts from Mentor, my spirit has been tempted to wander into this long dissertation, in order to give itself some ease, while it had the satisfaction of opening itself entirely to him. I am willing to flatter myself it has some sympathy with his, which I should be extremely sorry to shock, or even disoblige, by this frank confession of my sentiments. If I have incurred his displeasure by any freedom of speech that may be offensive, or any notions that may be repugnant to his, I submit to his censure, and am willing to stand corrected. I do not pretend either to instruct his better genius, or to force my thoughts upon him. I am a fond admirer of that worth and generosity which has put a stop to his rising in the world. I have no personal enmity to any man living, nor any interest in view that can interfere in the least with Mentor's.

It is true, I reckon Clarendon a more pernicious subject and a worse man than the brave and wicked Cromwell. I take him to be the author of most irreparable mischiefs to the church, the state, and more especially to the people of England, whom his design to maintain in a perpetual superiority over their prince has devoted to perpetual slavery. He, for his own ends, (as he fairly declared to the earl of Southampton,) as well as in compliment to them, hindered the first parliament after the Restoration to settle a constant and indefeasible revenue upon the crown; whereby it had been screened from factions, and the government from revolution, which must necessarily happen where the prince must depend on the people for his yearly subsistence, and the maintenance of his own state and family. This was by no means the circumstances of the kings of England till James I. had squandered away all the royal demesnes upon his hungry and insatiable countrymen; and so made his son a sacrifice by forcing him to become a bull-beggar.

All the constitutions of our western world began by limited monarchies, after the fall of the Roman empire, as most adapted to the spirit and genius of our Gothic ancestors. These limitations regarded the measures of peace, the means of war, and the regular administration of justice, but not the daily bread of the sovereigns, who had lands and immediate vassalages of their own for the support of their estate and dignity. Our Norman monarchs were the only arbitrary ones in Europe, except those of Castile, who were complimented with absolute sway by the people to enable them, without any delay or consultation, to issue their orders, and repress the sudden invasions of the Moors, whose neighbourhood was a perpetual alarm.

However, as the common people of England were generally villains or slaves to their lords, these lords became, by the importance of their vassalages, an hereditary council of state, upon extraordinary occasions, when it was thought convenient to gain their assistance by the compliment of asking their advice or their concurrence in taxing their vassals for the public good. The weak princes of the Plantagenet family (which has produced the greatest in Europe) were strangely given over to favourites and minions; as weak princes generally are, because they have not their glory and power so much at heart as their private satisfaction. The barons, as counsellors by their birth and fortune, were so disgusted at this humour, and at subsidies and other vexations that had their rise in the king's closet, and not in his council, that they made frequent confederacies of rebellion, on pretence of grievances; and as they were supported by the people, obtained great concessions in their favour from the crown. The kings found no way of supporting themselves against the barons, but by disengaging the people from them This they effected by admitting them, who had no manner of pretence to it before, to appear by their representatives in the great council of the nation which obtained the name of parliament, whenever they had any occasion for subsidies against the barons, or the foreign enemies of the state. The people, in return of their liberalities, obtained frequent enlargements of their privileges. But the Plantagenets and Tudors had still an ample share of their absolute dominion left, and were greatly superior both to the people and the barons. They had it always in their power to divide and rule, because they had wherewithal, by their own demesnes, to maintain their state independent of them, except where the right of the crown was in dispute. They called parliaments when they listed, and dissolved them as freely; or browbeat them, when they had spirit, into what they pleased. Whether it regarded peace or war, church or state, their will, in effect, was a law; and they had no need either of tricks or double-dealings, or of upstart prime-ministers. These they made use of to execute their orders, not to gain their points.

But after king James I. had lavished the ample demesnes left him by queen Elizabeth, the case was quite altered. His successor could neither maintain his authority over the people nor in his own house, for want of means to support his dignity. He was reduced to a wretched dependency on his vassals, who never fail of becoming insolent where they know they are masters. As fast as he called them together they began with complaints, though they never had less cause for them. He wanted subsidies, in fact, for the maintenance of his household, but made use of other pretences, after the example of his ancestors, who were under no such extremities at home. They immediately called for the previous redress of supposed grievances, and so he dissolved and redissolved them, which was almost the only branch of power he had left him. Under these hardships he could hold out no longer; and, without debasing his majesty, could find no other resource for subsisting in independency but that of reviving some rights and claims of his despotic ancestors, which were grown into disuse, because they had no need of them. All this came very short of his necessary expenses, and increased the ill humour of the people; who were growing extremely rich and luxuriant, on account of giving him nothing but extorted trifles. At length his wants obliged him to lay himself at the mercy of a saucy and inexorable house of commons, upon which he, his ministers, and his barons split at last. Surely no prince ever found himself in so forlorn and deplorable a situation as his, from the first sitting of that parliament upon his majesty till the last sitting upon his life.

He had been long borrowing from all the world, upon the credit of dead authority, in order to give bread to a household he could not pay. All his servants, from the secretaries of state down to the scullions of his kitchen, were in an interest contrary to that of his dignity, and could never hope either for their arrears or their current wages, but by his being well with a parliament that never intended to be well with him. His honour was concerned in supporting his rights; his necessity and conscience in making away with them by degrees, in hopes that his parliament might at length be engaged by his condescensions to allow him wherewithal to pay his debts and defray his daily expenses. All those that served him, either in his council or his house or his parliament, had a personal interest in making him take this party, except those very few that were sacrificed for voting generously, and at their own cost, on the side of his honour. All the rest were bribed against his royal dignity, by their wants and their fears; and not only left him to be worried unmercifully by two nations, under the insolent pretensions of loyalty and religion, but obliged him to waste part of his force, and all his indignation, against a third, the only one that had real loyalty and religion enough to restore him.

The mettle and superior genius of Cromwell subdued faction and rebellion, by the very power they had put into their hands against the lawful sovereign. He supported his state, and terrified all Europe, as well as the three nations, by the grandeur of his courage and the spirit of his army, which he made, in effect, his parliament. They paid themselves, and laughed at the constitution. Upon the return of king Charles II., the English nation, grown wise by a very dear-bought experience, had resolved, at their first meeting in parliament, to set the royal family in its ancient state of independency upon the people, except upon extraordinary occasions, by settling a perpetual revenue on the crown, and thereby securing it from the unavoidable danger and insolence of faction. Clarendon, as perfidious to his country as to his sovereign, has hindered this excellent purpose from taking effect, by his vile and interested infusions, and made himself a merit with the English nation of what has left it a prey ever since to unavoidable discontents and convulsions. By this means, and the abrogation of the ancient tenures, the crown was abandoned to a more wretched necessity of begging annually and condescending than before; and robbed of its old influence and authority over the people. Thus the kings of England were left in a worse state than the ancient kings of Sparta. Their cellars, their kitchens, and the wages of their footmen and grooms, depended upon the good graces of the house of commons: their inherent rights of making war, and peace, and alliances, or issuing quo warrantos, &c., were but mere feathers, the sport of every wind that blew from the ephori of the people.

In this manner king Charles II., though the idol of England, was forced, by the malign ascendant of Clarendon, to become her wretched pensioner. King only (and a very limited king) of Scotland, and tyrant of Ireland, to no manner of purpose for himself, but to the exceeding joy of his own and his father's enemies, he led a life of continual struggle and uneasiness, from which he had no relief, but in turning rake and drowning his royal spleen in all the common pleasures he could afford himself. To ward against those factions that arose naturally out of the triumph of the good old cause, and aimed at nothing less than his life and dignity, he found himself obliged to become a captain Tom too, to mix his majesty with the mob, and turn cabalist and factioneer, as well and as knavishly as the best of them. He must call parliaments as oft as his wants called upon him, not to advise him, (according to their original institution,) but merely to keep him from starving At length he grew weary of acting a part so far beneath him: he plucked up his spirit by calling to mind the power of his ancestors, cast his enemies into a panic fear, put Presbytery to death, and died soon after he had made himself in effect king of England.

His successor, who had not the force of his genius, and had more religion than either he or Clarendon would have thought necessary, was soon outwitted and outdone by faction. He had been used to closeting, favourites, and intrigues during his former life, in order to secure his rights against the inconvenience of that religion; and after he had mounted the throne with great acclamation, he misplaced his confidence upon those that grew too hard for him at his own weapons. A he had made himself pretty easy in his domestic circumstances, by making up a little demesne of forfeited estates, he was not so entirely at the devotion of his parliament as his predecessors had been; and so began to resume the old prerogatives of the crown, without a sufficient fund of money, or friends, or art, to make them pass upon a people that had so long looked upon themselves as masters, with a great deal of reason. He did not sink under the mutual villany of privy-council and parliament, like his father; his favourites in the privy-council alone were more than enough for him. Deserted by two kingdoms, and attacked by a foreign power; since he was too good-natured to allow any foreign power to support him, he had nothing left but the common people of Ireland, and those remnants of Catholic nobility and gentry there who had rested their estates, by favour or interest at court, out of the intricacies of Clarendon's act of settlement: for the infinitely greater number of Irish proprietors, though restored to their lands by the act of repeal, had been bred in so much distress and ignorance that they could scarce be of any use to him. And so he was obliged to abandon that kingdom to its evil destiny, as the other two had abandoned him.

Now Clarendon's politics began to have their full effect. His posterity was seated on the throne. The republican tares had been sown so thick in the church and state of England that they choked and overtopped the genuine grain. King James II. had given a liberty of conscience in general. This, as it was shocking to the established church, was exchanged, by the prevalence of calvinistical and freethinking interlopers, for the softer title of toleration, which has been improved by a very easy turn of legerdemain into actual dominion. A great cry was kept up on all sides about the dangers that threatened the church. The unthinking Tories, or church-of-England men, joined in it along with the Whigs, with a view of keeping out popery. The Whigs heightened it at every turn, not to keep out popery, which they made use of as a bugbear, but to oblige the church to suppress her true doctrine and discipline, and let in presbytery. The Tories were all along the dupes of this farce; and king William, with all his penetration, could not see through the whole plot, or did not go all the lengths he should to favour the Whigs, and thereby secure his own independency on the people. He had a very uneasy time of it, while he laboured in vain to mix parties that never can incorporate.' The Whig will never become Tory: the Tory, generally speaking, is not so stubborn. It is true, he never will expose his life or his fortune by rising to the sublime pitch of a cavalier, which renders any government secure against him. He may drink, and prate, and protest, to get a name among the vulgar; but Clarendon's usage of the loyalists after the Restoration is a sufficient warning to him to keep his own house and live within the verge of the laws in being. However, as he will not play the fool for church or state, he is extremely wise in regard of himself. Royalty and religion hang loose enough about him, and he can turn Whig without much difficulty, where he can find a considerable advantage in it. And thus king William, by endeavouring to jumble both parties together, became agreeable to neither; and had shared the same fate with his predecessor, if the war which England necessarily drew upon itself, and the absolute dominion he had over the seven provinces, had not kept him on the throne. For since the government of England has been reduced to a democracy by Clarendon, the Whigs must reign alone, or it must be in perpetual convulsions.

That prince had not found out this grand arcanum, which has since been discovered, and put in practice with infallible success; and has rendered his successors under an air of limitation as absolute in fact as any of our ancient monarchs, or of the present kings of Christendom. It is true the Tories had a lucid interval in the last years of queen Anne; but it could not last, because they never can have spirit enough to play all their game and fix their fortune. The Whigs, that will ever despise them as a rope of sand, have still art and mettle enough, though they be at the lowest ebb, to frighten or make them fall together by the ears, and thereby make a jest of all their projects. While the crown has no demesnes nor any settled revenue, the Tories can never do its business with unanimity and success. The Whigs, whose birthright it is to make the people uneasy and mutinous, can never miss of breaking, or at least thwarting their measures, under colour of their concern for the grievances and unsupportable taxes laid on the public. But let the prince put himself wholly under their protection, he is perfectly safe in regard of the Tories; and the Whigs will easily find the method of paying him, and themselves into the bargain, at the expense of the people, and with the most careless contempt of their adversaries. A prime-minister, under the inoffensive title of treasurer or secretary; a privy-council, under the title of parliament, the majority of which is gained over by his art or his largesses, and who, in return, secure the nation, with all its wealth, will, and power, in the most implicit obedience to him, and consequently to his master; does all the business of the crown to a wonder, and reduces the people, by their own consent, to as much slavery as is convenient for all the purposes of the prince.

Thus, in regard of the government, Clarendon's politics are entirely overset. He has ruined one royal family by leaving it at the mercy of the people; he has ruined the rights of the people by leaving them at the mercy of another that has been too cunning for him, and found the knack of keeping them whom he proposed to leave masters for ever, under perpetual and unlimited subjection, by the help and corruption of their representatives, notwithstanding the addition of new and more irksome limitations of the crown. He had destroyed the cavaliers at the Restoration, and has given the coup de grace to the Tories at the Revolution, which was a child of his own begetting upon the body of the former iniquity.

The world has never seen a frame of government so nicely fitted for all the purposes of the sovereign as the present constitution of England. The king has not a foot of land; yet all Britain is his property in fact: he is under the most unbecoming restrictions in the eyes of the people; however, he can be as despotic, when he thinks it necessary, as William the Conqueror; provided he save appearances by letting old forms subsist in the administration, he can turn them to what use he thinks proper, and has no need of very great dexterity in the management. The people flatter themselves with a notion of being free, because they have an air of being represented; and yet it is that very representation makes them slaves. They have no real liberty left but that of the press, which would soon grow contemptible in their own eyes if the minister (against whom it is generally directed) had sense enough to despise it. The barons have no shadow of their old authority, only in the vain formality of entering their protests by half-dozens against the votes of a vast and a sure majority, that speaks the sense of the minister, while it pretends to speak that of the nation. All this is a riddle,—yet every cobbler in England can unfold it, to no manner of purpose for himself or his country. The charm is irresistible; all the subjects are caught in the snare that Clarendon had laid for the sovereign.

In the mean time the prince, vested by this magic in as much real state and power as the most arbitrary monarch in Europe, has other advantages, which none of them can share with him. The interposition of his parliament screens him from all censure, as well as danger or want. Though he be an arrant knave in his dealings with his people, or a notorious trickster and breaker of public faith in regard of his foreign alliances, he is ever absolved by the unthinking world, and the blame thrown entirely on his parliament; which he is still supposed, upon the credit of a received tradition, not to be able to govern or lead into all his honest purposes, though it be in reality the best trained and most easily managed of any beast of burden in the universe. So that, as things now stand, Clarendon's antimonarchical scheme is like to continue for ever the surest support of tyranny. The Whigs must be the majority in parliament. They alone can be bribed to sell and subdue the people; and a king of Great Britain must be a downright fool or a madman not to be on a surer foot of reputation, as well as power, than any other sovereign upon earth. He may be at the head of different alliances at the same time, as well as of different churches; and has a more undisputed right to personal infallibility than the pope. The other monarchies of Europe, originally limited, have become absolute by the policy of keeping their ancient demesnes, and adding those of the rebellious barons to them from time to time; that of England, by having no demesnes at all.

In this happy circumstance, a king of England, while he is in perfect security at home, can keep his foreign enemies in awe by the terror of his fleets at sea, and confederacies on the continent, or by sowing corruption in councils and cabinets abroad, which are now as accessible to it as his parliament. If intrigue should fail, the Whigs, by whom he reigns, will always find him money enough to do the business. In the mean time he can stand in no manner of apprehension with respect to any part of his subjects, except a distant one, in regard of those established by Clarendon, to wit, the Irish Whigs. These have had earnest longings after independency, both upon the church and state of England, ever since their establishment in Ireland. The division of the vulgar of that country from them in point of religion, and the long peace of the neighbouring powers with England, have rendered all their views impracticable hitherto. England is mad enough to encourage persecution in that country; and if they can, by executing the penal laws in all their rigour, force the people at length to be of a piece with them, they may not be long to seek for a proper occasion to withdraw themselves from the dominion of England, as the Portuguese did some time ago from that of Spain, though upon the same continent. In that case, as they were founded upon presbytery and fanaticism, the ecclesiastical livings will be no small accession of power and encouragement for them to return to the religion of their fathers. Their honour will be concerned in having a church of their own; and there is nothing so easy as to make five hundred as good as any of those now in being within the comprehensive system.

Who can think it strange, after all, that Clarendon should reckon the Irish a blind and stupid people, since they could not discover the broad way to their temporal and eternal happiness as well as he and all his pupils of the present latitude? But, in the name of wonder, since they could have made the way to heaven, notwithstanding the needless burden of their articles of faith, why should they be destroyed in this world merely upon account of them? After having suffered so much for their rebellion against Cromwell, why should they be made martyrs to their loyalty, when their king was actually on the throne? a man must be stupid indeed not to see through all this mechanism of sacrificing people to God and to the devil at once. But, thanks to their stars! their friend Clarendon is still alive: his spirit of persecution will open their eyes at last, and bring them to their senses. Whenever they can get clear of the devil in his way, by having little or no religion at all, they will soon become as wise as their neighbours; and, by agreeing among themselves, get clear of England and her church too into the bargain.

Dear Mentor, excuse me for having finished, as folks do generally in their drink, with a dispute about religion; I love religion with all my soul where it is sincere; but abhor, above all things, the pretence or abuse of it, to advance any purpose but those that regard the other world. As I have a soul (I hope) to be saved, I have studied all the present religions with care; and, if my creed did not determine me to be a Catholic, I freely own I should be troubled with none of them, because of all the vile and cruel rogueries I have seen them misapplied to. Most of them, for want of authority, are lost in freethinking; others, by arrogating too much authority, vanish into superstition. These two kinds, abandoned to such extremities, have infinitely more business upon earth than ever they are like to have in heaven. The catholic may be free from either if he pleases; if he fall into either, he must be knave or fool. The same may be said of a national church, guarded by the civil, and fenced by her own ecclesiastical authorty. She may be very catholic, without being enslaved to the decertals and extravagancies of popery; or overlaid by the heavier weight of presbytery; or made the jest and handmaid of freethinking. It is a general remark that two of a trade cannot agree. The most sanguine Jesuits, though they are forced to keep some measures, are horribly cried out at by those who pretend to the strictest kind of reformation: yet these, whenever they get the temporal power into their hands, outdo them infinitely in all their arts of double-dealing and tyranny. But all our jars are a noise about nothing.—Clarendon, a man of much more religion and sense than either the apostles, fathers, or councils, has discovered, of late, that heresy is only a dream; since, according to him, Catholic and Christian are one and the same thing in fact. So let us burn our books and our schools, for there is an end of controversy. However, let us keep rancour and persecution on foot, with all the zeal of our fathers. There has been, and there is still, something to be got by it.

I own I am a little mad; so Mentor must take nothing ill that I say to him. My patience is exhausted, and I have done all I could to tire his. He must blame his own good nature, that has given me room to vent my spleen. As I have no friend here of genius or freedom of thought enough to comprehend these notions, they had rotted in my breast, and thrown me, perhaps, into some dangerous indisposition, if I had not come out with them. I am now setting out upon an expedition against the Moors, since the modern Christians are too hard for me; and, whatever may be my fate, it is an exceeding comfort to me to have thus discharged my conscience in regard of these, before I enter the lists against their brethren the Mahometans.

As for the blank verses which I recommended so earnestly to the care of Mentor, I now abandon them to his discretion. If he thinks them worth his correction, he will give them to the public as he proposes, without the name of an author, and with his own after the epistle to recommend them. It will do me a great deal of honour, and I will take care it shall do him no manner of mischief. If he neglect publishing them, I shall have the mortification of believing the present I took the liberty to make him no worth his while, or that my present liberty of speech is offensive to him. This must not be. We are all brethren in fact; and no man should be angry at another for using him with all the intimacy of a friend, and opening his whole heart to him without malice or disguise. I beg pardon of Mentor, and of all those great names he mentions, for my censures upon rhyme and raillery, which he may soften or expunge entirely, according to his better judgment. I should be very sorry to make enemies of those whom, of all mankind, I would choose to make my friends. Mr. Pope and I lived in perfect union and familiarity, for two or three summers, before he entered upon the stage of the world, where he has since gained so great and so just an applause. The other geniuses have a right to all my regard, by the merit of sharing the affection and esteem of Mentor, who will do me a great deal of honour if he allow me any place in so learned and polite a society. Without any compliment, they are fitter for the Augustan age than for this. They are at home, and endeavour to give the world a sense of its follies with great humour and gaitey. The cheerfulness of my temper is, in a great measure, sunk under a long and hopeless exile, which has given it a serious, or, if you will, a supercilious turn. I lash the world with indignation and grief, in the strain of Jeremiah. But the world is grown so inveterate in iniquity, that I fear we shall all lose our labour. It will have just the same effect to flog as to tickle them. However, if there be any room for a grave, sullen fellow, that has been one of the merriest fellows in Europe, in Mentor's academy, I offer myself: and, to pay my entrance, as I did in Newgate,[a] I send him a kilderkin of the best wine on this side of the country, to drink their healths, and mine if he pleases. I accept, with a great deal of acknowledgments, the present of books offered me by Mentor, and desire he will send along with them Dr. Jonathan Swift's "Miscellanies," which they tell me are worth them all. I can give him nothing in return, but some heads of the Saracens of Oran, which I shall be ordered to cut off, because they will not become Christians. I must be their executioner in my own defence; for, with all my spleen and vexation of spirit, I am the most inoffensive creature in the world in regard of religion. I would not shed one ounce of blood in anger or enmity, or wrong any man living of a cracked sixpence, to make all the world Catholics; yet I am as stanch a one myself as any Pope in the universe. I am all for the primitive church, in which people made proof of their religion only at their own expense. But I laugh with great contempt at those who will force others to Heaven their way, in spite of charity.

Though I should be in the deserts of Libya, I can still hear from Mentor. It is not necessary he should submit his criticism or correction to me, since I constitute him my judge without appeal. The gentleman of my family mentioned by him is the honestest but the idlest fellow breathing: I cannot even get a letter from him. Thus my reliance for the revising and publishing of those pieces is entirely upon Mentor, whom I embrace with all my heart this 27th of February, 1732.

FROM MR. GAY.

March 13, 1732.

Dear Sir,—I hope this unlucky accident of hurting your leg will not prevent your coming to us this spring, though you say nothing about it. All your friends expect it and particularly my landlord and landlady, who are my friends as much as ever; and I should not think them so if they were not as much yours. The downs of Amesbury are so smooth that neither horse nor man can hardly make a wrong step, so that you may take your exercise with us with greater security. If you prevail with the duchess to ride and walk with you, you will do her good; but that is a motive I could never prevail with her to comply with. I wish you would try whether your oratory could get over this difficulty. General Dormer, sir Clement Cotterell, and I set out to-morrow morning for Rousham, in Oxfordshire, to stay ten days or a fortnight. The duchess will undertake to recommend the lords of her acquaintance to attend Mr. Ryves's cause, if it should come on before our return; the duke will do the same. Her grace, too, has undertaken to answer your letter. I have not disposed of your South-Sea bonds; there is a year's interest due at Lady-day. Were I to dispose of them at present, I should lose a great deal of the premium I paid for them: perhaps they may fall lower, but I cannot prevail with myself to sell them. The rogueries that have been discoveried on some other companies, I believe, make them all have less credit. I find myself dispirited for want of having some pursuit. Indolence and idleness are the most tiresome things in the world. I begin to find a dislike to society. I think I ought to try to break myself of it, but I cannot resolve to set about it. I have left off almost all my great acquanitance, which saves me something in chair-hire, though in that article the town is still very expensive. Those who were your old acquaintance are almost the only people I visit; and, indeed, upon trying all, I like them best. Lord Cornbury refused the pension that was offered him; he is chosen to represent the university of Oxford, in the room of Mr. Bromley, without opposition. I know him, and I think he deserves it. He is a young nobleman of learning and morals, which is so particular that I know you will respect and value him; and to my great comfort, he lives in our family. Mr. Pope is in town and in good health. I lately passed a week with him at Twickenham. I must leave the rest to the duchess: for I must pack up my shirts, to set out to-morrow, being the 14th of March, the day after I received your letter. If you would advise the duchess to confine me four hours a-day to my own room, while I am in the country, I will write; for I cannot confine myself as I ought.

TO MR. FAULKNER.

Deanery-house, March 28, 1732.

Mr. Faulkner,—Without the least regard to your wager, I do assure you, upon my word and reputation, that I am not the author of one single line or syllable of that pamphlet called "An Infallible Scheme to Pay the Debts of the Nation;"[a] and, as it is a very unjust, so it is equally an imprudent and fallible proceeding, to pronounce determinately on our taste and knowledge of style or manner of writing, where very good judges are often deceived: and in this case, few men have suffered so much as myself, who have borne the reproach of many hundred printed papers which I never saw. I do likewise protest in the same manner that I did not write the epigram upon Taylor, nor heard of it until Mr. Pilkington showed it me in manuscript. Therefore, pray desire your wagerer, from me, to be more cautious in determining on such matters, and not venture the loss of his money and credit with so much odds against him. I am your humble servant,

Jonathan Swift.

[a] Where he had been imprisoned as one of the rebels taken at Preston in 1715.

[a] Which was written by Mr. Pilkington, and is founded upon a hint in "Gulliver's Travels" for levying a tax upon vices.

If this fancy should hold, of taxing me with all the papers that come out, and at the same time I should take a fancy to be a writer, I shall be discovered when I have no mind, for it will be only to catechise me whenever I am suspected.

TO LADY ACHESON.

AN APRIL-FOOL LETTER.

Saturday morning, 1732.

A GENTLEMAN called here last night upon some business, who took Mr. ———'s house yesterday at dinner in his return from Wicklow.[a] He tells me that Mrs. ——— was brought to-bed yesterday morning at five o'clock of half a child, just as if it were divided in two equal parts. It had one eye, half a nose, and a mouth, one leg, and so from top to bottom. They could see it was a boy, or rather half a boy: it was dead born, but she is very well. It was thought that this was the cause of all her colics. Mrs. Brent tells me she has known the like more than once. I am glad the poor woman had her mother and sister with her.

Are you not undone for want of Monky? How are you? Does your milk agree with you? We shall see you no more at church until Monday returns. Adieu, &c. I mend a little.

FROM LADY ACHESON.

Saturday morning, 1752.

I AM greatly surprised at the account you gave me of poor Mrs. ———; but since it was so, I am heartily glad she has got rid of it. Mrs. Morris's gout seized her all over on Thursday, so that she keeps her bed. None of them know anything of this matter: they sent a boy yesterday to Dilginney, (I will not mention this thing to them till he returns,) to let them know she was not able to go to the country. I am sorry that you mend but a little; this bad weather has increased my cough; the milk agrees very well with me. I will be at your church to-morrow. I am, yours, &c.

TO MR. GAY.

Dublin, May 4, 1732

I AM now as lame as when you wrote your letter, and almost as lame as your letter itself, for want of that limb from my lady duchess, which you promised, and without which I wonder how it could limp hither. I am not in a condition to make a true step even on Amesbury downs, and I declare that a corporeal false step is worse than a political one: nay, worse than a thousand political ones, for which I appeal to courts and ministers, who hobble on and prosper without the sense of feeling. To talk of riding and walking is insulting me, for I can as soon fly as do either. It is your pride or laziness, more than chair-hire, that makes the town expensive. No honour is lost by walking in the dark; and in the day you may beckon a blackguard boy under a gate, near your visiting place, (experto crede,) save elevenpence, and get half-a-crown's worth of health. The worst of my present misfortune is, that I eat and drink, and can digest neither for want of exercise; and, to increase my misery, the knaves are sure to find me at home, and make huge void spaces in my cellars. I congratulate with you for losing your great acquaintance; in such a case, philosophy teaches that we must submit and be content with good ones. I like lord Cornbury's refusing his pension, but I demur at his being elected for Oxford; which, I conceive, is wholly changed, and entirely devoted to new principles; so it appeared to me the two last times I was there.

I find by the whole cast of your letter that you are as giddy and as volatile as ever: just the reverse of Mr. Pope, who has always loved a domestic life from his youth. I was going to wish you had some little place that you could call your own, but I profess I do not know you well enough to contrive any one system of life that would please you. You pretend to preach up riding and walking to the duchess, yet, from my knowledge of you after twenty years, you always joined a violent desire of perpetually shifting places and company with a rooted laziness and an utter impatience of fatigue. A coach and six horses is the utmost exercise you can bear, and this only when you can fill it with such company as is best suited to your taste; and how glad would you be if it could waft you in the air to avoid jolting; while I, who am so much later in life, can, or at least could, ride five hundred miles on a trotting horse. You mortally hate writing, only because it is the thing you chiefly ought to do; as well to keep up the vogue you have in the world, as to make you easy in your fortune: you are merciful to everything but money, your best friend, whom you treat with inhumanity. Be assured I will hire people to watch all your motions and to return me a faithful account. Tell me, have you cured your absence of mind? can you attend to trifles? can you at Amesbury write domestic libels to divert the family and neighbouring squires for five miles round? or venture so far on horseback without apprehending a stumble at every step? can you set the footmen a-laughing as they wait at dinner? and do the duchess's women admire your wit? in what esteem are you with the vicar of the parish? can you play with him at backgammon? have the farmers found out that you cannot distinguish rye from barley, or an oak from a crab-tree? You are sensible that I know the full extent of your country skill is in fishing for roaches or gudgeons at the highest.

I love to do you good offices with your friends, and therefore desire you will show this letter to the duchess, to improve her grace's good opinion of your qualifications, and convince her how useful you are likely to be in the family. Her grace shall have the honour of my correspondence again when she goes to Amesbury. Hear a piece of Irish news: I buried the famous general Meredyth's father last night in my cathedral, he was ninety-six years old; so that Mrs. Pope may live seven years longer. You saw Mr. Pope in health, pray is he generally more healthy than when I was among you? I would know how your own health is, and how much wine you drink in a day? My stint in company is a pint at noon, and half as much at night; but I often dine at home like a hermit, and then I drink little or none at all. Yet I differ from you, for I would have society, if I could get what I like, people of middle understanding and middle rank. Adieu.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

London, May 13, 1732.

I AM sorry my writing should inconvenience your eyes; but I fear it is rather my style than my ink that is so hard to be read: however, if I do not forget myself, I will enlarge my hand to give you the less trouble. Their graces are at last arrived in perfect health, in spite of all their perils and dangers, though I must own they were so long in their voyage that they gave me an exceeding heartache; and if that would be any hinderance, they shall never have my consent to go back to Ireland, but remain here and be only king of Knowle[a] and Drayton; and I do not think it would be the worse for him, either in person or pocket. I dare say he would not need a remembrancer's office for anything you have spoke to him about: but, however, I will not fail in the part that you have set me.

[a] A delightful village in the county of Wicklow, about fourteen miles from Dublin.

I find you want a strict account of me how I pass my time. But first, I thank you for the nine hours out of the twenty-four you bestowed on sleeping; one or two of them I do willingly present you back again. As to quadrille, though I am, generally speaking, a constant attendant to it every day, yet I will most thankfully submit to your allowance of time; for, when complaisance draws me no further, it is with great yawnings and a vast expense of my breath is asking Who plays? Who's called? And what's trumps? and if you can recollect anything of my former way of life, such as it was, so it is. I never loved to have my hands idle; they were either full of work or had a book; but as neither sort was the best or most useful, so you will find forty years and a wee bit have done no more good to my head than it has to my face. Your old friend Biddy is much your humble servant, and could she get rid of her cough, her spleen would do her and her friend no harm; for she loves a sly sedate joke as well as ever you knew her do.

The duke and duchess are just come in, who both present their service to you, and will take it as a favour, if you will bestow any of your time that you can spare upon lord George.[a]

Adieu; for the duchess, the countess of Suffolk, Mr. Chardin, and I are going to quadrille.

FROM MR. GAY.

London, May 19, 1732.

Dear Sir,—To-morrow we set out for Amesbury, where I propose to follow your advice of employing myself about some work against next winter. You seemed not to approve of my writing more fables. Those I am now writing have a prefatory discourse before each of them, by way of epistle, and the morals of them mostly are of the political kind; which makes them run into a greater length than those I have already published. I have already finished fifteen or sixteen; four or five more would make a volume of the same size as the first. Though this is a kind of writing that appears very easy, I find it the most difficult of any that I ever undertook. After I have invented one fable and finished it, I despair of finding out another; but I have a moral or two more which I wish to write upon. I have also a sort of scheme to raise my finances by doing something for the stage; with this, and some reading and a great deal of exercise, I propose to pass my summer. I am sorry it must be without you. Why cannot you come and saunter about the downs a-horseback in the autumn, to mark the partridges for me to shoot for your dinner? Yesterday I received your letter, and notwithstanding your reproaches of laziness, I was four or five hours about business, and did not spend a shilling in a coach or chair. I received a year's interest on your two bonds, which is 8*l.* I have four of my own. I have deposited all of them in the hands of Mr. Hoare, to receive the half-year's interest at Michaelmas. The premium of the bonds is fallen a great deal since I bought yours. I gave very near 6*l.* on each bond, and they are now sold for about 50*s.* Everything is very precarious, and I have no opinion of any of their public securities; but I believe the parliament next year intend to examine the South-Sea scheme. I do not know whether it will be prudent to trust our money there till that time. I did what I could to assist Mr. Ryves; and I am very glad that he has found justice. Lord Bathurst spoke for him, and was very zealous on bringing on his cause. The duchess intended to write in my last letter, but she set out all on a sudden to take care of lord Drumlanrig,[a] who was taken ill of the small-pox at Winchester-school. He is now perfectly well recovered (for he had a favourable kind) to the great joy of our family. I think she ought, as she intends, to renew her correspondence with you at Amesbury. I was at Dawley on Sunday. Lady Bolingbroke continues in a very bad state of health, but still retains her spirits. You are always remembered there with great respect and friendship. Mrs. Pope is so worn out with old age, but without any distemper, that I look upon her life as very uncertain. Mr. Pope's state of health is much in the same way as when you left him. As for myself, I am often troubled with the colic. I have as much inattention, and have, I think, lower spirits than usual, which I impute to my having no one pursuit in life. I have many compliments to make you from the duke and duchess, and lords Bolingbroke, Bathurst, sir William Wyndham, Mr. Pulteney, Dr. Arbuthnot, Mr. Lewis, &c. Every one of them is disappointed in your not coming among us. I have not seen dean Berkeley, but have read his book,[b] and like many parts of it; but in general think, with you, that it is too speculative, at least for me. Dr. Delany I have very seldom seen; he did not do me the honour to advise with me about anything he has published.[c] I like your thoughts upon these sort of writings; and I should have advised him as you did, though I had lost his good opinion. I write in very great haste; for I have many things to do before I go out of town. Pray make me as happy as you can, and let me hear from you often. But I am still in hopes to see you, and will expect a summons one day or other to come to Bristol, in order to be your guide to Amesbury.

TO THE REV. DR. HENRY JENNY.

AT HIS HOUSE IN ARMAGH.[d]

Dublin, June 8, 1732.

Sir,—It is true that some weeks ago a manuscript paper of verses was handed about this town, and afterwards printed. The subject was, my great ingratitude and breach of hospitality in publishing a copy of verses called "Hamilton's Bawn." The writer hath likewise taken severe notice of some other verses published many years ago by the indiscretion of a friend, to whom they were sent in a letter. It was called a journal, and written at Mr. Rochfort's; and the consequences drawn from both by this late writer is, that the better I am used in any family the more I abuse them; with other reflections that must follow from such a principle. I was originally as unwilling to be libelled as the nicest man can be; but having been used to such treatment ever since I unhappily began to be known, I am now grown hardened; and while the friends I have left will continue to use me with any kindness, I shall need but a small degree of philosophy to bear me up against those who are pleased to be my enemies on the score of party zeal, and the hopes of turning that zeal to account. One thing, I confess, would still touch me to the quick; I mean if any person of true genius would employ his pen against me; but if I am not very partial to myself, I cannot remember that, among at least two thousand papers, full of groundless reflections against me, hundreds of which I have seen, and heard of more, I never saw any one production that the meanest writer could have cause to be proud of; for which I can assign a very natural reason; that during the whole busy time of [a] Lord George Sackville was at that time a student in the university of Dublin.

[a] The duke of Queensberry's eldest son.

[b] "Alciphron; or, the Minute Philosopher."

[c] He published in London, in the year 1732, "Revelation examined with Candour," &c.

my life, the men of wit (in England) were all my particular friends, although may of them differed from me in opinions of public persons and proceedings. As to Ireland, where I lived very little before the queen's death, and ever since in perfect retirement, I remember to have published nothing but what is called the "Drapier's Letters," and some few other trifles relating to the affairs of this miserable and ruined kingdom. What other things fell from me (chiefly in verse) were only amusements in hours of sickness or leisure, or in private families to divert ourselves and some neighbours, but were never intended for public view, which is plain from the subjects and the careless way of handling them; neither indeed can it answer the true ends of vanity, or desire of praise, to let the world see such little sallies of fancy or humour, because, if they be ill or indifferently performed, (which must often be the case,) the loss of reputation is certain; and however well executed, after a week's vogue, they are utterly forgotten. I know not how I come to be led so far from the subject of your letter. I confess there were some few persons who made random conjectures that you might possibly be concerned in the paper you hint at, but they were such who knew very little of you or me; for others who were better acquainted with us both have always cleared you, because they did not look upon that paper any way equal to your known good sense and candour, or talent of writing. And as to myself, I had further conviction, because I knew how well you were acquainted with the whole history and occasion of writing those verses on the barrack; how well pleased the master and lady of the family were with it; that you had read it more than once; that it was no secret to any neighbour, nor any reserve but that against giving a copy. You know well by what incidents that reserve was broken, by granting a copy to a great person, and from thence how it fell into other hands, and so came (as is the constant case) to be published, and is now forgotten. I confess my own conjectures about this late libel against me lay towards another gentleman, who, I am informed, hath since cleared himself,—I mean Dr. Tisdall:[a] but that suspicion was first taught me by others: and yet I know very well that for at least fifteen years past he hath been often engaged in a kind of flirting war of satiric burlesque verse with certain wags both in town and country, who, it seems, were provoked with his faculty of jibing, and used to answer him in his own way. Yet I have been assured that in these combats he was generally mistaken in his adversaries, falling foul upon many persons who never dipped a pen either for or against him: and I think you, among others, had some marks of his favour. But as to me, who I solemnly profess was always entirely innocent, during the whole time that his pen and tongue took this unhappy turn, as well as before and since, I could never be one month at peace for his wit; whatever was writ to ridicule him was laid at my door, and only by himself; with a further declaration, much to my honour, that he knew my style, would trouble himself to inquire no further; and, using my sirname, said I was his man. Some of his performances I have seen, and have heard of more, besides the great number he kept in petto; so that five or six gentlemen have often and very lately assured me that in one evening sitting he has produced a dozen of his libels wholly against me; desiring I might be told of it, and assuring those gentlemen that the whole dozen should be published if I would not let him alone. This was a little hard upon me, who had never one single moment in my life the least inclination to enter the lists with him, at those or any other weapons whatsoever, any more than I would venture to sit four hours disputing with him any point of controversy. I confess this keenness of the doctor in determining, whenever he was attacked, to fix on me for his adversary, inclined me to conceive that he might probably have written this last paper, and other people had the same thought: but I hear he hath utterly denied it; and I believe him: for I am confident he is an honest man, but unhappily misled, through the whole course of his life, by mistaking his talent, which he hath, against nature, applied to wit and raillery and rhyming: besides which, his incurable absence of mind on all occasions and in all companies hath led him into ten thousand errors, especially of that kind which are mortal to all agreeable or improving conversation, and which hath put him upon such a foot with every friend that I heartily lament the situation he is in.

I entreat your pardon for the length and insignificancy of this letter, but my solitary way of life is apt to make me talkative upon paper. I desire you would believe, first, that I have so frequently been libelled, that my curiosity to know the authors is quite extinct, though that of some friends is not; secondly, that I am not hasty in judging of men's style, or matter, or malice. I can venture to say that a thing is not written by such a person, because it is much below his good sense; and to look among the herd of dunces is endless. As to yourself, I hope you will be my witness that I have always treated you with particular distinction; and if we differ in opinions relating to public proceedings, it is for very good reasons: you are an expectant from the world and from power; I have long done with both: having been an original offender against all principles set up since the death of the queen, I could not think it worth my while to quit my old ones, and must have done it with an ill grace, though honour and conscience had been out of the question. Whoever really believes that things are well is many ways happy; he is pleased with the world, (as I was formerly,) and the world with him; his merit is allowed, and favour will certainly follow; which I heartily wish you, only desiring that, in what appears to my eyes a very dirty road, you would pick out the cleanest stages you can; and believe me to be, with much esteem, sir, your most obedient humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] To this gentleman Dr. Swift addressed a letter, April 20, 1704, on the subject of his addresses to Mrs. Johnson, assuring him very candidly that he had himself never seen any other lady whose conversation he entirely valued; and freely giving consent to her marrying Dr. Tisdall.

FROM LADY CATHERINE JONES.

June 15, 1732.

The return of my humble thanks to Mr. Dean, by the date it bears, looks more like a slumber of gratitude than the quick sense of that rare virtue which I owe to you, sir, for the trouble you have so willingly undertaken in executing what I so much desired, since the manner you have done it in answers my wishes in every respect. The proposal you made I acquainted my sister Kildare and niece Fanny Coningsby with; for I, being but one part of the family, cannot act further than they will consent, which is, that they will settle twenty shillings per year that you may never be liable to any more trouble upon the same occasion.[a]

I need not inform Mr. Dean that the world teaches us that relations and friends look like two different species: and though I have the honour to be allied to my lord Burlington, yet, since the death of my good father and his, the notice he takes of me is as if I was separated blood; or else, I am vain enough to say, we are sprung from one ancestor, whose ashes keep up a greater lustre than those who are not reduced to it.

I cannot conclude without saying that, were I worthy, in any way, to have the pleasure of seeing dean Swift, I do not know any passion, even envy, would not make innocent in my ambition of seeing the author of so much wit and judicious writing as I have had the advantage to reap. Your most humble and obliged servant, CATHERINE JONES.

Your opinion of Mr. French[a] is just, and his due.

TO THE REV. JOHN BRANDRETH, DEAN OF EMLY.[b]

Dublin, June 30, 1732.

SIR,—If you are not an excellent philosopher, I allow you personate one perfectly well; and if you believe yourself, I heartily envy you; for I never yet saw in Ireland a spot of earth two feet wide that had not in it something to displease. I think I once was in your county, Tipperary,[c] which is like the rest of the whole kingdom,—a bare face of nature, without houses or plantations; filthy cabins, miserable, tattered, half-starved creatures, scarce in human shape; one insolent, ignorant oppressive 'squire to be found in twenty miles' riding; a parish church to be found only in a summer-day's journey, in comparison of which an English farmer's barn is a cathedral; a bog of fifteen miles round; every meadow a slough, and every hill a mixture of rock, heath, and marsh; and every male and female, from the farmer inclusive to the day-labourer, infallibly a thief, and consequently a beggar, which in this island are terms convertible. The Shannon is rather a lake than a river, and has not the sixth part of the stream that runs under London Bridge. There is not an acre of land in Ireland turned to half its advantage; yet it is better improved than the people: and all these evils are effects of English tyranny;—so your sons and grandchildren will find to their sorrow. Cork indeed was a place of trade; but for some years past is gone to decay; and the wretched merchants, instead of being dealers, are dwindled into pedlars and cheats. I desire you will not write such accounts to your friends in England. Did you ever see one cheerful countenance among our country vulgar? unless once a-year at a fair or on a holiday, when some poor rogue happened to get drunk, and starved the whole week after. You will give a very different account of your winter campaign, when you can't walk five yards from your door without being mired to your knees, nor ride half a mile without being in slough to your saddle-skirts; when your landlord must send twenty miles for yeast, before he can brew or bake; and the neighbours for six miles round must club to kill a mutton. Pray, take care of damps, and when you leave your bedchamber let a fire be made, to last till night; and after all, if a stocking happens to fall off a chair, you may wring it next morning.—I nunc, et tecum versus meditare canoros.

I have not said all this out of any malicious intention, to put you out of conceit with the scene where you are, but merely for your credit; because it is better to know you are miserable than to betray an ill taste: I consult your honour, which is dearer than life; therefore I demand that you shall not relish one bit of victuals, or drop of drink, or the company of any human creature within thirty miles of Knoctoher, during your residence in those parts; and then I shall begin to have a tolerable opinion of your understanding.

My lameness is very slowly recovering; and if it be well when that the year is out, I shall gladly compound; yet I make a shift to ride about ten miles a-day by virtue of certain implements called gambadoes, where my feet stand firm as on a floor; and I generally dine alone, like a king or an hermit, and continue alone until I go to bed; for even my wine will not purchase company, and I begin to think the lame are forsaken as much as the poor and the blind. Mr. Jebb[a] never calls at the deanery of late: perhaps he hath found out that I like him as a modest man, and of very good understanding. This town is neither large nor full enough to furnish events for entertaining a country correspondent. Murder now and then is all we have to trust to. Our fruit is all destroyed with the long spring and eastern winds; and I shall not have the tenth part of my last year's fruit. Miss Hoadly hath been nine days in the small-pox which I never heard of till this minute; but they say she is past danger. She would have been a terrible loss to the archbishop.[b] Dr. Felton, of Oxford, hath written an octavo about Revelation;[c] I know not his character. He sent over four copies to me, one of which was for Mr. Tickell,[d] two for the bishops of Cork and Waterford,[e] and one to myself, by way of payment for sending the rest, I suppose, for he sent me no letter. I know him not. Whenever you are in this town, I hope you will mend your usage of me by coming often to a philosophical dinner at the deanery: this I pretend to expect for the sake of our common princess, lady Elizabeth Germaine, to whom I owe the happiness of your acquaintance; and on her account I expect your justice to believe me to be, with truest esteem, your most obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR GAY AND THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

Dublin, July 10, 1732.

I HAD your letter by Mr. Ryves a long time after the date, for I suppose he stayed long in the way. I am glad you determine upon something; there is no writing I esteem more than fables, nor anything so difficult to succeed in: which, however, you have done excellently well, and I have often admired your happiness in such a kind of performances, which I have frequently endeavoured at in vain. I remember I acted as you seem to hint; I found a moral first, and studied for a fable, but could do nothing that pleased me, and so left off that scheme for ever. I remember one, which was to represent what scoundrels rise in armies by a long war, wherein I supposed the lion was engaged; and having lost all his animals of worth, at last serjeant Hog came to be brigadier, and corporal Ass a colonel, &c. I agree with you likewise about getting something by the stage, which, when it succeeds, is the best crop for poetry in England: but pray take some new scheme, quite different from anything you have already touched. The present humour of the players, who hardly (as I was told in London) regard any new play, and your present situation at the court, are the difficulties to be overcome; but those circumstances may have altered (at least the former) since I left you. My scheme was to pass a month at Amesbury, and then go to Twickenham, and live a winter between that and Dawley, and sometimes at Riskins, without going to London, where I now can have no occasional lodgings; but I am not yet in any condition for such removals. I would fain have you get enough against you grow old to have two or three servants about you and a convenient house. It is hard to want those subsidia senectuti, when a man grows hard to please, and few people care whether he be pleased or not. I have a large house, yet I should hardly prevail to find one visitor if I were not able to hire him with a bottle of wine; so that, when I am not abroad on horseback, I generally dine alone, and am thankful if a friend will pass the evening with me. I am now with the remainder of my pint before me, and so here's your health; and the second and chief is to my Tunbridge acquaintance, my lady duchess; and I tell you that I fear my lord Bolingbroke and Mr. Pope (a couple of philosophers) would starve me, for even of port wine I should require half a pint a-day, and as much at night: and you were growing as bad, unless your duke and duchess have mended you. Your colic is owing to intemperance of the philosophical kind; you eat without care, and if you drink less than I you drink too little. But your inattention I cannot pardon, because I imagined the cause was removed, for I thought it lay in your forty millions of schemes by court hopes and court fears. Yet Mr. Pope has the same defect, and it is of all others the most mortal to conversation: neither is my lord Bolingbroke untinged with it: all for want of my rule, Vive la bagatelle! but the doctor is the king of inattention! What a vexatious life should I lead among you! If the duchess be a rêveuse, I will never go to Amesbury; or, if I do, I will run away from you both to one of her women and the steward and chaplain.

MADAM, I mentioned something to Mr. Gay of a Tunbridge acquaintance, whom we forget of course when we return to town, and yet I am assured that, if they meet again next summer, they have a better title to resume their commerce. Thus I look on my right of corresponding with your grace to be better established upon your return to Amesbury; and I shall at this time descend to forget, or at least suspend, my resentments of your neglect all the time you were in London. I still keep in my heart that Mr. Gay had no sooner turned his back than you left the place in his letter void which he had commanded you to fill: though your guilt confounded you so far that you wanted presence of mind to blot out the last line, where that command stared you in the face. But it is my misfortune to quarrel with all my acquaintance, and always come by the worst; and fortune is ever against me, but never so much as by pursuing me out of mere partiality to your grace, for which you are to answer. By your connivance, she has pleased, by one stumble on the stairs, to give me a lameness that six months have not been able perfectly to cure: and thus I am prevented from revenging myself by continuing a month at Amesbury, and breeding confusion in your grace's family. No disappointment through my whole life has been so vexatious by many degrees; and God knows whether I shall ever live to see the invisible lady to whom I was obliged for so many favours, and whom I never beheld since she was a brat in hanging sleeves. I am and shall be ever, with the greatest respect and gratitude, madam, your grace's most obedient and most humble, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

July 18, 1732.

I WRITE this letter in hopes that Pope, a man scattered in the world, (according to the French phrase,) will soon procure me an opportunity of conveying it safely to you, my reverend dean. For my own part, half this wicked nation might go to you, or half your beggarly nation might come to us, and the whole migration be over before I knew anything of the matter. My letter will concern neither affairs of state nor of party; and yet I would not have it fall into the hands of our ministers; it might pass in their excellent noddles for a piece of a plot against themselves, if not against the state; or at least it might furnish them with an opportunity of doing an ill-natured, and disappointing a good-natured thing; which being a pleasure to the malicious and the base, I should be sorry to give it on any occasion, and especially on this, to the par nobile fratrum.[a]

After this preamble, I proceed to tell you that there is in my neighbourhood, in Berkshire, a clergyman, one Mr. Talbot, related to the solicitor-general, and protected by him. This man has now the living of Burfield,[b] which the late bishop of Durham held before, and for aught I know after, he was bishop of Oxford. The living is worth 400*l.* per annum, over and above a curate paid, as Mr. Correy, a gentleman who does my business in that country, and who is a very grave authority, assures me. The parsonage-house is extremely good, the place pleasant, and the air excellent; the distance from London a little day's journey, and from hence (give me leave to think this circumstance of some importance to you) not much above half a day's, even for you who are no great jockey. Mr. Talbot has many reasons which make him desirous to settle in Ireland for the rest of his life, and has been looking out for a change of preferments some time. As soon as I heard this I employed one to know whether he continued in the same mind, and to tell him that an advantageous exchange might be offered him if he could engage his kinsman to make it practicable at court. He answered for his own acceptance and his kinsman's endeavours. I employed next some friends to secure my lord Dorset, who very frankly declared himself ready to serve you in anything, and in this if you desired it. But he mentioned a thing, at the same time, wholly unknown to me, which is, that your deanery is not in the nomination of the crown, but in the election of the chapter. This may render our affair perhaps more easy; more hard, I think, it cannot be; but in all cases it requires other measures to be taken. One of these, I believe, must be, to prepare Hoadly, bishop of Salisbury, if that be possible, to prepare his brother the archbishop of Dublin. The light in which the proposition must be represented to him and our ministers (if it be made to them) is this: that, though they gratify you, they gratify you in a thing advantageous to themselves, and silly in you to ask. I suppose it will not be hard to persuade them that it is better for them you should be a private parish priest in an English county than a dean in the metropolis of Ireland, where they know because they have felt your authority and influence. At least this topic is a plausible one for those who speak to them to insist upon, and coming out of a Whig mouth may have weight. Sure I am, they will be easily persuaded that quitting power for ease, and a greater for a less revenue, is a foolish bargain, which they should, by consequence help you to make.

You see now the state of this whole affair, and you will judge better than I am able to do of the means to be employed on your side of the water: as to those on this, nothing shall be neglected. Find some secure way of conveying your thoughts and your commands to me; for my friend has a right to command me arbitrarily, which no man else upon earth has: or rather, dispose of affairs so as to come hither immediately. You intended to come some time ago. You speak in a letter Pope has just now received from you as if you still had in view to make this journey before winter. Make it in the summer, and the sooner the better. To talk of being able to ride with stirrups is trifling: get on Pegasus, bestride the hippogryph, or mount the white nag in the Revelation. To be serious: come anyhow, and put neither delay nor humour in a matter which requires despatch and management. Though I have room, I will not say one word to you about Berkeley's[a] or Delany's[b] book. Some part of the former is hard to be understood; none of the latter is to be read. I propose, however, to reconcile you to metaphysics, by showing how they may be employed against metaphysicians; and that, whenever you do not understand them, nobody else does—no, not those who write them.

[a] Sir Robert, and his brother Horace Walpole.
[b] A rectory in Berkshire.

I know you are inquisitive about the health of the poor woman who inhabits this place; it is tolerable,—better than it has been some years. Come and see her; you shall be nursed, fondled, and humoured. She desires you to accept this assurance, with her humble service. Your horses shall be grazed in summer, and fothered in winter; and you and your man shall have meat, drink, and lodging. Washing, I cannot afford, Mr. Dean; for I am grown saving, thanks to your sermon about frugality.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

Drayton, July 19, 1732.

I BELIEVE you will not wonder at my long silence when I tell you that Mrs. Floyd came ill here, but that she kept pretty much to herself; and ever since she has been here, till within these two or three days, I have had no hopes of her life. You may easily guess what I must have suffered for a so long tried, prudent useful, agreeable companion and friend. And God knows she is now excessively weak, and mends but slowly: however I have now great hopes, and I am very good at believing what I heartily wish. As I dare say you will be concerned for her, you may want to know her illness, but that is more than I can tell you. See has fancied herself in a consumption a great while; but though she has had the most dreadful cough I ever heard in my life, all the doctors said it was not that; but none of them did say what it was. The doctor here, who is an extraordinary good one, (but lives fourteen long, long miles off,) has lately been left ten thousand pounds, and now hates his business: he says it is a sharp humour that falls upon her nerves, sometimes on her stomach and bowels; and indeed what he has given her has, to appearance, had much better effect than the millions of things she has been forced to take. After this, you will not expect I should have followed your orders and rid, for I have scarcely walked; although I dare not be very much in her room, because she constrained herself to hide her illness from me. * * * *

The duke and duchess of Dorset have not been here yet, but I am in hopes they will soon. I do not know whether you remember Mrs. Crowther, and Mrs. Acourt; they and Mr. Persode are my company; but as I love my house full, I expect more still; and my lady Suffolk talks of making me a short visit. I have been so full of Mrs. Floyd, I had like to have forgot to tell you that I am such a dunderhead, that I really do not know what my sister Pen's age was; but I think she could not be above twelve years old. She was the next to me, but whether two or three years younger I have forgotten; and what is more ridiculous, I do not exactly know my own, for my mother and nurse used to differ upon that notable point. And I am willing to be a young lady still, so will not allow myself to be more than forty-eight next birthday; but if I make my letter any longer, perhaps you will wish I had never been born. So adieu, dear dean.

TO MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

Dublin, July 22, 1732.

MR. ALDERMAN,—There is a young gentlemen of the clergy here, for whom I have great regard. And I cannot but wish this young gentleman (for whose learning and oratory in the pulpit I will engage) might have the honour to be your chaplain in your mayoralty. His name is Matthew Pilkington: he is some years under thirty, but has more wit, sense, and discretion than any of your London parsons ten years above his age. He has a great longing to see England, and appear in the presence of Mr. Pope, Mr. Gay, and others, in which I will venture to befriend him. You are not to tell me of prior engagements, because I have some title, as an old acquaintance, to expect a favour from you. Therefore pray let me know immediately that you have complied with my request before you had read half my letter.[a] I expect your answer, to my satisfaction, and the happiness of the young gentleman; and am, with great sincerity, your most obedient servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

P.S. You need not be afraid of Mr. Pilkington's hanging upon you; for he has some fortune of his own, and somewhat in the church; but he would be glad to see England, and be more known to those who will esteem him and may raise him.

FROM MR. GAY AND THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

Amesbury, July 24, 1732.

DEAR SIR,—As the circumstances of our money affairs are altered, I think myself obliged to acquaint you with them as soon as I can; which, if I had not received your letter last post, I should have done now. I left your two South-Sea bonds, and four of my own, in Mr. Hoare's hands, when I came out of town, that he might receive the interest for us, when due; or, if you should want your money, that you might receive it upon your order. Since I came out of town, the South-Sea company have come to a resolution to pay off 50 per cent. of their bonds, with the interest of the 50 per cent. to Michaelmas next; so that there is now half of our fortunes in Mr. Hoare's hands at present, without any interest going on. As you seem to be inclined to have your money remitted to Ireland, I will not lay out the sum that is paid into his hands in any other thing till I have your orders. I cannot tell what to do with my own. I believe I shall see Mr. Hoare in this country very soon: for he has a house not above six miles from us, and I intend to advise with him; though, in the present situation of affairs, I expect to be left to take my own way. The remaining 50 per cent., were it to be sold at present, bears a premium; but the premium on the 50 that was paid is sunk. I do not know whether I write intelligibly upon the subject. I cannot send you the particulars of your account, though I know I am in debt to you for interest, beside the principal; and you will understand so much of what I intend to inform you, that half of your money is now in Mr. Hoare's hands without any interest. So, since I cannot send you the particulars of your account, I will now say no more about it.

[a] This letter was sent to Mrs. Barber the poetess and Mr. Delany, who were then in London, to be delivered by them to the alderman; but they never delivered it, out of a desire, as was supposed, to prevent the recommendation from succeeding: and the dean was under the necessity of writing a second letter to the same purpose, which secured the place to Mr. Pilkington.

I shall finish the work I intended this summer; but I look upon the success in every respect to be precarious. You judge very right of my present situation, that I cannot propose to succeed by favour: and I do not think, if I could flatter myself that I had any degree of merit, much could be expected from that unfashionable pretension.

I have almost done everything I proposed, in the way of fables, but have not set the last hand to them. Though they will not amount to half the number, I believe they will make much such another volume as the last. I find it the most difficult task I ever undertook; but have determined to go through with it; and, after this, I believe I shall never have courage enough to think any more in this way. Last post I had a letter from Mr. Pope, who informs me he has heard from you; and that he is preparing some scattered things of yours and his for the press. I believe I shall not see him till the winter; for, by riding and walking, I am endeavouring to lay in a stock of health to squander in the town. You see, in this respect, my scheme is very like the country gentlemen in regard to their revenues. As to my eating and drinking, I live as when you knew me; so that in that point we shall agree very well in living together; and the duchess will answer for me that I am cured of inattention; for I never forget anything she says to me.[a]....For he never hears what I say, so cannot forget. If I served him the same way, I should not care a farthing ever to be better acquainted with my Tunbridge acquaintance, whom, by attention to him, I have learned to set my heart upon. I began to give over all hopes, and from thence began my neglect. I think this a very philosophical reason, though there might be another given. When fine ladies are in London, it is very genteel and allowable to forget their best friends; which, if I thought modestly of myself, must needs be you, because you know little of me. Till you do more, pray do not persuade Mr. Gay that he is discreet enough to live alone; for I do assure you he is not, nor I either. We are of great use to one another; for we never flatter nor contradict, but when it is absolutely necessary, and then we do it to some purpose; particularly the first agrees mightily with our constitutions. If ever we quarrel, it will be about a piece of bread and butter; for somebody is never sick, except he eats too much of it. He will not quarrel with you for a glass or so; for by that means he hopes to gulp down some of that forty millions of schemes that hindered him from being good company. I would fain see you here, there is so fair a chance that one of us must be pleased; perhaps both, you with an old acquaintance, I with a new one: it is so well worth taking a journey for, that if the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet must go to the mountain. But before either of our journeys are settled, I desire you would resolve me one question—whether a man, who thinks himself well where he is, should look out for his house and servants before it is convenient, before he grows old, or before a person, with whom he lives, pulls him by the sleeve in private (according to oath) and tells him that they have enough of his company? He will not let me write one word more, but that I have a very great regard for you, &c.

The duke is very much yourr, and will never leave you to your wine. Many thanks for your drum—— I wish to receive your congratulations for the other boy, you may believe.

a The duchess here begins.

FROM MRS. CÆSAR[a]

August 6, 1732.

PERMIT me to congratulate you upon the return of Mrs. Barber, with thanks for pleasures enjoyed in her company; for had she not come recommended by the dean of St. Patrick's, likely I had passed her by unheeded, being apt to follow a good author in shunning those of my own coat. But hold; I must look if it runs not from corner to corner, which I more fear than length. For Pope says, though sometimes he finds too many letters in my words, never too many words in my letters. So, with Mr. Cæsar's and my best wishes, thou worthy, witty, honest dean, adieu.

M. ADELMAR CÆSAR.

FROM LADY WORSLEY[b]

August 6, 1732.

SIR,—I flatter myself that if you had received my last letter you would have favoured me with an answer; therefore I take it for granted it is lost.

I was so proud of your commands, and so fearful of being supplanted by my daughter [lady Carteret], that I went to work immediately, that her box might not keep her in your remembrance, while there was nothing to put you in mind of an old friend and humble servant. But Mrs. Barber's long stay here (who promised me to convey it to you) has made me appear very negligent. I doubt not but you think me unworthy of the share (you once told me) I had in your heart. I am yet vain enough to think I deserve it better than all those flirting girls you coquet with. I will not yield (even) to dirty Patty, whom I was the most jealous of when you was last here. What if I am a great-grandmother, I can still distinguish your merit from all the rest of the world; but it is not consistent with your good breeding to put one in mind of it; therefore I am determined not to use my interest with sir Robert for a living in the Isle of Wight, though nothing else could reconcile me to the place. But if I could make you archbishop of Canterbury, I should forget my resentments, for the sake of the flock, who very much want a careful shepherd. Are we to have the honour of seeing you or not? I have fresh hopes given me; but I dare not please myself too much with them, lest I should be again disappointed. If I had it as much in my power as my inclination to serve Mrs. Barber, she should not be kept thus long attending: but I hope her next voyage may prove more successful. She is just come in, and tells me you have sprained your foot, which will prevent your journey till next summer; but assure yourself the Bath is the only infallible cure for such an accident. If you have any regard remaining for me, you will show it by taking my advice; if not, I will endeavour to forget you, if I can. But till that doubt is cleared, I am as much as ever, the dean's obedient humble servant,

F. WORSLEY.

TO ALDERMAN BARBER.

Dublin, August 10, 1732.

MR. ALDERMAN,—I am very angry with my friend doctor Delany for not applying to you sooner, as I desired him, in favour of Mr. Matthew Pilkington, a young clergyman here, who has a great ambition to have the honour of being your chaplain in your mayoralty. I waited for the doctor's answer before I could a Wife to the treasurer of the navy during lord Oxford's administration, in the reign of queen Anne.

b Indorsed, "Lady Worsley, with a present of a writing-box japanned by herself."

write to you, and it came but last night. He tells me you have been so very kind as to give him a promise upon my request; I will therefore tell my story. This gentleman was brought to me by the doctor about four years ago, and I found him so modest a young man, so good a scholar and preacher, and of so hopeful a genius, and grew still better upon my hands the more I knew him, that I have been seeking all opportunities to do him some real service, from no other motive in the world but the esteem I had of his worth. And I hope you know me long enough to believe me capable of acting as I ought to do in such a case, however contrary it may be to the present practice of the world. He has a great longing to see England, and appear in the presence of Mr. Pope, Mr. Gay, Dr. Arbuthnot, and some other of my friends, wherein I will assist him with my recommendations. He is no relation or dependant of mine. I am not putting you upon a job, but to encourage a young man of merit upon his own account as well as mine. He will be no burden upon you, for he has some fortune of his own, and will have a much better from his father; and has also a convenient establishment in a church in this city.

Mr. Pilkington will be ready to attend you upon your command, and I wish he may go as soon as possible, that he may have a few weeks to prepare him for his business, by seeing the Tower, the Monument, and Westminster Abbey, and have done staring in the streets.

I am so entirely out of the world that I cannot promise a hope ever to requite your favour otherwise than with hearty thanks for conferring this obligation upon me. And I shall ever remain, with true esteem, your most obedient and obliged humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. GAY AND THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

Dublin, August 12, 1732.

I KNOW not what to say to the account of your stewardship, and it is monstrous to me that the South Sea should pay half their debts at one clap. But I will send for the money when you put me into the way, for I shall want it here, my affairs being in a bad condition by the miseries of the kingdom, and my own private fortune being wholly embroiled and worse than ever; so that I shall soon petition the duchess, as an object of charity, to lend me three or four thousand pounds to keep up my dignity. My one hundred pounds will buy me six hogsheads of wine, which will support me a year; provisæ frugis in annum copia. Horace desired no more: for I will construe frugis to be wine. You are young enough to get some lucky hint which must come by chance, and it shall be a thing of importance, quod et hunc in annum vivat et in plures, and you shall not finish it in haste, and it shall be diverting and usefully satirical, and the duchess shall be your critic; and between you and me, I do not find she will grow weary of you till this time seven years. I had lately an offer to change for an English living, which is just too short by 300*l*. a-year, and that must be made out of the duchess's pin-money before I can consent. I want to be minister of Amesbury, Dawley, Twickenham, Riskins, and prebendary of Westminster, else I will not stir a step, but content myself with making the duchess miserable three months next summer. But I keep ill company: I mean the duchess and you, who are both out of favour; and so I find am I, by a few verses wherein Pope and you have your parts. You hear Dr. Delany has got a wife with 1600*l*. a-year; I, who am his governor, cannot take one under two thousand; I wish you would inquire of such a one in your neighbourhood. See what it is to write godly books! I profess I envy you above all men in England; you want nothing but 3000*l*. more to keep you in plenty when your friends grow weary of you. To prevent which last evil at Amesbury, you must learn to domineer and be peevish, to find fault with their victuals and drink, to chide and direct the servants, with some other lessons which I shall teach you, and always practised myself with success. I believe I formerly desired to know whether the vicar of Amesbury can play at backgammon? pray ask him the question and give him my service.

MADAM,—I was the most unwary creature in the world[a] when, against my old maxims, I writ first to you upon your return to Tunbridge. I beg that this condescension of mine may go no further, and that you will not pretend to make a precedent of it. I never knew any man cured of any inattention, although the pretended causes were removed. When I was with Mr. Gay last in London, talking with him on some poetical subjects, he would answer, "Well, I am determined not to accept the employment of gentleman-usher;" and of the same disposition were all my poetical friends, and if you cannot cure him I utterly despair. As to yourself, I will say to you (though comparisons be odious) what I said to the queen, that your quality should be never any motive of esteem to me: my compliment was then lost, but it will not be so to you; for I know you more by any one of your letters than I could by six months conversing. Your pen is always more natural and sincere and unaffected than your tongue; in writing you are too lazy to give yourself the trouble of acting a part, and have indeed acted so indiscreetly that I have you at mercy: and although you should arrive to such a height of immorality as to deny your hand, yet, whenever I produce it, the world will unite in swearing this must come from you only.

I will answer your question. Mr. Gay is not discreet enough to live alone, but he is too discreet to live alone; and yet (unless you mend him) he will live alone; even in your grace's company. Your quarrelling with each other upon the subject of bread and butter is the most usual thing in the world; parliaments, courts, cities, and kingdoms quarrel for no other cause; from hence, and from hence only, arise all the quarrels between Whig and Tory; between those who are in the ministry and those who are out; between all pretenders to employment in the church, the law, and the army: even the common proverb teaches you this, when we say, It is none of my bread and butter: meaning it is no business of mine. Therefore I despair of any reconcilement between you till the affair of bread and butter be adjusted, wherein I would gladly be a mediator. If Mahomet should come to the mountain, how happy would an excellent lady be who lives a few miles from this town! As I was telling of Mr. Gay's way of living at Amesbury, she offered fifty guineas to have you both at her house for one hour over a bottle of Burgundy, which we were then drinking. To your question, I answer that your grace should pull me by a One of the last and most elegant compliments which this singular lady, after having been celebrated by so many former wits and poets, received, was from the amiable Mr. William Whitehead, in the third volume of his works, p. 65; which compliment turns on the peculiar circumstance of her grace's having never changed her dress according to the fashion, but retained that which had been in vogue when she was a young beauty.

the sleeve ti you tore it off, and when you said you were weary of me, I would pretend to be deaf, and think (according to another proverb) that you tore my clothes to h[illegible] I never will believe one word you say of my lord duke unless I see three or four lines in his own hand at the bottom of yours. I have a concern in the whole family, and Mr. Gay must give me a particular account of every branch, for I am not ashamed of you though you be duke and duchess, though I have been of others who are, &c., and I do not doubt but even your own servants love you, even down to your postilions; and when I come to Amesbury, before I see your grace, I will have an hour's conversation with the vicar, who will tell me how familiarly you talk to Goody Dobson and all the neighbours as if you were their equal, and that you were godmother to her son Jacky. I am, and shall be ever, with the greatest respect, your grace's most obedient, &c.

FROM THE EARL OF PETERBOROUGH TO MR. POPE.

I AM under the greatest impatience to see Dr. Swift at Bevis-mount,[a] and must signify my mind to him by another hand: it not being permitted me to hold correspondence with the said dean, for no letter of mine can come to his hands.

And whereas it is apparent in this Protestant land, most especially under the care of Divine Providence, that nothing can succeed or come to a happy issue without bribery; therefore let me know what he expects to comply with my desires, and it shall be remitted unto him.

For, though I would not corrupt any man for the whole world, yet a benevolence may be given without any offence to conscience; every one must confess that gratification and corruption are two distinct terms; nay, at worst, many good men hold that, for a good end, some very naughty measures may be made use of.

But, sir, I must give you some good news in relation to myself, because I know you wish me well: I am cured of some diseases in my old age which tormented me very much in my youth.

I was possessed with violent and uneasy passions, such as a peevish concern for truth, and a saucy love for my country.

When a Christian priest preached against the spirit of the gospel, when an English judge determined against Magna Charta, when the minister acted against common sense, I used to fret.

Now, sir, let what will happen, I keep myself in temper. As I have no flattering hopes, so I banish all useless fears; but as to the things of this world, I find myself in a condition beyond expectation; it being evident, from a late parliamentary inquiry, that I have as much ready money, as much in the funds, and as great a personal estate, as sir Robert Sutton.

If the translator of Homer find fault with this unheroic disposition, or (what I more fear) if the drapier of Ireland accuse the Englishman of want of spirit, I silence you both with one line out of your own Horace,— for I take the whole to be so corrupted, that a cure in any part would but little avail. Yours, &c.

[a] This year lord Peterborough and Pope paid a visit from Southampton to Winchester College, and gave prizes to the scholars for the best copy of verses that should be written on a subject proposed to them by Pope himself—The campaign of Valentia. The prizes were sets of Pine's "Horace." Hampton, the excellent translator of "Polybius," at that time very young, gained one of these prizes; Mr. Whitehead another.

TO THE EARL OF PETERBOROUGH.

MY LORD,—I never knew or heard of any person so volatile and so fixed as your lordship; you, while your imagination is carrying you through every corner of the world, where you have or have not been, can at the same time remember to do offices of favour and kindness to the meanest of your friends; and, in all the scenes you have passed, have not been able to attain that one quality peculiar to a great man, of forgetting everything but injuries. Of this I am a living witness against you; for, being the most insignificant of all your old humble servants, you were so cruel as never to give me time to ask a favour; but prevented me in doing whatever you thought I desired, or could be for my credit or advantage.

I have often admired at the capriciousness of fortune in regard to your lordship. She hath forced courts to act against their oldest and most constant maxims; to make you a general because you had courage and conduct; an ambassador because you had wisdom and knowledge in the interests of Europe; and an admiral on account of your skill in maritime affairs; whereas, according to the usual method of court proceedings, I should have been at the head of the army, and you of the church, or rather a curate under the dean of St. Patrick's.

The archbishop of Dublin laments that he did not see your lordship till he was just upon the point of leaving the Bath: I pray God you may have found success in that journey; else I shall continue to think there is a fatality in all your lordship's undertakings, which only terminate in your own honour, and the good of the public, without the least advantage to your health or fortune.

I remember lord Oxford's ministry used to tell me, "That, not knowing where to write to you, they were forced to write at you." It is so with me; for you are in one thing an evangelical man, that "you know not where to lay your head;" and I think you have no house. Pray, my lord, write to me that I may have the pleasure, in this scoundrel country, of going about, and showing my depending parsons a letter from the earl of Peterborough. I am, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

MR. PILKINGTON TO MR. BOWYER.

Dublin, August 17, 1732.

SIR,—I received your last letter with the note to Mr. North. I am extremely obliged to you for the favour of such a present, and shall be glad to have an opportunity to express my gratitude to you.

I would send with this letter two or three of those papers which I design for your volume; but the dean is reading them over to try if there be any alteration requisite in any of them. I showed him your note to Mr. North, and I believe he was at least as much pleased as the person who was to receive it. We have thoughts of preparing a preface to your edition in the name of the editor. Let me know whether I shall send the pamphlets by post, and whether you have the "Journal of a Dublin Lady," the "Ballad on the English Dean," and "Rochfort's Journal," because you shall have the copies sent to you and the property effectually secured. I mentioned your request to the dean; and I shall get you the right of printing the "Proposal for Eating Children." I mentioned the alteration of the titles; and he thinks it will be most proper to give them both the Irish and English titles; for instance, the "Soldier and the Scholar," or "Hamilton's Bawn," &c. I have some hope of being able to send all these in about a week or fortnight's time, and shall venture to send them by post, though it will be expensive. The dean says he thinks the assignment as full as it is possible for him to write; but that he will comply with any alterations we think proper. I shall expect to hear from you as soon as possible, because I have some schemes to transact which probably I shall acquaint you with in my next letter. I am, sir, your most obliged servant,

MATT. PILKINGTON.

FROM MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

London, August 24, 1732.

SIR,—I wish Dr. Delany had complied with your request sooner in acquainting me with your intentions in favour of Mr. Pilkington. I could have been glad also that he had acquainted you, as I desired him, with the particulars how I stood circumstantiated in relation to the chaplain; for I flatter myself that your usual good nature would have induced you to comply with my request in writing a letter to me, in an authoritative way, in your recommendation of Mr. Pilkington; which would have given me a good excuse for my refusing a gentleman whom my deputy and common-councilmen had recommended to me above six months ago.

Another accident happened in this affair by the doctor's not receiving a letter I sent him, which, by mistake, came not to his hands (though at home) until many hours after my man had left it at his lodgings; which letter, had he seen in time, would have prevented some little difficulties I lie under in this affair, and which I must get over as well as I can. For, sir, when I reflect on the many obligations I have to you, which I shall ever acknowledge, I am glad of any occasion to show my gratitude; and do hereby, at your request, make Mr. Pilkington my chaplain when mayor. I wish it may answer his expectations; for the profits are not above 120*l.* if so much, as I am told. He constantly dines with the mayor, but I am afraid cannot lie in the hall, the rooms being all of state. For your sake I will show him all the civilities I can. You will recommend him to Jo. (Dr. I mean) Trapp. The mayor's day is the 30th of October; so that he may take his own time.

It would add very much to my felicity if your health would permit you to come over in the spring, and see a pageant of your own making. Had you been here now, I am persuaded you would have put me to an additional expense by having a raree-show (or pageant) as of old on the lord-mayor's day. Mr. Pope and I were thinking of having a large machine carried through the city, with a printing-press, author, publishers, hawkers, devils, &c., and a satirical poem printed and thrown from the press to the mob in public view, but not to give offence; but your absence spoils that design.

Pray God preserve you long, very long, for the good of your country and the joy and satisfaction of your friends; among whom I take the liberty to subscribe myself, with great sincerity, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

J. BARBER.

FROM MR. GAY AND THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

Amesbury, August 28, 1732.

DEAR SIR,—Mr. Hoare has a hundred and odd pounds of yours in his hands, which you may have whenever you please to draw upon me for it. I know I am more indebted to you (I mean beside the South-Sea bond of a hundred that still subsists), but I cannot tell you exactly how your account stands till I go to town. I have money of my own too in Mr. Hoare's hands which I know not at present how to dispose of. I believe I shall leave it without interest till I go to town, and shall then be at the same loss how to dispose of it as now. I have an intention to get more money next winter; but am prepared for disappointments, which I think it is very likely I shall meet with; yet, as you think it convenient and necessary that I should have more than I have, you see I resolve to do what I can to oblige you. If my designs should not take effect, I desire you will be as easy under it as I shall be; for I find you so solicitous about me that you cannot bear my disappointments as well as I can. If I do not write intelligibly to you, it is because I would not have the clerks of the post-office know everything I am doing. If you would come here this summer you might with me have helped to have drunk up the duke's wine, and saved your money. I am growing so saving of late that I very often reproach myself with being covetous; and I am very often afraid that I shall have the trouble of having money and never have the pleasure of making use of it. I wish you could live among us, but not unless it could be to your ease and satisfaction. You insist upon your being minister of Amesbury, Dawley, Twickenham, Riskings, and prebendary of Westminster. For your being minister in those places I cannot promise you; but I know you might have a good living in every one of them. Gambadoes I have rid in, and I think them a very fine and useful invention; but I have not made use of them since I left Devonshire. I ride and walk every day to such excess that I am afraid I shall take a surfeit of it. I am sure if I am not better in health after it it is not worth the pains. I say this, though I have this season shot nineteen brace of partridges. I have very little acquaintance with our vicar; he does not live among us, but resides in another parish. And I have not played at backgammon with anybody since I came to Amesbury but lady Harold and lady Bateman. As Dr. Delany has taken away a fortune from us, I expect to be recommended in Ireland. If authors of godly books are entitled to such fortunes, I desire you would recommend me as a moral one; I mean in Ireland, for that recommendation would not do in England.

THE DUCHESS BEGINS.

THE duchess will not lend you 2000*l.* or 3000*l.* to keep up your dignity, for reasons to Strada del Poe; but she had much rather give you that, or 10,000*l.* more, than lay it out in a fine petticoat to make herself respected.

I believe, for all you give Mr. Gay much good advice, that you are a very indiscreet person yourself, or else you would come here to take care of your own affairs, and not be so indiscreet as to send for your money over to a place where there is none. Mr. Gay is a very rich man, for I really think he does not wish to be richer; but he will, for he is doing what you bid him; though, if it may not be allowed, he will acquire greater honour and less trouble. His covetousness, at present, is for health, which he takes so much pains for that he does not allow himself time to enjoy it. Neither does he allow himself time to be either absent or present. When he began to be a sportsman he had like to have killed a dog; and now every day I expect he will kill himself, and then the bread and butter affair can never be brought before you. It is really an affair of too great consequence to be trusted in a letter; therefore pray come on purpose to decide it. If you do, you will not hear how familiar I am with Goody Dobson; for I have seen Goody Dobson play at that with so ill a grace that I was determined never to risk anything so unbecoming. I am not beloved, neither do I love any creature except a very few, and those not for having any sort of merit; but only because it is my humour; in this rank Mr. Gay stands first and yourself next, if you like to be respected upon these conditions. Now do you know me? He stands over me, and scolds me for spelling ill, and is very peevish (and sleepy) that I do not give him up the pen; for he has yawned for it a thousand times.* We both once heard a lady (who at that time we both thought well of) wish that she had the best living in England to give you.* It was not I: but I do wish it with all my heart if Mr. Gay does not hang out false lights for his friend.

MR. GAY GOES ON HERE.

I HAD forgot to tell you that I very lately received a letter from Twickenham, in which was this paragraph:—"Motte and another idle fellow, I find, have been writing to the dean, to get him to give them some copyright, which surely he will not be so indiscreet as to do, when he knows my design, and has done these two months and more. Surely I should be a properer person to trust the distribution of his works with than a common bookseller. Here will be nothing but the ludicrous and little things, none of the political, or any things of consequence, which are wholly at his own disposal. But, at any rate, it would be silly in him to give a copyright to any, which can only put the manner of publishing them hereafter out of his own and his friends' power into that of mercenaries."

I really think this is a very useful precaution, considering how you have been treated by these sort of fellows.

The duke is fast asleep, or he would add a line.

MR. PILKINGTON TO MR. BOWYER.

August 28, 1732.

SIR,—I have sent you some of the pamphlets I promised, in as large a parcel as I could venture. The dean has, with his own hand, made some alterations in some of them. I will by next post, or next but one, send you another pamphlet at least, and a new assignment from the dean. He received a letter from Mr. Pope and Mr. Motte; but neither have been of the least disadvantage to my request. I cannot say but I am proud of his friendship to me.

I desire that you will insist upon your right by the assignment I formerly sent; and let Mr. Motte show you anything under the dean's hand which will invalidate it! Our affair is a point where the dean's honour is concerned; and that very consideration may convince you that your interests will be secured. You shall hear from me more particularly in a post or two.

I send you a catalogue of some of those pieces which you are entitled to print; and if you would add any of the "Intelligencers," I can inform you which are the dean's, and which not.

A catalogue of pieces which you are empowered to print by the dean's assignment:—"The Barrack;" "An Ode to Ireland," from Horace; "A Libel on Dr. Delany and Lord Carteret;" "To Dr. Delany, on the Libels against him;" "O'Rourk;" "The Dressing-room;" "The Defence of it;" "The Journal at Rochford's;" "The Thorn;" "City Cries;" "Project, Bishops' Lands;" "On Bishops' Leases;" "Arguments against repealing the Test Act;" "Consideration ... the Bishops' Bills;" "Vindication of Lord Carteret;" "Proposal for Eating Children;" "Poem on the English Dean" "Journal of a Dublin Lady."

MATT. PILKINGTON

FROM SIR WILLIAM FOWNES

Island Bridge, September 9, 1732.

DEAR SIR,—It has been the observation of travellers, (as I have been frequently told,) that in all the countries they have seen they never met with fewer public charitable foundations than in this kingdom.

Private charities, no doubt, will have their reward; but public are great incitements; and good examples often draw others on, though grudgingly; and so a good work be done, no matter who are the workmen.

When I was lord-mayor, I saw some miserable lunatics exposed to the hazard of others, as well as themselves. I had six strong cells made at the workhouse for the most outrageous, which were soon filled; and by degrees, in a short time, those few drew upon us the solicitations of many, till, by the time the old corporation ceased, we had in that house forty and upward. The door being opened, interest soon made way to let in the foolish, and such-like, as mad folks. These grew a needless charge upon us, and had that course gone on, by this time the house had been filled with such. The new corporation got rid of most of these by death or the care of friends, and came to a resolution not to admit any such for the future; and the first denial was to a request of the earl of Kildare; which put a full stop to further applications. As I take it, there are at this time a number of objects which require assistance; and probably many may be restored, if proper care could be taken of them. There is no public place for their reception, nor private undertakers, as about London. Friends and relations here would pay the charge of their support and attendance, if there were a place for securing such lunatics.

I own to you I was for some time averse to our having a public bedlam, apprehending we should be overloaded with numbers under the name of mad. Nay, I was apprehensive our case would soon be like that in England; wives and husbands trying who could first get the other to bedlam. Many, who were next heirs to estates, would try their skill to render the possessor disordered, and get them confined, and soon run them into real madness. Such-like consequences I dreaded, and therefore have been silent on the subject till of late. Now I am convinced that regard should be had to those under such dismal circumstances; and I have heard the primate and others express their concern for them; and no doubt but very sufficient subscriptions may be had to set this needful work on foot. I should think it would be a pleasure to any one that has any intention in this way to see something done in their lifetime, rather than leave it to the conduct of posterity. I would not consent to the proceeding on such a work in the manner I have seen our poor-house, and Dr. Steven's hospital, viz., to have so expensive a foundation laid that the expense of the building should require such a sum, and so long a time to finish, as will take up half an age.

My scheme for such an undertaking should be much to this effect:—

First, I would have a spot of ground fixed on, that should be in a good open air, free from the neighbourhood of houses; for the cries and exclamations of the outrageous would reach a great way, and ought not to disturb neighbours: which was what you did not think of, when you mentioned a spot in a close place, almost in the heart of the city. There are many places in the outskirts of the city I can name very proper.

Next to the fixing of a proper spot, I would, when that is secured, (which should be a good space,) have it well enclosed with a high wall, the cost of all which must be known. Then I would have the cells at the Royal Hospital Infirmary, lately made for mad people, be examined, how convenient and how in all points they are adapted to the purpose, with the cost of these cells, which I take to be six or eight. Then I would proceed to the very needful house for the master and the proper servants. Then another building, to which there should be a piazza for a stone gallery, for walking dry; and out of that several lodging-cells for such as are not outrageous, but melancholy, &c. This may be of such a size that it may be enlarged in length, or by a return; and overhead the same sort of a gallery, with little rooms or cells, opening the doors into the gallery; for, by intervals, the objects affected may be permitted to walk at times in the galleries. This is according to the custom of London. Annexed to the master's house must be the kitchen and offices.

This proceeding may be so contrived as to be enlarged from time to time, as there shall be a fund and occasion to require additions. There is no necessity for any plans or architects; but any ordinary capacities may contrive those enlargements. Perhaps there may appear some well-disposed persons who will say they will make this enlargement, and so others, and, by such helps, they may be sufficiently done to answer all purposes.

It comes just now into my head that there is a very proper spot,[a] which I think the chapter of St. Patrick let to one Lee, a bricklayer or builder. It lies back of Aungier-street east, comes out of York-street down a place called the Dunghill, runs down to the end of King-street, facing William-street; at the north end of which some almshouses are built by Dowling and others. Also there stands, to the front of the street, a large stone building, called an almshouse, made by Mrs. Mercer; though, by the by, I hear she is weary of her project, and does little in supplying that house, or endowing it. Perhaps the ground may be easily come at from Lee's heirs; and, by your application, I know not but Mrs. Mercer may give her house up to promote so good a work. This will go a good way, and being followed by subscriptions, a great and speedy progress may be made, in which I will readily join my interest and labour. If that spot fail, we will pitch upon another. Whatsoever may be your future intentions, do not deny me the consideration of the good your appearance and help may now do. I would not make a step in this affair if it shall not be agreed that all matters which require the consent by votes shall be determined by the method of a balloting-box, that no great folks, or their speeches, should carry what they please, by their method of scoring upon paper, and seeing who marks, &c., too much practised.

If there be nothing in this paper worth your attention, you know how to dispose of it. You have the thoughts of your assured humble servant,

W. Fownes.

THE PROPOSAL.

I. That an hospital, called Bedlam, be built in the city of Dublin, or liberties, for the reception of lunatics from any part of the kingdom.

II. In order to promote so good a work, subscriptions to be taken in Dublin, and in every city and town in the kingdom; and that the chief magistrate of each place be desired to recommend the subscription-paper sent to him for that purpose.

III. That when public notice is given in print that ground is secured for building the hospital of Bedlam, the subscription be collected and sent to Dublin, and paid into the hands of (query, Mr. Thorn, steward to the Blue-coat hospital, a very proper person?)

IV. That upon notice given by Mr. Thorn that he has received 200*l.*, a meeting shall be held of all subscribers who happen to be in Dublin at a proper time and place.

V. Such persons as subscribe 5*l.* or upwards to have a vote at such a meeting.

VI. That Mr. Thorn, giving security, be continued to receive and pay out the money subscribed for one year and be allowed only 6*d.* per 1*l.* for receiving and paying.

[a] The ground here mentioned by sir William Fownes does not belong to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick, but to the corporation of vicars choral in that cathedral.

VII. That the money first laid out shall be for the building of six or eight strong cells for outrageous lunatics to be confined in, and after the form of those made at the infirmary of the Royal Hospital.

VIII. That the college of physicians be desired to contribute to this good work, by appointing two or three of their body to be present at the first meeting, and to give their opinion as to the conveniency of the cells, what boilers are proper to be set up in a kitchen, and what food is proper to be provided for such lunatics

IX. That near the cells be made a kitchen, small at first, and in such a manner as capable to be enlarged. That over this kitchen be a middle room, and over it a garret, to lodge the cook-maid and one other maid.

X. That adjoining the kitchen may be made one room of 18 feet by 18, which may serve for Mr. Thorn to attend in, and where the doctors or any subscribers may meet on occasion. And over this room another, to serve for a store-room, and a garret to lodge a porter or two, that must attend the lunatics.

XI. That these buildings be made plain and strong, with as little cost as can be.

XII. That the charge of these be computed separate, and of the inside necessaries; so that the work may go on as fast as the subscription-fund can be got in.

XIII. That the subscribers at the first meeting do elect seven of their number, such as are knowing in carrying on of the work, and willing to attend at needful times. That any three or more, at any meeting at the hospital, may give directions for proceeding on the buildings agreed upon to be made at the first meeting of the subscribers; at which first meeting a second meeting may be agreed upon, and so from time to time.

The walling-in of the piece of ground intended for this use may go on as the fund will bear, without obstructing the first useful buildings. And whereas there are lunatics of several kinds, as the melancholy, &c., and some that are unruly by fits, a building must be designed for this sort; the floors not lofty, but made sufficiently airy, 20 feet wide, whereof 10 for a gallery and 10 for lodges; each lodge 8 or 10 feet broad.

As there is a fund * * * *

Dear Sir,—Herewith you have my thoughts of the affair you mentioned to me. I wish I could prevail on you to patronise it, and lay down your own scheme. I am most confident it cannot fail going on briskly. You have friends and interest enough to set it agoing, although there may be some grandees would rather other hands had the conduct of it; yet the work speaks so much for itself, they must be ashamed not to contribute, much more to obstruct it.

In the paper called "The Proposal" I have considered the privatest and least expensive way of going to work, avoided public forms and grandees interposing. Tom Thorn by chance I thought upon for that reason, and for preventing jobs, &c., Do what you please with my papers. I am just ditto.

TO MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

Dublin, September 11, 1732.

My Lord Elect,—I anticipate your title, because perhaps it my be your due before your chaplain, Mr. Pilkington, can attend you. And besides, I have a mind to be the first person who gives it to you. And, first, I heartily acknowledge your goodness in favouring a young gentleman who has well answered all the recommendations that have been given me of him, and I have some years watched all opportunities to do him a good office, but none of the few things in my own gift that would be proper for him have fallen in my way since I knew him; and power with others, you know or may believe, I have none. I value Mr. Pilkington as much for his modesty as his learning and sense, or any good quality he has. And it would be hard, after your sending us over so many worthless bishops, all bedangled with their pert illiterate relations and flatterers, if you would not suffer us to lend you, at least for one year, one sample of modesty, virtue, and good sense; and I am glad it falls to your lordship to give the first precedent. I will write to Dr. Trapp in Mr. Pilkington's favour, but whether I have any credit with him I cannot tell, although perhaps you will think I may pretend to some. It is by my advice that Mr. Pilkington goes over somewhat sooner; for I would have him know a little of your end of the town, and what he is to do; but he will not give you any trouble or care till yo . please to command him, which I suppose will not be till you are settled in your office.

Nothing but this cruel accident of a lameness could have hindered me from attending your ceremonial as a spectator, and I should have forwarded, to the utmost, Mr. Pope's scheme, for I never approved the omission of those shows. And I think I saw, in my youth, a lord-mayor's show with all that pomp, when sir Thomas Pilkington,[a] of your chaplain's name and family, made his procession.

I have advised your chaplain to send you this letter, and not present it, that you may be in no pain about him, for he shall wait on you the next morning, when he has taken a lodging for himself, till you come into your mayoralty.

I cannot conclude without repeating my acknowledgments for your kind remembrance of me. We were both followers of the same court and the same cause and exiles, after a sort, you a voluntary one,[b] and I a necessary; but you have out-thrown me many a hundred bars' lengths. I heartily wish the continuance of your good success, and am, with great truth, your most constant friend and most obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

London, November 7, 1732.

I SHOULD have answered yours sooner, but that I every day expected another from you, with your orders to speak to the duke; which I should with great pleasure have obeyed, as it was to serve a friend of yours. Mrs. Floyd is now, thank God, in as good health as I have seen her these many years, though she has still her winter cough hanging upon her; but that, I fear, I must never expect she should be quite free from at this time of day. All my trouble with her now is to make her drink wine enough according to the doctor's order, which is not above three or four glasses, such as are commonly filled at sober houses; and that she makes so great a rout with, and makes so many faces, that there is nobody that did not know her perfectly well but would extremely suspect she drank drams in private.

I am sorry to find our tastes so different in the same person; and as everybody has a natural partiality to their own opinion, so it is surprising to me to find lady Suffolk dwindled in yours, who rises infinitely in mine the more and the longer I know her. But you say, "you will say no more of courts, for fear of growing angry;" and, indeed, I think you are so already, since you level all without knowing them, and seem to think that no one who belongs to a court can act right. I am sure this cannot be really and truly your sense, because it is unjust; and if it is, I shall suspect there is something of your old maxim in it, (which I ever admired and found true,) that you must have offended them, because you do not forgive. I have been about a fortnight from Knowle, and shall next Thursday go there again for about three weeks, where I shall be ready and willing to receive your commands, who am most faithfully and sincerely yours.

FROM MR. GAY.

November 16, 1732.

DEAR SIR,—I am at last come to London before the family, to follow my own inventions. In a week or fortnight I expect the family will follow me. You may now draw upon me for your money as soon as you please. I have some of my own too that lies dead; and I protest I do not know which way at present to dispose of it, everything is so precarious. I paid Mrs. Launcelot 12*l.*, and pay myself the five guineas you had of me, and have deducted your loss by paying off one of the South Sea bonds; and I find I have remaining of yours 211*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* And I believe, over and above that sum, there will be more owing to you upon account of interest on the bonds, about four or five pounds. Mr. Hoare has done this for me, but I have not had time to call upon him yet, so that I cannot be more particular. As the money now lies in Mr. Hoare's hands, you see it is ready on demand. I believe you had best give notice when you draw on me for it, that I may not be out of the way. I have not as yet seen Mr. Pope, but design in a day or two to go to him, though I am in hopes of seeing him here to-day or to-morrow. If my present project succeeds, you may expect a better account of my own fortune a little while after the holidays; but I promise myself nothing, for I am determined that neither anybody else or myself shall disappoint me. I wish the arguments made use of to draw you here were every way of more consequence. I would not have you change one comfort of life for another. I wish you to keep every one of those you have already, with as many additional ones as you like. When I sit down to consider on the choice of any subject, to amuse myself by writing, I find I have a natural propensity to write against vice, so that I do not expect much encouragement; though I really think, in justice, I ought to be paid for stifling my own inclination; but the great are ungrateful. Mr. Pulteney's young son has had the small-pox, and is perfectly recovered. He is not in town, but is expected in about a week from the Bath. I must answer the letter you writ to the duchess and me, when her grace comes to town; for I know she intended to have a part in it. Why cannot you come among us in the beginning of the new year? The company will be then all in town, and the spring advancing upon us every day. What I mean by the company is, those who call themselves your friends, and I believe are so. It is certain the parliament will not meet till the middle of January. I have not been idle while I was in the country; and I know your wishes in general, and in particular that industry may always find its account. Believe me, as I am, unchangeable in the regard, love, and esteem I have for you.

[a] Sir Thomas Pilkington was lord-mayor in three successive years, from 1689 to 1691. There is a broadside, containing an account of the festivities upon the occasion, drawn up by no less a person than Elkanah Settle, once the rival of Dryden. Pilkington's triumph was the more complete, as he had been a sufferer for his adherence to the Whig interest in the reigns of Charles II. and his successor.

[b] Barber was a violent adherent of lord Bolingbroke, and deemed it safe to go abroad upon the accession of the Hanoverian line.

FROM MR. POPE.

December 5, 1732.

It is not a time to complain that you have not answered me two letters (in the last of which I was impatient under some fears). It is not now indeed a time to think of myself, when one of the nearest and longest ties I have ever had is broken all on a sudden by the unexpected death of poor Mr. Gay. An inflammatory fever hurried him out of this life in three days. He died last night at nine o clock, not deprived of his senses entirely at last, and possessing them perfectly till within five hours. He asked of you a few hours before, when in acute torment by the inflammation in his bowels and breast. His effects are in the duke of Queensberry's custody. His sisters, we suppose, will be his heirs, who are two widows; as yet it is not known whether or no he left a will.—Good God! how often are we to die before we go quite off this stage? in every friend we lose a part of ourselves, and the best part. God keep those we have left! few are worth praying for, and oneself the least of all.

I shall never see you now, I believe; one of your principal calls to England is at an end. Indeed he was the most amiable by far, his qualities were the gentlest, but I love you as well and as firmly. Would to God the man we have lost had not been so amiable nor so good; but that's a wish for our own sakes, not for his. Sure, if innocence and integrity can deserve happiness, it must be his. Adieu. I can add nothing to what you will feel, and diminish nothing from it. Yet write to me, and soon. Believe no man now living loves you better, I believe no man ever did, than ALEXANDER POPE.

Dr. Arbuthnot, whose humanity you know, heartily commends himself to you. All possible diligence and affection has been shown, and continued attendance, on this melancholy occasion. Once more adieu, and write to one who is truly disconsolate.

P.S. BY DR. ARBUTHNOT.

DEAR SIR,—I am sorry that the renewal of our correspondence should be upon such a melancholy occasion. Poor Mr. Gay died of an inflammation, and I believe at last a mortification, of the bowels; it was the most precipitate case I ever knew, having cut him off in three days. He was attended by two physicians besides myself. I believed the distemper mortal from the beginning. I have not had the pleasure of a line from you these two years; I wrote one about your health, to which I had no answer. I wish you all health and happiness, being with great affection and respect, sir, your, &c

---

TO THE RIGHT HON. JOHN BARBER, LORD-MAYOR OF LONDON

Dublin, December 14, 1732.

MY LORD,—After obtaining one favour from your lordship, I am under the necessity of requesting another; which, however, I hope will not give you much trouble. I know that it depends upon chance what employments you may have in your disposal during your mayoralty; but some I presume you will have. It is therefore my request, and will be so likewise of some others among your friends, that if any employment should fall vacant during your government, which Mr. Barber would be allowed capable of executing well, your lordship would please that he may have the refusal, with as much favour as will consist with your own generous disposition, adding the friendship you are pleased to profess to me, which I throw heartily into the balance. He is of English birth; a very upright, honest man, and his wife has abundance of merit in all respects; they design to settle among you, having turned what fortune they had here into money.

And now, my lord, I heartily give you joy of governing the noblest city in the world, where I know you are desirous and able to do so much good, and to set a worthy pattern for the imitation of those who shall come after you. If my health and the bad situation of my private affairs will permit, I shall hope to have the honour of being one among your guests next summer. Mr. Pilkington is, in his letters, perpetually full of your great favours to him, and says you will be his voucher that he still continues his modest behaviour, which I always pressed upon him as the best quality in a young man, although I never observed the least want of it in him.

I hope you will take care of your health, which in our city of Dublin is a difficult task for a lord-mayor to perform; and if your lordship be under the necessity of drinking as many healths in proportion on public days as are done here, you will be in great danger of ruining your own. I am, with entire friendship and true respect, my lord, your lordship's most obedient and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM CHARLES FORD, ESQ.

London, December 23, 1732.

YESTERDAY I received your letter of the 9th, and am infinitely obliged to you for the constant concern you show for me. I am ashamed to trouble you so much and so often in my own affairs; and your great kindness makes me almost ashamed to ask pardon for it. * * * * * * * * * * * *

I am very glad to hear the character you give of lord Orrery. He was extremely applauded for a speech he made against the army bill. There is no danger of repealing the test. The court has taken the usual method of gaining the fanatic leaders, much against the grain of the body. It is said the bishop of Salisbury [Dr. Benjamin Hoadly] is the chief encourager of them; that the queen spoke to him, and that he answered, He can be besmeared, although they would not suffer him to go the dirty road to Durham. That was the excuse they made him upon the last vacancy of that see. I am extremely proud that lady Acheson does me the honour to remember her humble servant. I heartily wish she could be persuaded to keep good hours, having observed by many of my acquaintance, that nothing impairs health so much as sitting up late. I often hear from my sister: she writes in quite another strain than she talked, with cheerfulness and good-nature. I fancy Arsalia[a] has cured the lady of her spleen.

I heartily wish you many new years, with health and happiness, and am, most entirely, &c.

I am told poor Gay's play is now in rehearsal, and will please. It was that brought him to town a little before he died; though, without his fever, he could not probably have held out long anywhere.

TO MRS. PILKINGTON.

Deanery-house, January 1, 1733.

MADAM,—I send you your bit of a newspaper, with the verses,[b] than which I never saw better in their kind.

* Indorsed "On my dear friend Mr. Gay's death: Received December 15, but not read till the 20th, by an impulse foreboding some misfortune" This note is indorsed on the original letter in Dr. Swift's hand.—POPE.

a The seat of Peter Ludlow, esq., father to the first earl of Ludlow.

b Mrs. Pilkington, when she was about sixteen, having been teazed by her brother to write some verses as a school exercise

I have the same opinion of those you were pleased to write upon me,[a] as have also some particular friends of genius and taste, to whom I ventured to communicate them, who universally agree with me. But as I cannot with decency show them, except to a very few, I hope, for both our sakes, others will do it for me. I can only assure you I value your present as much as either of the others, only you must permit it to be turned into a pen; which office I will perform with my own hand, and never permit any other to use it. I heartily wish you many happy new years; and am, with true esteem, madam, your most obliged friend and servant,
JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. ROBERT ARBUTHNOT.

Rouen, January 2, 1733.

DEAR SIR,—I have flattered myself these many years that vapours or company would have brought you over seas to Spa, or to some such place, and that you would have taken Paris in your way; and so I should have had the pleasure of seeing you in some place of my own. I wonder much that a person of so much good humour can let yourself grow old, or die, without seeing some other country than your own. I am not quite so wicked as to wish you any real illness to bring you to us, though I should not be sorry that you thought you had need of change of air. I wish you a happy new year, and many more; and (whatever interest I have against it) good health and prosperity, and everything that I can wish to one that I much honour and esteem.

I recommend to your friendship and acquaintance the bearer, Mr. De la Mar. His brother, now dead, has been with you in Ireland; and this gentleman deserves from me all the kindness my friends can show him. Adieu, dear sir; if I can serve you in anything, command me always, for I am, with great esteem, your most humble and most obedient servant,
ROBERT ARBUTHNOT.

TO LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

January 8, 1733.

MADAM,—Although I have but just received the honour of your ladyship's letter, yet, as things stand, I am determined, against my usual practice, to give you no respite but to answer it immediately; because you have provoked me with your lady Suffolk. It is six years last spring since I first went to visit my friends in England after the queen's death. Her present majesty heard of my arrival, and sent at least nine times to command my attendance before I would obey her, for several reasons not hard to guess; and, among others, because I had heard her character from those who knew her well. At last I went, and she received me very graciously. I told her the first time "that I was informed she loved to see old persons; and that, having sent for a wild boy from Germany, she had a curiosity to see a wild dean from Ireland." I was not much struck with the honour of being sent for, because I knew the same distinction had been offered to others, with whom it would not give me much pride to be compared. I never went once but upon command; and Mrs. Howard, now lady Suffolk, was usually the person who sent for me, both at Leicester-house and Richmond. Mr. Pope (with whom I lived) and Mr. Gay were then great favourites of Mrs. Howard, especially the latter, who was then one of her led-captains. He had written a very ingenious book of fables, for the use of her younger son, and she often promised to provide for him. But some time before, there came out a libel against Mr. Walpole, who was informed it was written by Mr. Gay; and although Mr. Walpole owned he was convinced that it was not written by Gay, yet he never would pardon him, but did him a hundred ill offices to the princess. Walpole was at that time very civil to me, and so were all the people in power. He invited me and some of my friends to dine with him at Chelsea. After dinner I took an occasion to say what I had observed of princes and great ministers, "that if they heard an ill thing of a private person, who expected some favour, although they were afterward convinced that the person was innocent, yet they would never be reconciled." Mr. Walpole knew well enough that I meant Mr. Gay. I afterward said the same thing to the princess, with the same intention; and she confessed it a great injustice. But Mr. Walpole gave it another turn; for he said to some of his friends, and particularly to a lord, a near relation of yours, "that I had dined with him, and had been making apologies for myself;" it seems for my conduct in her late majesty's reign, in which no man was more innocent, and particularly more officious to do good offices to many of that party which was then out of power, as it is well known. Mrs. Howard was then in great favour, and openly protected Mr. Gay; at least, she saw him often, and professed herself his friend; but Mr. Walpole could hardly be persuaded to let him hold a poor little office for a second year, of commissioner to a lottery. When I took my leave of her highness on coming hither, she was very gracious; told me "the medals she had promised me were not ready, but she would send them to me." However, by her commands I sent her some plaids for herself and the princesses, and was too gallant to hear of any offers of payment. Next spring I came again to England; was received the same way; and as I had many hints given me that the court at Leicester-fields would endeavour to settle me in England, (which I did not much regard,) the late king died. I went, by Mrs. Howard's orders, to kiss their new majesties' hands, and was particularly distinguished by the queen. In a few weeks the queen said to Mrs. Howard (alluding to one of Gay's fables) "that she would take up the Hare;" and bade her to put her in mind, in settling the family, to find some employment for Mr. Gay; but, in the event, it proved only an offer to be a gentleman-usher to a girl of two years old, which all his friends (and I among the rest) advised him not to accept: and accordingly he excused himself with the utmost respect. This I and everybody else were sure must have been a management of Mr. Walpole. As to myself, in a few weeks after the king's death I found myself not well, and was resolved to take a step to Paris for my health, having an opportunity of doing it with some advantages and recommendations. But my friends advised me first for him, asked him what she should write upon: "Why," said he pertly, "what should you write upon but paper?" So, taking it for her subject, she wrote the following lines; which, four years after, were printed in one of the London newspapers. See Pilkington's Memoirs, vol. i. p. 88.

"O spotless paper, fair and white!
On whom, by force constrain'd, I write,
How cruel am I to destroy
Thy purity to please a boy!
Ungrateful I, thus to abuse
The fairest servant of the muse.
Dear friend, to whom I oft impart
The choicest secrets of my heart,
Ah, what atonement can be made
For spotless innocence betray'd!
How fair, how lovely didst thou show,
Like lilied banks or falling snow!
But now, alas! become my prey,
No floods can wash thy stains away;
Yet this small comfort I can give,
That which destroy'd shall make thee live."

[a] Mrs. Pilkington, having heard that Dr Swift had received a book from the earl of Orrery and a silver standish from Dr. Delany, sent him an eagle-quill with the verses upon his birthday. See vol. i. p. 647.

to consult Mrs. Howard; because, as they knew less of courts than I, they were strongly possessed that the promise made me might succeed, since a change was all I desired. I wrote to her for her opinion, and particularly conjured her, "since I had long done with courts, not to use me like a courtier, but give me her sincere advice;" which she did, both in a letter and to some friends. It was, "by all means not to go: it would look singular, and perhaps disaffected;" and to my friends enlarged upon the good intentions of the court toward me. I staid; my health grew worse; I left Mr. Pope's house; went to a private lodging near Hammersmith; and, continuing ill, I wrote to Mrs. Howard, with my duty to the queen, took coach for Chester, recovered in my journey, and came over hither; where, although I have ever since lived in obscurity, yet I have the misfortune, without any grounds except misinformation, to lie under her majesty's displeasure, as I have been assured by more than two honourable persons of both sexes; and Mr. Gay[a] is in the same condition. For these reasons, as I did always, so I do still think Mrs. Howard, now my lady Suffolk, to be an absolute courtier. Let her show you the character I wrote of her, and whereof no one else has a copy; and I take Mr. Pope and Mr. Gay, who judge more favourably, to be a couple of simpletons. In my answer to the last letter which my lady Suffolk honoured me with, I did with great civility discharge her from ever giving herself another trouble of that kind. I have a great esteem for her good sense and taste. She would be an ornament to any court; and I do not in the least pity her for not being a female minister, which I never looked on as an advantageous character to a great and wise lady; of which I could easily produce instances. Mr. Pope, besides his natural and acquired talents, is a gentleman of very extraordinary candour; and is, consequently, apt to be too great a believer of assurances, promises, professions, encouragements, and the like words of course. He asks nothing; and thinks, like a philosopher, that he wants nothing. Mr. Gay is, in all regards, as honest and sincere a man as ever I knew; whereof neither princes nor ministers are either able to judge, or inclined to encourage: which, however, I do not take for so high a breach of politics as they usually suppose: for, however insignificant wit, learning, and virtue may be thought in the world, it perhaps would do government no hurt to have a little of them on its side. If you have gone thus far in reading, you are not so wise as I thought you to be; but I will never offend again with so much length. I write only to justify myself. I know you have been always a zealous Whig, and so am I to this day: but nature has not given you leave to be virulent. As to myself, I am of the old Whig principles, without the modern articles and refinements.

Your ladyship says not one syllable to inform me whether you approve of what I sent you to be written on the monument,[b] nor whether you would have it in Latin or English. I am ever, with true respect and high esteem, madam, your ladyship's, &c.,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

The friend I named, who I was afraid would die, is recovered: and his preferment is by turns in the crown and the primate; but the next vacancy will not be in the crown's disposal.

[a] This letter must have been written before its date, of 8th January, for the dean had intelligence of Gay's death on 20th December.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.

London, January 13, 1733.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—I had the pleasure of receiving one from you by Mr. Pilkington. I thank you for the opportunity it gave me of being acquainted with a very agreeable, ingenious man. I value him very much for his music, which you give yourself an air of contemning; and I think I treated him in that way to a degree of surprise.

I have had but a melancholy, sorrowful life for some time past, having lost my dear child, whose life, if it had so pleased God, I would have willingly redeemed with my own. I thank God for a new lesson of submission to his will, and likewise for what he has left me.

We have all had another loss, of our worthy and dear friend Mr. Gay [who died Dec. 4, 1732]. It was some alleviation of my grief to see him so universally lamented by almost everybody, even by those who knew him only by reputation. He was interred at Westminster-Abbey, as if he had been a peer of the realm; and the good duke of Queensberry, who lamented him as a brother, will set up a handsome monument upon him. These are little affronts put upon vice and injustice, and is all that remains in our power. I believe the "Beggars' Opera," and what he had to come upon the stage, will make the sum of the diversions of the town for some time to come. Curll (who is one of the new terrors of death) has been writing letters to everybody for memoirs of his life. I was for sending him some, particularly an account of his disgrace at court, which I am sure might have been made entertaining: by which I should have attained two ends at once, published truth, and got a rascal whipped for it. I was overruled in this. I wish you had been here, though I think you are in a better country. I fancy to myself that you have some virtue and honour left, some small regard for religion. Perhaps Christianity may last with you at least twenty or thirty years longer. You have no companies or stock-jobbing, are yet free of excises; you are not insulted in your poverty, and told with a sneer that you are a rich and a thriving nation. Every man that takes neither place nor pension is not deemed with you a rogue and an enemy to his country.

Your friends of my acquaintance are in tolerable good health. Mr. Pope has his usual complaints of headach and indigestion, I think more than formerly. He really leads sometimes a very irregular life, that is, lives with people of superior health and strength. You will see some new things of his, equal to any of his former productions. He has affixed to the new edition of his "Dunciad," a royal declaration against the haberdashers of points and particles, assuming the title of critics and restorers, wherein he declares that he has revised carefully this his "Dunciad," beginning and ending so and so, consisting of so many lines, and declares this edition to be the true reading: and it is signed by John Barber, major civitatis Londini.

I remember you, with your friends, who are my neighbours; they all long to see you. As for news, there is nothing here talked of but the new scheme of excise. You may remember that a ministry in the queen's time, possessed of her majesty, the parliament, army, fleet, treasury, confederate, &c., put all to the test by an experiment of a silly project in the trial of a poor parson [Dr. Sacheverell]. The same game, in my mind, is playing over again, from a wantonness of power. Miraberis quàm paucâ sapientiâ mundus regitur.

I have considered the grievance of your wine; the friend that designed you good wine was abused by an agent that he intrusted this affair to. It was not this gentleman's brother, whose name is De la Mar, to whom show what friendship you can. My brother is getting money now in China, less and more honestly than his predecessor's supercargoes; but enough to make you satisfaction, which, if he comes home alive, he shall do.

My neighbour the proseman is wiser and more cowardly and despairing than ever. He talks me into a fit of vapours twice or thrice a-week. I dream at night of a chain and rowing in the galleys. But, thank God, he has not taken from me the freedom I have been accustomed to in my discourse, (even with the greatest persons to whom I have access,) in defending the cause of liberty, virtue, and religion; for the last, I have the satisfaction of suffering some share of the ignominy that belonged to the first confessors. This has been my lot, from a steady resolution I have taken of giving these ignorant impudent fellows battle upon all occasions. My family send you their best wishes and a happy new year; and none can do it more heartily than myself, who am, with the most sincere respect, your most faithful humble servant.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, January 1733.

I RECEIVED yours with a few lines from the doctor, and the account of our losing Mr. Gay, upon which event I shall say nothing. I am only concerned that long living has not hardened me; for even in this kingdom, and in a few days past, two persons of great merit, whom I loved very well, have died in the prime of their years, but a little above thirty. I would endeavour to comfort myself upon the loss of friends as I do upon the loss of money, by turning to my account-book, and seeing whether I have enough left for my support; but in the former case I find I have not any more than in the other; and know not any man who is in a greater likelihood than myself to die poor and friendless. You are a much greater loser than I by his death, as being a more intimate friend and often his companion; which latter I could never hope to be, except perhaps once more in my life for a piece of a summer. I hope he has left you the care of any writings he may have left, and I wish that, with those already extant, they could be all published in a fair edition, under your inspection. Your poem on the "Use of Riches" has been just printed here, and we have no objection but the obscurity of several passages by our ignorance in facts and persons, which makes us lose abundance of the satire. Had the printer given me notice, I would have honestly printed the names at length, where I happened to know them; and writ explanatory notes, which, however, would have been but few, for my long absence has made me ignorant of what passes out of the scene where I am. I never had the least hint from you about this work, any more than of your former, upon "Taste." We are told here that you are preparing other pieces of the same bulk to be inscribed to other friends, one (for instance) to my lord Bolingbroke, another to lord Oxford, and so on. Dr. Delany presents you his most humble service: he behaves himself very commendably, converses only with his former friends, makes no parade, but entertains them constantly at an elegant plentiful table; walks the streets, as usual, by daylight; does many acts of charity and generosity; cultivates a country-house two miles distant; and is one of those very few within my knowledge on whom a great access of fortune hath made no manner of change. And particularly, he is often without money, as he was before. We have got my lord Orrery among us, being forced to continue here on the ill condition of his estate by the knavery of an agent; he is a most worthy gentleman, whom I hope you will be acquainted with. I am very much obliged by your favour to Mr. Pilkington, which I desire may continue no longer than he shall deserve by his modesty, a virtue I never knew him to want, but is hard for young men to keep without abundance of ballast. If you are acquainted with the duchess of Queensberry, I desire you will present her my most humble service; I think she is a greater loser by the death of a friend than either of us. She seems a lady of excellent sense and spirits. I had often postscripts from her in our friend's letters to me, and her part was sometimes longer than his, and they made up a great part of the little happiness I could have here. This was the more generous because I never saw her since she was a girl of five years old, nor did I envy poor Mr. Gay for anything so much as being a domestic friend to such a lady. I desire you will never fail to send me a particular account of your health; I dare hardly inquire about Mrs. Pope, who I am told is but just among the living, and consequently a continual grief to you; she is sensible of your tenderness, which robs her of the only happiness she is capable of enjoying. And yet I pity you more than her; you cannot lengthen her days, and I beg she may not shorten yours. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE EARL OF ORRERY.

January, 1733.

MY LORD,—It is some time since Mrs. Ball gave me, enclosed and directed to me, your lordship's verses, in your own hand, with the alterations you were pleased to make, for which I have long deferred my acknowledgments; and if I were to follow the course of my own nature, the delay should be longer; because, although I believe no man has a more grateful sense of a real honour done him than myself, yet no man is in more confusion how to express it. Although I had not the least hand in publishing those verses (which would have ill become me), yet I will not be so affected as to conceal the pride I have in seeing them abroad, whatever enmity they may procure against your lordship for publicly favouring one so obnoxious to present powers, and turning their hatred into envy; which last, as it is more tormenting to the owners, will better gratify my revenge. And of this advantage I shall make the proper use, leaving your lordship to shift for yourself, without the least grain of pity for what you may suffer.

In the mean time I beg you to accept my most humble thanks for the honour done me by so excellent a performance on so barren a subject; by which words I wisely anticipate the censure of all those who love me not; in spite of whom it will be said in future ages that one of lord Orrery's first essays in poetry were these verses on Dr. Swift. That your lordship may go on to be the great example, restorer, and patron of virtue, learning, and wit, in a most corrupt, stupid, and ignorant age and nation, shall be the constant wish, hope, and prayer of, my lord, your most obedient, obliged, and most humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MISS KELLY.

Jarvis-street, six o'clock, Friday evening, February 2, 1733.

SIR,—I danced so long last night that I have not been able till this moment to thank you for the goodness you showed me this morning. Be assured the favours you bestow on me are received with the greatest pleasure, and I only am sorry it is not in my power to convince you that nobody can set a higher value on your friendship than I do.

Indeed I have an implicit faith in your medicine; for if only despising the poets can hinder its proving effectual, I must certainly receive from it all the benefit I desire; for really I am quite of the other side, and am a sincere admirer of all the good poets; but am more particularly attached to the best. What I shall do to convince you of the truth of this I cannot determine; but surely the care I shall always take to mend upon your reproofs will, in time, let you know that nobody can desire more sincerely to please you than, sir, your most obliged and most faithful humble servant, F. A. KELLY.

I am half asleep, so do not be angry at these blots. Being out of cash at present, I send you my note, which I hope will satisfy you.

I acknowledge to be indebted to the reverend doctor Swift, dean of St. Patrick's, the sum of 0*l*. 1*s*. 1½*d*. for value received, this 2nd day of February, 1733.

FRANCES ARABELLA KELLY.[a]

FROM MR. POPE TO MR. DODSLEY.[b]

February 5, 1733.

SIR,—I was very willing to read your piece, and do freely tell you I like it, so far as my particular judgment goes. Whether it has action enough to please on the stage, I doubt; but the morality and satire ought to be relished by the reader. I will do more than you ask me, I will recommend it to Mr. Rich.[c] If he can join it to any play, with suitable representations, to make it an entertainment, I believe he will give you a benefit-night; and I sincerely wish it may be turned any way to your advantage, or that I could show you my friendship in any instance. I am, &c.

ALEXANDER POPE.

FROM THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

London, February 6, 1733.
Queen Anne's birthday, the bells all ringing.

BELIEVE me, sir, and it is with great truth I speak it, that there is not a person in the world I would sooner oblige than yourself; and I should be glad to have it in my power to serve Mrs. Barber in the way you mention; but it is odds it may not be in my power, for many things may fall that her spouse is not fit for; as all places relating to the law he can have no pretensions to. There are a dozen persons in my house called lord-mayors' officers, who wear black gowns and give from eight to nine hundred pounds for their places, which at first they make about sixty pounds per annum of, and rise in time to three or four hundred pounds; but they are generally young men. These places, I suppose, should any one fall, would not be thought good enough. There are many other places in my gift. We have had mayors gone through the office who have not got one hundred pounds, and others have got ten thousand pounds; it is all chance. I have gone through the fourth part of my year, and have got only about two hundred guineas, by the deaths of one of the city music and a porter to Guildhall.

But suppose a place should fall worth fifteen hundred or two thousand pounds that he may be fit for, one-third of the purchase goes to the city, and must be paid before his admission; the other two-thirds are mine: but I cannot put a less price than was paid before, because the last price is entered in the city books.

I know you love particulars, and thus you have the case as it stands. * * *

You will give me leave to add a word or two, which I do in confidence, that I have been for many years plagued with a set of ungrateful monsters called cousins, that I tremble at the name. And though I give yearly pensions to some, and monthly and weekly to others, all would not do, and I am insulted and abused by them, and cannot help myself.

Now, as Mrs. Barber and her family design to settle here, and she has done me the honour in most places to call me cousin, I hope it will not be expected I should have the care of them. I have very ill health, and any additional care that way would hurt me very much; but for doing her and her family any good offices, I shall never be wanting.

I must now beg leave to return you my thanks for your affectionate and kind wishes. The honour, I own, is very great I am in possession of, and I am sensible I am placed aloft, and that all my words and actions are scanned; but I will not be discouraged, and hope I shall get through with honour. One motive for making me think so is the great pleasure and satisfaction I have in the hopes of seeing you here, where your advice and example will be of great use; and therefore I hope you will lose no time, but come away, and I will fit up an apartment for you in Queen-square, and another at Sheen (which I hope you will accept), places that I shall hardly be able to see this year.

Mr. Pilkington gains daily upon us, and comes out a facetious, agreeable fellow. I carried him the other day to see her grace of Bucks in the park. Her grace, seeing him, asked who he was; I answered, "he was a present from you from Dublin." She smilingly replied, "he is no fool then, I am sure."

I shall conclude a long dull letter with my sincere wishes for your health and prosperity, and that you would not delay one hour coming to bless your friends here with your company, which by none is more desired than, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant, J. BARBER.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

February 28, 1733.

I RECEIVED yours of the 8th of January but last week, so find it has lain long on the road after the date. It was brought me while at dinner, that very lady sitting close to me whom you seem to think such an absolute courtier [countess of Suffolk]. She knew your hand, and inquired much after you as she always does; but I, finding her name frequently mentioned not with that kindness I am sure she deserves, put it into my pocket with silence and surprise. Indeed, were it in people's power that live in a court with the appearance of favour to do all they desire with their friends, they might deserve their anger and be blamed when it does not happen right to their minds; but that I believe never was the case of any one: and in this particular of Mr. Gay, thus far I know and so far I will answer for, that she was under very great concern that nothing better could be got for him; and the friendship upon all other occasions in her own power that she showed him did not look like a double-dealer.

As to that part concerning yourself and her, I suppose it is my want of comprehension that I cannot find out why she was to blame to give you advice when you asked it, that had all the appearance of sincerity, good-nature, and right judgment. And if, after that the court did not do what you wanted, and she both believed and wished they would, was it her fault? At least I cannot find out that you have hitherto proved it upon her. And though you say you lamented the hour you had seen her, yet I cannot tell how to suppose that your good sense and justice can impute anything to her, because it did not fall out just as she endeavoured and hoped it would.

[a] This promissory note is pinned to the letter. It certainly is an answer to some whim or other of the dean's.

[b] Mr. Robert Dodsley, the celebrated bookseller, to whom Mr. Pope was one of the earliest patrons. He died Sept. 25, 1764.

[c] He was as good as his word. He recommended to Mr. Rich "The Triflers," the piece above alluded to; and by his interest it was brought on the stage, and very favourably received.

As to your creed in politics, I will heartily and sincerely subscribe to it (that I detest avarice in courts, corruption in ministers, schisms in religion, illiterate fawning betrayers of the church in mitres). But at the same time I prodigiously want an infallible judge to determine when it is really so: for as I have lived longer in the world and seen many changes, I know those out of power and place always see the faults of those in with dreadful large spectacles; and I dare say you know many instances of it in lord Oxford's time. But the strongest in my memory is sir Robert Walpole, being first pulled to pieces in the year 1720 because the South Sea did not rise high enough, and since that he has been to the full as well banged about because it did rise too high. So experience has taught me how wrong, unjust, and senseless, party factions are; therefore I am determined never wholly to believe any side or party against the other; and to show that I will not, as my friends are in and out of all sides, so my house receives them altogether; and those people meet here that have and would fight in any other place. Those of them that have great and good qualities and virtues I love and admire, in which number is lady Suffolk; and I do like and love her because I believe, and as far as I am capable of judging know, her to be a wise, discreet, honest, and sincere courtier, who will promise no further than she can perform, and will always perform what she does promise; so now you have my creed as to her.[a]

I though. I had told you in my last, at least I am sure I designed it, that I desire you would do just as you like about the monument; and then it will be most undoubtedly approved by your most sincere and faithful servant, E. GERMAIN.

TO THE EARL OF OXFORD.

Dublin, February 16, 1733.

MY LORD,—The bearer, Mr. Faulkner, the prince of Dublin printers, will have the honour to deliver you this. He tells me your lordship was so gracious as to admit him into your presence and receive him with great condescension, which encouraged him to hope for the same favour again by my mediation, which I could not refuse. Although for his own profit he is engaged in a work that very much discontents me, yet I would rather have it fall into his hands than any other's on this side.

I am just recovered in some degree of two cruel indispositions, of giddiness and deafness, after seven months. I have got my hearing; but the other evil hangs still about me, and I doubt will never quite leave me until I leave it.

I hope your lordship, and lady Oxford, and lady Margaret continue in perfect health. I pray God preserve you all, for the good of your friends and your country. I am, with entire respect and esteem, your lordship's most obedient and most obliged servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. POPE.

February 16, 1733.

IT is indeed impossible to speak on such a subject as the loss of Mr. Gay, to me an irreparable one. But I send you what I intend for the inscription on his tomb which the duke of Queensberry will set up at Westminster. As to his writings, he left no will, nor spoke a word of them or anything else during his short and precipitate illness, in which I attended him to his last breath. The duke has acted more than the part of a brother to him, and it will be strange if the sisters do not leave his papers totally to his disposal, who will do the same that I would with them. He has managed the comedy[a] (which our poor friend gave to the playhouse the week before his death) to the utmost advantage for his relations; and proposes to do the same with some fables[b] he left finished.

There is nothing of late which I think of more than mortality, and what you mention of collecting the best monuments we can of our friends, their own images in their writings: for those are the best when their minds are such as Mr. Gay's was, and as yours is. I am preparing also for my own, and have nothing so much at heart as to show the silly world that men of wit, or even poets, may be the most moral of mankind. A few loose things sometimes fall from them, by which censorious fools judge as ill of them as possibly they can for their own comfort: and indeed, when such unguarded and trifling jeux d'esprit have once got abroad, all that prudence or repentance can do, since they cannot be denied, is to put them fairly upon that foot, and teach the public (as we have done in the preface to the four volumes of "Miscellanies") to distinguish betwixt our studies and our idlenesses, our works and our weaknesses. That was the whole end of the last volume of "Miscellanies," without which our former declaration in that preface, "that these volumes contained all that we have ever offended in that way," would have been discredited. It went indeed to my heart to omit what you called the libel on Dr. Delany, and the best panegyric on myself that either my own times or any other could have afforded or will ever afford to me. The book as you observe was printed in great haste; the cause whereof was that the booksellers were doing the same in collecting your pieces, the corn with the chaff; I do not mean that anything of yours is chaff, but with other wit of Ireland which was so, and the whole in your name. I meant principally to oblige them to separate what you wrote seriously from what you wrote carelessly; and thought my own weeds might pass for a sort of wild flowers when bundled up with them.

It was I that sent you those books into Ireland, and so I did my epistle to lord Bathurst even before it was published, and another thing of mine, which is a parody from Horace [2 Sat. i.] written in two mornings. I never took more care in my life of anything than of the former of these, nor less than of the latter; yet every friend has forced me to print it, though in truth my own single motive was about twenty lines toward the latter end which you will find out.

I have declined opening to you by letters the whole scheme of my present work, expecting still to do it in a better manner in person; but you will see pretty soon that the letter to lord Bathurst[c] is a part of it, and you will find a plain connexion between them if you read them in the order just contrary to that they were published in. I imitate those cunning tradesmen who show their best silks last; or (to give you a truer idea though it sounds too proudly) my works will in one respect be like the works of nature, much more to be liked and understood when considered in the relation they bear with [a] This spirited defence of lady Suffolk, against a man of Swift's ability and disposition, does lady Betty Germain more honour than she would have deserved by writing the best satire against all the courts and courtiers in the world.

[a] "The Wife of Bath;" which, in truth, is but an indifferent comedy.

[b] The second volume of the Fables is much inferior to the first; particularly on account of the long and languid introductions to each fable, which read like party pamphlets.

[c] He himself, we see, calls this piece a letter, not a dialogue, as it was afterwards entitled.

each other, than when ignorantly looked upon one by one; and often those parts which attract most at first sight will appear to be not the most but the least considerable.

I am pleased and flattered by your expression of orna me. The chief pleasure this work can give me is that I can in it with propriety, decency, and justice, insert the name and character of every friend I have, and every man that deserves to be loved or adorned. But I smile at your applying that phrase to my visiting you in Ireland; a place where I might have some apprehension (from their extraordinary passion for poetry and their boundless hospitality) of being adorned to death, and buried under the weight of garlands, like one I have read of somewhere or other. My mother lives (which is an answer to that point), and I thank God, though her memory be in a manner gone, is yet awake and sensible to me, though scarce to anything else; which doubles the reason of my attendance, and at the same time sweetens it. I wish (beyond any other wish) you could pass a summer here; I might (too probably) return with you, unless you preferred to see France first, to which country I think you would have a strong invitation [from Bolingbroke]. Lord Peterborough has narrowly escaped death, and yet keeps his chamber; he is perpetually speaking in the most affectionate manner of you: he has written you two letters which you never received, and by that has been discouraged from writing more. I can well believe the post-office may do this, when some letters of his to me have met the same fate, and two of mine to him. Yet let not this discourage you from writing to me or to him, inclosed in the common way as I do to you; innocent men need fear no detection of their thoughts; and for my part I would give them free leave to send all I write to Curll, if most of what I write was not too silly.

I desire my sincere services to Dr. Delany, who, I agree with you, is a man every way esteemable; my lord Orrery is a most virtuous and good-natured nobleman whom I should be happy to know. Lord B. received your letter through my hands; it is not to be told you how much he wishes for you; the whole list of persons to whom you sent your services return you theirs, with proper sense of the distinction. Your lady friend is semper eadem, and I have written an epistle to her on that qualification in a female character,* which is thought by my chief critic in your absence to be my chef d'œuvre; but it cannot be printed perfectly in an age so sore of satire and so willing to misapply characters.

As to my own health, it is as good as usual. I have lain ill seven days of a slight fever (the complaint here), but recovered by gentle sweats and the care of Dr. Arbuthnot. The play Mr. Gay left succeeds very well; it is another original in its kind. Adieu. God preserve your life, your health, your limbs, your spirits, and your friendships!

FROM THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

February 21, 1733.

Sir,—Soon after the death of our friend Mr. Gay, I found myself more inclined to write to you than to allow myself any other entertainment. But considering that might draw you into a correspondence that most likely might be disagreeable, I left off all thoughts of this kind till Mr. Pope showed me your letter to him, which encourages me to hope we may converse together as usual; by which advantage I will not despair to obtain in reality some of those good qualities you say I seem to have. I am conscious of only one, that is, being an apt scholar; and if I have any good in me, I certainly learned it insensibly of our poor friend, as children to any strange language. It is not possible to imagine the loss his death is to me; but as long as I have any memory, the happiness of ever having such a friend can never be lost to me.

As to himself, he knew the world too well to regret leaving it; and the world in general knew him too little to value him as they ought. I think it my duty to my friend to do him the justice to assure you he had a most perfect and sincere regard for you. I have learned a good deal of his way of thinking on your account; so that, if at any time you have any commands in this part of the world, you will do me a pleasure to employ me as you would him: and I shall wish it could ever be in my power to serve you in anything essential. The duke of Queensberry meant to write, if I had not, concerning your money affair. We both thought of it as soon as we could of anything; and if you will only write word what you would have done with your money, great care shall be taken according to your order. I differ with you extremely, that you are in any likelihood of dying poor or friendless; the world can never grow so worthless. I again differ with you that it is possible to comfort oneself for the loss of friends as one does upon the loss of money. I think I could live on very little, nor think myself poor or be thought so; but a little friendship could never satisfy me, and I could never expect to find such another support as my poor friend. In almost everything but friends, another of the same name may do as well, but friend is more than a name if it be anything.

Your letter touched me extremely; it gave me a melancholy pleasure. I felt much more than you wrote, and more than I hope you will continue to feel. As you can give Mr. Pope good advice, pray practise it yourself. As you cannot lengthen your friend's days, I must beg you in your own words not to shorten your own: for I do full well know by experience that health and happiness depend on good spirits. Mr. Pope is better in both this year than I have seen him a good while. This you will believe, unless he has told you what he tells me, that I am his greatest flatterer. I hope that news has not reached you; for nothing is more pleasant than to believe what one wishes. I wish to be your friend; I wish you to be mine; I wish you may not be tired with this; I wish to hear from you soon; and all this in order to be my own flatterer.

I will believe— —

I never write my name.

I hope you have no aversion to blots.

Since I wrote this, the duke of Queensberry bids me tell you that if you have occasion for the money you need only draw upon him and he will pay the money to your order. He will take care to have the account of interest settled and made up to you. He will take this upon himself, that you may have no trouble in this affair.

FROM THE COUNTESS OF KERRY.

Lixnaw, March 4, 1733.

The kind concern and friendly remembrance of the most esteemed dean of St. Patrick's has raised in me a satisfaction and pleasure that I had almost given up, having been resolved a good while humbly to content myself in a state of indolence and indifference; and, if I could avoid the pains of body and mind, not to seek further after those points in life I so long and vainly pursued; but you have invaded my tranquillity in a manner I must not only forgive but pay my acknowledgments for, since, at the same time you make a melancholy representation of my misfortunes, you strike a light for me from another quarter from whence to raise hope. I most heartily rejoice in what you tell me of Mr. Fitzmaurice, who has indeed given me an undeniable mark of taste, by the sense he has of the honour you do him in letting him into your society, from whence it is impossible to come without some good influence. For my part, I grieve at the interval that necessity seems to call for to interrupt such advantage, and it is my study to find an occasion indispensable that he may return;[a] and as I think to be a member of our senate-house is the best way to lead a young man into the world, I have been watching a good while for some gap in that body that he might step into. There seems now to offer one on the death of sir Ralph Gore that may not be impracticable, since it is a very small borough, entirely belonging, as I am informed, to the bishop of Clogher, who I dare say is above disposing of it for court favour only, or to the highest bidder; practices much in fashion of late. Might I not then presume upon your friendship with the bishop to recommend this young man, as an honest one at present, and whom he might devote to his service by so great and seasonable an obligation, beside paying an acknowledgment that in gratitude is due, although the person were never so well qualified; thus much sure I may say without censure. If I have taken too great liberty in recommending this matter to you, forgive me, and impute it to my zeal in endeavouring to take all opportunities to turn this lad into the world, that I may see what figure he will be likely to make hereafter. But if I do not succeed in this or any other attempt, I thank Providence sincerely I can now boast I have attained philosophy enough to take everything with patience as it comes, by no means thinking myself too good to be the sport of higher powers; and my Christian duty will not permit me to look for reasons. As little wisdom as I have bought, I wish I had had it sooner; now it is too late, la farce est joué, and my curtain almost drawn; so that if I could I would no more traffic with the world upon my own account; friendship only is what I still must always value; yours surely is more than comes to my share.

You are very good to inquire after my eyes; they are indeed well beyond my expectation, but are to me like the miser's gold, hoarded up as imaginary treasure that one wants, at the same time that one possesses; for so much as this letter I have not taxed them so long time. I shall with attention observe all you recommend to me in the way of passing my time, and do daily see reason to respect la bagatelle; yet are there some places where that is too insipid to be made any use of. I have an excellent chaplain that I employ in reading, and my domestic. Handicrafts and gardening do the rest. As for quadrille, it is a part of entertainment only for strangers. What shall I say for taking up so much of your time? Forgive, dear dean, your most real and faithful humble servant, A. KERRY.

TO THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

March 20, 1733.

MADAM,—I had lately the honour of a letter from your grace, which was dated just a month before it came to my hand, and the ten days since I have been much disordered with a giddiness that I have been long subject to at uncertain times. This hindered me from an acknowledgment of the great favour you have done me. The greatest unhappiness of my life is grown a comfort under the death of my friend [Mr. Gay],—I mean my banishment in this miserable country; for the distance I am at, and the despair I have of ever seeing my friends, further than by a summer's visit; and this, so late in my life, so uncertain in my health, and so embroiled in my little affairs, may problably never happen; so that my loss is not so great as that of his other friends, who had it always in their power to converse with him. But I chiefly lament your grace's misfortune, because I greatly fear, with all the virtues and perfections which can possibly acquire the highest veneration to a mortal creature from the worthiest of humankind, you will never be able to procure another so useful, so sincere, so virtuous, so disinterested, so entertaining, so easy, and so humble a friend as that person whose death all good men lament. I turn to your letter, and find your grace has the same thoughts. Loss of friends has been called a tax upon life, and what is worse, it is then too late to get others if they were to be had, for the younger ones are all engaged. I shall never differ from you in anything longer than till you declare your opinion; because I never knew you wrong in anything except your condescending to have any regard for me; and therefore all you say upon the subject of friendship I heartily allow. But I doubt you are a perverter; for sure I was never capable of comparing the loss of friends with the loss of money. I think we never lament the death of a friend upon his own account, but merely on account of his friends, or the public, or both; and his, for a person in private life, was as great as possible. How finely you preach to us who are going out of the world, to keep our spirits, without informing us where we shall find materials! Yet I have my flatterers too, who tell me I am allowed to have retained more spirits than hundreds of others who are richer, younger, and healthier than myself; which, considering a thousand mortifications, added to the perfect ill-will of every creature in power, I take to be a high point of merit, as well as an implicit obedience to your grace's commands. Neither are those spirits (such as they be) in the least broken by the honour of lying under the same circumstances with a certain great person whom I shall not name, of being in disgrace at court. I will excuse your blots upon paper, because they are the only blots that you ever did or ever will make in the whole course of your life. I am content upon your petition to receive the duke and your grace for my stewards for that immense sum; and in proper time I may come to thank you as a king does the commons for your loyal benevolence. In the mean while, I humbly entreat your grace that the money may lie where you please till I presume to trouble you with a bill, as my lord duke allows me.

One thing I find, that you are grown very tetchy since I lost the dear friend who was my supporter; so that perhaps you may expect I shall be very careful how I offend you in words, wherein you will be much mistaken; for I shall become ten times worse after correction. It seems Mr. Pope, like a treacherous gentleman, showed you my letter wherein I mentioned good qualities that you seem to have. You have understroked that offensive word to show it should be printed in italic. What could I say more? I never saw your person since you were a a girl except once in the dark (to give you a bull of this country) in a walk next the Mall. Your letters may possibly be false copies of your mind; and the universal, almost idolatrous esteem you have forced from every person in two kingdoms who have the least regard for virtue may have been only procured by a peculiar art of your own,—I mean that of bribing all wise and good men to be your flatterers. My literal mistakes are worse than your blots. I am subject to them by a sort of infirmity wherein I have few fellow-sufferers; I mean that my heart runs before my pen, which it will ever do in a greater degree as long as I am a servant to your grace,—I mean to the last hour of my life and senses. I am, with the greatest respect and utmost gratitude, madam, your grace's most obedient, most obliged, and most humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

I desire to present my most humble respects and thanks to my lord duke of Queensberry. For a man of my level I have as bad a name almost as I desire; and I pray God that those who give it me may never have reason to give me a better.

FROM LORD CARTERET.

March 24, 1733.

SIR,—I had the favour of your letter of the 19th of February. A gentleman left it at my door. I have not heard from him since, though he said he would call again, and who he is I do not know. I showed it to my wife and lady Worsley [his mother-in-law], who will not fail to obey your commands, and tease me if I could be forgetful of your orders to attend the cause of the city of Dublin when it comes into the house. I know by experience how much that city thinks itself under your protection, and how strictly they used to obey all orders fulminated from the sovereignty of St. Patrick's. I never doubted their compliance with you in so trivial a point as a recorder.[a] You can give any one law and capacity in half an hour; and if by chance a rake should get those faculties any other way, you can make the worthy citizens believe he has them not; and you can sustain any machine in a furred gown.

I thank you for the letter by Mr. Pilkington. I have seen him twice at a great entertainment at my lord-mayor's, where you were the first toast. I like the young man very well, and he has great obligations to you, of which he seems sensible.

I hope Dr. Delany is well, and that you see one another often, and then the doctor won't have leisure to pursue his dissertations[b] or to answer the reverend prelate[c] on your side, who I hear has answered him. As I have not read the dissertations, so I shall not read the answer; which, I hope, without offence, I may suppose to be your case. If so, I hope you will endeavour to keep me well with the doctor, who took it a little unkindly of me that I would shut my eyes to such revelation so demonstrated. I have a great esteem for him, to which nothing that he can write upon those subjects can make any addition, and therefore I would run no risk as to altering my opinion of him by reading his books.

That health and prosperity may attend you is my sincere wish, and I entreat you to believe that I am, with great truth, sir, your most humble and obedient servant.

The whole family of my ladies send their compliments.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Dublin, March 27, 1733.

I RECEIVED your letter with some pleasure and a good deal of concern. The condition you are in requires the greatest haste hither, although your school did not; and when you arrive I will force Dr. Helsham to see and direct you: your scheme of riding and country air you find hath not answered, and therefore you have nothing to trust to but the assistance of a friendly, skilful doctor. For whether they can do any good or not, it is all we have for it; and you cannot afford to die at present, because the public and all your family have occasion for you. Besides, I do not like the place you are in, from your account, since you say people are dying there so fast. You cannot afford to lose daily blood; but I suppose you are no more regular than you have been in your whole life. I like the article very much which you propose in your will, and if that takes place forty years hence, and God for the sins of men should continue that life so long, I would have it be still inserted, unless you could make it a little sharper. I own you have too much reason to complain of some friends who, next to yourself, have done you most hurt, whom still I esteem and frequent, though I confess I cannot heartily forgive. Yet certainly the case was not merely personal malice to you (although it had the same effect), but a kind of know-not-what job, which one of them hath often heartily repented: however, it came to be patched up. I am confident your collection of bon mots and contes à rire will be much the best extant; but you are apt to be terribly sanguine about the profits of publishing; however, it shall have all the pushing I can give. I have been much out of order with a spice of my giddiness, which began before you left us; I am better of late days, but not right yet, though I take daily drops and bitters. I must do the best I can, but shall never more be a night-walker. You hear they have in England passed the excise on tobacco, and by their votes it appears they intend it on more articles. And care is taken by some special friends here to have it the same way here. We are slaves already. And from my youth upward the great wise men whom I used to be among taught me that a general excise (which they now by degrees intend) is the most direct and infallible way to slavery. Pray G— send it them in his justice, for they well deserve it. All your friends and the town are just as you left it. I humdrum it on, either on horseback, or dining and sitting the evening at home, endeavouring to write, but write nothing, merely out of indolence and want of spirits. No soul has broke his neck, or is hanged, or married; only Cancerina[a] is dead, and I let her go to her grave without a coffin and without fees. So I am going to take my evening walk after five, having not been out of doors yet. I wish you well, and safe at home; pray call on me on Sunday night. I am yours.

P.S. I believe there are a hundred literal blunders, but I cannot stay to mend them.—So pick as you are able.

I am not so frank a writer as you.

FROM LORD BATHURST.

Cirencester, March 29, 1733.

MY MOST DEAR DEAN,—I am indebted to you for several scraps of paper which you have sent me; but I waited to receive a letter from you, and then would have returned you an answer as well as I could. I obeyed your commands signified in your penultième; I attended your cause; your client happened to be [a] Mr. Stanard was about this time chosen recorder for the city of Dublin, chiefly at the recommendation of Dr. Swift.

[b] "Revelation examined with Candour."

[c] Dr. Robert Clayton, bishop of Killala, January 23, 1729.

[a] One of those poor people to whom the dean used to give money when he met them in his walks; some of them he named thus, partly for distinction and partly for humour: Cancerina, Stompanymma, Pullagowna, Friterilla, Flora, Stumphantha.

in the right, and we are not a little in the wrong that we gave no costs. I should have moved for them, but I had distinguished myself in pressing lords to attend, and told so many that I had your commands so to do, that I did not think it proper to take that part upon me, and nobody else would do it; therefore give me leave to tell you that you are bound in conscience to pay that poor man 100*l*. He would certainly have had that sum if you had not interposed in that peremptory manner.

As to your last orders in relation to the Dublin cause, I take it for granted you are in the wrong. All corporations of men are perpetually doing injustice to individuals. I will attend it, but am as much prejudiced against them as it is possible, though I know nothing of the man nor the matter in question. I have often reflected (from what cause it arises I know not), that though the majority of a society are honest men, and would act separately with some humanity, and according to the rules of morality, yet, conjunctively, they are hard-hearted, determined villains. I know physicians who, if you take them out of their practice, are very good sort of men; but was there ever in the world a consultation of them that tended to anything else than robbery and murder? Do the body of lawyers think of anything else but to plunder and destroy the rest of mankind? In short, there is no corporation to be excepted out of this general rule but the two houses of parliament, and all assemblies of divines, wheresoever dispersed over the Christian world. So much for the Dublin cause.

Now I must tell you I want exceedingly to see you here, and I would have you come just about midsummer. If you come a moment before that time you will find the parliament sitting, all in a flame about excises; and go into what company you will you can hear of nothing else. I reckon by that time we shall separate, and then I come down to this place en famille (where I am now only a sojourner for three days), and you shall be better accommodated than you were last time you were here. I can assure you I have made great alterations; and to speak modestly, I think I may say it is by much the finest place in England. What Ireland may produce I cannot tell. Pope has promised to come down; and it is time for him to retire, for he has made the town too hot to hold him.

Poor John Gay! we shall see him no more, but he will always be remembered by those who knew him with a tender concern. I want to know how you do and what you are doing. I suspect you are growing very idle, for I have not heard of any production from that fertile brain of yours a great while. And besides, the greatest mark of idleness that I know is the minding of other people's business. You that used to be employed in supporting or pulling down ministers, in instructing or diverting mankind, in inflaming kingdoms, or pacifying contending parties, now seem to be dwindled into an Irish solicitor. I expect to see you in a dirty brown coat, with a little green bag under your arm. However, let me see you. If I cannot laugh with you, as I used to do, I will laugh at you, for I am resolved to laugh as long as I live. So, my dear little pettifogger, adieu.

FROM MR. POPE.

April 2, 1733.

You say truly that death is only terrible to us as it separates us from those we love; but I really think those have the worst of it who are left by us, if we are true friends. I have felt more (I fancy) in the loss of Mr. Gay than I shall suffer in the thought of going away myself into a state that can feel none of this sort of losses. I wished vehemently to have seen him in a condition of living independent, and to have lived in perfect indolence the rest of our days together, the two most idle, most innocent, undesigning poets of our age. I now as vehemently wish you and I might walk into the grave together, by as slow steps as you please, but contentedly and cheerfully: whether that ever can be, or in what country, I know no more than into what country we shall walk out of the grave. But it suffices me to know it will be exactly what region or state our Maker appoints, and that whatever is is right. Our poor friend's papers are partly in my hands, and, for as much as is so, I will take care to suppress things unworthy of him. As to the epitaph, I am sorry you gave a copy, for it will certainly by that means come into print, and I would correct it more unless you will do it for me, and that I shall like as well. Upon the whole, I earnestly wish your coming over hither, for this reason among many others, that your influence may be joined with mine to suppress whatever we may judge proper of his papers. To be plunged in my neighbours' and my papers will be your inevitable fate as soon as you come. That I am an author whose characters are thought of some weight appears from the great noise and bustle that the court and town make about any I give, and I will not render them less important or less interesting by sparing vice or folly or by betraying the cause of truth and virtue. I will take care they shall be such as no man can be angry at but the persons I would have angry. You are sensible with what decency and justice I paid homage to the royal family at the same time that I satirized false courtiers and spies, &c., about them. I have not the courage, however, to be such a satirist as you, but I would be as much, or more, a philosopher. You call your satires libels; I would rather call my satires epistles: they will consist more of morality than of wit, and grow graver, which you will call duller. I shall leave it to my antagonists to be witty (if they can), and content myself to be useful and in the right. Tell me your opinion as to lady Mary Wortley's or lord Harvey's performance: they are certainly the top wits of the court, and you may judge by that single piece what can be done against me; for it was laboured, corrected, precommended, and post-disapproved, so as to be disowned by themselves, after each had highly cried it up for the other's. I have met with some complaints,[a] and heard at a distance of some threats occasioned by my verses: I sent fair messages to acquaint them where I was to be found in town, and to offer to call at their houses to satisfy them, and so it dropped. It is very poor in any one to rail and threaten at a distance and have nothing to say to you when they see you. I am glad you persist and abide by so good a thing as that poem,[b] in which I am immortal for my morality; I never took any praise so kindly, and yet I think I deserve that praise better than I do any other. When does your collection come out, and what will it consist of? I have but last week finished another of my epistles, in the order of the system; and this week (exercitandi gratia) I have translated (or rather parodied) another of Horace's, in which I introduce you advising me about my expenses, housekeeping, &c. But these things shall lie by till you come to carp at them, and alter rhymes, and grammar, and triplets, and cacophonies of all kinds. Our parliament will sit till midsummer, which I hope may be a motive

[a] At this time there was a great outcry among all the courtiers against the keenness of this satire.

[b] The ironical libel on Dr. Delany.

to bring you rather in summer than so late as autumn: you used to love what I hate, a hurry of politics, &c. Courts I see not, courtiers I know not, kings I adore not, queens I compliment not; so I am never likely to be in fashion nor in dependence. I heartily join with you in pitying our poor lady [the duchess of Queensberry] for her unhappiness, and should only pity her more if she had more of what they at court call happiness. Come then, and perhaps we may go all together into France at the end of the season, and compare the liberties of both kingdoms. Adieu. Believe me, dear sir (with a thousand warm wishes, mixed with short sighs), ever yours.

FROM LORD AND LADY MASHAM.

London, April 7, 1733.

SIR,—I hope you will excuse me that I have not answered your letter sooner; but I shall not be backward in obeying your commands, by attending the cause you mention when it comes into the house. I shall not fail speaking to those few lords I can be so free with to attend also; and shall rejoice if it should be determined to your satisfaction; and I have good reason to believe it will, being fully convinced that you can interest yourself in nothing but where justice is uppermost. We have long flattered ourselves with the hopes of having your good company here. I am sure there is no family in this kingdom wishes to see you more than that of the Mashams, who will always have you in remembrance for your health and welfare. I doubt not but you hear from better hands the state of our affairs in relation to the excising tobacco and wine, therefore shall not trouble you upon that subject, and shall only desire your further commands wherein I am capable to serve you, assuring you that I am, with great esteem and faith, sir, your most faithful and humble servant, MASHAM.

POSTSCRIPT BY LADY MASHAM.

SIR,—There are few things in life would give me more joy than to see you again in this part of the world. Let your friends have that pleasure, for in doing it you will oblige a vast number of people, but nobody more, my dear Mr. Dean, than your affectionate humble servant, A. MASHAM.

FROM THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

April 12, 1733.

DEAR SIR,—I received yours of the 23rd of March. Perpetual pains in my head have hindered me from writing till this moment, so you see you are not the only person that may tormented. I dare believe there as many bad heads in England as in Ireland; I am sure none worse than my own; that I am made for pain and pain for me; for of late we have been inseparable. It is a most dispiriting distemper. And bring on pain of mind, whether real or imaginary, it is all one.

While I had that very sincere good friend, I could sometimes lay open all my rambling thoughts, and he and I would often view and dissect them; but now they come and go, and I seldom find out whether they be right or wrong, or if there be anything in them. Poor man! he was most truly everything you could say of him. I have lost in him the usefullest limb of my mind. This is an odd expression, but I cannot explain my notion otherwise.

I deny that I am tetchy; yet am going to seem so again, by assuring you my letters are never false copies of my mind. They are often, I believe, imperfect ones of an imperfect mind (which, however, to do it justice, often directs me better than I act). Though I will not take upon me to declare my way of thinking to be eternally the same, yet whatever I write is at that instant true. I would rather tell a lie than write it down, for words are wind, it is said, but the making a memorandum of one's own false heart would stare one in the face immediately, and should put one out of countenance. Now, as a proof of my unsettled way of thinking and of my sincerity, I shall tell you that I am not so much in the wrong as you observed I was in my last, for my regard to you is lessened extremely since I observed you are just like most other people, viz., disobliged at trifles, and obliged at nothings; for what else are bare words? Therefore, pray never believe I wish to serve you till you have tried me; till then protestations are bribes, by which I may only mean to gain the friendship of a valuable man, and therefore ought to be suspected. I seldom make any for that reason, so that, if I have the peculiar happiness to have any wise and good people my flatterers, God knows how I came by it; but sure nothing can equal such glory except that of having the silly and bad people my enemies.

Here I think we agree. You declare that no such can depress your spirits; and if our constitutions are alike, I will not only preach up good spirits, but prescribe the materials that have ever agreed with me. If anybody has done me an injury they have hurt themselves more than me. If they give me an ill name (unless they have my help), I shall not deserve it. If fools shun my company, it is because I am not like them; if people make me angry, they only raise my spirits; and if they wish me ill, I will be well and handsome, wise and happy, and everything except a day younger than I am, and that is a fancy I never yet saw becoming to man or woman, so it cannot excite my envy. Here I have betrayed to you the devilishness of my temper; but I declare to you nothing ever enlivened me half so much as unjust ill usage, either directed to myself or to my friends. The very reverse happens to me when I am too well spoken of, for I am sorry to find I do not deserve it all. This humbles me as much too much as the other exalts; so I hope you will not be too civil, since I have declared the consequence.

I am in great hopes you will make us a visit this summer, for though I have a sensible satisfaction by conversing with you in this way, yet I love mightily to look in the person's face I am speaking to. By that one soon learns to stop when it is wished, or to mend what is said amiss.

Your stewards will take great care of your money, but you must first direct us to your friend Mr. Launcelott (ill spelt to be sure), and order him to give up Mr. Gay's note, on his sister's paying the money to his grace, who will give him his note for the money, or send it to you as you order. And as to what interest is due to you, I suppose you have kept some account.

By this time you must be too much tired to bear reading one word more, therefore I will make no excuses. Pray employ me, for I want to be certain whether I know my own mind or not; for something or other often tells me that I should be very happy to be of any use to you. Whether it be true or false, neither you or I can be positive till an opportunity shows; but I do really think that I am, dear sir, most sincerely yours, &c.

FROM CHARLES FORD, ESQ.

London, April 14, 1733.

I am extremely concerned to hear the bad state of your health. I have often wished that you would be more moderate in your walks, for though riding has always been allowed to be good for a giddy head, I never heard walking prescribed for a strain or any ailment in the leg; and the violent sweats you put yourself into are apt to give colds, and I doubt occasion much of your other disorder. I am confident you would find yourself better here, and even the journey would be of great use to you. I was vastly pleased to hear my lord-mayor talk of the delight he should have in seeing you this year, that he might show you a creature of your own making. He has behaved himself so well in his public capacity that, whether it be his humility or his pride, he deserves to be gratified.

I could heartily wish your other complaints were as much without foundation as that of having lost half your memory and all your invention. I will venture to pronounce you have more left of the first than most men, and of the last than any man now alive. While the excises were depending, you were expected every day; for it was said, Why should he not show as much regard for the liberty of England as he did for the money of Ireland? I wish you had been here, though the affair in my opinion is happily ended. Many people were offended that the bills were dropped and not rejected, and the authors of the scheme left unpunished. It was absolutely impossible to have carried it otherwise. You have heard sir Robert Walpole and one or two more coming out of the house were insulted. A few of that rabble have been seized with the ringleader, who proves to be a Norfolk man; no enemy to excises, but an entire dependant upon the outraged person. Though the rejoicings were as great and as universal as ever were known, there was no violence except the breaking a very few windows, whose owners had shown an untimely thrift of their candles. I foretold Henley what his joking would come to; but the mayor of Southampton immediately printed his real letter, which was short and extremely proper. His designed opponent at the next election, having voted for the excise, will not dare to show himself in the corporation; and Henley after the division thanked him for having by that vote bestowed him 1500*l*. * * * * * *

I have great hopes this fine mild weather will set you right, and long to hear you are preparing for your journey. I am most entirely your grateful, &c.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

May 1, 1733.

I should have answered yours of the 22nd of March long ago, but that I have had some troubles and frights; and the uneasiness I was under made me neglect what at another time would have been agreeable to myself, Mrs Chamber's younger sister having had the small-pox; but now perfectly well, though she has hitherto been a very puny, sickly girl. Mrs. Floyd too has been excessively bad with her winter-cough and dispiritedness; but country air I think has a little revived her.

His grace of Dorset bids me present his humble service to you, and says the rectory of Churchtown is at Mr. Stafford Lightburne's service. As to the countess of Suffolk's affair in dispute, I cannot possibly (according to your own just rule) be angry, because I am in the right. It is you ought to be angry and never forgive her, because you have been so much in the wrong as to condemn her without the show of justice, and I wish with all my heart, as a judgment upon you, that you had seen her, as I did, when the news of your friend's [Gay's] death came; for though you are a proud parson, yet (give you, devil, your due) you are a sincere, good-natured, honest one. I am extremely Mrs. Kelly's humble servant; but I will never believe she is more valued for her beauty and good qualities in Ireland than she was in England. The excise you mention has caused great changes here. Some that I am sorry for; though I will not enter into the merits of the cause, because of my aversion to politics. But if you did dislike it, why did you bestow such a costly funeral upon it as to burn its bones on a sumptuous pile like a Roman emperor?

Adieu, my ever honoured old friend; and do not let me see any more respects or ladyships from you.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, May 1, 1733.

I answer your letter the sooner because I have a particular reason for doing so. Some weeks ago came over a poem called, "The Life and Character of Dr. Swift, written by himself." It was reprinted here, and is dedicated to you. It is grounded upon a maxim in Rochefoucault, and the dedication, after a formal story, says that my manner of writing is to be found in every line. I believe I have told you that I wrote a year or two ago near five hundred lines upon the same maxim in Rochefoucault, and was a long time about it, as that impostor says in his dedication, with many circumstances all pure invention. I desire you to believe and to tell my friends that in this spurious piece there is not a single line, or bit of a line, or thought, any way resembling the genuine copy, any more than it does Virgil's "Æneis," for I never gave a copy of mine, nor lent it out of my sight. And although I showed it to all common acquaintance indifferently, and some of them (especially one or two females) had got many lines by heart, here and there, and repeated them often; yet it happens that not one single line or thought is contained in this imposture, although it appears that they who counterfeited me had heard of the true one. But even this trick shall not provoke me to print the true one, which indeed is not proper to be seen till I can be seen no more; I therefore desire you will undeceive my friends, and I will order an advertisement to be printed here, and transmit it to England, that everybody may know the delusion, and acquit me, as I am sure you must have done yourself if you have read any part of it, which is mean and trivial, and full of that cant that I most despise; I would sink to be a vicar in Norfolk rather than be charged with such a performance. Now I come to your letter.

When I was of your age I thought every day of death, but now every minute; and a continual giddy disorder, more or less, is a greater addition than that of my years. I cannot affirm that I pity our friend Gay, but I pity his friends; I pity you, and would at least equally pity myself if I lived among you; because I should have seen him oftener than you did, who are a kind of hermit, how great a noise soever you make by your ill nature in not letting the honest villains of the times enjoy themselves in this world, which is their only happiness, and terrifying them with another. I should have added in my libel that of all men living you are the most happy in your enemies and your friends: and I will swear you have fifty times more charity for mankind than I could ever pretend to. Whether the production you mention came from the lady or the lord, I did not imagine that they were at least so bad versifiers. Therefore, facit indignatio versum is only to be applied when the indignation is against general villany, and never operates when some sort of people write to defend themselves. I love to hear them reproach you for dulness, only I would be satisfied, since you are so dull, why are they so angry? give me a shilling, and I will insure you that posterity shall never know you had one single enemy, excepting those whose memory you have preserved.

I am sorry for the situation of Mr. Gay's papers. You do not exert yourself as much as I could wish in this affair. I had rather the two sisters were hanged than to see his works ed by any loss of credit to his memory. I would be glad to see the most valuable printed by themselves, those which ought not to be seen burned immediately, and the others that have gone abroad printed separately like opuscula, or rather be stifled and forgotten. I thought your epitaph was immediately to be engraved, and therefore I made less scruple to give a copy to lord Orrery, who earnestly desired it, but to nobody else; and he tells me he gave only two, which he will recall. I have a short epigram of his upon it, wherein I would correct a line or two at most, and then I will send it you with his permission. I have nothing against yours but the last line, striking their aching, the two participles, as they are so near, seem to sound too like. I shall write to the duchess, who has lately honoured me with a very friendly letter, and I will tell her my opinion freely about our friend's papers. I want health, and my affairs are enlarged; but I will break through the latter if the other mends. I can use a course of medicines, lame and giddy. My chief design next to seeing you is to be a severe critic on you and your neighbour [Bolingbroke]; but first kill his father that he may be able to maintain me in my own way of living, and particularly my horses. It cost me near 600*l.* for a wall to keep mine, and I never ride without two servants, for fear of accidents; hic vivimus ambitiosâ paupertate. You are both too poor for my acquaintance, but he much the poorer. With you I shall find grass, and wine, and servants, but with him not.—The collection you speak of is this. A printer [Faulkner] came to me to desire he might print my works (as he called them) in four volumes, by subscription. I said I would give no leave, and should be sorry to see them printed here. He said they could not be printed in London; I answered they could if the partners agreed. He said, "he would be glad of my permission; but as he could print them without it, and was advised that it could do me no harm, and having been assured of numerous subscriptions, he hoped I would not be angry at his pursuing his own interest," &c. Much of this discourse past, and he goes on with the matter, wherein I determined not to intermeddle, though it be much to my discontent; and I wish it could be done in England, rather than here, although I am grown pretty indifferent in everything of that kind. This is the truth of the story.

My vanity turns at present on being personated in your quæ virtus, &c. You will observe in this letter many marks, of an ill head and a low spirit; but a heart wholly turned to love you with the greatest earnestness and truth.

FROM MISS KELLY.

Jarvis-street, May 4, 1733.

SIR,—I am sure, if you knew what I have suffered for having offended you, your anger would be changed into pity; for indeed, sir, my uneasiness cannot be expressed. Of all the misfortunes I ever met with, this has given me the greatest concern; for your friendship is an honour that the whole world are ambitious of; but I received from it more than ordinary satisfaction. Judge then, sir, how unhappy I now am; and for God's sake forgive what is past, and be assured my future conduct shall be such that you never again shall have cause of complaint against me. —I own you have reason to condemn my impertinence; but as I had not the least intention to offend, I hope it will in some measure lessen the fault. Indeed, sir, if you will be so good to pardon me, I will make any atonement in my power; and it will much add to the other obligations you have already conferred upon me. My health is so much impaired that it is but too probable that I shall not live very long, and methinks it would be very hard to have the short time that is allotted for me made more miserable than continual sickness can make it. This must be the case if you do not once more receive me into favour; nothing I desire half so much; and do assure you, I spent so bad a night from the thoughts of my misfortune, that, could you have had an idea of it, you would have been sorry for me. You might have seen how depressed I was at supper, but not my indisposition, but your cold behaviour was the real occasion of it.—What shall I say or do to influence you to pardon me? If true repentance for my crime, and a firm resolution to be upon my guard for the future against any inadvertent expressions that can give offence, will plead anything in my favour, you will be so good to pardon me; for I can affirm that I will never offend you again. Try me then, good sir; and if it is possible, both forget and forgive the errors I have been guilty of.

If you are not determined to continue my unhappiness, I must beg the favour of you to send me a line to assure me of my being pardoned; for my uneasiness cannot be removed without it. I hope too, sir, that I shall have the honour of seeing you before I go, that I may in person acknowledge how much I owe you, and with what satisfaction I receive your forgiveness; and for God's sake, sir, look upon me as you were wont to do, for I cannot bear your coldness.

I propose, when I go to Bristol, to follow your advice, and should be much obliged to you if you would recommend me to those books that you think most proper for me: and if it please God that I recover, you shall find that, by the honour you have done me in advising me to improve my mind, the deficiencies of my education will be made up, and I shall be more worthy of your esteem.

I should beg pardon for the length of this, but that I still could write on to ask your forgiveness, who am, sir, with true respect and regard, your most obliged and most humble servant, F. A. KELLY.

FROM MR. POPE.

May 28, 1733.

I HAVE begun two or three letters to you by snatches, and been prevented from finishing them by a thousand avocations and dissipations. I must first acknowledge the honour done me by lord Orrery, whose praises are that precious ointment Solomon speaks of which can be given only by men of virtue; all other praise, whether from poets or peers, is contemptible alike; and I am old enough and experienced enough to know that the only praises worth having are those bestowed by virtue for virtue. My poetry I abandon to the critics, my morals I commit to the testimony of those who know me: and therefore I was more pleased with your libel than with any verses I ever received. I wish such a collection of your writings could be printed here as you mention going on in Ireland. I was surprised to receive from the printer that spurious piece, called "The Life and Character of Dr. Swift," with a letter telling me the person who "published it had assured him the dedication to me was what I would not take ill, or else he would not have printed it." I cannot tell who the man is who took so far upon him as to answer for my way of thinking; though, had the thing been genuine, I should have been greatly displeased at the publisher's part in doing it without your knowledge.

I am as earnest as you can be in doing my best to prevent the publishing of anything unworthy of Mr. Gay; but I fear his friends' partiality. I wish you would come over. All the mysteries of my philosophical work shall then be cleared to you, and you will not think that I am merry enough nor angry enough: it will not want for satire, but as for anger I know it not; or, at least, only that sort of which he apostle speaks, "Be ye angry, and sin not."

My neighbour's writings have been metaphysical, and will next be historical. It is certainly from him only that a valuable history of Europe in these later times can be expected. Come and quicken him; for age, indolence, and contempt of the world, grow upon men apace, and may often make the wisest indifferent whether posterity be any wiser than we. To a man in years, health and quiet become such rarities and consequently so valuable, that he is apt to think of nothing more than of enjoying them whenever he can for the remainder of life; and this I doubt not has caused so many great men to die without leaving a scrap to posterity.

I am sincerely troubled for the bad account you give of your own health. I wish every day to hear a better, as much as I do to enjoy my own, I faithfully assure you.

FROM MRS. PENDARVES.

London, May 29, 1733.

Sir,—You will find to your cost that a woman's pen, when encouraged, is as bad as a woman's tongue: blame yourself, not me; had I never known the pleasure of receiving a letter from you, I should not have persecuted you now. I think (a little to justify this bold attack) that I am obliged by all the rules of civility to give you an account of the letter you charged me with: I delivered it into my lord Bathurst's hands; he read it before me: I looked silly upon his asking me what you meant by the Fosset affair? and was obliged to explain it to him in my own defence, which gave him the diversion I believe you designed it should. We then talked of your vineyard; he seemed pleased with every subject that related to you, and I was very ready to indulge him that way. I did not forget to brag of your favours to me; if you intended I should keep them a secret, I have spoiled all; for I have not an acquaintance of any worth that I have not told how happy I have been in your company. Everybody loves to be envied, and this is the only way I have of raising people's envy. I hope, sir, you will forgive me, and let me know if I have behaved[a] myself right: I think I can hardly do wrong as long as I am, sir, your most obliged and most obedient servant,

M. Pendarves.

Mrs. Donnellan is much your humble servant, and as vain of your favours as I am.

[a] Dr. Swift could not endure to hear the phrase behaved:—Behaved what? he would say with some emotion. He once gave his cousin Deane Swift an account of his rebuking lord Bathurst for this, and that my lord promised him not to be guilty of the like for the future. The words being here marked under by Mrs. Pendarves prove that she refers to some rebuke of that kind.

FROM THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

Amesbury. May 31, 1733.

Dear Sir,—I am now again your Tunbridge correspondent. His grace and I have been here this fortnight, with no other company than bricklayers and labourers. We are throwing down a parcel of walls that blocked us up every way, and making a sunk fence round the house. This will make the place as cheerful again, and we find great entertainment by inspecting the work. Since I came here even I have often got up by six in the morning, designed it always, and the whole house are fast asleep before twelve. This I call good hours. I walk as much as I am able, sometimes rather more. We sometimes ride, though not often; for the evenings and mornings are very cold, and the middle of the day very hot, North-east winds continually, and such want of rain that the ground is as hard as iron. I am the most temperate creature in my diet you ever knew; yet with all my care I cannot be well. I believe if I am never guilty of a greater fault I shall meet with very little resentment either public or private. They are the faults in the world soonest forgot, and the seldomest truly resented. Let that be as it will, since health is undoubtedly the most valuable thing in life, I shall do all I can to obtain it. This makes me consent to a thing in the world I am most averse to; that is going to the Spa about a month or six weeks hence. I wish it was good for your complaints that we might be there together. Really, if you think it will be of any use to you, and that you can order your affairs so as to make it possible, depend upon it we shall make it our study (and a very agreeable one too) to make you as easy and happy as it is in the power of people (not of a very troublesome disposition) to contrive. Your complaint and mine are not very different, as I imagine. Mine is a sort of dizziness which generally goes off by the headache. Some learned people give it a name I do not know how to spell, a vertico, or vertigo. Pray understand that I, really and truly, do not only say but mean that I wish you could either meet us at the Spa or at London, to go on with us; and in this I am sure I shall never change my mind. If it can do you any good, I feel myself enough your friend to resent it extremely if you miss this opportunity. This you would believe if you knew what obligations I have to you. I am generally poor in spirit, or quarrelling with myself for being good for nothing. When a letter comes from you, it does not only entertain and revive me, but instantly I fancy I ought to have a good opinion of myself; which is of very great use to have, provided it is kept within just bounds. I shall punctually obey your commands concerning that poem; but I think you may be perfectly easy on that account; for I saw it before I left London, and heard several people talk of it, and the general opinion was, that you had no hand in it; but that the thing happened just as you say. I think you need not be much disturbed at it. The other trouble you mention I can allow of. Philosophy cannot make such things not be; the most it can pretend to is, to help people to patience. I am heartily sorry you have any particular occasion for any. Is your lawsuit still in being? Perhaps I may be impertinent; but I remember you once mentioned something of that kind.

I am pretty well satisfied anything is bad for the head that fills it too full; therefore I advise you to unbend your thoughts and ask my advice; if it should prove good, take it; if not, leave it. I should be mighty glad to be of service to you; in making me so, you would show kindness to the memory of your very sincere friend, and be kind to me. You may depend upon me, both for his sake and your own. I will endeavour to convey your messages to lady Catharine and Charlotte as soon as possible. The first I have not conversed with this year and a half; I believe she is nobody's friend, but I more than believe that nobody is hers. I have a brother that I dare answer you would like if you knew him perfectly, not else. I love and honour him, and he deserves it. When his grace goes to London, which will be very soon, your money shall be as you ordered. He is mightily shocked at so many speeches. He is not by just now, or undoubtedly he would think you deserve to have them returned. It is lucky for me, for I am come to the end of my paper. Note, without an excuse.

FROM MISS KELLY.

Bristol Hot Wells, June 2, 1733.

Sir,—I hear my agreeable fellow-traveller has been beforehand with me in paying her compliments to you; but I cannot be surprised at that, for she was formed to get the better of me in everything but respecting and esteeming you. That, indeed, nobody can do; for both gratitude and taste conspire to make me truly your friend and servant.

I have been since I came here very low-spirited; the companions I had some part of my journey lessened my illness, or at least I felt not with them the same weight that I did upon their leaving me; and I have often wished myself again in Ireland to enjoy conversation, for I really believe it is one excellent cure for most disorders. This is the dullest place that ever was known; there is not above half-a-dozen families, and those are cits with great fortunes or Irish impertinents: the former despise one because their clothes are finer than yours; and the latter have no view in keeping your company but to report your faults. This makes me avoid all communication with them, and only in the morning I go to the Wells; and I thank God I can spend my time far better, for either writing to my friends, reading, walking, and riding, find me full employment, and leave me not a wish for such company as the place affords. Doctor Lane (who by character is a second Æsculapius, and can raise people from the dead), is my physician, and gives me great hopes of a speedy amendment; and, as I take his medicines regularly, and am up at six in the morning, breakfast at eight, dine at one, and sup at seven, I hope I may in time find some benefit: nor do either the ass's milk or waters disagree with me, and I think my appetite is rather better. I wish to heaven it was agreeable to your affairs to come here, for I am sure you would like the situation of the house that I lodge in—it has the command of such a prospect that I should do it injustice to attempt to describe it; but the variety of the scene is such that one discovers new beauties in it every day. I hope you will continue your former goodness to me, and let me have the honour of hearing from you sometimes, for in reality nobody is more sincerely your well-wisher than, sir, your most obliged and most faithful humble servant,

F. A. Kelly.

Your expedition to the archbishop's country residence makes a very fine figure in print; but since you have made this discovery I think you ought to fly to us, for if Dublin be in danger the deanery-house cannot be a safe retreat for you. I wish anything would send Barber here; for I was at the Bath to see some of my friends, and was forced to swear that only the want of health kept her book from being published. I am sure you would be glad to hear that a lady of very good understanding, that is a particular friend of mine, comes to me next week to stay while I do: her name is Rooke, admiral Rooke's son's lady.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

June 5, 1733.

Has Mr. Stafford Lightburne's friend got the gout in his fingers? or is he so busy in measuring the water, and casting a figure to know the exact time when to set his friends a-swimming, that he cannot find one moment to let me know that he received my letter, written a month ago, to inform you that his grace would cheerfully and readily obey your commands? However, I am again ordered by him to tell you that the warrant will be sent to Dublin by next post, so pray let Mr. Lightburne be ready to make his personal appearance, lest they should not else know how to find him. It was well you needed no intercessor to his grace, and that the no-promise from him and the one word from you is of much more weight than my rhetoric, for I have been so horridly used by a nasty griping brother black-coat, in a small three-and-sixpence affair of my own, that I do not know whether I should not have done like you of the faction, revenge myself of the innocent for the sake of one bishop and minister that I say have cheated, fleeced, and flead me, just as if they had been South Sea or East India directors.

You are angry if I do not mention Mrs. Floyd to you, so I must tell you she is gone for a little time into the country, to try if that will ever cure her cough. I am heartily sorry for your new friend Mrs. Kelly, who writes in a desponding way to Mrs. Chamber about her health, and talks of going to Spa. This is a melancholy subject, and I hate to be vexed; so I will say no more of it, but adieu, my dear dean, and let me hear from you soon.

TO MR FAULKNER.

June 29, 1733.

I desire Mrs. Pilkington will deliver you the paper relating to Gulliver, which I left with her husband. For since you intend to print a new edition of that book, I must tell you that the English printer made several alterations which I much disapprove of, and cannot set them right without those papers.

If I am not mistaken Mr. Pilkington hath an edition of Gulliver, where the true original copy is interleaved in manuscript; I desire I may also see that book. I am your humble servant,

Jonathan Swift.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, July 8, 1733.

I must condole with you for the loss of Mrs. Pope, of whose death the papers have been full. But I would rather rejoice with you, because, if any circumstances can make the death of a dear parent and friend a subject for joy, you have them all. She died in an extreme old age, without pain, under the care of the most dutiful son that I have ever known or heard of, which is a felicity not happening to one in a million. The worst effect of her death falls upon me; and so much the worse, because I expected, aliquis damno usus in illo, that it would be followed by making me and this kingdom happy with your presence. But I am told, to my great misfortune, that, a very convenient offer happening, you waived the invitation pressed on you, alleging the fear you had of being killed here with eating and drinking. By which I find that you have given some credit to a notion of our great plenty and hospitality. It is true our meat and wine is cheaper here, as it is always in the poorest countries, because there is no money to pay for them. I believe there are not in this whole city three gentlemen out of employment who are able to give entertainments once a month. Those who are in employments of church or state are three parts in four from England, and amount to little more than a dozen: those indeed may once or twice invite their friends or any person of distinction that makes a voyage hither. All my acquaintance tell me they know not above three families where they can occasionally dine in a whole year. Dr. Delany is the only gentleman I know who keeps one certain day in the week to entertain seven or eight friends at dinner and to pass the evening, where there is nothing of excess, either in eating or drinking. Our old friend Southern [the poet], who has just left us, was invited to dinner once or twice by a judge, a bishop, or a commissioner of the revenues, but most frequented a few particular friends, and chiefly the doctor [Delany], who is easy in his fortune and very hospitable. The conveniences of taking the air, winter or summer, do far exceed those in London. For the two large strands just at two edges of the town are as firm and dry in winter as in summer. There are at least six or eight gentlemen of sense, learning, good-humour, and taste, able and desirous to please you, and orderly females, some of the better sort, to take care of you. These were the motives that I have frequently made use of to entice you hither. And there would be no failure among the best people here of any honours that could be done you. As to myself, I declare my health is so uncertain that I dare not venture among you at present. I hate the thoughts of London, where I am not rich enough to live otherwise than by shifting, which is now too late. Neither can I have conveniences in the country for three horses and two servants, and many others which I have here at hand. I am one of the governors of all the hackney coaches, carts, and carriages, round this town, who dare not insult me like your rascally waggoners or coachmen, but give me the way; nor is there one lord or squire for a hundred of yours to turn me out of the road or run over me with their coaches and six. Thus I make some advantage of the public poverty, and give you the reasons for what I once wrote, why I choose to be a freeman among slaves rather than a slave among freemen. Then I walk the streets in peace without being justled, nor even without a thousand blessings from my friends the vulgar. I am lord-mayor of 120 houses, I am absolute lord of the greatest cathedral in the kingdom, am at peace with the neighbouring princes, the lord-mayor of the city and the archbishop of Dublin, only the latter, like the king of France, sometimes attempts encroachments on my dominions, as old Lewis did upon Lorraine. In the midst of this raillery I can tell you with seriousness that these advantages contribute to my ease, and therefore I value them. And in one part of your letter relating to lord Bolingbroke and yourself you agree with me entirely about the indifference, the love of quiet, the care of health, &c., that grow upon men in years. And if you discover those inclinations in my lord and yourself, what can you expect from me, whose health is so precarious? and yet at your or his time of life I could have leaped over the moon.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MISS KELLY.

Bristol, July 8, 1733.

DEAR SIR,—I cannot express how much pleasure your letter gave me; to say that it surpassed the anxiety your silence gave me is all the description I am able to make. Indeed I had a thousand fears about you; your health was my first care, and yet I thought that the gods must take care of Cato; but I too fearfully apprehended that the whole club had quite forgotten the most unworthy member that ever entered into their society. For though you wrote to others, your hands were useless to me; and of all our little set none remained unblessed but myself; but as your letter has made me full amends for everything beside, I must be lavish in my thanks.

I am apt to believe that I really died on the road, as it was reported, for I am certainly not the same creature I once was, for I have grown fonder of reading than of any other amusement, and except when health calls me on horseback I find my only joys at home. But my life indeed has received a great addition in its pleasures by Mrs. Rooke's being so good to come down to me; she has all the qualities that can make an agreeable companion and friend; we live together without form, but have all the complacence for each other that true friendship inspires. You are sensible that two people cannot always like the same thing: this we make easy by following our inclinations, for if she likes to walk she walks, and I do whatever I like better. Would to God you were with us to complete our happiness. I had a letter from Mrs. Cleland to inquire about you; she says she hears you are coming to England; surely, if you were, you would tell me so, for few things in life could give me more true delight than the sight of you.

You are extremely good to enter into my affairs; all marks you give me of your friendship increase my esteem for you, and make me bear the common rubs of life with patience. I have really been often tempted to let you into all my secrets, but the thought that you only could receive uneasiness from them, and that even your advice could not remove the least painful of them, hindered me from it, for to those I best love I still remain upon these heads reserved. Indeed the cause of my complaints is of such a nature that it cannot well be told. The unhappy life of a near relation must give one a pain in the very repeating it that cannot be described. For surely to be the daughter of a colonel Chartres must, to a rational being, give the greatest anxiety; for who would have a father at seventy publicly tried for an attempt of a rape? Such a Dulcinea del Toboso is shocking, I think. For if a man must do wrong he should aim a little higher than the enjoyment of a kitchen-maid that he finds obstinately virtuous. In short, dear sir, I have been fool enough to let such things make an impression on me, which, spite of a good constitution, much spirits, and using a great deal of exercise, has brought me to what I am. Were I without a mother (I mean had I lost her in my infancy and not known her goodness), I could still better have borne the steps that were taken; but while I saw how lavish he was upon his dirty wenches, I had frequent accounts that my mother was half-starved abroad. She brought him 16,000*l.* fortune, and having borne severe usage for near twenty years, had resolution enough to part with him, and chose to take 250*l.* per annum separate maintenance rather than bear any longer; and as she could not live here upon such an income, she has banished herself, and lives retired in a country town in France.—His late letters to me have been kind, and hitherto he has supplied me well, but in his last he tells me he shall not see me till September.

What you say is perfectly right, and I propose returning to the club as soon as my health will permit me, but how long this may prove I know not, for I must still pursue this cruel god[a] that flies me.

[a] The god of health, poetically expressed.

I shall go from hence I believe in a week, for Lane only pours down medicines for the sake of the apothecary, and though he reaps the benefit of them, I receive none; and as he has not allowed me to drink the waters these three weeks I can have no business here, so shall follow Holling's advice, and remove to Kensington or Hampstead with the utmost expedition; therefore I must beg the favour of you to enclose your letters for me to William Cleland, esq., commissioner of taxes, in St. Stephen's-court, Westminster. I have disobeyed orders in writing so long a letter, but I will not do this again, so now be so good to excuse the tediousness of, sir, your most obliged and most faithful humble servant,

F. A. Kelly.

Write to me as often as you can, and make my compliments to all friends.

Mrs. Pendarves is gone down with lady Weymouth, whose fortune was 5000*l.* and has for jointure 2500*l.* a-year, and 500*l.* a-year pin-money.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

Knowle, July 9, 1733.

"Now," says parson Swift, "what the devil makes this woman write to me with this filthy white ink? I cannot read a word of it without more trouble than her silly scribble is worth."—"Why," say I again, "ay, it is the women are always accused of having bad writing implements, but, to my comfort be it spoken, this is his grace my lord-lieutenant's ink." My bureau at London is so well furnished, and his grace and his secretary make so much use of it, that they are often obliged to give me half-a-crown that I may not run out my estate in paper. It is very happy when a go-between pleases both sides, and I am very well pleased with my office; for his grace is delighted that it was in his power to oblige you. So trève de compliment. Since I have declared my passion against a bishop and a parson, it is but fair, I should tell you the story, whether you care to hear it or not; but if you do not I give you leave not to mind it, for now it is over I am calm again.

As to the bishop [Dr. Clavering], I know neither his principles nor his parts, but his diocese is Peterborough, and having a small park in Northamptonshire, which I had a mind to increase by a small dab of addition, to make my house stand in the middle of it Three shillings and sixpence worth of land per annum, at the largest computation, belongs to the church, for which my old parson (who flatters me black and blue when he comes for a Sunday dinner, and says he loves me better than anybody in the world) has made me give him up, in lieu of that land, a house and ground that lets for 40*s.* a-year, and is hardly content with that, but reckons it a vast favour. And the bishop has put me to ten times more charge than it is worth, by sending commissioners to view it, and making me give petitions and dancing me through his court, besides a great dinner to his nasty people. Now am I not in the right to be angry? But perhaps you will say if I will have my fancies I must pay for them, so I will say no more about it. I hear poor Mrs. Kelly is not near so well as she says, and a gentleman that came from Bristol says she looks dreadfully, and fears it is almost over with her and that no mortal could know her: so ends youth and beauty! That is such a moral reflection that lest it should make you melancholy I will tell you something to please you. Your old friend Mrs. Floyd is perfectly recovered. I think I have not seen her so well this great while; but winter is always her bane, so I shall live in dread of that. In your next I desire to know what I am in your debt for my sister's monument. Adieu, my dear, good, old, and well-beloved friend.

FROM MRS. PENDARVES.

Gloucester, July 21, 1733.

Sir,—May I say, without offending you, that I was overjoyed at the honour you did me in answering my letter? and do not call me formal when I assure you that I think myself made happy by such a distinction. It was stupidity in me not to let you know where to address to me, but I do not repent of it; I have by that means tried your zeal; but I am afraid your good-breeding, more than your inclination, procured me that favour. I am resolved to be even with you for what you say about my writing, and will write henceforward to you as carelessly as I can; if it is not legible thank yourself. I do not wonder at the envy of the ladies when you are pleased to speak of me with some regard; I give them leave to exercise their malice on an occasion that does me so much honour. I protest I am not afraid of you, and would appear quite natural to you, in hopes of your rewarding my openness and sincerity by correcting what you disapprove of. And since I have not now an opportunity of receiving your favours of pinching and beating, make me amends by chiding me for every word that is false spelt and for my bad English; you see what you are like to suffer. If this promises you too much trouble do not give me so much encouragement in your next letter, for upon something in your last I have almost persuaded myself that by your assistance and my own earnest desire I may in time become worthy of your care. Vanity stands at my elbow all this while and animates me by a thousand agreeable promises; without her encouragement I should never have presumed to correspond with the dean of St. Patrick's. Some say she is a mischievous companion; I swear she is a pleasant one: you must not be angry with me for keeping her company, for I had very little acquaintance with her till I had received some marks of your favour.

I received your letter but a little while before I left London; I attended lord and lady Weymouth down to Longleat, and left them with a prospect of as much happiness as matrimony can give; they are pleased with one another at present, and I hope that will continue. My lord and lady Carteret are both satisfied with the disposal of their daughter in so advantageous a station. Common report wrongs my lord Weymouth, for which reason, as I am his friend, I must tell you his good qualities: he has honour and good-nature, and does not want for sense; he loves the country, and inclines a little too much to his stable and dog-kennel, but he keeps a very hospitable, good house, and is always ready to relieve those in distress; his lady Dr. Delany can give you a character of, and is what I believe you will approve of. I came from Longleat last Saturday, and am now at Gloucester with my mother and sister. My lord Bathurst was here about a fortnight ago; I was sorry to miss of him; I have a double reason for liking his company. He has made me promise to pay him a visit at Oakley Wood, which I certainly will do; I shall with great resignation submit to any punishment you convey through his hands. I wish you could make your words good, and that I was a sorceress; I should then set all my charms to work to bring you to England, and should expect a general thanksgiving for employing my spells to so good a purpose. The syren has lately been at Oxford; we parted very unwillingly; she is extremely obliged to you for remembering her so favourably. I am glad

Mr. Donnellan pleases you; I know he has a high value for you, and I agree with you in thinking him a most deserving young man. My lord Lansdown is much at your service, laments the days that are past, and we constantly drink your health in champagne, clear as your thoughts, sparkling as your wit. Lord and lady Carteret and my lady Worsley all talk kindly of you, and join their wishes to mine for your coming among us. I request it of you to make my humble service acceptable to those friends of yours that are so good as to remember me. I am, sir, your most obliged and faithful humble servant,

M. PENDARVES.

Be pleased to direct for me at Mrs. Granville's, Gloucester.

TO DR. JOHN STERNE, BISHOP OF CLOGHER.

July, 1733.

MY LORD,—I have been often told by some of our common acquaintance that you have sometimes expressed your wonder that I never waited on you for some years past, as I used to do for many years before; and that you could not guess the reason, because, to your knowledge, you never once disobliged me. As nothing is more common than dropping acquaintance by the usual occurrences of life, without any fault on either side, I never intended to say or think anything of the matter until a late proceeding of yours, which no way relates to me, put me upon a desire of finding matter to justify you to your friends here, as well as to myself; because I always wished you well, and because I have been more than once instrumental to your service. When I first came acquainted with you we were both private clergymen in a neighbourhood; you were afterwards chancellor of St. Patrick's; then was chosen dean, in which election I was the most busy of all your solicitors. When the compromise was made between the government and you to make you easy, and Dr. Synge chancellor, you absolutely and frequently promised to give me the curacy of St. Nicholas Without; but you thought fit, by concert with the archbishop, to hold it yourself, and apply the revenue to build another church; against which it became me to say nothing, being a party concerned and injured; although it was generally thought by others, as well as myself, that it was an ill and dangerous precedent to build a church with the revenue of the minister. I desire no thanks for being instrumental in your next promotion, because, as things then stood, I consulted my own advantage. However, upon the queen's death, when I had done for ever with courts, I returned to reside at my post, yet with some kind of hopes of getting some credit with you, very unwisely, because, upon the affair of St. Nicholas, I had told you frankly that I would always respect you, but never hope for the least friendship from you. But trying to forget all former treatment I came like others to your house; and since you were a bishop have once or twice recommended persons to you who were no relations or friends of mine, but merely for their general good character, which availed so little that those very persons had the greatest share of your neglect. I then gave over all thoughts of being instrumental to place merit and virtue under your protection by my recommendations; and as I was ever averse from mingling with multitudes and strangers, I forbore by degrees to be a partaker of your hospitality rather than purchase a share of it at so dear a rate. This is the history of my conduct with regard to your lordship; and it is now a great comfort to me that I acted in this manner, for otherwise, when those two abominable bills for enslaving and beggaring the clergy (which took their birth from hell) were upon the anvil, if I had found your lordship's name among the bishops who would have turned them into a law, I might have been apt to discover such marks of indignation, horror, and despair, both in words and deportment, as would have ill become me to a person of your station; for I call God to witness that I did then, and do now, and shall for ever firmly believe, that every bishop who gave his vote for either of these bills did it with no other view (bating further promotion) than a premeditated design, from the spirit of ambition and love of arbitrary power, to make the whole body of the clergy their slaves and vassals until the day of judgment, under the load of poverty and contempt. I have no room for more charitable thoughts, except for those who will answer now, as they must at that dreadful day, that what they did was out of perfect ignorance, want of consideration, hope of future promotion (an argument not to be conquered), or the persuasion of cunninger brethren than themselves, when I saw a bishop whom I had known so many years fall into the same snare, which word I use in partiality to your lordship. Upon this open avowed attempt in almost the whole bench to destroy the church, I resolved to have no more commerce with persons of such prodigious grandeur, who, I feared, in a little time, would expect me to kiss their slipper. It is happy for me that I know the persons of very few bishops; and it is my constant rule never to look into a coach; by which I avoid the terror that such a sight would strike me with.

In the beginning of my letter I told your lordship of a desire to know the particulars of a late proceeding, which is in the mouths of many among your acquaintance; from some of whom I received the following account: That you have the great tithes of two livings in your diocese, which were left to some fanatic knight whose name I forget. It seems you felt the beginning of a good motion in yourself, which was to give up those tithes to the two incumbents (the fanatic's lease being near out), either for a very small reserved rent, or entirely, provided you could do so without lessening the revenue of the see. And the condition was that your tenants among them should raise the rents one hundred and fifty pounds, which was what the fanatic paid you for both the said parishes. It is affirmed that sir Ralph Gore, one of your tenants, much approving so generous a proposal, engaged to prevail on the tenants to agree, and offered a large advancement of his own part. The matter was thus fixed when suddenly you changed your mind, and renewed the lease to the same fanatic for three hundred pounds fine. The reasons of this singular action are said to two: the first is, that you declared you wanted power to resist the temptation of such a fine; the other, that you were dissuaded from it by some of your brethren as an example very dangerous, and of ill consequence if it should be followed by others. This last I do not in the least wonder at, because such advice is of the same leaven with the two enslaving and beggaring bills. I profess to your lordship that I have no other motive in desiring to be satisfied upon this point than a resolution to justify you to the world as far as the truth will give me ver. I am, &c.

TO MRS. CÆSAR.

MADAM,—Among a few little vexations, such as beggary, slavery, corruption, ignorance, want of friends, faction, oppression, and some other trifles of the like nature, that we philosophers ought to despise, two or three ladies of long acquaintance, and at a great distance, are still so kind as to remember me; and I was always proud and pleased to a great degree that you happened to be one, since constancy is, I think, at least as seldom found in friendship as in love. Mrs. Barber, when I see her, is always telling me wonders of the continual favours you have conferred on her, and that, without your interposition, the success of her errand would have been hardly worth the journey; and I must bear the load of this obligation without the least possibility of ever returning it, otherwise than my best wishes for the prosperity and health of you and your family; for in spite of all your good words I am the most insignificant man of this most insignificant country. I have been tied by the leg (without being married) for ten months past, by an unlucky strain, which prevented the honour and happiness I proposed to myself of waiting on you often during this last summer; and another year at my period of life is like an inch in a man's nose; yet I flatter myself that next spring I may take one voyage more, when you will see me altered in every disposition of body and mind, except in my respects for you and all that belong to you. There is one part of Mr. Pope's compliment which I cannot make you, for I could not with the strictest search find one letter too many in any of your words, although I found a thousand words too few in your letter; therefore I accepted and understood it only as a billet just written, while Mrs. Barber stood by in her hood and scarf, just ready to take her leave and begin her journey, and what is worse, I suspect that she was forced to solicit you long because she wanted a certificate under your hand to convince me that she was not an impostor.

I will not say one word in Mrs. Barber's behalf, for she will always continue to deserve your protection, and therefore she may be sure you will always continue to give it her.

I hope Mr. Cæsar is in good health, and desire he will accept the offer of my most humble service, with my hearty wishes for your whole family. I am, with true respect, madam, your most obedient and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MRS. CÆSAR.

Dublin, July 30, 1733.

MADAM,—I could not let Mrs. Barber leave us for good and all without honouring her with the carriage of a letter from your old humble and constant lover; she hath been afflicted with so many repetitions of the gout that her limbs are much weakened and her spirits sunk; neither can I well blame her, considering her grand affair of subscriptions must needs have slackened in her absence. Neither could she be in much disposition to increase her volumes, for health and good-humour are two ingredients absolutely necessary in the poetical trade; but I hope your countenance and protection will recover her spirits, and her hopes, and her genius. I imagine she looks on you as her chief patroness; because, although she be abundantly grateful to all her protectors, yet I observe your name most often in her mouth. I wish it were in my power to take the same journey; but neither my health nor the bad state of my private affairs will give me power or leave; I cannot make shift nor bear fatigue as I used to do. To live in England half as tolerably as I do here would ruin me. I must have two servants and three horses, and dare drink nothing but wine; and my ragged church-rents would never be paid in my absence. My lord Bolingbroke and Mr. Pope press me with many kind invitations; but the former is too much a philosopher; he dines at six in the evening, after studying all the morning until the afternoon; and when he hath dined to his studies again. Mr. Pope can neither eat nor drink, loves to be alone, and hath always some poetical scheme in his head. Thus the two best companions and friends I ever had have utterly disqualified themselves for my conversation and my way of living. Mr. Pope, who had often promised to pass a summer season with me here if he outlived his mother, soon after death waived the fairest opportunity of performing his promise two months ago, of coming over with ease, and in company of dean Cotterel and his sister; he said we should kill him with eating and drinking. I had a very convenient apartment for him in the deanery-house; he would have all the civilities of this town; and Mrs. Barber will tell you that we never want a dozen or more of very valuable persons, and of both sexes, with whom to converse; I chid him soundly in my last letter for his want of friendship or resolution. You see, madam, I am full of talk, but you are to blame, for I imagine my self in your company, which is indeed no great compliment; and, upon second thoughts, it is not true, for I should be much better pleased to be your hearer. However, I should certainly ask you a thousand questions concerning yourself and Mr. Cæsar and your whole family. I have received so much friendship and so many civilities from you both that I shall ever own my obligations, which are much increased by Mrs. Barber's feeding my vanity with telling me that you did not receive her worse for her being recommended by me; yet I confess her expressions were in somewhat stronger terms. Pray God bless you and your family. I desire you will present my most humble service to Mr. Cæsar. I am, with the greatest respect, madam, your most obedient and most obliged humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE RIGHT HON. JOHN BARBER,
Lord-mayor of London.

July, 1733.

MY LORD,—Although I never read news I often hear of your lordship's actions and speeches, particularly your and the city address to the house of commons for throwing out that execrable bill of excise, and your defence of the city in the answer you gave to the recorder on the subject of riots. I hope you will always remember that you learnt these honest principles under an honest ministry, and in what has been since called the worst of times, which I pray God we might live to see again. Our friend Mrs. Barber is recovering of her gout, and intends in a few weeks to return to London. My lord Orrery, although almost a stranger to her, and very much embroiled in his affairs by a most villanous agent, has been extremely generous to her in easing her of one part of her load; and I hope by the success of her poems she will be made tolerably easy and independent, as she well deserves for her virtue and good sense. My lord Orrery is the delight of us all. But we wish him hanged for coming among us since he cannot stay with us. Your chaplain writes to me very seldom, and I never can get him to answer me how he lives; I gave him credit upon a friend in London for any small sums of money, which I find he has received most of; so that I am afraid his salary, perquisites, or fees, or whatever else he is to live by, is not to come in till the end of his office. I hope he continues to behave himself well; and indeed I think him a very valuable young man. As to myself, my private affairs are in so ill a posture, and my head so disordered by returns of my old giddiness, that I cannot yet venture to take those journeys that I used to make nothing of, and God knows whether I shall be able to dine with your lordship in your mayoralty. Doctor Delany lives very happy and hospitably, entertains his old friends, and has nothing to fight with but envy, which he despises, and does not in the least deserve, but by those from whom it is a blessing. I think I have named all your acquaintance here; and I presume you will hardly trouble yourself to acquire more.

Your lordship hath now got over more than half your difficulties. I doubt not but you will finish the rest with equal reputation, so that the year of your mayoralty will be long remembered with honour.

I must desire leave to tell your lordship that I have not known a more bashful, modest person than Mrs. Barber, nor one who is less likely to ply her friends, patrons, or protectors, for any favour, or is more thankful for the smallest. Therefore I hope you will continue to do her any good office that lies in your way without trouble to yourself. And among other things I desire you will advise her to be more thrifty; for she carries her liberality as much too high as our friend sir Gilbert did his avarice. I thought I did a fine thing to subscribe for ten copies of her poems; and she contrived to send me presents that, in my conscience, are worth more than the money I subscribed.

Having not heard lately of your being ill, I hope you have recovered your health entirely; and I pray God preserve it. I am, with true respect, my lord, your lordship's most obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE LORD-MAYOR OF LONDON.

Goldsmiths' Hall, August 6, 1733.

SIR,—I thank you heartily for your kind and affectionate letter, and I beg your pardon for not answering it sooner.

I agree with you that I had the happiness of learning honest principles early from a set of great men, who will ever be an honour and an ornament to their country; and it is my greatest glory that in the late affair of the excise-bill (though I did nothing but my duty, and what every honest man in my station would have done) I acted consistent with those honest principles, and that my enemies as well as friends have generally approved my conduct. And believe me, sir, I speak it with great sincerity, that, when I consider how sparingly you and some other friends have ever been of your praises, your approbation affords me the greatest pleasure imaginable, as it gives me that inward peace of mind which the whole world could not purchase.

My lord Orrery's amiable qualities must make him the delight of all with you, as he is truly so with us; and when he comes over "your loss will be our gain," as the proverb says.

I know nothing of Mr. Pilkington's affairs or expenses; what the city allows him is never paid till the end of the year; I have presented him, at twice, with forty pounds, which I design to make fifty; which sum has but one precedent; generally they have but thirty of the mayor. His behaviour is very well, and he is generally esteemed.

I shall have great regard to your recommendations in favour of Mrs. Barber, and shall not fail of doing her any service in my power. I have been thought to be a lucky man; but this year fortune has been my foe, for I have had no death happened in my year (a fiddler excepted) yet, nor have made 500*l.* in all. But my friends say it is made up in fame.

I am very sorry your ill health continues; for I flattered myself with being very happy with you and some friends, on the important subject of the Cap of Maintenance, Custard, the Sword, and many other laudable things in the lord-mayor's house: and yet I hope to have that felicity, for there are three months to come, and who knows what may happen in that time? Nay, I do not despair of seeing you settled with your friends here before we are many years older. Do not start! stranger things have happened very lately.

I was lately honoured at dinner with the lords Bolingbroke, Carteret, Winchelsea, Gower, and Mr. Pulteney; and among other things your name was mentioned, and lord Carteret instantly toasted your health; and you were the subject of conversation for an hour. I showed them your letter. I dare not mention what passed, because I know I shall offend your modesty; only one thing I will venture to repeat, "that they all swore that if ever the wind should change, they would not long be deprived of the greatest genius of the age." The conversation turning on another subject, lord Carteret pulled me to the window, and bade me tell you that he loved and honoured you, and so you should find on all occasions, and that he toasted your health. This is literally true, upon the honour of a ——.

I dined yesterday with lord Bolingbroke only: he complains you do not write to him: he is well.

They say you are making interest for my brother of Dublin to be member of parliament; pray come over and do the same for me, and have the credit of both. My brother behaves himself well, I hear; if it is proper, my service to him.

What you tell Mr. Pilkington of my speaking disrespectfully of the Irish is false and scandalous: I never used such an expression in my life; I appeal to all my acquaintance. I love the Irish.

Pray God restore your health; and believe me always, with gratitude, your most obedient humble servant,

JOHN BARBER.

FROM MISS KELLY.

London, August 2, 1733.

I AM truly sorry, my dear sir, that I have not heard from you so long; but am much more concerned with Barber's account of your being not as well as I wish you. For God's sake try the change of air, and let not any other attachment than your health employ your thoughts. Consider how dear you are to your friends; but if that won't do let the detestation you must feel from giving pleasure to the unworthy make you careful of yourself. Indeed I should be glad to make you sensible that you are valued by all that have a taste for merit; and I should be very much pleased if you would think you owe so much to them that you would, for their sakes, preserve yourself. Believe me, sir, illness is not to be trifled with: I can speak on this subject as an experienced person; and I earnestly entreat you to take remedies in time. Forgive my impertinence, and be assured that none is more truly zealous for your welfare than your

F. A. KELLY.

TO THE EARL OF ORRERY.

Dublin, August 20, 1733.

MY LORD,—I lately received a letter from Mrs. Barber, wherein she desires my opinion about dedicating her poems to your lordship; and seems in pain to know how far she may be allowed to draw your character, which is a right claimed by all dedicators; and she thinks this the more incumbent on her from the surprising instances of your generosity and favour that she has already received, and which she has been so unfashionable to publish wherever she goes. This makes her apprehend that all she can say to your lordship's advantage will be interpreted as the mere effect of flattery, under the style and title of gratitude.

I sent her word that I could be of no service to her upon this article; yet I confess, my lord, that all those who are thoroughly acquainted with her will impute her encomiums to a sincere but overflowing spirit of thankfulness, as well as to the humble opinion she has of herself: although the world in general may possibly continue in its usual sentiments, and list her in the common herd of dedicators.

Therefore, upon the most mature deliberation, I concluded that the office of setting out your lordship's character will not come properly from her pen, for her own reasons: I mean the great favours you have already conferred on her; and God forbid that your character should not have a much stronger support. You are hourly gaining the love, esteem, and respect of wise and good men; and in due time, if Mrs. Barber can have but a little patience, you will bring them all over, in both kingdoms, to a man: I confess the number is not great; but that is not your lordship's fault, and therefore, in reason, you ought to be contented.

I guess the topics she intends to insist on; your learning, your genius, your affability, generosity, the love you bear to your native country, and your compassion for this; the goodness of your nature, your humility, modesty, and condescension; your most agreeable conversation, suited to all tempers, conditions, and understandings: perhaps she may be so weak as to add the regularity of your life; that you believe a God and Providence; that you are a firm christian according to the doctrine of the church established in both kingdoms.

These and other topics I imagine Mrs. Barber designs to insist on in the dedication of her poems to your lordship; but I think she will better show her prudence by omitting them all. And yet my lord I cannot disapprove of her ambition, so justly placed in the choice of a patron; and at the same time declare my opinion that she deserves your protection on account of her wit and good sense, as well as of her humility, her gratitude, and many other virtues. I have read most of her poems; and believe your lordship will observe that they generally contain something new and useful, tending to the reproof of some vice or folly, or recommending some virtue. She never writes on a subject with general unconnected topics, but always with a scheme and method driving to some particular end; wherein many writers in verse and of some distinction are so often known to fail. In short, she seems to have a true poetical genius, better cultivated than could well be expected either from her sex or the scene she has acted in as the wife of a citizen; yet I am assured that no woman was ever more useful to her husband in the way of his business.[a] Poetry has only been her favourite amusement; for which she has one qualification that I wish all good poets possessed a share of, I mean that she is ready to take advice, and submit to have her verses corrected by those who are generally allowed to be the best judges.

I have at her entreaty suffered her to take a copy of this letter, and given her the liberty to make it public; for which I ought to desire your lordship's pardon: but she was of opinion it might do her some service, and therefore I complied. I am, my lord, with the truest esteem and respect, your lordship's most obedient servant, JONATHAN SWIFT

[a] Her husband was a woollen-draper.

TO MRS. DINGLEY.[a]

Wednesday, August 29, 1733.

If you are disposed to be easy and cheerful, I will send something for dinner to your lodgings, and eat it with you and Mrs. Ridgeway;[b] with a bottle of wine, and bread. Speak freely, and send me word. But Mrs. Ridgeway shall take all the care upon her. If you do like this proposal, send word. I would dine a little after two.

FROM MR. POPE.

September 1, 1733.

I have every day wished to write to you to say a thousand things; and yet I think I should not have writ to you now if I was not sick of writing anything, sick of myself, and (what is worse) sick of my friends too. The world is become too busy for me; everybody is so concerned for the public that all private enjoyments are lost or disrelished. I write more to show you I am tired of this life than to tell you anything relating to it. I live as I did, I think as I did, I love you as I did; but all these are to no purpose: the world will not live, think, or love as I do. I am troubled for, and vexed at, all my friends by turns. Here are some whom you love, and who love you; yet they receive no proofs of that affection from you, and they give none of it to you. There is a great gulf between. In earnest, I would go a thousand miles by land to see you, but the sea I dread. My ailments are such that I really believe a sea-sickness (considering the oppression of colical pains and the great weakness of my breast) would kill me; and if I did not die of that, I must of the excessive eating and drinking of your hospitable town, and the excessive flattery of your most poetical country. I hate to be crammed either way. Let your hungry poets and your rhyming peers digest it, I cannot. I like much better to be abused and half-starved than to be so overpraised and overfed. Drown Ireland! for having caught you and for having kept you: I only reserve a little charity

[a] The dean used constantly to visit Mrs. Dingley; but in such a manner as to prevent her being at any expense in providing entertainments.

[b] Mrs. Dingley's lodgings were in Grafton street, Dublin, at the house of a daughter of his old housekeeper, Mrs. Brent, wife to an idle spendthrift, one Ridgeway, a cabinet maker; for the relief of whose necessities she was once about selling an annuity of 20*l*. a year, that had been bequeathed to her for life by her late mistress, lady Newtown. The dean, upon hearing of such a design, commiserated her case and paid down the sum agreed for as the purchase, retaining it in his own power: then paid the annuity to her every year, as if it had been received from lady Newtown's executors; and afterwards bequeathed it to her, which she enjoyed till her death, which happened Oct 16, 1774. For her better encouragement to take more than ordinary care of him in that illness which he always dreaded and foresaw as plainly as he would a coming shower, he left her 100*l*. more. But, to bind her more strongly to her duty still, after he had settled all his affairs by a last will, he signed a bond and warrant for a further sum of 300*l*.; observing at the same time, "It may be the jade will hereafter demand interest upon this bond, though only intended as an additional legacy." Upon which she declared she never would do so, and wondered that the dean could suspect her of it. However, his conjecture proved true in the end: for she afterward intermarried with an avaricious man, one Henry Land (whom the dean had formerly appointed sexton of his cathedral, in which office he had acquired some wealth), who persuaded her in 1748 to join him in demanding 144*l*. for eight years' interest due on the said bond, which was paid along with the principal by the executors: but she generously remitted a small part, by way of benefaction to the dean's hospital."

for her knowing your value and esteeming you: you are the only patriot I know who is not hated for serving his country. The man who drew your character and printed it here was not much in the wrong in many things he said of you; yet he was a very impertinent fellow for saying them in words quite different from those you had yourself employed before on the same subject; for surely to alter your words is to prejudice them: and I have been told that a man himself can hardly say the same thing twice over with equal happiness; nature is so much a better thing than artifice.

I have written nothing this year: it is no affectation to tell you my mother's loss has turned my frame of thinking. The habit of a whole life is a stronger thing than all the reason in the world. I know I ought to be easy and to be free; but I am dejected, I am confined; my whole amusement is in reviewing my past life, not in laying plans for my future. I wish you cared as little for popular applause as I; as little for any nation in contradistinction to others as I; and then I fancy you that are not afraid of the sea, you that are a stronger man at sixty than ever I was at twenty, would come and see several people who are (at last) like the primitive christians, of one soul and of one mind. The day is come which I have often wished, but never thought to see; when every mortal that I esteem is of the same sentiment in politics and in religion.

Adieu. All you love are yours, but all are busy, except, dear sir, your sincere friend.

FROM MRS. DONNELLAN.

London, September 22, 1733.

Sir,—Knowing your great esteem and tenderness for Miss Kelly, and that there is no one whom she has so high an opinion of, or whose advice would sway so much with her, I cannot forbear letting you know my thoughts about her at this time; that I think she wants the assistance and counsel of her best and wisest friend. As she has been so good to distinguish me among her female acquaintance and to show more confidence than in any other, I think I can better tell her mind; but as she has a natural closeness I judge chiefly by hints; for I believe she does not open herself entirely to any one. Her health I think in a much worse way than when she came to London: she has still a slow fever, a violent cough, great and almost continual sickness in her stomach,* and added to all these, a very great dejection of spirit; which last I cannot but think proceeds in a good measure from discontent and uneasiness of mind; and the physicians are of the same opinion. I have endeavoured by all the means I could think of to find out the cause, hoping that if it were known it might by the assistance of friends be remedied. I know, when a young person shows any discontent, people are apt to imagine there can be no cause for it but a disappointment in love; I really think that is not Miss Kelly's case: I have tried her to the uttermost on that subject, and I cannot find she has any attachment to any particular person, but that the whole world, except a few friends, is indifferent to her: but what I take her present uneasiness to proceed from is the unkindness in general of her parents, and the fear of not being supported by her father in the way she likes, and as her present bad state of health indeed requires. She has a high spirit, and cannot bear to be obliged to her friends, and she has not been much used to management. She is here in a very expensive way, with her sickness, her servants, and horses; and I believe she would be greatly mortified, after appearing in this manner, to be obliged to fall below it; and at the same time she has reason to fear, from her father's behaviour, that he thinks little of her, and will not support her in it: she has not heard from him these two months; and the letters she had from him at Bristol were warning her not to marry without his consent, enjoining her not to go to public places, and above all, to spend little money; very odd subjects to one in her condition. Now, what I would beg of you, sir, is to endeavour to find out what are his resolutions in relation to her, and, if there be any that has an influence over him, to get them to convince him that his child's life is in the greatest danger; and then perhaps he may not think his time and money ill employed to save it. If at the same time, sir, you would join your good advice to her, I believe it might be of great use either to make her bear with less uneasiness the ills of this life, or, if it please God to take her from us, to prepare her for another and a better. Her humour is much changed; her spirits are low; and upon every little disappointment her passions rise high: you know, sir, how best to apply to these. She is at Hampstead quite alone; and although her physicians desire much she should come to town, she cannot be prevailed upon to think of it; she desires to be alone; even Mrs. Rooke and I, whom she calls her best friends, are troublesome to her. I believe I need not tell you, sir, that I desire this letter may be a secret, and especially to the person concerned. If you have anything to tell me that can be of use on this subject, and will honour me with your commands, direct if you please for me, under cover to Mrs Anne Shuttleworth, at Mr. Jourdain's, in Conduit street. I should beg pardon, sir, for troubling you with this long letter, but I hope my friendship to Miss Kelly will be my excuse. I am sorry to write on so melancholy a subject, and which I am sure must give you uneasiness; but pleased with any opportunity of assuring you that I am, sir, your very great admirer and most obedient humble servant,

Anne Donnellan.

* Miss Kelly died the last week in October, 1733.

FROM MRS. PENDARVES.

Gloucester, October 24, 1733.

Sir,—I cannot imagine how my lord Orrery came by my last letter to you; I believe my good genius conveyed it into his hands to make it of more consequence to you; if it had that effect I wish this may meet with the same fortune.

If I were writing to a common correspondent, I should now make a fine flourish to excuse myself for not sooner acknowledging the favour of your letter; but I must deal plainly with you, sir, and tell you (now do not be angry) that the fear of tiring you stopped my hand. I value your correspondence so highly that I think of every way that may preserve it, and one is not to be too troublesome.

Now I cannot guess how you will take this last paragraph; but if it makes me appear affected or silly, I will endeavour not to offend in the same manner again. Some mortification of that kind is wanting to bring me to myself: your ways of making compliments are dangerous snares, and I do not know how to guard against the pleasure they bring: to be remembered and regretted by you are honours of a very delicate kind. I have been told that unexpected good fortune is harder to bear well than adversity.

The cold weather I suppose has gathered together Dr. Delany's set: the next time you meet may I beg the favour to make my compliments acceptable? I recollect no entertainment with so much pleasure as what I received from that company; it has made me very sincerely lament the many hours of my life that I have lost in insignificant conversation.

I am very much concerned at the disorder you complain of. I hope you submit to take proper care of yourself, and that the next account I have of your health will be more to my satisfaction.

A few days before I had your last letter my sister and I made a visit to my lord and lady Bathurst at Cirencester. Oakly-wood joins to his park; the grand avenue that goes from his house through his park and wood is five miles long; the whole contains 5000 acres. We stayed there a day and a half: the wood is extremely improved since you saw it; and when the whole design is executed it will be one of the finest places in England. My lord Bathurst talked with great delight of the pleasure you once gave him by surprising him in his wood, and showed me the house where you lodged. It has been rebuilt; for the day you left it it fell to the ground; conscious of the honour it had received by entertaining so illustrious a guest, it burst with pride. My lord Bathurst has greatly improved the wood-house, which you may remember but a cottage not a bit better than an Irish cabin. It is now a venerable castle, and has been taken by an antiquarian for one of king Arthur's "with thicket overgrown, grotesque and wild." I endeavoured to sketch it out for you, but I have not skill enough to do it justice. My lord Bathurst was in great spirits; and though surrounded by candidates and voters against next parliament, made himself agreeable in spite of their clamour: we did not forget to talk of Naboth's vineyard[a] and Delville.[b] I have not seen him since, though he promised to return my visit.

All the beau monde flock to London to see her royal highness[c] disposed of; while I prefer paying my duty to my mother, and the conversation of a country girl, my sister, to all the pomp and splendour of the court. Is this virtue or stupidity? If I can help it I will not go to town till after Christmas. I shall spend one month in my way to London at Longleat:[d] I hear that the young people there are very happy.

It is a little unreasonable for me to begin a fourth page; but it is a hard task to retire from the company one likes best. I am, sir, your most obliged and faithful humble servant, M. PENDARVES.

FROM THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

Amesbury, November 3, 1733.

DEAR SIR,—I was mightily pleased to receive a letter from you last post; yet I am so ungrateful I will not thank you for it, and it may be you do not deserve it. The cruelest revenge that one can possibly inflict (without hurting oneself) is that of being doubly diligent to those who neglect one, in order to shock them into better behaviour. As I have tried this trick myself, and that strong appearances are against me, I must defend myself, and then you will own I do not quite deserve chastisement.

The post before I left this place I received a letter from you, which I designed to have answered before I left London and England; but was hindered from both for some time by an express which hurried us down to Winchester school, to take care of our little boy there who was violently ill of a fever. From that time till I came to Spa we were never at home; and as soon as I began the waters, writing could not be done with my bad head. Since I left that place and grew well, I have been still upon the ramble. After all, these are not very substantial good reasons; but upon my word I did design it; in order to which, two days ago I washed the mould out of my inkhorn, put fresh ink into it, and promised myself to write to you this very post: pleasing myself with the fancy that this would reach you and convince you that I had you still in great regard, before you could or would think it worth your while to put me in mind of you. I could not fail to gain credit if you could conceive the great satisfaction your letters give me. I have seldom met with any half so conversable. I do not only pity but grieve at those complaints you mention; they are a cruel incumbrance to you. Why cannot you transfer them to a thousand inanimate creatures who have nothing in their heads? I was, and am, really sorry that you could not go with us to the Spa. I am confident it must have done you good. I cannot describe the vast difference I felt after drinking the waters a week, and am still much better than I ever expected, though not quite free of the complaints in my head, but they are greatly lessened.

I have three or four letters to write this very night, so have not time to think of answering your letters. This is only a volunteer, after which I may with greater assurance desire you to believe that I am, with constancy, regard, and respect, yours, &c.

FROM CHARLES FORD, ESQ.

London, November 6, 1733.

I HAD the favour of your letter in Derbyshire, from whence I came last week. I am extremely concerned to hear the ill state of your health. I was afraid of it when I was so long without the pleasure of hearing from you. Those sort of disorders puzzle the physicians everywhere; and they are merciless dogs in purging and vomiting to no purpose when they do not know what to do. I heartily wish you would try the Bath waters, which are allowed to be the best medicine for strengthening the stomach; and most distempers in the head proceed from thence. Vomits may clean a foul stomach, but they are certainly the worst things that can be for a weak one.

I have long had it at heart to see your works collected and published with care. It is become absolutely necessary since that jumble with Pope, &c., in three volumes, which put me in a rage whenever I meet them. I know no reason why at this distance of time the "Examiners" and other political pamphlets written in the queen's reign might not be inserted. I doubt you have been too negligent in keeping copies; but I have them bound up, and most of them single besides. I lent Mr. Corbet that paper to correct his "Gulliver" by; and it was from it that I mended my own. There is every single alteration from the original copy; and the printed book abounds with all those errors which should be avoided in the new edition.

In my book the blank leaves were wrong placed, so that there are perpetual references backward and forward, and it is more difficult to be understood than the paper; but I will try to get one of the second edition, which is much more correct than the first, and transcribe all the alterations more clearly. I shall be at a loss how to send it afterwards, unless I am directed to somebody that is going to Ireland. All books are printed here by subscription: if there be one for this, I beg I may not be left out. Mr. Crosthwaite my steward will pay for me.

The dissenters were certainly promised that the test act should be repealed this session in Ireland; I should be glad to know whether any attempt has been or is to be made towards it; and how it is like to succeed.

[b] Dr Delany's beautiful villa, near Dublin.
[c] The late princess of Orange.
[d] Wiltshire, the superb seat of lord Weymouth, now marquis of Bath.

We have lost Miss Kelly, who they say was destroyed by the ignorance of an Irish physician, one Gorman. Doctor Beaufort was sent for when she was dying, and found her speechless and senseless.

Our late lord-mayor has gone through his year with a most universal applause. He has shown himself to have the best understanding of any man in the city, and gained a character, which he wanted before, of courage and honesty. There is no doubt of his being chosen member of parliament for the city at the next election. He is something the poorer for his office; but the honour he has got by it makes him ample amends.

For God's sake try to keep up your spirits. They have hitherto been greater than any man's I have met, and it is better to preserve them even with wine than to let them sink. Divert yourself with Mrs. Worrall at backgammon. Find out some new country to travel in: anything to amuse. Nothing can contribute sooner than cheerfulness to your recovery; which, that it may be very speedy, is sincerely the thing in the world most wished for by your ever obliged, &c.

FROM THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

Amesbury, November 10, 1733.

Dear Sir,—I have only stayed to give time for my letters getting to you. There is some satisfaction in sitting down to write, now that I am something less in your debt; I mean by way of letter. To speak seriously, I must love contradiction more than ever woman did if I did not obey your commands; for I do sincerely take great pleasure in conversing with you. If you have heard of my figure abroad, it is no more than I have done on both sides of my ears (as the saying is), for I did not cut and curl my hair like a sheep's head, or wear one of their trolloping sacks; and by so not doing I did give some offence.

We have seen many very fine towns, and travelled through good roads and pleasant countries. I like Flanders in particular, because it is the likest to England. The inns were very unlike those at home, being much cleaner and better served; so that here I could not maintain my partiality with common justice. As to the civilizing any of that nation, it would employ more ill-spent time fruitlessly than any one has to spare; they are the only people I ever saw that were quite without a genius to be civil when they had a mind to be so. Will you eat? Will you play at cards? are literally the tip-top well-bred phrases in use. The French people we met are quite of another turn, polite and easy; one is the natural consequence of the other, though a secret that few have discovered. I can bring you an Irish witness (if that be sufficient) that I have wished for you many times during this journey, particularly at Spa, where I imagined you might have been mending every day as fast as I did; and you are a base man to say that any such impediment as you mentioned thwarted your journey; for you were sure of a welcome share in everything we had. It were unnecessary to say this now, if we had no thoughts of ever going again; but it is what I am strongly advised to, though I should not much want it, and I am not averse: travelling agrees with me, and makes me good humoured. At home I am generally more nice than wise, but on the road nothing comes amiss. At Calais we were windbound four or five days and I was very well contented; when the wind changed I was delighted to go. As impatience is generally my reigning distemper, you may imagine how I must be alarmed at this sudden alteration, till I happily recollected two instances, where I was myself. The one at Breda, where the innkeeper let drop "if you mean to go" an hour and a half after we had told him fifty times that we positively would go on. The other at Amsterdam, where we met with a very incurious gentleman, who affirmed there was nothing worth seeing; though, besides the town, which far surpassed my imagination, there happened to be a most famous fair. It is long since those two verses of Dryden's "Cymon" are strictly applicable to me:—

"Her corn and cattle are her only care,
And her supreme delight a country fair."

I shall forget to name my Irish friend; it is Mr. Coote. He is in all appearance a modest, well-bred, splenetic, good-natured man. I had then one of these qualifications more than was pleasant, and so we became acquainted. He has a very great regard for you, sir; and there we agreed again. We were all highly pleased with him. He seems to have a better way of thinking than is common, and not to want for sense or good humour. I tell you that I do not use exercise; designedly never eat or drink what can disagree with me, but am no more certain of my stomach than of my mind; at sometimes proof against anything, and at other times too easily shocked; but time and care can certainly make a strong defence. I will obey your commands, and so will his grace, concerning Mrs. Barber, as soon as we come to London, where we stayed but three days. We are now at Amesbury; but pray direct for me at London. I doubt we can do her but little good; for as to my part, I have few acquaintance and little interest. I will believe everything you say of her, though I have hitherto ever had a natural aversion to a poetess.

I am come almost to the end of my paper before I have half done with you. It was a rule I remember with poor Mr. Gay and me never to exceed three pages. I long to hear from you, that I may have an excuse to write again; for I doubt it would be carrying the joke too far to trouble you too often. Adieu, dear sir; health and happiness attend you ever.

I fear I have written so very ill that I am quite unintelligible. His grace is very much yours.

FROM MRS. PRATT.

London, November 10, 1733.

Sir,—Not many days ago I had the pleasure of yours by Mrs. Barber, whose turn seems to confirm the good impression you give of her. I want not more than your recommendation to engage my wishes to serve her, and also my endeavours, if any opportuity falls in my way. Are there no hopes of seeing you on this side of the water? Cannot the great number of your friends, and the great variety of conversation abounding here, be some kind of inducement to your coming among us? Is not Mr. Pope a temptation to one of your distinction to draw you this way? Even the variety of people in this great city might contribute to the amusement of your mind, as a journey and exercise would to your bodily health. I would use every argument I could think of to invite you hither, and consequently to preserve a life so beneficial to the public and so dear to all your friends. You have a spirit that should prevail against indolence, and bring you into a part of the world which calls aloud for your talents. This winter would furnish you with many opportunities of doing great good, as well as making a shining figure, which reflection gives me great hopes that you will think it a reasonable obligation; as in that case, like Pitt's diamond, you would stand alone. I wish I had a house in some measure worthy to entertain a guest that should be so welcome to me. You surprise me greatly in telling me that my lord Shelburne and you have not met, although he has been some time in Dublin and to my knowledge is one of your great admirers. Why do not you send to my lord Dunkerin, who undoubtedly wants only that encouragement to wait upon you? You see I want none to embrace the opportunity of assuring you that I am, with great esteem, respect, and affection, your very obliged and most humble servant, H. PRATT.

FROM ALDERMAN BARBER.

(When the year of his being lord-mayor had expired.)

London, November 17, 1733.

As I have now got rid of the plague of grandeur, and all its dependencies, I take this first opportunity to pay my respects to you, sir, which I beg pardon for not doing sooner. The transition from Goldsmiths'-hall[a] to Queen-square is hardly credible; for in one view to imagine the constant hurry, noise, and impertinence I lay under from morning till night, in opposition to the peace, the quiet, and great tranquillity I feel in my little retirement, makes me pity your great men, who certainly must be strangers to the great pleasure I now enjoy.

Before I left my office I took care to do justice to Mr. Pilkington, who has received more than I mentioned, and, indeed, more than any chaplain ever had before, viz.:—

Of the city.
Salary	20	0	0
Gratuity	25	0	0
Gratuity extraordinary .	21	0	0
				£66	0	0
From my lord-mayor . .				50	0	0
Five sermons preached before the mayor				10	0	0

St. Paul's happened to be shut up in the summer for two months, when the mayor went on Sundays to his own chapel at Guildhall, and his chaplain read prayers for eight Sunday mornings only; for which the mayor got him from the court of aldermen twenty guineas.

I have been the more particular in this account because I know your great punctuality in things of this nature, as well as to do myself justice. How much he may be a gainer by coming over I cannot tell; but if he had pleased to have lived near the hall, as he might, in a lodging of ten or twelve pounds a-year, he need not have kept a man (for I had more for show than business), nor given the extravagant sum of thirty pounds a-year for lodgings; he might have saved something in those articles. Had he lived in the city, I should now and then have had the favour of his company in an evening; but his living from me brought him into company, and among the rest into that of Mr. Edward Walpole, from whom he has great dependencies.

I recommended him to Mr. alderman Champion, who got the primate's wife's brother to write in his favour to the primate. And he talks of the living of Colerain's being vacant; if it be, I will do him what service I can.

Thus, sir, I have discharged myself of the duty you laid upon me in relation to that gentleman, which I hope will be to your satisfaction; for I will never be ungrateful, though I have met with it frequently myself.

All your friends in town are well and in high spirits. Lord Bolingbroke complains you do not write to him. Poor Mrs. Barber has the gout, but is better. It was a great mortification to me that you did not come and eat some custard; but I hope your health will permit your coming next summer. We rejoice much at my brother French's success. I know you do not deal in news, so I send you none. Pray God continue your health, and believe me always, with the greatest sincerity, sir, your most obedient and most obliged humble servant, JOHN BARBER.

P.S. Why Mr. Pilkington should send his wife home in the midst of winter, or why he should stay here an hour after her, are questions not easily answered. I am not of his council.

FROM THE COUNTESS GRANVILLE.[a]

Hawnes, November 27, 1733.

DEAR SIR,—I have received the honour of your commands, and shall obey them; for I am very proud of your remembrance. I do not know we ever quarrelled; but if we did, I am as good a Christian as you are, in perfect charity with you. My son, my daughter, and all our olive-branches salute you most tenderly. I never wished so much as I do now that I were bright and had a genius which could entertain you, in return for the many excellent things that entertain me daily, which I read over and over with fresh delight. Will you never come into England, and make Hawnes your road? You will find nothing here to offend you; for I am a hermit, and live in my chimney-corner, and have no ambition, but that you will believe I am the charming dean's most obedient humble servant, GRANVILLE.

FROM MRS. CONDUITT.[b]

George street, November 29, 1733.

SIR,—Mrs. Barber did not deliver your letter till after the intended wedding brought me hither. She has as much a better title to the favour of her sex than poetry can give her, as truth is better than fiction, and shall have my best assistance. But the town has been so long invited into the subscription that most people have already refused or accepted, and Mr. Conduitt has long since done the latter.

I should have guessed your holiness would rather have laid than called up the ghost of my departed friendship, which, since you are brave enough to face, you will find divested of every terror but the remorse that you were abandoned to be an alien to your friends, your country, and yourself. Not to renew an acquaintance with one who can twenty years after remember a bare intention to serve him, would be to throw away a prize I am not now able to re-purchase; therefore when you return to England I shall try to excel in what I am very sorry you want, a nurse; in the mean time I am exercising that gift to preserve one who is your devoted admirer.

Lord Harvey has written a bitter copy of verses upon Dr. Sherwin for publishing (as it is said) his lordship's epistle, which must have set your brother Pope's spirits all a-working.

Thomson is far advanced in a poem of 2000 lines, deducing liberty from the patriarchs to the present times, which, if we may judge from the press, is now in full vigour. But I forget I am writing to one who has the power of the keys of Parnassus, and that the only merit my letter can have is brevity. Please therefore to place the profit I had in your long one to your fund of charity, which carries no interest, and to add to your prayers and good wishes now and then a line to, sir, your obedient humble servant,

[a] Widow and relict of George lord Carteret, and daughter of John Granville, earl of Bath.

[b] Thus indorsed by the dean:—"My old friend Mrs. Barton, now Mrs. Conduitt."

C. CONDUITT.

Mrs. Barber, whom I had sent to dine with us, is in bed with the gout and has not yet sent me her proposals.

FROM CHARLES COOTE, ESQ.

London, December 13, 1733.

SIR,—Being indebted solely to you for a most valuable acquaintance with the duke and duchess of Queensberry and some other of your friends, I ought to have acknowledged it before. It is a common stratagem of mine, and has always succeeded, to give hints in proper places of your allowing me to some degree of personal acquaintance with you, and I owe to it most of the agreeable hours I passed at Spa this summer, where they were. I had strong temptations, especially at that distance, to give myself high airs this way; but finding the bare mention of my having been received by you in a most obliging manner was enough to do my business, and it being a fact I could make oath of, I kept within due bounds. Her grace, who would be the most agreeable woman in England though she were not the handsomest, has honoured me with her compliments to you with a walking-stick, the manufacture of Spa, where she had it made for you, and I ought to have delivered it two months ago; accidents prevented my leaving this place, and it is not certain when I can; so that I must send it to you by the first proper opportunity, but could no longer delay your pleasure in knowing it, and hers when you shall acknowledge it. If I can be of any sort of service to you on this side, your commands will find me at St. James's coffeehouse. I am, sir, your most obliged, humble servant,

CHARLES COOTE.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.[a]

December 20, 1733.

DEAR SIR,—Yours I received, and if it was not that I have a good deal of company to sup at my house upon beef griskins I would go and play a game of backgammon with Mr. Worrall's tables, and be after winning some of Mrs. Worrall's coin; I would not fear to win a crown-piece of her money by playing sixpence halfpenny a time. She is a very good body and one that I have a great value for; I wish my spouse were but half as good; but of this I shall say nothing more till meeting. I hope my gossip Delany's spouse is upon the mendin,, hand, for they tell me she has been lately much out of order. She is as good a woman as ever breathed, and it is a thousand pities that anything should ail her. God Almighty wish her well, for I am sure if she went off the dector would not meet with her fellow. I hope nothing ails her but a brush.

To-morrow I eat a bit with Mr. and Mrs. M'Gwyre: if you will make one, you will get as hearty a welcome as if you were their own father, for nobody speaks better of you than they. My humble service to all friends and to yourself is the request of yours to command,

THADY O SULIVAN.

I lodge hard by the Shovel in Francis-street.

TO MRS. PILKINGTON.

1733.

MADAM,—You must shake off the leavings of your sex. If you cannot keep a secret and take a chiding you will quickly be out of my sphere. Corrigible people are to be chid; those who are otherwise may be very safe from any lectures of mine; I should rather choose to indulge them in their follies than attempt to set them right. I desire you may not inform your husband[a] of what has passed, for a reason I shall give you when I see you, which may be this evening, if you will. I am very sincerely your friend,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. POPE.

January 6, 1734.

I NEVER think of you and can never write to you now without drawing many of those short sighs of which we have formerly talked; the reflection both of the friends we have been deprived of by death, and of those from whom we are separated almost as eternally by absence, checks me to that degree that it takes away in a manner the pleasure (which yet I feel very sensibly too) of thinking I am now conversing with you. You have been silent to me as to your works; whether those printed here are or are not genuine. But one I am sure is yours; and your method of concealing yourself puts me in mind of the Indian bird I have read of who hides his head in a hole while all his feathers and tail stick out. You will have immediately by several franks (even before it is here published) my "Epistle to Lord Cobham," part of my Opus Magnum, and the last "Essay on Man;" both which I conclude will be grateful to your bookseller on whom you please to bestow them so early. There is a woman's war declared against me by a certain lord; his weapons are the same which women and children use, a pin to scratch, and a squirt to bespatter: I wrote a sort of answer, but was ashamed to enter the lists with him, and after showing it to some people, suppressed it; otherwise it was such as was worthy of him and worthy of me. I was three weeks this autumn with lord Peterborough, who rejoices in your doings and always speaks with the greatest affection of you I need not tell you who else do the same; you may be sure almost all those whom I ever see or desire to see. I wonder not that B—— paid you no sort of civility while he was in Ireland; he is too much a half-wit to love a true wit, and too much half honest to esteem any entire merit. I hope and I think he hates me too, and I will do my best to make him; he is so insupportably insolent in his civility to me when he meets me at one third place that I must affront him to get rid of it. That strict neutrality as to public parties which I have constantly observed in all my writings I think gives me the more title to attack such men as slander and belie my character in private to those who know me not. Yet even this is a liberty I will never take unless at the same time they are pests to private society or mischievous members of the public, that is to say, unless they are enemies to all men as well as to me. Pray write to me when you can; if ever I can come to you I will; if not, may Providence be our friend and our guard through this simple world, where nothing is valuable but sense and friendship. Adieu, dear sir, may health attend your years, and then may many years be added to you.

P.S. I am just now told a very curious lady intends to write to you to pump you about some poems said to be yours. Pray tell her that you have not answered me on the same questions, and that I shall take it as a thing never to be forgiven from you if you tell another what you have concealed from me.

TO THE DUKE OF DORSET.

January, 1734.

My Lord,—It has been my great misfortune that since your grace's return to this kingdom I have not been able to attend you, as my duty and gratitude for your favours as well as the honour of having been so many years known to you obliged me to do. I have been pursued by two old disorders, a giddiness and deafness, which used to leave me in three or four weeks, but now have continued four months. Thus I am put under a necessity to write what I would rather have chosen to say in your grace's presence.

On Monday last week towards evening there came to the deanery one Mr. Bettesworth; who, being told by the servants that I was gone to a friend's house,[a] went thither to inquire for me, and was admitted into the street parlour. I left my company in the back room and went to him. He began with asking me "whether I were the author of certain verses wherein he was reflected on." The singularity of the man, in his countenance, manner, action, style, and tone of voice, made me call to mind that I had once seen him about two or three years ago at Mr. Ludlow's country-house. But I could not recollect his name; and of what calling he might be I had never heard. I therefore desired to know who and what he was; said "I had heard of some such verses, but knew no more." He then signified to me "that he was a serjeant-at-law and a member of parliament." After which he repeated the lines that concerned him with great emphasis; said "I was mistaken in one thing, for he assured me he was no booby, but owned himself to be a coxcomb." However, that being a point of controversy wherein I had no concern, I let it drop. As to the verses, he insisted, "that by his taste and skill in poetry he was as sure I wrote them as if he had seen them fall from my pen." But I found the chief weight of his argument lay upon two words that rhymed to his name, which he knew could come from none but me. He then told me "that, since I would not own the verses, and that since he could not get satisfaction by any course of law, he would get it by his pen, and show the world what a man I was." When he began to grow overwarm and eloquent I called in the gentleman of the house from the room adjoining; and the serjeant, going on with less turbulence, went away. He had a footman in the hall during all his talk, who was to have opened the door for one or more fellows, as he has since reported; and likewise that he had a sharp knife in his pocket, ready to stab or maim me." But the master and mistress of the house, who knew his character and could hear every word from the room they were in, had prepared a sufficient defence in such a case, as they afterward told me. He has since related to five hundred persons of all ranks about five hundred falsehoods of this conversation, of my fears and his own brutalities, against all probability as well as fact; and some of them, as I have been assured, even in the presence of your grace. His meanings and his movements were indeed peevish enough, but his words were not. He threatened me with nothing but his pen, yet owned he had no pretence to wit. And indeed I am heartily glad for his own sake that he proceeded no farther, for the least uproar would have called his nearest neighbours first to my assistance, and next to the manifest danger of his life; and I would not willingly have even a dog killed upon my account. Ever since he has amused himself with declaring in all companies, especially before bishops and lords and members of parlament, his resolutions for vengeance and the several manners by which he will put it in execution.

It is only to the advice of some judicious friends that your grace owes the trouble of this letter; for though I may be dispirited enough by sickness and years, yet I have little reason to apprehend any danger from that man; and those who seem to have most regard for my safety are no more apprehensive than myself, especially such as best know his character; for his very enemies and even his ridiculers, who are of the two by far the greater number, allow him to be a peaceable man in all things except his words, his rhetorical actions, his looks, and his hatred to the clergy; which however are all known by abundance of experience to be perfectly harmless, and particularly as to the clergy. I do not doubt but, if he will be so good to continue steadfast in his principles and practices, he may at proper junctures contribute very much to the honour and interests of that reverend body, as well as employ and improve the wit of many young gentlemen in the city, the university, and the rest of the kingdom.

What I have said to your grace is only meant as a poor endeavour to preserve myself in your good opinion and in the continuance of your favour. I am, with the highest respect, &c.

Jonathan Swift.

[a] The Rev. Mr. Worrall's

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

March 2, 1734.

I am extremely glad to hear you are got well again; and I do assure you it was no point of ceremony made me forbear writing, but the downright fear of being troublesome. If you have got off your deafness, that is a happiness I doubt poor lady Suffolk will never have; for she does not mend, if she does not grow rather worse. But we ladies are famous for straining our voices upon the bad occasion of anger; and sure then it is hard if it is not more agreeable to do it for the sake of friendship. By the histories I hear from Ireland, Bettesworth, in the midst of your illness, did not think your pen lay idle;[a] but this good you had from it, that such a troublesome fellow made your friends and neighbours show they could exert themselves for your sake. Mrs. Floyd has passed this winter rather better than the last; but cold weather is a great enemy of hers; and when you see her I fear you will find that, though the goodness of the "composition"[b] will always hold, yet so many winters have taken the beauty of it entirely off. It grows now near the time that I have hopes you will soon part with my duke and duchess. I always used to be her doctor; I wish you would allow me to be yours, and take my advice, and try how the change of air would mend your constitution; but I fear you will not. However, God bless you; and adieu.

[a] About this time an attempt was made to repeal the test act in Ireland; and the dissenters, on this occasion, affected to call themselves "brother protestants and fellow-christians" with the members of the established church. This the dean made the subject of a short copy of verses, in which there is a passage that so provoked one Bettesworth, a lawyer and member of the Irish parliament, that he swore to revenge himself, either by maiming or murdering the author; and for this purpose he engaged his footman with two ruffians to secure the dean wherever he could be found. As soon as this oath and attempt of Bettesworth were known, thirty of the nobility and gentry of St. Patrick's waited upon the dean in form; and presented a paper subscribed with their names, in which they solemnly engaged, in behalf of themselves and the rest of the liberty, to defend his person and fortune, as the friend and benefactor of his country.

[b] "And call'd the happy composition Floyd." See Swift's "Receipt to make a Beauty."

FROM THE DUCHESS OF QUEENSBERRY.

London, March 4, 1734.

DEAR SIR,—If ever lying was necessary, I fear it is so at present, for no truth can furnish me with sufficient excuse for not having written long ago; therefore I have been strongly tempted to disown having received any return to my letters which I wrote to you since my return to these parts; but upon more mature deliberation, I have convinced myself that it is better rather to confess my fault than to give you any handle to suspect my truth for the future. I wish everybody was as timorous as myself, and then lying and deceit would never be so much in the fashion as it has and will be for many ages past and to come. I remember you once told me always to sit down to write when I was in good health and good humour; neither of them have been perfect of some tim The first has been interrupted by perpetual colds and pains in my face and teeth. My temper, by these trying truths which I am about to tell you, viz. a journey to Scotland, where we have been going every week and every day since Christmas; the uncertainty of which, and being consequently unsettled, is even worse than the thing itself. This is not all; by these means I have been obliged to send a little boy (who has been my constant companion ever since he was born, and who is not seven years old till next July) to school a full year before it was necessary or proper. The doing this I own has damped my spirits more than was reasonable, though it was by his own desire; and that I am persuaded he is well taken care of, both by the master and his own brother, who is fond of him, and so would you be if you knew him; for he has more sense than above half the world. The other is a fine boy, and grown very strong and healthy. I am much obliged to you for reproving me that I did not tell you so before. I am in great hopes to live to see them both men; therefore pray advise me what to do with them after they have gone through the school; for I imagine that just then is the most difficult part of their education. Mr. Locke, with whom I cannot help differing in some things, makes a full stop there; and I never heard of any other that ever mentioned, or at least published, any helps for children at that time of life which I apprehend to be the most material.

There is a good deal of impertinence in filling two sides of paper about me and mine; but I own at present my whole thoughts are so much employed on the latter, that I involuntarily think and talk of little else. To-morrow will be acted a new play of our friend Mr. Gay's ["The Distressed Wife"]; we stay on purpose now for that, and shall go on Thursday for Edinburgh, where the greatest good I can expect or hope for is a line from you. Mrs. Barber has met with a good deal of trouble; I have not seen her I fancy for that reason; but we shall leave our guineas for her with Mr. Pope or my brother. I wish you all health and prosperity. I will not wish you devoid of all trouble and vexation, because I think a moderate share is a great encouragement to good spirits; but may you never meet with more than is absolutely necessary to be pleasant.

Adieu, dear sir. If you will oblige me, you must do me the justice to believe I am your most faithful friend.

FROM FRANCIS GRANT, ESQ.

[A London merchant.]

London, March 14, 1734.

VERY REVEREND SIR,—Though I have been long an admirer of your w[i]t and learning, I have not less valued and esteemed your public spirit and great affection to your native country. These valuable ingredients in your character persuade me to propose to you what I apprehend may be for your country's benefit, and that you will excuse my taking the liberty to do it. As good principles dispose you, your real merit, happily united with them, gives you weight and influence to promote the public good; to which I am well assured your country owes not only the escaping many evils, but the establishment of many valuable articles for the increase of their wealth and strength. Though I am not a native of Ireland, I have always regarded it as so connected with this country, that the natives of both islands ought mutually to study and advance the advantage of each other. And it is in consequence of this principle that I offer to your consideration that your countrymen should heartily engage in and pursue the white-herring and cod fishing. This is a branch of trade which Providence has given opportunity to follow in both countries; neither can they prejudice one another, as there may be consumption for all that may be caught on both islands. There is nothing that would so effectually employ your poor and prevent their going abroad, considering the great variety of trades necessary in this undertaking; it would also increase the consumption of your home manufactures, and increase the balance of your foreign trade.

The north and north-east parts of your island lie exceeding well both for the cod and herring fishing, as will appear to you from their course, which is described in the enclosed pamphlet, if you take the trouble to look upon it; but encouragements are necessary to support a new undertaking in its infancy, because they are always at the beginning liable to charges and inconveniences, which discourage private adventurers, if not supported by the public. I have with great pleasure read in the minutes of your parliament of late years several instances of their zeal for their country's good, which inclines me to believe they would readily receive and encourage a proposition of this nature if properly introduced and recommended to them; and I shall reckon it a particular good fortune if I could suggest what would be acceptable to you and them. I have been desirous to establish and improve this valuable branch of commerce in Britain, for which reason I have applied myself to it several years last past, and examined it in all its shapes, from whence I flatter myself to have acquired a thorough knowledge in the matter; and I am, with other gentlemen, endeavouring to obtain the necessary encouragements for it here; but it being late before we moved in our application, and appearance of a short session, I am afraid we shall make little progress at this time. Not being sufficiently acquainted with your laws and constitutions, I cannot take upon me to say what may be proper encouragements in your country: yet I may freely venture to assert one proposition to which every one must assent, that it is the interest of any nation to grant premiums and bounties for the encouragement of any one branch of trade, which in proportion to what is paid by the public, and when that is paid only to its own subjects, brings into the kingdom ten times the value. And I may with equal safety advance this other proposition, that no article of trade better deserves encouragement from both Britain and Ireland than the fishing does; or that might be made of so great consequence and general benefit to both; to which I believe I may add that there is not any business more natural to either, or the establishment whereof would receive more universal approbation and applause.

These things from my opinion of your character I thought I might take the liberty to trouble you with; which I was the more readily induced to as it furnished me an opportunity of declaring that I am, with great esteem, sir, your most obedient humble servant

FRANCIS GRANT

P. S. If you have any commands for me, or that you think I may be any ways useful in explaining or promoting this subject, I shall with pleasure obey you; in which case you may direct for me, merchant, in London.

TO FRANCIS GRANT, ESQ.

Dublin, March 23, 1734.

SIR,—I return you my hearty thanks for your letter and discourse upon the fishery; you discover in both a true love of your country, and (excepting your civilities to me) a very good judgment, good wishes to this ruined kingdom, and a perfect knowledge in the subject you treat. But you are more temperate than I, and consequently much wiser: for corruptions are apt to make me impatient and give offence, which you prudently avoid.

Ever since I began to think, I was enraged at the folly of England in suffering the Dutch to have almost the whole advantage of our fishery just under our noses.

The last lord Wemyss told me he was governor of a castle in Scotland, near which the Dutch used to fish; he sent to them, in a civil manner, to desire they would send him some fish, which they brutishly refused; whereupon he ordered three or four cannon to be discharged from the castle, (for their boats were in reach of the shot,) and immediately they sent him more than he wanted.

The Dutch are like a knot of sharpers among a parcel of honest gentlemen, who think they understand play, and are bubbled of their money. I love them for the love they have to their country; which, however, is no virtue in them, because it is their private interest, which is directly contrary in England. In the queen's time I did often press the lord-treasurer, Oxford and others of the ministry upon this very subject; but the answer was, "We must not offend the Dutch;" who at that very time were opposing us in all our steps toward a peace. I laughed to see the zeal that ministry had about the fishing at Newfoundland, (I think,) while no care was taken against the Dutch fishing just at our doors.

As to my native country, I happened indeed by a perfect accident to be born here, my mother being left here from returning to her house at Leicester, and I was a year old before I was sent to England; and thus I am a Teague, or an Irishman, or what people please, although the best part of my life was in England.

What I did for this country was from perfect hatred of tyranny and oppression, for which I had a proclamation against me of 300*l*., which my old friend, my lord Carteret, was forced to consent to the very first or second night of his arrival hither. The crime was that of writing against a project of one Wood, an ironmonger, to coin 100,000*l*. in halfpence not worth a sixth part of the money, which was laid before the people in so plain a manner that they all refused it: and so the nation was preserved from immediate ruin.

I have done some smaller services to this kingdom, but I can do no more. I have too many years upon me, and have too much sickness. I am out of favour at court, where I was well received, during two summers, six or seven years ago. The governing people here do not love me. For, as corrupt as England is, it is a habitation of saints in comparison of Ireland. We are sl——s and kn——s, and fools; and all, but bishops and people in employments, beggars. The cash of Ireland does not amount to 200,000*l*.: the few honest men among us are dead-hearted, poor, and out of favour and power.

I talked to two or three gentlemen of this house of commons now sitting here: and mentioning your scheme, showed how very advantageous it would be to Ireland. They agreed with me; but said that, if such a thing were proposed, the members would all go out, as at a thing they had no concern in.

I believe the people of Lapland or the Hottentots are not so miserable a people as we; for oppression, supported by power, will infallibly introduce slavish principles. I am afraid that, even in England, your proposal will come to nothing. There is not virtue enough left among mankind. If your scheme should pass into an act, it will become a job; your sanguine temper will cool: r——s will be the only gainers. Party and faction will intermingle and defeat the most essential parts of the whole design. Standing armies in times of peace, projects of excise, and bribing at elections, are all you are like to be employed in, not forgetting septennial parliaments, directly against the old Whig principles, which always have been mine.

A gentleman of this kingdom, about three years ago, joined with some others in a fishery here in the northern parts: they advanced 200*l*. by way of trial: they got men from Orkney to cure their fish, who understood it well. But the vulgar folks of Ireland are so lazy and so knavish that it turned to no account, nor would anybody join with them; and so the matter fell, and they lost two-thirds of their money. Oppressed beggars are always knaves; and I believe there hardly are any other among us. They had rather gain a shilling by knavery than five pounds by honest dealing. They lost 30,000*l*. a-year for ever in the time of the plague at Marseilles, when the Spaniards would have bought all their linen from Ireland, but the merchants and the weavers sent over such abominable linen that it was all returned back or sold for a fourth part of the value. This is our condition, which you may please to pity, but never can mend. I wish you good success with all my heart. I have always loved good projects, but have always found them to miscarry. I am, sir, with true esteem for your good intentions, your most obedient servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

P.S. If I can be of any service to you in this kingdom, I shall be glad you will employ me.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

April 12, 1734.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR,—I have received yours of the 16th of February very lately; but have not yet seen the person who brought it, nor am likely to see him, unless he finds me out in my retreat. Our friend Pope is in town, and to him I send this letter; for he tells me he can forward it to you by the hands of one of our common friends. If I can do Mr. Faulkner any service I shall certainly do it, because I shall catch at any opportunity of pleasing you; but my help in a project of subscription will, I fear, avail him little. I live much out of the world, and I do not blush to own that I am out of fashion in it. My wife, who is extremely obliged to you for your kind remembrance of her, and who desires me to say all the fond things from her to you which I know she thinks, enjoys a precarious health, easily shaken and sometimes interrupted by fits of severe pain, but upon the whole much better than it has been these five years. I walk down hill easily and leisurely enough, except when a strong disposition to the jaundice (that I have long carried about me) gives me a shove. I guard against it as well as I can; the censors say not as well as I might. Too sedentary a life hurts me, and yet I do not care to lead any other, for sauntering about my grounds is not exercise. I say I will be very active this summer, and I will try to keep my word. Riding is your panacea; and Bathurst is younger than his sons by observing the same regimen. If I can keep where I am a few years longer I shall be satisfied; for I have something, and not much, to do before I die. I know by experience one cannot serve the present age. About posterity one may flatter one's self, and I have a mind to write to the next age. You have seen, I doubt not, the ethic epistles, and though they go a little into metaphysics, I persuade myself you both understand and approve them; the first book being finished, the others will soon follow, for many of them are writ, or crayoned out. What are you doing?—Good, I am sure. But of what kind? Pray, Mr. Dean, be a little more cautious in your recommendations. I took care a year ago to remove some obstacles that might have hindered the success of one of your recommendations, and I have heartily repented of it since. The fellow wants morals, and, as I hear, decency sometimes. You have had accounts I presume which will not leave you at a loss to guess whom I mean. Is there no hope left of seeing you once more in this island? I often wish myself out of it, and I shall wish so much more if it is impossible de voisiner (I know no English word to say the same thing) with you. Adieu, dear sir; no man living preserves a higher esteem or a more warm and sincere friendship for you than I do.

FROM LORD CARTERET.

Jermyn street, April 13, 1734.

SIR,—I had the honour of your letter, which gave me a considerable pleasure to see that I am not so much out of your thoughts but that you can take notice of events that happen in my family. I need not say that these alliances* are very agreeable to me; but that they are so to my friends adds much to the satisfaction I receive from them. They certainly enable me to contract my desires, which is no inconsiderable step towards being happy. As to other things, I go on as well as I can; and now and then observe that I have more friends now than I had when I was in a situation to do them service. This may be a delusion; however, it is a pleasing one. And I have more reason to believe a man, now I can do him no good, than I had when I could do him favours, which the greatest philosophers are sometimes tempted to solicit their friends about. I shall continue to serve Mrs. Barber, by recommending her, as occasion shall offer, where it is necessary; but you have done that so effectually that nothing need be said to those to whom you have said anything in her behalf. I hope Dr. Delany is, as he always used to be, cheerful in himself and agreeable to all that know him, and that he by this time is convinced that the world is not worthy of so much speculation as he has bestowed upon some matters. Lady Worsley, my wife, and daughters, to whom I have shown your letter, not forgetting my mother, present their humble service to you. And I desire to recommend the whole family, as well as myself, to the continuance of your favour. I am, sir, with the greatest respect, your most humble and most obedient servant, CARTERET.

TO MISS HOADLY.

[Daughter of the archbishop of Dublin.]

June 4, 1734.

MADAM,—When I lived in England, once every year I issued out an edict, commanding that all ladies of wit sense, merit, and quality, who had an ambition to be acquainted with me, should make the first advances at their peril; which edict, you may believe, was universally obeyed. When (much against my will) I came to live in this kingdom, I published the same edict; only, the harvest here being not altogether so plentiful, I confined myself to a smaller compass. This made me often wonder how you came so long to neglect your duty; for, if you pretend ignorance, I may produce legal witnesses against you.

I have heard of a judge bribed with a pig, but it was discovered by the squeaking; and therefore, you have been so politic as to send me a dead one, which can tell no tales. Your present of butter was made with the same design, as a known court practice, to grease my fist that I might keep silence. These are great offences, contrived on purpose to corrupt my integrity. And besides, I apprehend, that if I should wait on you to return my thanks, you will deny that the pig and butter were any advances at all on your side, and give out that I made them first; by which I may endanger the fundamental privilege that I have kept so many years in two kingdoms, at least make it a point of controversy. However, I have two ways to be revenged; first, I will let all the ladies of my acquaintance know, that you, the sole daughter and child of his grace of Dublin, are so mean as to descend to understand housewifery; which every girl of this town, who can afford sixpence a-month for a chair would scorn to be thought to have the least knowledge in; and this will give you as ill a reputation as if you had been caught in the fact of reading a history, or handling a needle, or working in a field at Tallagh. My other revenge shall be this: when my lord's gentleman delivered his message, after I put him some questions, he drew out a paper containing your directions, and in your hand; I said it properly belonged to me; and when I had read it, I put it in my pocket, and am ready to swear, when lawfully called, that it is written in a fair hand, rightly spelt, and good plain sense. You now may see I have you at mercy; for, upon the least offence given, I will show the paper to every female scrawler I meet, who will soon spread about the town that your writing and spelling are ungenteel and unfashionable, more like a parson than a lady.

I suppose by this time you are willing to submit, and therefore I desire you may stint me to two china bowls of butter a-week; for my breakfast is that of a sickly man, rice gruel; and I am wholly a stranger to tea and coffee, the companions of bread and butter. I received my third bowl last night, and I think my second is almost entire. I hope and believe my lord archbishop will teach his neighbouring tenants and farmers a little English country management: and I lay it upon you, madam, to bring housewifery in fashion among our ladies; that, by your example, they may no longer pride themselves on their natural or affected ignorance. I am, with the truest respect and esteem, madam, your most obedient and obliged, &c., JONATHAN SWIFT.

I desire to present my most, &c., to his grace and the ladies.

FROM DR. JOHN STERNE, BISHOP OF CLOGHER

Clogher, June 25, 1734.

MR. DEAN,—I have a letter of yours of a very long date, and should, it may be, out of good manners, have answered it long since; but I thought it would be better to delay the answer I was then able to make, to our first private meeting, which I thought might be soon; and for the same reason that delayed me then, I shall put off my defence till I have the pleasure of half an hour's private conversation with you, when I think I shall be able to clear myself from the heavy charges you bring against me; and therefore, not to take any further notice of that letter, I shall, in answer to your last, which I received by last post, return you my thanks for your having taken the same care about the 60*l.*, which at your request I lent Joe Beaumont, whose circumstances at that time I was pretty much a stranger to, as you have taken about the money you lent him on the same occasion; and as this shall serve for a full discharge of all demands I have on Joe's execution,[a] so I shall take it as a favour if you will take on you the trouble of disposing of that sum of 50*l.* as an augmentation to your own charitable fund, or to any other charitable use you shall judge proper, and that I desire may be without any mention of my name.

* His lordship's third daughter, Georgina-Carolina, was married Feb. 14, 1734, to the honourable John Spencer.

If you desire an acquittance in any other form, be pleased to draw one and I will sign it. I shall be proud of a visit in this mountainous country, being, notwithstanding any coolness or misunderstanding that has happened between us, as much as ever, your affectionate friend and servant, JOHN CLOGHER.

FROM LORD BOLINGBROKE.

From my farm, June 27, 1734.

I THANK you, Mr. Dean; or, to use a name to me more sacred, I thank you, my friend, for your letter of the 23rd of May, which came to me by post. I answer it by the same conveyance; and provided the diligent inspection of private men's correspondence do not stop our letters, they have my leave to do, what they will do without it, to open and read them. If they expect to find anything which may do us hurt, or them good, their disappointment will give me pleasure, and in the proportion I shall imagine it gives them pain. I should have another pleasure, of higher relish, if our epistles were to be perused by persons of higher rank. And who knows, considering the mighty importance we are of, whether that may not happen? How would these persons stare to see such a thing as sincere cordial friendship subsist inviolate, and grow and strengthen from year to year, in spite of distance, absence, and mutual inutility.

But enough on this. Let us turn to other subjects. I have read in the golden verses of Pythagoras, or in some other collection of wise apophthegms of the ancients, that a man of business may talk of philosophy, —a man who has none may practise it. What do you think of this maxim? Is it exact? I have a strange distrust of maxims. We make as many observations as our time, our knowledge, and the other means we have give us the opportunity of making on a physical matter. We find that they all correspond, and that one general proposition may be affirmed as the result of them. This we affirm, and, in consequence, this becomes a maxim among our followers, if we have any. Thus the king of Siam affirmed, that water was always in a fluid state; and I doubt not but the Talapoins (do they not call them so?) held this maxim. Neither he nor they had ever climbed the neighbouring mountains of Ava: their observations were confined to the burning climate they inhabited. It is much the same in moral maxims, founded on observations of the conduct of men; for there are other moral maxims of universal truth, as there are moral duties of eternal obligation. We see what the conduct is, and we guess what the motives are, of great numbers of men; but then we see often at too great a distance, or through a faulty medium; we guess with much uncertainty from a thousand reasons concerning a thing as various, as changing, as inconsistent as the heart of man. And even when we see right, and guess right, we build our maxims on a small number of observations, (for such they are comparatively, how numerous soever they may be, taken by themselves,) which our own age and our own country chiefly have presented to us.

You and I have known one man in particular [the earl of Oxford], who affected business he often hindered, and never did; who had the honour among some, and the blame among others, of bringing about great revolutions in his own country, and in the general affairs of Europe; and who was, at the same time, the idlest creature living; who was never more copious than in expressing, when that was the theme of the day, his indifference to power, and his contempt of what we call honours, such as titles, ribbons, &c., who should, to have been consistent, have had this indifference, and have felt this contempt, since he knew neither how to use power nor how to wear honours, and yet who was jealous of one and fond of the other even to ridicule. This character seems singular enough, and yet I have known some resembling it very much in general, and many exactly like it, in the strongest marks it bore.

Now let us suppose that some Rochefoucault or other, some anthroponomical sage should discover a multitude of similar instances, and not stumble upon any one repugnant; you and I should not, however, receive for a maxim, that he who affects business never does it; nor this, that he who brings about great revolutions is always idle; nor this, that he who expresses indifference to power and contempt of honours is jealous of one and fond of the others.

Proceed we now, dear doctor, to the application. A man in business and a man who is out of it may equally talk of philosophy; that is certain. The question is, whether the man in business may not practise it as well as the man out of business? I think he may in this sense as easily; but sure I am he may in this sense as usefully. If we look into the world, our part of it I mean, we shall find, I believe, few philosophers in business or out of business. The greatest part of the men I have seen in business, perhaps all of them, have been so far from acting on philosophical principles, that is on principles of reason and virtue, that they have not acted even on the highest principles of vice. I have not known a man of real ambition; a man who sacrificed all his passions, or made them all subservient to that one; but I have known many whose vanity and whose avarice mimicked ambition. The greatest part of the men I have seen out of business have been so far from practising philosophy that they have lived in the world arrant triflers; or retiring from it, have fallen into stupid indolence, and deserved such an inscription as Seneca mentions, in one of his letters to Lucilius, to have been put over the door of one Vattia, "Hic situs est Vattia." But for all this I think that a man in business may practise philosophy as austerely to himself, and more beneficially to mankind, than a man out of it. The stoics were an affected, pedantical sect; but I have always approved that rule of the Portique, that a philosopher was not to exempt himself from the duties of society, neither in the community to which he particularly belonged, nor in the great community of mankind. Mencius and his master Confucius were strange metaphysicians, but they were good moralists, and they divided their doctrines into three parts; the duties of a man, as an individual, as a member of a family, and as a member of a state. In short, a man may be, many men have been, and some are, I believe, philosophers in business; he that can be so out of it can be so in it.

But it is impossible to talk so much of philosophy and forget to speak of Pope. He is actually rambling from one friend's house to another. He is now at Cirencester; he came thither from my lord Cobham's; he came to my lord Cobham's from Mr. Dormer's; to Mr. Dormer's from London; to London from Chiswick; to Chiswick from my farm; to my farm from his own garden; and he goes soon from lord Bathurst's to lord Peterborough's: after which he returns to my farm again. The demon of verse sticks close to him. He has been imitating the satire of Horace, which begins Ambubaiarum collegia pharmacopolæ, &c., and has chosen rather to weaken the images than to hurt chaste ears overmuch. He has sent it me; but I shall keep his secret as he desires, and shall not, I think, return him the copy; for the rogue has fixed a ridicule upon me, which some events of my life would seem perhaps to justify him in doing. I am glad you approve his moral essays. They will do more good than the sermons and writings of some who had a mind to find great fault with them. And if the doctrines taught, hinted at, and implied in them, and the trains of consequences deducible from these doctrines, were to be disputed in prose, I think he would have no reason to apprehend either the free-thinkers on one hand, or the narrow dogmatists on the other. Some few things may be expressed a little hardly, but none are, I believe, unintelligible. I will let him know your complaints of his silence; which I wonder at the more because he has often spoke in such a manner as made me conclude you heard from him pretty regularly. Your compliments shall be paid likewise to the other friends you mention.

You complain of the vast alteration which the last seven years have made in you; and do you believe, that they have not made proportionable alterations in us? Satisfy yourself they have. We all go the same road, and keep much the same stages. Let this consideration, therefore, not hinder you from coming among us. You shall ride, walk, trifle, meddle, chide, and be as ill-bred as you please; and the indulgence you receive on those heads you shall return on these or others. Adieu.

I will speak to you about books next time I write, if I can recollect what I intended to say upon a passage in your letter; or if anything else worth saying comes into my head. Adieu, my friend.

FROM THE EARL OF OXFORD.

Dover-street, August 8, 1734.

GOOD MR. DEAN,—It is now so long since I have troubled you with a letter that I am almost quite ashamed to do it now; but the truth of the case is this, I cannot be longer easy any further to defer my making my due acknowledgments to you in the best manner I can, for the many kind remembrances I have received from under your own hand, and your obliging notice of me in your letters to Mr. Pope, &c. It was an extreme great pleasure to me to find that I still maintained a share in your thoughts, that I was still worthy to receive your commands; I did my best, I did all that lay in my power to obey them; I wish there had been better success. I assure you this, that there is no person (I speak without excepting one) whose commands I would more readily obey than yours; I hope you will be so good as to indulge me, and make use of your power often: I value myself not a little upon this score, and you see here how easy it is for you to make one happy, which is more than can be said of ———.

I shall now take the liberty to talk to you a little upon family affairs; and my encouragement to do it proceeds from this, that ever since I have been so fortunate to be acquainted with you, you have in the kindest manner always taken part in whatever fortune befell me or my family.

Indulge, therefore, the fondness of a father to detain you so long as to give a sincere friend some account of the completing a great work, the disposal of an only daughter in marriage, and in these times.

The whole affair was conducted with as much care and consideration as we were capable of: when we looked over and weighed the many offers that had been proposed to us, and what sort of creatures they were composed of, this person we have now chosen had the fairest and most unexceptionable character, and as his composition is the most unlike the generality of the young gentlemen of this age, which you will think was no small ingredient toward our approbation of him. As I hope and long much to see you in England, I believe when you see the duke[a] you will be pleased with him, and you will not disapprove of our choice; as he is free from the prevailing qualifications of the present set of young people of quality, such as gaming, sharping, pilfering, lying, &c., &c., so, on the contrary, he is endowed with qualifications they are strangers to, such as justice, honour, excellent temper both of mind and body, affability, living well with his own family; and the manner in which he proposed himself was what became a gentleman and a man of honour. Thus you see I have given you a long account of this affair, and the reasons which induced us to consent to this match. I flatter myself that you will not be displeased with the account I have given you of the gentleman to whom we have given our daughter.

My wife and my daughter desire your acceptance of their humble service, with many wishes for the enjoyment of your health, and would be very glad to see you over here.

Mr. Pope has been upon the ramble above these two months: he is now with my lord Peterborough, near Southampton, where he proposes to stay some time. This morning died Willis, bishop of Winchester, and is to be succeeded by Hoadley, and further I cannot say.

Pray, has Mr. Jeb[b] got any preferment? I was very glad to hear that he had a share in your good opinion: I hope he has done nothing to forfeit it. What has prevented Mr. Faulkner from sending over your works?[c] he promised to send them over the end of last May at the furthest. I am, with true regard and esteem, sir, your most obliged and most faithful humble servant, OXFORD.

FROM LADY HOWTH.

Kilfane, near Kilkenny, August 15, 1734.

SIR,—To show you how much I covet your correspondence, I would not even give myself time to rest; for gratitude obliges me to return you thanks for all your favours, in particular your last, which quite cured me of my cold. I can as yet give you no account of this country, but that I have been mightily hurried, settling my little family. We all got safe here on Monday night; and this day was the fair of Bennett's bridge, where I had two gentlemen on purpose to look out for a pad for you, but there was not one to be got; but if there be any such thing to be had as a good trotter, such a one as I know you like, I will have it. I do not know whether you will be as free in writing as you are in speaking; but I am sure, were I at your elbow when you read this, you would bid me go to a writing-school and a spelling book. My lord joins me in begging you will accept of our best wishes, and hope you will believe me to be, what I really am, your affectionate friend and humble servant, LUCY HOWTH.

[a] William Bentinck, second duke of Portland.

[b] An English clergyman, who, soon after the date of this letter, got very good preferment in the church of Ireland. In the year 1768 he was prebendary of Christ-church, Dublin, and rector of St Thomas's in the East.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

August 16, 1734.

DEAR DEAN,—A little before I go to Dublin I intend to kill a buck, and send you some of it. Mr. Hamilton has promised me that favour. He has the best and fattest venison I ever tasted; and the finest boat, and the finest situation, and the finest house, and the finest hall, and the finest wife and children, and the finest way of living I ever met. You live in Dublin among a parcel of rabble; I live at Castle Hamilton among gentlemen and ladies; you live upon chaffed mutton, I live upon venison; you drink benicarlo wine, I drink right French margoset you hear nothing but noise, with ravishing music my ears are delighted. If you were here you would never go back again. I fancy that I never shall; and that I shall be able soon to keep my coach, and bring you down into this elysium, which is both my taste and my choice.

Pouvoir choisir, et choisir le meilleur, ce sont deux avantages qu'a le bon goût. C'est donc un des plus grands dons du ciel d'être né homme de bon choix. And to give you a sample of my good choice, I choose to end with this French maxim, having no more to write, but my love to my mistress and service to all friends. I am yours to the day of judgment,

THOMAS SHERIDAN.

TO THE DUKE OF CHANDOS.[a]

August 31, 1734.

MY LORD,—Although I have long had the honour to be an humble servant to your grace, yet I do not remember to have ever written you a letter, at least since her majesty's death. For this reason your grace will reasonably wonder to find a man wholly forgotten begin a commerce by making a request. For which I can offer no other excuse than that frequent application has been made to me by many learned and worthy persons of this city and kingdom, who, having heard that I was not unknown to you, seldom failed any opportunity of pressing me to solicit your grace, of whose generous nature fame has well informed them, to make a present of those ancient records, in paper or parchment, which relate to this kingdom, that were formerly collected, as we have heard, by the late earl of Clarendon, during his government here, and are now in your grace's possession. They can be of no use in England, and the sight of them will be of little value to foreign virtuosi; and they naturally belong to this poor kingdom. I could wish they were of great intrinsic value, so as to be sold on the Exchange for 1000*l.*, because you would then part with them at the first hint, merely to gratify your darling passion of generosity and munificence: and yet, since they are only valuable in the place of their birth, like the rest of our natives, I hope you will be prevailed on to part with them at the humble request of many very deserving persons in this city and university. In return for which bounty, the memory of it shall be preserved in that honourable manner which so generous a patron of learning as your grace will be certainly pleased with. And at their request alone I desire your compliance, without the least mention of myself as any way instrumental.

I entreat your grace's pardon for this interruption, and remain, with the greatest respect, my lord, your grace's, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] On this duke Swift wrote a severe epigram, beginning—"James Bridges and the dean at first were friends," &c.

FROM MRS. PENDARVES.

Little Brook street, September 9, 1734.

SIR,—I find your correspondence is like the singing of the nightingale; no bird sings so sweetly, but the pleasure is quickly past; a month or two of harmony, and then we lose it till next spring; I wish your favours may as certainly return. I am at this time not only deprived of your letters, but of all other means of inquiring after your health; your friends and my correspondents being dispersed to their summer quarters, and know as little of you as I do. I have not forgot one mortifying article on this occasion, and if your design in neglecting me was to humble me, it has taken effect; could I find out the means of being revenged I would most certainly put it in execution; but I have only the malice of an incensed neglected woman, without the power of returning it. The last letter I wrote to you was from Gloucester, about a twelvemonth ago; after that I went to Long-Leat, to my lady Weymouth; came to town in January, where I have remained ever since, except a few weeks I spent at sir John Stanley's, at Northend, the Delville of this part of the world. I hope Naboth's vineyard flourishes: it always has my good wishes, though I am not near enough to partake of its fruits. The town is now empty, and, by most people, called dull; to me it is just agreeable, for I have most of my particular friends in town, and my superfluous acquaintance I can very well spare. My lord Carteret is at Hawnes; my lady Carteret is in town, nursing my lady Dysart, who is brought to bed of a very fine son, and in hopes of my lady Weymouth's being soon under the same circumstance. I have not seen my lord Bathurst since I was at his house in Gloucestershire; that is a mischief I believe you have produced; for as long as I could entertain him with an account of his friend the dean, he was glad to see me; but lately we have been great strangers. Mrs. Donellan sometimes talks of making a winter's visit to Dublin, and has vanity enough to think you are one of those that will treat her kindly; her loss to me will be irreparable, beside the mortification it will be to me to have her go to a place where I should so gladly accompany her. I know she will be just, and tell the reasons why I could not this year take such a progress. After having forced myself into your company, it will be impertinent to make you a longer visit, and destroy the intention of it; which was only to assure you of my being, sir, your most faithful and obliged humble servant, M. PENDARVES.

FROM MR. POPE AND LORD BOLINGBROKE.

, September 15, 1734.

I HAVE ever thought you as sensible as any man I knew of all the delicacies of friendship; and yet I fear (from what lord B. tells me you said in your last letter) that you did not quite understand the reason of my late silence. I assure you it proceeded wholly from the tender kindness I bear you. When the heart is full it is angry at all words that cannot come up to it; and you are now the man in all the world I am most troubled to write to, for you are the friend I have left whom I am most grieved about. Death has not done worse to me in separating poor Gay, or any other, than disease and absence in dividing us. I am afraid to know how you do, since most accounts I have give me pain for you, and I am unwilling to tell you the condition of my own health. If it were good I would see you; and yet if I found you in that very condition of deafness which made you fly from us while we were together, what comfort could we derive from it? In writing often I should find great relief, could we write freely; and yet when I have done so you seem, by not answering in a very long time, to feel either the same uneasiness I do, or to abstain from some prudential reasons. Yet I am sure nothing that you and I would say to each other (though our whole souls were to be laid open to the clerks of the post-office) could hurt either of us so much, in the opinion of an honest man or good subject, as the intervening officious impertinence of those goers between us, who in England pretend to intimacies with you, and in Ireland to intimacies with me. I cannot but receive any that call upon me in your name, and in truth they take it in vain too often. I take all opportunities of justifying you against these friends, especially those who know all you think and write, and repeat your slighter verses It is generally on such little scraps that witlings feed; and it is hard the world should judge of our housekeeping from what we fling out to the dogs, yet this is often the consequence. But they treat you still worse, mix their own with yours, print them to get money, and lay them at your door. This I am satisfied was the case in the "Epistle to a Lady;" it was just the same hand (if I have any judgment in style) which printed your "Life and Character" before which you so strongly disavowed in your letters to lord Carteret, myself, and others. I was very well informed of another fact which convinced me yet more: the same person who gave this to be printed, offered to a bookseller a piece in prose of yours, as commissioned by you, which has since appeared and been owned to be his own. I think (I say once more) that I know your hand, though you did not mine in the "Essay on Man." I beg your pardon for not telling you, as I should had you been in England; but no secret can cross your Irish Sea, and every clerk in the post-office had known it. I fancy, though you lost sight of me in the first of those essays, you saw me in the second. The design of concealing myself was good, and had its full effect; I was thought a divine, a philosopher, and what not; and my doctrine had a sanction I could not have given to it. Whether I can proceed in the same grave march like Lucretius, or must descend to the gaieties of Horace, I know not, or whether I can do either; but be the future as it will, I shall collect all the past in one fair quarto this winter, and send it you, where you will find frequent mention of yourself. I was glad you suffered your writings to be collected more completely than hitherto, in the volumes I daily expect from Ireland; I wish it had been in more pomp, but that will be done by others; yours are beauties that can never be too finely dressed, for they will ever be young. I have only one piece of mercy to beg of you; do not laugh at my gravity, but permit me to wear the beard of a philosopher, till I pull it off and make a jest of it myself. It is just what my lord Bolingbroke is doing with metaphysics. I hope you will live to see and stare at the learned figure he will make on the same shelf with Locke and Malbranche.

You see how I talk to you (for this is not writing); if you like I should do so, why not tell me so? if it be the least pleasure to you, I will write once a-week most gladly; but can you abstract the letters from the person who writes them, so far as not to feel more vexation in the thought of our separation, and those misfortunes which occasion it, than satisfaction in the nothings he can express? If you can, really and from my heart I cannot. I return again to melancholy. Pray, however, tell me, is it a satisfaction? that will make it one to me; and we will think alike, as friends ought, and you shall hear from me punctually just when you will.

BY LORD BOLINGBROKE.

Our friend, who is just returned from a progress of three months, and is setting out in three days with me for the Bath, where he will stay till toward the middle of October, left this letter with me yesterday, and I cannot seal and despatch it till I have scribbled the remainder of this page full. He talks very pompously of my metaphysics, and places them in a very honourable station. It is true I have written six letters and a half to him on subjects of that kind, and I propose a letter and a half more, which would swell the whole up to a considerable volume. But he thinks me fonder of the name of an author than I am. When he and you, and one or two other friends have seen them, satis magnum theatrum mihi estis, I shall not have the itch of making them more public. I know how little regard you pay to writings of this kind; but I imagine that if you can like any such, it must be those that strip metaphysics of all their bombast, keep within the sight of every well-constituted eye, and never bewilder themselves while they pretend to guide the reason of others. I wrote to you a long letter some time ago, and sent it by the post. Did it come to your hands, or did the inspectors of private correspondence stop it, to revenge themselves of the ill said of them in it? Vale et me ama.

PICKLE-HERRING TO MR. FAULKNER.[a]

SIRRAH,[b]—Are not you the rascal that makes so free with my family? Had you once recollected that, graceless and despised as he is, that same serjeant Kite,[c] was my brother, and, however marred in the making, was born to be as great a man as myself; had you thought with what vengeance a man in my high station can espouse any one's quarrel, and especially that of a sinking brother, durst you presume to run these lengths? Mark what I am going to say; bitter is the sorrow, hot, sour, and cutting is the sauce you are to taste after your merry conceits on my poor brother; and what mortal can expect better that meddles with the very worst of the family of the Pickles. Recollect at last, and tremble! Whom hast thou offended and stirred up to wrath, thou little pitiful swad? More would I say to thee, but that I take thee right; I look upon thee only as the foul pipe through which the filth and nastiness of the whole nation is squirted in the teeth of my unfortunate brother, the unlucky graceless dog, that has brought all this on himself; but alas, my brother! But, however provoked, are your scribbling spitfires never to be satisfied? One should think that by this time, if the poor soul had not enough, they certainly had! Is it not sufficient for them to see a man of learning and law, a man of singular inimitable eloquence, a man of unparalleled graceful action, a man of unspeakable, inconceivable truth, justice, and sincerity, exemplary religion, strict virtue, nice honour, and sterling worth in general, past finding out? I say, is it not sufficient to see a luminary like this new shining in meridian lustre, but anon set for ever in a puddly cloud? Is it not sufficient to see him so unmasked and stigmatized that he can be no longer a tool even for a court a Indorsed by Dr. Swift, "An excellent droll paper"

b This humorous letter, although addressed to Mr Faulkner, was ultimately designed for the entertainment of Dr. Swift.

c Bettesworth, serjeant-at-law, whose character is well known for the assault he made upon Dr. Swift in the year 1733, was frequently persecuted by the young poets under the name of serjeant Kite.

sharper, and (what's worst of all for him) no longer to be in pay with them? Is it not sufficient to see his poor skull (God help it) incurably bumped and bulged by that damnable bounce of his against the pulpit cornish? Is it not sufficient to see with what pain and shame he wriggles along by that confounded splinter of the bar he lately got thrust into his ——, and which has left him a running sore to his dying day? Is it not sufficient to see him, all the last term, walk about in merry sadness, an idle spectator in the courts, where he was not retained even for his most noted talent of dirt-flinger? O you swarms of green counsels and attorneys! I wonder not to see you posted about Idler's Corner[a] looking sharp as dinnerless men for a lucky pop on a client; but why, oh! why should this ever be the case of my hapless brother? O fortune! fortune! cruel are thy sports! Is it not sufficient to see him doubly tormented in putting a good countenance on treatment which is inwardly gnawing and consuming him? in which state his whole comfort is, that for half a score years at least his conscience could never upbraid him: O the comfort of an easy conscience! Is it not sufficient to see him at Ballyspellin, and everywhere he goes, the common butt of gibe, wink, and titter? Is it not sufficient that, after what has been flying about since he left it, he knows not how to show his face in town, nor how to stand the infinite mortifications he is to meet with this winter? Is it not sufficient that, as his case stands, it is the serjeant against all the world, and all the world against the serjeant? Wretched case, when a creature has not even the cheap relief of common pity! And is not all this sufficient? No, the virulent crew tell me that, as long as the terrible tumour in his breast continues hard, the caustic and corrosives must be applied, and that none but injudicious quacks would talk of emollients and lenitives, until some at least of the corrupt and fœtid matter is discharged. In short, they tell me that as long as the cause remains, and the world likes the operations, the cure must go on the same way! Well, go on, ye scoundrels, go on! and make him as wretched and contemptible as you can; and when you have done your worst, I will make a provision for him that shall alarm you all; shall make some burst with envy, and others to look on him with a merry face, whom they so long beheld with hatred and derision.

To keep neither him nor the world longer in suspense, know ye that I will take him home to myself, and after a little of my tutoring, not a turn in his intellects, expression, or action, (which now are subject of satire,) that shall not soon become matter of high panegyric. O ye dogs you, I will set him over all your heads! I will advance him to a place of performance which he was born for, and which (however he thought of it all the while) he was not ill bred to; and there he is sure to meet with the honour and applause he might in vain expect on any other stage.

As for your part, little pert whipper-snapper Faulkner, is it base fear, or is it insufferable vanity in you to talk of correction from the hands of my brother? Had you been anything above the sorry remnant of a man, you might perhaps come in for the honour of a gentle drubbing; but a little rascal that has already one leg in the grave, what satisfaction or credit would it be to him to beat thee abominably, or even slay thee outright? No, but, sirrah, if our brother doctor Anthony[b] were alive, rot you, in spite of your rascally Keven-bail,[a] and your scribbling janissaries he should set up his wheel just before your door, and on his pole, thrust up your fundament, he should twirl you about till your brains tumbled down into the hollow of your wooden shin-bone, and till all the bones in your skin rattled and snapped like pease-poppers in a bladder. Take that from your sworn and mortal enemy,

PICKLE-HERRING.

FROM DR. ARBUTHNOT.

Hampstead, October 4, 1734.

MY DEAR AND WORTHY FRIEND,—You have no reason to put me among the rest of your forgetful friends; for I wrote two long letters to you, to which I never received one word of answer. The first was about your health; the last I sent a great while ago by one De la Mar. I can assure you with great truth that none of your friends or acquaintance has a more warm heart toward you than myself. I am going out of this troublesome world; and you among the rest of my friends shall have my last prayers and good wishes.

The young man whom you recommended came to this place, and I promised to do him what service my ill state of health would permit. I came out to this place so reduced by a dropsy and an asthma that I could neither sleep, breathe, eat, nor move. I most earnestly desired and begged of God that he would take me. Contrary to my expectation, upon venturing to ride (which I had forborne for some years, because of bloody water) I recovered my strength to a pretty considerable degree, slept, and had my stomach again; but I expect the return of my symptoms upon my return to London, and the return of the winter. I am not in circumstances to live an idle country life; and no man at my age ever recovered of such a disease further than by an abatement of the symptoms. What I did I can assure you was not for life but ease. For I am at present in the case of a man that was almost in harbour, and then blown back to sea; who has a reasonable hope of going to a good place, and an absolute certainty of leaving a very bad one. Not that I have any particular disgust at the world; for I have as great comfort in my own family, and from the kindness of my friends, as any man; but the world, in the main, displeases me; and I have too true a presentiment of calamities that are likely to befall my country. However, if I should have the happiness to see you before I die, you will find that I enjoy the comforts of life with my usual cheerfulness. I cannot imagine why you are frighted from a journey to England. The reasons you assign are not sufficient; the journey I am sure would do you good. In general I recommend riding, of which I have always had a good opinion, and can now confirm it from my own experience.

My family give you their love and service. The great loss I sustained in one of them gave me my first shock; and the trouble I have with the rest to bring them to a right temper, to bear the loss of a father who loves them, and whom they love, is really a most sensible affliction to me. I am afraid, my dear friend, we shall never see one another more in this world. I shall, to the last moment,[b] preserve my love and esteem for you, being well assured you will never leave the paths of virtue and honour; for all that is in this world is not worth the least deviation from that way. It will be great pleasure to me to hear from you sometimes; for none can be with more sincerity than I am, my dear friend, your most faithful friend and humble servant,

JO. ARBUTHNOT.

FROM SIR WILLIAM FOWNES.*

From my Observatory in the Parliament-house, October 18, 1734.

SIR,—There are a sort of gentlemen, who, after great labour and cost, have at last found out that two dishes of meat will not cost half so much as five or six, and yet answer the end of filling the bellies of as many as usually fed upon the five or six.

I have considered that a like sort of reduction in other articles may have the like proportion of good effect; as for instance, when any one bespeaks a pair of shoes, a pair of stockings, or a pair of gloves, they should bespeak a pair and a half of each, and make use of these turn about: I am very confident they will answer the end of two pair; by which good management a quarter part of the expense in those article may be saved. Perhaps it may be objected, that this is a spoiling of trade; to which I answer, that when the makers of those sorts of ware shall reduce their rates a quarter part, (instead of enhancing them as has been done in some late years unreasonably,) and now ought to be reduced according to the rates of wool and leather;

Then it may be reasonable to bespeak two pair instead of a pair and a half.

Another objection may be started as to gloves, with a query, Which of the hands shall be obliged with two gloves? To this I answer, That generally the left hand is used but seldom, and not exposed as the other to many offices; one of which in particular is the handling of ladies. For these reasons two gloves ought to be granted to the right hand.

There are many other frugal improvements, which, as soon as I have discoursed Thomas Turner, the Quaker, who is now upon finding out the longitude, and further improving the latitude, I shall be able to demonstrate what sort of meat, and the joints, will best answer this frugal scheme, as likewise in clothing and other parts of good economy; and they shall be communicated to you by, sir, your most humble servant,

PHILO MÆ.

TO MR. POPE.

November 1, 1734.

I HAVE yours with my lord Bolingbroke's postscript of September 15; it was long on its way, and for some weeks after the date I was very ill with my two inveterate disorders, giddiness and deafness. The latter is pretty well off, but the other makes me totter towards evenings, and much dispirits me. But I continue to ride and walk, both of which, although they be no cures, are at least amusements. I did never imagine you to be either inconstant, or to want right notions of friendship, but I apprehend your want of health; and it has been a frequent wonder to me how you have been able to entertain the world so long, so frequently, so happily, under so many bodily disorders. My lord Bolingbroke says you have been three months rambling, which is the best thing you can possibly do in a summer season; and when the winter recalls you, we will for our own interest leave you to your own speculations. God be thanked, I have done with everything and of every kind that requires writing, except now and then a letter; or, like a true old man, scribbling trifles only fit for children, or schoolboys of the lowest class at best, which three or four of us read and laugh at to-day, and burn to-morrow. Yet what is singular, I never am without some great work in view, enough to take up forty years of the most vigorous, healthy man: although I am convinced that I shall never be able to finish three treatises that have lain by me several years, and want nothing but correction. My lord B. said in his postscript that you would go to Bath in three days; we since heard that you were dangerously ill there, and that the newsmongers gave you over. But a gentleman of this kingdom, on his return from Bath, assured me he left you well, and so did some others whom I have forgot. I am sorry at my heart that you are pestered with people who come in my name, and I profess to you it is without my knowledge. I am confident I shall hardly ever have occasion again to recommend; for my friends here are very few, and fixed to the freehold, from whence nothing but death will remove them. Surely I never doubted about your "Essay on Man:" and I would lay any odds that I would never fail to discover you in six lines, unless you had a mind to write below or beside yourself on purpose. I confess I did never imagine you were so deep in morals, or that so many new and excellent rules could be produced so advantageously and agreeably in that science from any one head. I confess in some few places I was forced to read twice; I believe I told you before what the duke of Dorset said to me on that occasion, how a judge here who knows you, told him that, on the first reading those essays, he was much pleased, but found some lines a little dark; on the second, most of them cleared up, and his pleasure increased; on the third, he had no doubt remained, and then he admired the whole. My lord Bolingbroke's attempt of reducing metaphysics to intelligible sense and usefulness will be a glorious undertaking; and as I never knew him fail in anything he attempted, if he had the sole management, so I am confident he will succeed in this. I desire you will allow that I write to you both at present, and so I shall while I live; it saves your money and my time; and he being your genius, no matter to which it is addressed. I am happy that what you write is printed in large letters, otherwise, between the weakness of my eyes and the thickness of my hearing I should lose the greatest pleasure that is left me. Pray command my lord Bolingbroke to follow that example, if I live to read his metaphysics. Pray God bless you both. I had a melancholy account from the doctor of his health. I will answer his letter as soon as I can. I am ever entirely yours,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE REV. MARMADUKE PHILIPS.

Marston, in Somersetshire, November 2, 1734.

SIR,—You may be assured that I should not have denied myself so long the pleasure of that great privilege and favour you allowed me at our parting, of corresponding with you while I staid in England, but that I waited to give you some account of the success of your kind and friendly negotiation for me in the letter you were so good to give me to lord Orrery, and that I could not do before this week; for though I delivered my credentials to his lordship near a month ago, yet we did not talk over the affair till very lately; for as I thought it my duty to wait his time and leisure, I did not press him for an answer; and as I have all the reason in the world to imagine, from the many friendly offices you have done me, that you would rejoice at any good that may befall me, so I can at length tell you that it was as favourable as I could well wish for, considering every thing and circumstance attending that affair; for it seems the scheme in relation to Mr. Taylor's giving my mother and me so much money for our good-will in the lease can never take place, for many very good reasons his lordship gave me, which are too tedious now to trouble you with; and therefore he only told me in general terms that, as he thought our case a little hard and severe, somewhat or other at the expiration of the lease must be done for me, but in what manner it was not possible for him to say; which surely was as much as any conscionable and reasonable man (and God forbid that I should ever prove otherwise) could expect; in short, his kind reception of me at Marston, and the handsome manner he has behaved himself toward me in every particular since I came to him, has been like lord Orrery himself; and now to whom must I attribute all this? not to any merit or conduct of my own, for I am conscious of none, but to the worthy dean of St. Patrick's, who takes delight in doing all the good he can to those who have the invaluable happiness and honour of being acquainted with him; and therefore what a monster of ingratitude should I be not to acknowledge the channel through which this intended bounty of his lordship is to flow to me, let it be more or less? Agnosco fontem; for without controversy, you have been the means of bringing all this about; for which I shall say no more being but bitter bad at making speeches) but the Lord reward you, and to assure you good sir that this your act of friendship manet et manebit alta mente repostum. His lordship told me that he would answer your letter very soon; and as his pen and head infinitely transcend mine, it is likely you will have then a clearer and better account of this matter than I can possibly give you.

I have been under an unspeakable concern at an account I lately saw from Ireland of a return of your old disorders of giddiness and deafness; but I still flatter myself that it is not so bad with you as my fears have represented it, which makes me long impatiently to hear how you really are; but I am in hopes your usual medicina gymnastica will carry it off; if it does not, more the pity say I, and so will all say, I am confident, that know you; but surely ten thousand times more pity is it that you are not like one of Gulliver's Struldbrugs, immortal; but alas! that cannot be, such is the condition of miserable man; which puts me often in mind of the following lines I have somewhere or other met with, which I apply now and then to myself, by way of cordial:—

What's past we know, and what's to come must be,
Or good or bad, is much the same to me;
Since death must end my joy or misery,
Fix'd be my thoughts on immortality.

But hold! I believe I begin to preach; and it is well if you do not think by this time that I imagine myself in Rathenny[a] pulpit instead of writing a letter to the dean, and therefore I forbear.

I know writing in your present circumstances must be so very troublesome and uneasy to you that I am not quite so unreasonable as to expect it from you; but whenever your health permits you, it will be an infinite pleasure and satisfaction to me to hear from you; and the safest way of sending a letter to me will be under cover to lord Orrery, at Marston, near Frome, in Somersetshire. I shall trouble you, sir, with my compliments to my very good friends and neighbours, lady Acheson and her mother, for whom I have a very real esteem and value, and also to Dr. Helsham and his lady, and with my very affectionate love and service to all my Sunday companions at the deanery.[b]

I have no novelties to entertain you with from hence: for here we lead a very retired and perfectly rural life; but when I get to London (which I believe will not be till after Christmas, because, as I am within ten or a dozen miles of Bath, I have some thoughts of making a trip thither, and try what good those waters will do me), you may depend upon having an account of what passes in the political and learned world that is possible for me to come at and convey to you, and I hope to be then honoured with all your commissions and commands in that place; for I wish for nothing more than an opportunity of showing with how much gratitude and true esteem for all your favours, I am, sir, your most obedient and much obliged humble servant,

MARMADUKE PHILIPS.

I have seen your friend Mrs. Cope at Bath, and she desired me to send her compliments to you.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

London, November 7, 1734.

Do not accuse me of forsaking you: indeed it is not the least in my thoughts; but I heard you were ill, and had no letter from you, so doubted being troublesome. I was about two months ago at my own house, and had my duke and duchess with me. The rest of my time was divided between lord president [Spencer] and Knowle. I have now left their graces in the country, where I hope they will not stay long; for she has been very ill, though now recovered.

I am always more frighted when my friends are sick there, because there is neither physic nor physician that is good for anything. Indeed I cannot answer whether your lord-lieutenant will be the same or not. All that I can say is, that if he asks my consent for it he shall not have it. I have no acquaintance with the duke of Chandos, nor I believe has the duke of Dorset much. And to be sure it would be to no purpose to ask him for those records[a] again, because, if he would have parted with them, he would have done it on your asking. And whether it be useful or not, just to him, yet few people would care to part with what must enhance the value of their libraries; but if he succeeds the duke of Dorset, then for certain he will be easily persuaded to make a compliment of them to the kingdom. Your friend Dr. Arbuthnot, I hear, is out of order again. I have not seen him lately, and I fear he is in a very declining way. I fancy it would be prodigiously good for your health to come to England, which would be a great pleasure to your most sincere old friend and humble servant,

E. GERMAIN.

FROM MRS. PENDARVES.

Gloucester, November 20, 1734.

SIR,—I am truly concerned at your having been so much out of order; I most heartily wish you constant health and happiness, though that is of little use to you, and only serves to do honour to myself, by showing I know how to prize what is valuable.

I should have returned you thanks much sooner for the favour of your last letter, but when I received it I was preparing for my journey hither, and have ever since had so great a disorder in one of my eyes, that till this moment I have not been able to make my acknowledgments to you. I wonder you should be at a loss for a reason for my writing to you: we all love honour and pleasure; were your letters dull, do you imagine my vanity would not be fond of corresponding with the dean of St. Patrick's? But the last reason you give I like best, and will stick by, which is, that

b It was customary for the doctor's friends and acquaintances to visit him on Sunday afternoons, and spend the evening with him; so that every one who was at leisure to go there was sure of meeting variety of good company.

a These records were manuscripts relating to the history of Ireland, which had been collected by sir James Ware (who was recorder of Dublin) before, after, and during the troubles of 1641. When lord Clarendon was lord-lieutenant, in 1686, he got these manuscripts from the heir of sir James, and brought them into England. After lord Clarendon's death they were sold to the hon. Mr. Brydges, afterwards duke of Chandos. The catalogue of them was printed in 1697, in the large folio catalogue of all the libraries both in England and Ireland, and the dean having read that account of them, was very desirous to procure them for public use. See a letter written by the dean to the duke of Chandos, dated August 31, 1734, soliciting his grace to present them to the public library at Dublin, in this volume.

I am a more constant nymph than all your goddesses of much longer acquaintance; and furthermore, I venture to promise you are in no danger of receiving a boutade, if that depends on my will. As for those fasting days you talk of[a] they are, I confess, alluring baits, and I should certainly have been with you in three packets, according to your commands, could I either fly or swim; but I am a heavy lump, destined for a few years to this earthly element, and cannot move about without the concurrent assistance of several animals that are very expensive.

Now for business: as soon as I received your letter I went to your brother Lansdown, and spoke to him about the duke of Chandos. He desired me to make his compliments to you, and to tell you he was very sorry he could be of no service to you in that affair; but he has had no manner of correspondence or even acquaintance with the duke these fifteen years. I have put it, however, into hands that will pursue it diligently, and I hope obtain for you what you desire; if they do not succeed you must not call me negligent; for whatever lies in my power to serve you, is of too much consequence for me to neglect.

I have left my good friend and your humble servant, Mrs. Donellan, behind me in London, where she meets with little entertainment suitable to her understanding; and she is a much fitter companion for the Dublin Thursday Society than for the trifling company she is now engaged in; and I wish you had her with you (since I cannot have her), because I know she would be happier than where she is, and my wish I think no bad one for you. Neither my eyes nor paper will hold out any longer. I beg my compliments to all your friends, and am, sir, your most faithful humble servant, M. PENDARVES.

FROM MR. JARVIS[b]

Hampton, November 24, 1734.

DEAR MR. DEAN,—You can hardly imagine how rejoiced I am at finding my old friend the bishop of Worcester[c] so hale at 83-4! No complaint; he does but begin to stoop, and I am forced myself, every now and then, to awaken myself to walk tolerably upright, famous as I was lately for a wight of uncommon vigour, and consequently spirits to spare. If ever I see Dublin again, and your Teague escapes hanging so long, I will myself truss him up for non-admittance when you were in a conversable condition. I am sure the lady will send you Mr. Conolly's[d] picture with pleasure, when I tell her you expect it. Our friend Pope is off and on, here and there, everywhere and nowhere, à son ordinaire, and therefore as well as we can hope for a carcase so crazy. He assures me he has done his duty in writing frequently to the dean, because he is sure it gives you some amusement, as he is rejoiced at all yours; therefore you must write away. Upon inquiry, I learn that exercise is the best medicine for your giddiness. Penny made Mrs. Pendarves happy with a print of yours, and I do not fail to distribute them to all your well-wishers. I am, dear dean, yours most affectionately,

CHARLES JARVIS.

I held out bravely the three weeks' fogs, &c., and am very well.

FROM MR. POPE.

Twickenham, December 19, 1734.

I AM truly sorry for any complaint you have, and it is in regard to the weakness of your eyes that I write (as well as print) in folio. You will think (I know you will, for you have all the candour of a good understanding) that the thing which men of our age feel the most is the friendship of our equals; and that therefore whatever affects those who are stept a few years before us, cannot but sensibly affect us who are to follow. It troubles me to hear you complain of your memory, and if I am in any part of my constitution younger than you, it will be in my remembering everything that has pleased me in you, longer than perhaps you will. The two summers we passed together dwell always on my mind, like a vision which gave me a glimpse of a better life, and better company, than this world otherwise afforded. I am now an invidual upon whom no other depends; and may go where I will if the wretched carcase I am annexed to did not hinder me. I rambled, by very easy journeys, this year to lord Bathurst and lord Peterborough, who upon every occasion commemorate, love, and wish for you. I now pass my days between Dawley, London, and this place; not studious nor idle; rather polishing old works than hewing out new. I redeem now and then a paper that has been abandoned several years; and of this sort you will see one which I inscribe to our old friend Arbuthnot.

Thus far I had written, and thinking to finish my letter the same evening, was prevented by company, and the next morning found myself in a fever, highly disordered, and so continued in bed for five days, and in my chamber till now; but so well recovered as to hope to go abroad to-morrow, even by the advice of Dr. Arbuthnot. He himself, poor man, is much broke, though not worse than for these two last months he has been. He took extremely kind your letter. I wish to God we could once meet again, before that separation which yet I would be glad to believe shall reunite us; but he who made us, not for ours, but his purposes, knows only whether it be for the better or the worse that the affections of this life should or should not continue into the other: and doubtless it is as it should be. Yet I am sure that while I am here, and the thing that I am, I shall be imperfect without the communication of such friends as you; you are to me like a limb lost and buried in another country; though we seem quite divided, every accident makes me feel you were once a part of me. I always consider you so much as a friend, that I forget you are an author, perhaps too much; but it is as much as I would desire you would do to me. However, if I could inspirit you to bestow correction upon those three treatises which you say are so near completed, I should think it a better work than any I can pretend to of my own. I am almost at the end of my morals, as I have been long ago of my wit; my system is a short one, and my circle narrow. Imagination has no limits, and that is a sphere in which you may move on to eternity; but where one is confined to truth (or to speak more like a human creature, to the appearances of truth), we soon find the shortness of our tether. Indeed, by the help of a metaphysical chain of ideas, one may extend the circulation, go round and round for ever, without making any progress beyond the point to which Providence has pinned us; but this does not satisfy me, who would rather say a little to no purpose than a great deal. Lord Bolingbroke is voluminous, but he is voluminous only to destroy volumes. I shall not live, I fear, to see that work printed; he is so taken up still (in spite of the monitory hint given in the first line of my Essay,— a That is, dining upon two or three dishes at the deanery; which, in comparison of magnificent tables, the doctor used to call fasting.

b A celebrated painter, contemporary with sir Godfrey Kneller.

c Dr. John Hough, bishop of Worcester.

d Speaker of the house of commons, one of the lords-justices, and a commissioner of the revenue in Ireland.

"Awake, my St. John, leave all meaner things To low ambition and the pride of kings),"

with particular men, that he neglects mankind, and is still a creature of this world, not of the universe: this world, which is a name we give to Europe, to England, to Ireland, to London, to Dublin, to the court, to the castle, and so diminishing till it comes to our own affairs, and our own persons. When you write (either to him or to me, for we accept it all as one), rebuke him for it, as a divine if you like it, or as a badineur, if you think that more effectual.

What I write will show you that my head is yet weak. I had written to you by that gentleman from the Bath, but I did not know him, and everybody that comes from Ireland pretends to be a friend of the dean's. I am always glad to see any that are truly so, and therefore do not mistake anything I said so as to discourage your sending any such to me. Adieu.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

December 25, 1734.

Dear Sir,—Mr. R. Hamilton is glad the venison got safe to you; it was carried by a county Cavan man in the 75th year of his age, who went off on Wednesday morning, was back with us on Saturday night, in all 101 miles. He was much affronted that a young fellow was proposed for the expedition——There's a county Cavan man for you!

As for myself, I am grown thirty years younger, by no other method than eating, drinking and breathing freely in this Elysium of the universe. Happy will it be for you (if I misjudge not, and very seldom I do, as you yourself, can witness, who have known me above sixteen years, and I believe a little more, if my memory fails me not, as I have no reason to think it does; for I do not find it in the least impaired) to convey yourself into the finest apartment of our Elysium, I mean to Castle Hamilton, where you will find a most hearty welcome, and all the delights this world can give——But you must take me along with you.

Nothing could give me greater pleasure than to hear that your innocent subjects of the Kevin-Bayl[a] escaped the gallows, in spite of Bettisworth[b] and all his add hay rents——If he were to make them a holiday, it should make one for me and my boys likewise.

Sunday we had a very hard frost—yesterday morning fair—the afternoon, all night, and this morning to ten, was rain—now fair again, but lowering.

We are just now going to dinner at captain Perrott's, where your health is never omitted, both as dean and drapier. I forgot to tell you that there is a drapier's club fixed in Cavan of about thirty good fighting fellows; from whence I remark you have the heart of Ireland." Vid. Grierson's new map.—There is another Cavan Bayl for you.[c]

I have no more to trouble you with, but my good wishes for your long health and happiness. I am, dear sir, your most obedient humble servant,

Thomas Sheridan.

If you go out of town before I return, leave the key of your strong-box with Jane, that I may put my money among yours.

[a] Dr Swift used to call the people who lived in the liberty of St Patrick's his subjects: and without doubt they would have fought up to their knees in blood for him; so much was he beloved.

[b] The right spelling of this name is Betteswörth, constantly pronounced as a word of two syllables, until some poems had come out against him, and then Mr. Bettesworth affected to pronounce it as three syllables, to which this spelling by Dr. Sheridan alludes.

[c] Alluding to the inhabitants of the liberty of St. Patrick's having formed themselves into a body-guard for Swift, upon Bettesworth's threatening personal violence against him.

TO MRS DINGLEY.

December 28, 1734.

Pray God bless you, and restore your health, and give you many happy new years. I send you your usual Christmas-box. I will see you as soon as I can, I am tolerably well, but have no security to continue so. We must all submit, both by piety and necessity. I am ever entirely yours. I send you two bottles of wine.[a]

Jonathan Swift.

TO THE DUKE OF DORSET.

January 14, 1735.

My Lord,—I am assured that your grace will have several representations of an affair relating to the university here from some very considerable persons in this kingdom. However, I could not refuse the application made me by a very worthy person of that society who was commissioned by some principal members of the body to desire my good offices to your grace; because they believed you thought me an honest man, and because I had the honour to be known to you from your early youth. The matter of their request related wholly to a dreadful apprehension they lie under of Dr. [John] Whetcombe's endeavour to procure a dispensation for holding his fellowship along with that church preferment bestowed on him by your grace.[b] The person sent to me on this message gave me a written paper containing the reasons why they hope your grace will not be prevailed upon to grant such a dispensation. I presume to send you an abstract of these reasons; because I may boldly assure your grace that party or faction have not the least concern in the whole affair; and as to myself, it happens that I am an entire stranger to Dr. Whetcombe.

It is alleged "That this preferment given to the doctor consists of a very large parish, worth near 600*l.* a-year, in a very fine country thirty miles from Dublin; that it abounds very much with papists, and consequently a most important cure, requiring the rector's residence, beside some other assistant; which being so rich, it might well afford.

"That as to such dispensations, they find in their college books but three or four instances since the revolution, and these in cases very different from the present: for those few livings which had dispensations to be held with a fellowship were sinecures of small value, not sufficient to induce a fellow to leave his college; and in the body of those dispensations is inserted a reason for granting them. That they were such livings as could be no hinderance in the discharge of a fellow's duty.

"That dispensations are very hurtful to their society; because they put a stop to the succession of

[a] It was known by an accident, after Dr. Swift's memory failed, that he allowed an annuity of 52*l* to Mrs Dingley; but instead of doing this with the pride of a benefactor, or gratifying his pride by making her feel her dependence, he always pretended that he acted as her agent, and that the money he paid her was the produce of a certain sum which she had in the funds; and the better to save appearances, he always took her receipt, and sometimes would pretend with great seeming vexation, that she drew upon him before he had received her money from London. However, he was punctual in paying it quarterly. He used to write the receipt himself in the following form every quarter-day, and sent it to be signed by the messenger who carried the money:—

July 25th, 1737.

"Received from Dr. Swift, dean of St. Patrick's, the sum of 13*l.* sterling, in full for one quarter's rent of payments out of funds in England, by advance of what will be due to me at Michaelmas next, in this year 1737; the said dean always paying me one quarter by advance. I say, received by me, Re. Dingley.

Mrs. Dingley died before her benefactor in July, 1743.

[b] He had a higher preferment Dec. 23 following, being raised to the united sees of Clonfert and Kilmarduagh. He was translated to the archbishopric of Cashel, Aug. 25, 1752; and died in 1754.

fellowships, and thereby give a check to that emulation, industry, and improvement in learning which the hopes of gaining a fellowship will best incite young students with.

"That, if this dispensation should take place, it may prove a precedent for the like practice in future times; which will be very injurious to the society, by encouraging fellows to apply for dispensations when they have interest enough to get preferments, by which the senior fellows will be settled in the college for life; and thus, for want of a succession any other way than by death or marriage, all encouragement to young diligent students will be wholly lost.

"That a junior fellowship is of very small value, and to arrive at it requires good sense as well as long and close study; to which young students are only encouraged by hopes of succeeding, in a reasonable time, to be one of the seven seniors, which hopes will be quite cut off when those seniors are perpetuated by dispensations.

"That the fellows at their admittance into their fellowships take a solemn oath never to accept of any church preferment above a certain value, and distance from Dublin, as long as they continue fellows; to which oath the accepting of a dispensation by Dr. Whetcombe is directly contrary, in both particulars of value and distance.

"That at this time there is a set of very hopeful young men, in long and close study, to stand for the first vacant fellowship, who will be altogether discouraged and drop their endeavours in the pursuit of learning, by being disappointed in their hopes of Dr. Whetcombe's leaving the college, and opening a way for one of them to succeed in a fellowship."

These, my lord, are the sum of the reasons brought me by a very worthy person, a fellow of that college, and recommended by some of the most deserving in that body; and I have shortened them as much as I could.

I shall only trouble your grace with one or two of my own remarks upon this subject.

The university, and in some sense the whole kingdom, are full of acknowledgment for the honour your grace has done them, in trusting the care of one of your sons[b] to be educated in the college of Dublin, which hopes to be always in your grace's favour: and by your influence, while you govern here, as well as the credit you will always deserve at court, will ever desire to be protected in their rights.

Your grace will please to know, that a fellowship in this university differs much, in some very important circumstances, from most of those in either of the universities in England.

My lord George will tell your grace, that a fellowship is here obtained with great difficulty by the number of candidates, the strict examination in many branches of learning, and the regularity of life and manners. It is also disposed of with much solemnity: the examiners take an oath at the altar, to give their vote according to their consciences.

The university is patron of some church preferments, which are offered to the several fellows downward to the lowest in holy orders.

I beg your grace to consider, that there being very little trade here, there is no encouragement for gentlemen to breed their sons to merchandise: that not many great employments, in church or law, fall to the share of persons born here: that the last resource of younger sons is to the church: where, if well befriended, they may chance to rise to some reasonable spiritual maintenance: although we do not want instances of some clergymen well born and of good reputation, who have been, and still are, curates for thirty years; which has been a great discouragement to others who have no other means left to provide for their children.

Your grace will not want opportunities, while you continue in this government, and by your most deserved favour with his majesty, to make Dr. Whetcombe easier in his preferment, by some addition that no person or society can have the least pretence to complain of. And I humbly beg your grace, out of the high veneration I bear to your person and virtues, that you will please to let Dr. Whetcombe content himself for a while with that rich preferment, (one of the best in the kingdom,) until it shall lie in your way further to promote him to his own content. If, upon his admittance to his fellowship, he took an oath never to accept a church living thus circumstantiated, and hold it with his fellowship, it will be thought hardly reconcilable to conscience to receive a dispensation.

I humbly entreat your grace to forgive this long trouble I have given you; wherein I have no sort of interest except that which proceeds from an earnest desire that your grace may continue, as you have begun from your youth, without incurring the least censure from the world, or giving the least cause of discontent to any deserving person. I am, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

b Lord George, his grace's third son. His lordship was under the tuition of Dr. Whetcombe and Mr. Molloy, the one a senior, the other a junior fellow of Trinity College, Dublin.

FROM MRS. DONNELLAN.

London, January 19, 1735.

SIR,—My brother tells me you are so good to inquire after me, and to speak in a very kind manner of me, which as it gives me the greatest pleasure, so it raises in me the highest gratitude. I find I have a great advantage in being very inconsiderable; I dare believe people sincere when they profess themselves my friends; I consider I am not a wit, a beauty, nor a fortune; then why should I be flattered? I have but two or three qualities that I value myself upon, and those are so much out of fashion that I make no parade of them; I am very sincere, I endeavour to be grateful, and I have just sense enough to discern superior merit, and to be delighted with the least approbation from it. My brother some time ago gave me hopes of receiving a letter from you; but he now tells me your ill state of health has made writing uneasy to you. I grieve much at my loss, but more at the occasion of it; and I write now only to return my best thanks for your good opinion and designs, not to solicit new favours, or give you the trouble of answering this. I hope next summer to be in Ireland, where I shall expect to receive your answer in person, when the sun, with its usual blessings, shall give us this additional one of restoring you to that state of health that all those who have the happiness of knowing you, either as a friend and companion, or lover of your country, must with the greatest earnestness desire. You will laugh perhaps, sir, at my saying I hope to see Ireland this year; indeed, the generality of our country folks who spend a little time here, and get into any tolerable acquaintance, seem to forget they have any other country till a knavish receiver or their breaking tenants put them in mind of it; but I assure you I have so little of the fine lady in me that I prefer a sociable evening in Dublin to all the diversions of London, and the conversation of an ingenious friend, though in a black gown, to all the powdered toupet at St. James's. What has kept me seven years in London is the duty I owe a very good mother of giving her my company since she desires it, and the conveniency I enjoy with her of a house, coach, and servants at my command. I suppose, sir, you know Mrs. Pendarves has been for some time at Gloucester; she has preferred a pious visit to a sick mother, in a dull country town, to London in its gayest dress; she tells me she designs next month to return to us; the only uneasiness I shall have in leaving London is the parting with so valuable and tender a friend; but as she promises me that if I stay in Ireland she will make it another visit, I think for the good of my country I must leave her. But while I am indulging myself in telling you my thoughts and designs, I should consider I am perhaps making you a troublesome or unseasonable visit; if so, use me as all impertinent things should be used; take no notice of me; all I designed in writing to you was to let you know the high sense I have of all your favours, and that I am, with the greatest gratitude and esteem, sir, your most obliged obedient humble servant,

H. DONNELLAN.

I beg you will be so good to give my best wishes and services to Dr. Delany and Dr. Helsham.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

February 13, 1735.

You are a fine gentleman indeed to teach his grace of Dorset such saucy words; and we have quarrelled so much about it that I do not know but I shall oblige him to meet me behind Montague-house. He says it is some time ago that he commanded me to write to you to assure you he thought himself very much obliged to you for your letter, and that he takes it as a proof of your friendship and good-will to him. So far I own is true; he did humbly beg the favour of me to write you this a great while ago; but I understood he had something else more to say, so delayed writing; and though I cannot but own I have seen him pretty often since, yet (at the times I could speak to him) my addle head constantly forgot to ask him what he had to say. So now he says he will do his own business and write to you soon himself.

The countess [of Suffolk] has quitted the court because, after a long illness at Bath, she did not meet with a reception that she liked; though her mistress appeared excessively concerned, and expressed great uneasiness at parting with her; and my opinion is that not only her master and mistress but her very enemies will have reason to repent the part they have acted by her.

Now I have answered all I can tell you that you want to know, I bid my dear dean adieu.

ROM THE EARL OF STRAFFORD.*

London, February 18, 1735.

SIR,—To honour, and esteem, and admire you is general to all that know or have heard of you; but to be pleased with your commands, and glad and diligent to obey them is peculiar to your true friends, of which number I am very desirous to be reckoned. On receiving your letter by Mr. Skerret, I immediately undertook to do him the best service I could, and thought myself happy in having advanced his affair so far as to get his petition to the house of lords read and agreed to, and a peremptory day agreed to for his being (as this day) heard ex parte if the other party did not put in their answer before. I likewise got several lords to attend; but on printing his case, our new lord-chancellor [Talbot] (who at present has a great sway in the house) found out that the petition I had presented for Mr. Skerret had not fully explained matters to the house; because, upon comparing dates, the petition of appeal last year was presented late in the sessions; and that though there was then an order for the respondents to put in their answer in five weeks (the usual time for causes in Ireland) yet the parliament did not sit above a fortnight after, so that it was impossible for the respondents' answer to be put in by that time. That the parliament being dissolved, the respondents in Ireland might expect to have been served with a new order this session, which it did not appear was done; and that though in the courts below, if answers were not put in, they proceeded to hear causes ex parte; yet there was this difference, that there they always allowed a time for the defendant to have his cause re-heard; but in the house of lords our decrees are final, and it would be hard for any person by surprise to be absolutely cut out from making his defence. The whole house seeming to be of the same mind, they put off the cause for Thursday five weeks, and ordered the respondents, in the mean time, to be served with an order to put in their answer; and if they did not answer by that time the house would proceed absolutely to hear the cause ex parte. I must own to you the chancellor proposed to put it off only for a month; and it was I alone desired it might be for five weeks, giving for a reason that, since the appellant was disappointed once, after having been at the expense of feeing his counsel, he might not be so a second time; and since his adversaries were ready to make all the chicane possible, they might not have the pretence for another by saying, as the usual time was five weeks, and this order but for a month, they expected they were to be allowed the usual time; so I thought it was better giving them a week more than leaving them any room for further chicane. As I have not seen your friend Mr. Skerret since this order, I do not know how he takes it; but I was resolved to give you this account of what happened but a few hours ago, that you might be convinced of my diligence to gratify you in everything you desire of, sir, your most sincere faithful humble servant.

As the house of commons were but yesterday on the practice of opening letters, you will not wonder if I expect this to be opened.

* He had been ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the states-general during the treaty for the peace of Utrecht.

TO MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

Deanery-house, Dublin, March 1, 1735.

MY VERY GOOD AND OLD FRIEND,—I received lately a very acceptable present which you were pleased to send me, which was an engraved picture of you, very handsomely framed, with a glass over it. I take your remembrance of me very kindly, and give you my hearty thanks. I have no other way to show my gratitude at present than by desiring another favour from you, which, however, will be less expensive. Mr. Singleton, the king's prime-serjeant here, is one of the first among the worthiest persons in this kingdom; of great honour, justice, truth, good sense, good nature, and knowledge in his faculty; this gentleman, whom I have the honour to know, although his business be too great to allow me the happiness of seeing him as often as I desire, hath commanded me to recommend the bearer, Mr. Richardson, agent to the Derry society, whereof you are a member. From such a recommendation as the prime-serjeant's I will engage that Mr. Richardson is a very deserving man, and that whatever he desires of you will be perfectly just and reasonable.

And now, my good friend, give me leave to inquire after your health, which I hope is much better than mine. Are you often in your coach at Highgate and Hampstead? Do you keep cheerful company? I know you cannot drink, but I hope your stomach for eating is not declined; and how are you treated by the gout? These and many more particulars I desire to know.

The people who read news have struck me to the heart by the account of my dear friend doctor Arbuthnot's death; although I could expect no less by a letter I received from him a month or two ago. Do you sometimes see Mr. Pope? We still correspond pretty constantly. He publishes poems often and better than ever, which I wonder at the more, because he complains, with too much reason, of his disorders. What a havoc has death made among our friends since that of the queen! As to myself, I am grown leaner than you were when we parted last, and am never wholly free from giddiness and weakness, and sickness in my stomach, otherwise I should have been among you two or three years ago, but now I despair of that happiness. I ride a dozen miles as often as I can, and always walk the streets, except in the night, which my head will not suffer me to do. But my fortune is so sunk that I cannot afford half the necessaries or conveniences that I can still make a shift to provide myself with here. My chief support is French wine, which, although not equal to yours, I drink a bottle to myself every day. I keep three horses, two men, and an old woman, in a large empty house, and dine half the week, like a king, by myself. Thus I tell you my whole economy, which, I fear, will tire you by reading. Pray God keep you in health and happiness; and do me the justice to believe that I am, with true esteem and friendship, dear sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

You see by my many blottings and interlinings what a condition my head is in.

FROM LORD CARTERET.

Jermyn street, March 6, 1735.

SIR,—I had the honour of your letter, and attended the cause yesterday, and the day before; it went for your friend upon the justest principle, and that unanimously. He did not only carry his cause before the house, but his future cause springing out of this, is mended by the decree. The chancellor said, the respondent had more reason to appeal than the appellant. Mr. Lindsay, who informed you right in all the matters you mentioned to me, will inform you, on perusing our decree, of the reason of the chancellor's expression. I have a partiality for captain Rowley in everything but judicature; and in that capacity, if judge Lindsay and I sat together, I fancy, by what I know of him, that we should seldom disagree.

I thank you for taking notice of the prosperous events that have happened to my family. If alliance and the thoughts of prosperity can bind a man to the interest of his country, I am certainly bound to stand by liberty; and when you see me forgetful of that, may you treat me like Traulus and Pistorides.[a] I am impatient for four volumes, said to be your works, for which my wife and I have subscribed; and we expected a dozen of copies from Mr. Tickell last packet.

I intend these works shall be the first foundation of the libraries of my three grandsons. In the meantime they will be studied by my son and sons-in-law.

I desire you will condescend to make my compliments to Dr. Delany, for whom I have a most hearty esteem, though I know he thinks me not serious enough upon certain arduous points of antiquity.

Sir, that you may enjoy the continuance of all happiness is my wish; as for futurity, I know your name will be remembered, when the names of kings, lords-lieutenants, archbishops, and parliament politicians will be forgotten at last, you yourself must fall into oblivion, which may happen in less than a thousand years, though the term may be uncertain, and will depend on the progress that barbarity and ignorance may make, notwithstanding the sedulous endeavours to the contrary, of the great prelates in this and succeeding ages. My wife, my mother, my mother-in-law, my &c., &c., &c., all join with me in good wishes to you; and I hope you will continue to believe that I am, with the greatest respect, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant,

CARTERET.

[a] Joshua, lord Allen, and Richard Tighe, esq.

TO WILLIAM PULTENEY, ESQ.

Dublin, March 8, 1735.

SIR,—Mr. Stopford going to England upon some particular affair, I gladly complied with his desire, that I should do myself the honour of writing to you, because, as useless as I am, and although I shall never have the happiness to see you, yet my ambition to have some small place in your memory will live as long as myself.

I will do an unmannerly thing, which is, to bequeath you an epitaph for forty years hence, in two words, Ultimus Britannorum. You never forsook your party. You might often have been as great as the court can make any man so; but you preserved your spirit of liberty when your former colleagues had utterly sacrificed theirs; and if it shall ever begin to breathe in these days, it must entirely be owing to yourself and one or two friends. But it is altogether impossible for any nation to preserve its liberty long under a tenth part of the present luxury, infidelity, and a million of corruptions. We see the Gothic system of limited monarchy is extinguished in all the nations of Europe. It is utterly extirpated in this wretched kingdom, and yours must be the next. Such has ever been human nature, that a single man, without any superior advantages either of body or mind, but usually the direct contrary, is able to attach twenty millions, and drag them voluntarily at his chariot-wheels. But no more of this. I am as sick of the world as I am of age and disease, the last of which I am never wholly without. I live in a nation of slaves, who sell themselves for nothing. My revenues, though half sunk, are sufficient to support me in some decency. And I have a few friends of great worth, who, when I visit them, or they me, agree together in discovering our utter detestation of all proceeding both here and there. Hæc est vita solutorum misera ambitione gravique. I am under the displeasure of the court for fixing up a true Whig epitaph in my cathedral, over the burying-place of old Schomberg, and for some other things of equal demerit or disaffection, wherewith I am charged; perhaps also for some verses laid to my charge, and published without my knowledge or consent; wherein you and another person are understood to be meant by initial letters.

I desire your pardon for the trouble I gave in recommending a gentleman to your protection, who has an appeal before the house of lords; wherein I was prevailed on by an eminent person in the law, who, by a miracle, was raised to the bench in these very times, although he be a man of virtue and learning in a great degree. Dear sir, you have nothing to desire in this world but good health, good times, the prosperity of your family (wherein you have my constant prayers), and deserving friends. I have often said that I never knew a more easy man to live with than yourself; and if you had only a poor 40,000*l.* a-year, I would command you to settle 1000*l.* of it on me to live in your next neighbourhood; but as for our friends at Twickenham and Dawley, I have told them plainly that they are both too speculative and temperate for me to accept their invitation, and infinitely too philosophical. The bearer, Mr. Stopford, has such infinite obligations to you for your favours to him, and is, in all respects, so very deserving a gentleman, that I am sure you never repented the good office you have done him at my recommendation. But he only attends you on perfect gratitude; for he knows very well you are what is now called a disaffected person. You are, in the modern sense, a friend to popery, arbitrary power, and the pretender; and therefore he has just politics enough not to trouble you with helping him by the hand to better preferment; and I pray God, while things continue as they are, that it may be never in your power to make a curate or an exciseman.

You will hear perhaps that one Faulkner has printed four volumes, which are called my works: he has only prefixed the first letters of my name; it was done utterly against my will; for there is no property in printers or booksellers here, and I was not able to hinder it. I did imagine that after my death the several London booksellers would agree among themselves to print what each of them had by common consent; but the man here has prevented it, much to my vexation, for I would as willingly have it done even in Scotland. All this has vexed me not a little, as done in so obscure a place. I have never yet looked into them, nor, I believe, ever shall. You will find Mr. Stopford the same modest, virtuous, learned man that you last saw him; but with a few more years and a great deal more flesh, beside the blessing of a wife and children. I desire to present my humble service to yours. I pray God bless and assist you in your glorious endeavours for the preservation of your country, and remain, with the truest respect, sir, your most obedient and obliged humble servant,

Jonathan Swift.

You will see by the many blunders in words, syllables, and letters, what a condition my giddy head is in.

FROM WILLIAM PULTENEY, ESQ.

London, March 11, 1735.

Dear Sir,—I have often desired our friend Pope, when he wrote to you, to allow me a corner of his letter to assure you of my most humble service, but the little man never remembered it, and it was not worth troubling you with a letter of my own on so insignificant an occasion.

Your recommending Mr. Lorinan to me gives me great pleasure and satisfaction, as it is an instance of your kind remembrance and friendship. I promise you, whoever at any time comes to me from you shall be sure of meeting with the utmost of my endeavours to serve them. I am glad I can acquaint you Mr. Lorinan has all the success he could expect or wish for; his cause was a good one, and he had the honour of having it greatly attended. When it was over, he asked me (but in a very modest way) whether it was possible to get him made receiver of the new bishop of Derry's rents? I told him I would try. I did so, found it would not succeed, and so dropped it immediately.

What do you say to the bustle made here to prevent the man[a] from being an English bishop, and afterward allowing him to be good Christian enough for an Irish one? Sure the opposition, or the acquiescence, must have been most abominably scandalous. By what I can learn of Dr. Rundle's character (for I am not in the least acquainted with him myself), he is far from being the great and learned man his friends would have the world believe him, and, much further yet from the bad man his enemies represent him. Our right reverend brethren continue to dwell together in the strictest political unity; whether it be like the dew of Hermon upon the hill of Sion, or like the ointment that ran down into Aaron's beard to the skirts of his clothing, I cannot say, but I am sure it is a good joyful thing for the ministers to behold. This has enabled them to prevent any inquiry into the scandalous method of nominating, instead of electing the sixteen Scotch peers: and these and they together make a most dreadful body in that house. We are not quite so bad in ours, but I own to you that I am heartily tired of struggling to no purpose against the corruption that does prevail, and I see always will prevail there. Poor Arbuthnot, who grieved to see the wickedness of mankind, and was particularly ashamed of his own countrymen,[b] is dead. He lived the last six months in a bad state of health, and hoping every night would be his last; not that he endured any bodily pain, but as he was quite weary of the world, and tired with so much bad company. What I have said of the doctor may perhaps deter you from coming among us; but if you had any thoughts of visiting England this summer, I can assure you of some friends who wish to live with you and know how to value and esteem you; among them there is none that does so more sincerely than, dear sir, your most obedient humble servant,

William Pulteney.

Mrs. Pulteney is very much your humble servant, and joins in inviting you here next summer.

TO WILLIAM FITZHERBERT, ESQ.

March 19, 1735.

Sir,—I had some days ago a very long letter from a young gentleman whom I never saw, but by the name subscribed I found it came from a younger son of yours, I suppose your second. He lays before me in a very particular manner the forlorn condition he is in by the severities of you and your lady, his mother. He freely owns his boyish follies when he was first brought up to town, at fourteen years old, but he appeals to Dr. Sheridan for the improvement he made in the doctor's school, and to his tutor for his behaviour in the college, where he took his degree with particular credit, being made one of the moderators of his class, by which it appears that he passed for one of the four best scholars in it. His letter contains four large pages in folio, and written in a very small hand, where he gives a history of his life from the age of fourteen to the present time. It is written with so much spirit, nature, and good sense, as well as appearance of truth, that having first razed out the writer's name, I have shown it to several gentlemen, my friends, of great worth, learning and taste, who all agree in my opinion of the letter, and think it a pity that so hopeful a youth should not have proper encouragement, unless he has some very disagreeable faults, whereof they and I are ignorant. When I had written thus far Dr. Sheridan came to see me; I read your son's letter to him, and he was equally pleased with it, and justified the progress the young man had made in his school. I went this evening to visit a lady who has a very great esteem and friendship for you and Mrs. * * * * *: she told me "That the young man's great fault was too much pertness and conceit of himself, which he often showed in your house and even among company," which I own is a very bad quality in any young man, and is not easily cured; yet I think if I had a son who had understanding, wit, and humour, to write such a letter, I could not find in my heart to cast him off, but try what good advice and maturer years would do toward amendment; and in the mean time give him no cause to complain of wanting convenient food, lodging, and raiment. He lays the whole weight of his letter to me upon the truth of the facts, and is contented to stand or fall by them. If he be a liar, he is into the bargain an unpardonable fool, and his good natural, as well as acquired parts, shall be an aggravation to me to render him more odious. I hear he is turned of one-and-twenty years; and what he alleges seems to be true, that he is not yet put into any way of living, either by law, physic, or divinity, although in his letter he pretends to have studied the first on your promise to send him to the Temple, but your mind altering, and you rather choosing to send him to Leyden, he applied himself to study physic, and made some progress in it, but for many months he has heard nothing more from you, so that now he is in utter despair, loaden with the hatred of both his parents, and lodges in a garret in William-street, with only the liberty to dine at your house, and no further care taken of him.

[a] Dr. Thomas Rundle was promoted to the rich see of Derry in Ireland, in February, 1735, after being prevented from getting the see of Gloucester, in England, which had been intended for him in November, 1734. The dispute concerning his promotion to the see of Gloucester was between the chancellor and the bishop of London: the chancellor was his friend, and the bishop his enemy.

[b] He was a native of Scotland.

Sir, although I have seldom been in your company, it is many years since I had the honour of being known to you; and I always thought, as well as heard, that you were a gentleman of great honour, truth, knowledge, modesty, good-nature, and candour. As to your lady, I never saw her but once, and then but for a few minutes; she has the character of being a very polite and accomplished person, and therefore, very probably, her son's rough, overweening, forward behaviour among company with her, without that due deference which only can recommend youth, may be very disgustful to her. Your son desires me in his letter to apply to some friends who have most credit with you, that you will please to put him into some way of life; and he wishes that those friends would be so generous to join in contributing some allowance to support him at Leyden. I think it would have been well if he had been sent to sea in the proper time, or had now a commission in the army. Yet if he were the original writer of that letter sent to me under his name, I confess myself so very partial as to be extremely sorry if he should not deserve and acquire the favour of you and your lady, in which case, any parents might be forgiven for being proud of such a son. I have no acquaintance with his tutor, Dr. King, but if I can learn from those who have, I shall be glad to hear that he confirms the character of the young man's good parts and learning, as Dr. Sheridan has done.

I entreat your pardon for this long letter, and for offering to interfere in a domestic point where I have no information but from one side; but I can faithfully assure you that my regard is altogether for the service and ease of you and your lady and family. I have always thought that a happy genius is seldom without some bent toward virtue, and therefore deserves some indulgence. Most of the great villains I have known (which were not a small number) have been brutes in their understandings as well as their actions.

But I have already run out my paper, as well as your patience. I shall therefore conclude with the sincere profession of being, with great esteem and truth, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MRS. PRATT.

London, April 4, 1735.

SIR,—I think you know me sufficiently not to doubt of a letter any way coming from you being acceptable, therefore any omission but that cannot fail of an excuse from me, whose friendship is pleasingly gratified by the honour of having it returned from one of your distinguished talents and merits whose life I wish to preserve, but wish more to make it agreeable to you by the full enjoyment of health, friends, fortune, and situation; my next desire should be that I had a power to contribute to your attainment of any of these comforts.

Your kind inquiries in relation to myself only justify taking up your time with so insignificant a subject, which I shall be particular upon merely in obedience to your commands.

I have no obligations to the court, nor am I likely to have any; I have to my lord Shelburne, whose house in London is my settled habitation, though I am afraid two years will put an end to my good fortune, the lease of the house, which is an old one, being then expired; and so perhaps may be that of my life, which I have been long tired of. Added to my lord Shelburne's favours, I have great and many more than I can express here, to the duchess of Buckingham, whose table is my constant one, and her coach oftener mine than I ask for it; beside fetching me every day, and bringing me home, makes me share in public amusements without expense; and in summer the variety of change of air, which her station empowers her to take, and more her inclination to impart to her friends the benefit of, who cannot fail of being so to her if they have merit enough to be capable of being obliged by the most agreeable sincere manner to engage approbation and gratitude; then I hope you think I have enough to do justice, both in my thoughts and actions, to one so worthy of it. I am, sir, your sincerely obliged and affectionate humble servant,

H. PRATT.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

April 5, 1735.

PART the first, you order me to give up my secretaryship; and part the second, called postscript, you employed me about Dr. Sheridan's exchange, when the letters for it must have been at Dublin long before yours came away. I was just thinking that you was a little upon the dear joy;[a] but to be sure, you were in the right, for what signified my secretaryship when I had no business.

The countess of Suffolk did not give up the first employment at court, for she had no other than mistress of the robes, being 400*l.* a-year, which the duchess of Dorset had quitted to her, there being no lady of the bedchamber's place vacant, and it not being quite proper for a countess to continue bedchamber woman. As to her part about Gay, that I cleared to you long ago, for to my certain knowledge no woman was ever a better friend than she by many ways proved herself to him. As to what you hint about yourself, as I am wholly ignorant what it is you mean, I can say nothing upon it. And as to the question, whether you should congratulate or condole? I believe you may do either or both, and not be in the wrong, for I truly think she was heartily sorry to be obliged by ill usage to quit a master and mistress that she had served so justly, and loved so well. However, she has now much more ease and liberty, and accordingly her health better.

Mrs. Floyd has a cough every winter, and generally so bad that she often frightens me for the consequences. My saucy niece[b] presents her service to parson Swift. The duchess of Dorset is gone to Bath with lady Lambert for her health; she has not been long enough there yet to find the good effects of the waters, but as they always did agree with her, I have great hopes they will now quite cure her colic.

In all likelihood you are weary by this time of reading, and I am of writing, such a long letter, so adieu, my dear dean.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

April 5, 1735.

DEAR SIR,—Mrs. Perott has this instant invited my two eldest daughters to her house till such time as I may be settled at Cavan. She is a lady the best housewife in Ireland, and of the best temper I ever knew. Her daughters are formed by her example, so that it is impossible to place them where they will have a better opportunity of learning what may be hereafter of real advantage to them. Dear sir, I shall impatiently wait your advice, for my affairs here require a longer attendance than I expected. You will be so good as to let me know from Mr. Lingen[a] whether the duke of Dorset's letter be come in answer to the lords-justices, that I may hurry to Dublin, for people are here impatient at having their children so long idle. I am apt to believe that if you put this matter in what light you think proper to the lord-chancellor, he will not insist upon a punctilio, which may prove a great loss to me. The bishop of Killmore can produce a letter I think sufficient to justify their excellencies the lords-justices in granting us patents.

I wish you long health and happiness, and shall, dear sir, ever have a grateful sense of your friendship, and be, with all respect, your most obedient and very humble servant, THOMAS SHERIDAN.

FROM THE ARCHBISHOP OF CASHELL.

[Dr. Theophilus Bolton.]

Cashell, April 7, 1735.

DEAR SIR,—I suppose by this time you have been informed that Mr. Dunkin was ordained here last Thursday, and that the recommendations got the better of my prejudices to his unhappy genius, which I hope will in some degree convince you that your power over me is not yet quite worn out.

It is one of the greatest evils that attends those whom fortune has forsaken, that their friends forsake them too; and let me tell you that your not seeing me the whole winter I was last in Dublin was not a less mortification to me than all the hard sayings of the great parliament orators. However, I must own your taking any occasion to write to me at all has made some amends, for though you seem designedly to cover it, I think I perceive some little marks of that former kindness which I once pleased myself to have had a share in with your lawyer friends. When I conversed with politicians I learned that it was not prudent to seem fond of what one most desires, for which reason I would not tell you that if this accident of your poetical friend should open a way to our frequent meeting together again, and being put upon the old foot, as when I was your subject at St. Patrick's, I should think myself the happiest man in the world; but this I will say, that if it falls out so, this last heavy period of my life will be much more tolerable than it is at present.

I am now wholly employed in digging up rocks and making the way easier to the church, which if I can succeed in, I design to repair a very venerable old fabric that was built here in the time of our ignorant (as we are pleased to call them) ancestors. I wish this age had a little of their piety, though we gave up instead of it some of our immense erudition. What if you spent a fortnight here this summer? I have laid aside all my country politics, sheriffs' elections, feasts, &c. And I fancy it would not be disagreeable to you to see king Cormack's chapel, his bedchamber, &c., all built, beyond controversy, above eight hundred years ago, when he was king, as well as archbishop. I really intend to lay out a thousand pounds to preserve this old church, and I am sure you would be of service to posterity if you assisted me in the doing of it, at least, if you approved the design, you would give the greatest pleasure, I assure you, to your most affectionate and faithful humble servant, THEOPHILUS CASHELL.

TO MR. THOMAS BEACH,[a]

Merchant in Wrexham, Denbighshire.

To be left at the Customhouse, and given to Stephen Lovel, esq., collector of the customs in Chester.

Dublin, April 12, 1735.

SIR,—After the fate of all poets, you are no favourite of fortune, for your letter of March 31st did not come to my hands till two days after sir William Fownes's death, who having been so long afflicted with the stone and other disorders, besides great old age, died about nine days ago. If he had recovered I should certainly have waited on him with your poem, and recommended it and the author very heartily to his favour. I have seen fewer good panegyrics than any other sort of writing, especially in verse, and therefore I much approve the method you have taken: I mean that of describing a person who possesseth every virtue, and rather waiving that sir William Fownes was in your thoughts, than that your picture was like in every part. He had indeed a very good natural understanding, nor wanted a talent for poetry; but his education denied him learning, for he knew no other language except his own; yet he was a man of taste and humour as well as a wise and useful citizen, as appeared by some little treatise for regulating the government of this city; and I often wished his advice had been taken. I read your poem several times, and showed it to three or four judicious friends, who all approved it, but agreed with me that it wanted some corrections.[b] Upon which I took a number of lines, which are in all 299, the odd number being occasioned by what they call a triplet, which was a vicious way of rhyming, wherewith Dryden abounded, and was imitated by all the bad versifiers in Charles II.'s reign. Dryden, though my near relation,[c] is one I have often

[a] One of the secretaries to the lords-justices.

[a] Mr. Thomas Beach, author of a poem, entitled "Eugenio, or a Virtuous and Happy Life." It is dedicated to Mr. Pope. The author committed suicide a few weeks after publication of his poem, in 1737.

[b] From a perusal of the printed poem, we find that Mr. Beach adopted every one of the dean's hints and corrections. Even the triplet is discarded, and the poem now consists of three hundred lines.

[c] "It is not easy to ascertain the exact degree of relationship between Dryden and Swift. He is said by his kinsman, dean Swift, and by Hawkesworth after him, to have been our author's second cousin, the grandson of Elizabeth, one of the daughters of sir Erasmus Driden: but this could not be the case, for that lady was married to sir Richard Phillips, bart. The wife, therefore, of Thomas Swift, being acknowledged to have been Elizabeth Dryden; must be sought for in some other branch of the Dryden family. From 'Mercurius Rusticus,' p. 75, it appears, that, in October, 1642, she had beside ten children, who supplicated her plunderers for bread, an infant in the cradle, and afterwards she had three more children; so that she probably was younger than any of the daughters of sir Erasmus Driden, all of whom, I believe, were born before the year 1600. On her husband's living being sequestered, the profits of it were consigned to Jonathan Dryden, minister, who was probably her brother; and they were the blamed as well as pitied. He was poor, and in great haste to finish his plays, because by them he chiefly supported his family, and this made him so very incorrect; he likewise brought in the Alexandrine verse at the end of his triplets. I was so angry at these corruptions that about twenty-four years ago I banished them all by one triplet, with the Alexandrine, upon a very ridiculous subject. I absolutely did prevail with Mr. Pope, and Gay, and Dr. Young, and one or two more, to reject them. Mr. Pope never used them till he translated Homer, which was too long a work to be so very exact in; and I think in one or two of his last poems he has, out of laziness, done the same thing, though very seldom. I now proceed to what I would have corrected in your poem. Line 6, for han't, read want; I abhor those han'ts and won'ts, &c., &c.; they are detestable in verse as well as prose. L. 46, for whilst, put while. L. 83, derives, I doubt there is no verb deponent, but always active. L. 106, "If Noll usurps, or James;" Noll is too much a cant word for a grave poem; and as to James, he was a weak, bigoted papist, desirous, like all kings, of absolute power, but not properly a tyrant. L. 109, And midst, harsh and rough, the elision unluckily placed. L. 115, 116, I cannot suffer an ill rhyme, such as seen and scene (I forgot the triplet in L. 108, which I wish were clipped of one of its three wings): and L. 110, to Glory, I wish it were in Glory. L. 118. Does. This word should be avoided as a mere expletive. L. 155, Does. The same fault. L. 161, The Ingrate. This verse is not right measure, but sounds very ill. L. 121, Chee'ful, &c. This verse wants a verb, as are, or some other. 204, Does. L. 217, for pervade it should be pervades. L. 218, and grows, Quere, is not or more proper? L. 278, Cuzzoni famed. This is an expletive, not a proper epithet. L. 289, That dares. The word that, as it is placed, spoils the whole line, and is not proper, for the right word should be who. L. 294, Reascend. I know not the reason for this word. Why not rather ascend? I slipped 290, Than; I suppose you only meant then. You will do right to read over your poem carefully, and observe where there be any more oversights of the same kind with those I have noted, and to be corrected, which you can do better than any other person. A friend can only see what is amiss, but the writer can mend it more easily. All you desire in relation to sir William Fownes is at an end by his death, otherwise I should gladly have performed it in the best and most effectual manner I was able. As to the publishing it here, I utterly differ from you. No printer in this beggarly town, and enslaved starving kingdom, would print it without being paid his full charge of his labour, nor would he be able to sell two dozen unless he could afford it for a penny. I would rather advise you to have it published in London by Motte or Lintot, or any other bookseller there who deal in poetry. It would bear a shilling price; but as I presume you are not much known as a poet in that great city, you should get some person of consequence to recommend it.

As to what things were printed here on supposition they were mine, the thing was done directly against my inclinations, out of the disdain I had of their being published in so obscure and wretched a country. But I would have been well enough satisfied if the booksellers in London could have agreed among themselves to print them there. And I believe they now repent they did not, because every printer there hath a property in their copy; and what things are supposed to be mine belonged to several booksellers, who might have shared equally, according to what copies they held. I have been called away till evening; however, my paper could afford me but little more room if I had staid. I am, with true esteem, sir, your most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM ALDERMAN BARBER.

Queen-square, April 22, 1735.

DEAR SIR,—It was with great pleasure I had the favour of your most obliging letter by the hands of Mr. Richardson, agent to the Irish Society; for as I am always proud to receive your commands, he may depend upon any service I can do him that is in my power. When I say this I make you no great compliment; for as that gentleman's merit has raised him to the post he now enjoys under the society, it is hardly to be doubted but that his integrity and good conduct for the future will easily preserve his interest in that body.

I am very sorry to hear that your old complaints from your head continue; and the more so because they have deprived your friends here of the great pleasure and satisfaction of seeing you among them, which is a sensible mortification to them indeed; but I am very much pleased with the account you give of your way of living, because I am a living instance how the economy you are under must necessarily preserve your life many years. I have the gout sometimes, the asthma very much, and of late frequent pains in my bowels; and yet, by keeping in a constant regular way, I battle them all, and am in much better health than I was twelve years ago, when four top physicians pronounced me a dead man, and sent me abroad to die. I ride when I can, but not in winter, for the fogs, and mists, and cold weather murder me. I drink a pint of claret at dinner (none at night), and have a good stomach, with a bad digestion; but I have good spirits, and am cheerful, thank God.

I beg pardon for entertaining you so long with my infirmities, which I would humbly apply, that if my being regular with so many distempers preserves me to almost a miracle, what must the same method produce in you?

About ten days ago I saw Mr. Pope, who is very well; so is the lord of Dawley [Bolingbroke].

It is a melancholy reflection you make, how many friends you have lost since good queen Anne's time. Many indeed! for there are very few left. The loss of a friend is the loss of a limb, not to be restored. Poor lady Masham among the rest. Our friend the doctor [Arbuthnot] I am afraid did not take the care he ought to have done. I am told he was a great epicure, and denied himself nothing. Possibly he might think the play not worth the candle. You may remember Mr. Garth said he was glad when he was dying; for he was weary of having his shoes pulled off and on. As for my part, I am resolved to make the remains of my life as easy as I can, and submit myself entirely to the will of God.

You will give me leave, sir, just to congratulate children of a brother of sir Erasmus Driden; he had five brothers. If I am right in this conjecture, the dean of St. Patrick's father and our author were only second cousins. Swift's grandfather, Thomas, had ten sons, of which the fifth, Jonathan (the dean's father), was probably named from Jonathan Dryden above mentioned, who was, I believe, his uncle. Another of the sons (who, as well as Jonathan, was an attorney) was called Driden Swift, in honour of his mother; a circumstance which confirms the tradition concerning the relationship between these two celebrated men. Swift, in one of his letters, calls Dryden his near relation; but in the last age a greater account was made of consanguinity than at present. A second or third cousin was then considered as a near relation.'—See Malone's Life of Dryden.

you on your public spirit (and for which all mankind applaud you), in erecting an hospital for the unhappy. It is truly worthy of your great soul, and for which the present and the future age must honour and revere your memory! I dare say no more on this head for fear of offending.

That God Almighty would please to restore your health, and preserve you many years for the good of mankind, is the hearty prayer of, sir, your most obedient humble servant, JOHN BARBER.

My service to Dr. Delany.

FROM MRS. PRATT.

London, April 22, 1735.

SIR,—I wrote in such haste that I forgot to make my lady Saville's acknowledgments, which, before she left this, she engaged me to do in a particular manner from her, by assuring you that she is your obliged humble servant, and wishes you all happiness, as many more do among your friends here. Her number of children is three, two girls and a boy, who, thank God, seem promising.

My lord Shelburne, who is just come to town for two or three days, desires his sincere compliments to you, invites you next June to an empty town-house, and wishes that accommodation of removing you from the inconveniences of a lodging may tempt you to a change of air, and to come among your friends. I wish I could tempt you to come hither, as I long to have the pleasure of assuring you in person how sincerely I am, sir, your ever obliged and most faithful humble servant, H. PRATT.

FROM WILLIAM PULTENEY, ESQ.

London, April 29, 1735.

SIR,—I am obliged to you for your letter by Dr. Stopford, to which I am sorry I can so soon, by him, return you an answer. I have scarce had any opportunity of seeing him. One day, believing we should have had no business in parliament, I desired him to dine with me; but unluckily a debate arose, which kept us till nine at night before we sat down to dinner. We have had a very fatiguing session, more from the severe attendance on elections than any other public business. The ministers have been defeated in their expectation of weeding the house; and upon the whole we stand stronger in numbers than we did at first setting out.

I have sent you the copy of a bill now depending in our house "for the encouragement of learning," as the title bears; but I think it is rather of advantage to booksellers than authors. Whether it will pass or not this session I cannot say; but if it should not, I should be glad of your thoughts upon it against another session. It seems to me to be extremely imperfect at present. I hope you have many more writings to oblige the world with than those which have been so scandalously stolen from you. And when a bill of this nature passes in England (as I hope it will next year), you may then secure the property to any friend or any charitable use you think fit.

I thank you for the many kind expressions of friendship in your letter. If my public conduct has recommended me to your esteem, I am extremely proud of the reward, and value it more than those who attain foolish ribbons, or foolish titles, vilia servitutis præmia.[a] Pray therefore continue me your friendship, and believe me, with the greatest sincerity and regard, dear sir, your most humble and obedient servant, WM. PULTENEY.

[a] This was before he attained the title of earl of Bath.

Lord Bolingbroke is going to France with lord Berkeley, but I believe will return again in a few months.

I will take a proper opportunity of recommending Dr. Stopford to the duke of Dorset; but I think it is not yet quite certain that he will continue lord-lieutenant. I mean that if he perceives that he is to be turned out soon after his return from Ireland, possibly he may desire not to go.

TO LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

May 5, 1735.

MADAM,—I find your ladyship seems not very much pleased with your office of secretary, which, however, you must be obliged to hold during the duke's government, if I happen to outlive it, which for your comfort, considering my health, is not very likely. I have not been a troublesome petitioner to his grace, and intend to be less; and, as I have always done, will principally consider my lord duke's honour. I have very few friends in want. I have kindred enough, but not a grain of merit among them, except one female, who is the only cousin I suffer to see me. When I had credit for some years at court I provided for above fifty people in both kingdoms, of which not one was a relation. I have neither followers, nor fosterers, nor dependers, so that if I lived now among the great they might be sure I would never be a solicitor out of any regard but merit and virtue; and in that case I would reckon I was doing them the best service in my power; and if they were good for anything I would expect their thanks; for they want nothing so much as an honest, judicious recommender, which, in perfect modesty, I take myself to be. Dr. Sheridan is gone to his school in the country, and was only delayed so long on account of some very unnecessary forms contrived by his grace's most cautious deputies.

My letter is but just begun; the larger half remains;[a] and your ladyship is to make a fresh use of your secretary's employment. The countess of Kerry, my long friend and mistress, commanded me to attend her yesterday: she told me that Mr. Deering, late deputy-clerk of the council, being dead, she had thoughts of soliciting the same office for her younger son, Mr John Fitzmaurice. Her eldest son, lord Fitzmaurice, has for some years been plagued with a wife and no wife.[b] The case has been tried in both kingdoms, and he stands excommunicated, and forced to live abroad, which is a very great misfortune to the earl of Kerry and his lady; and they have nothing left to comfort them but their younger son, who has lately married very honestly and indisputably. He is a young gentleman of great regularity, very well educated, but has no employment; therefore his parents would be very desirous he should have one, and this, of deputy-clerk of the council here, would be a very proper introduction to business. It is understood here that the purchase of the deputy-clerk's office is the usual perquisite of the chief clerk, with the consent of the chief governor, with which my lord and lady Kerry would very readily and thankfully fall in. And as the earl of Kerry's is one of the most ancient and noble families of the kingdom, his younger, and only son of which he has any hopes, might well pretend to succeed in so small an office, upon an equal foot with any other person. I own this proposal of mine is more suitable to the corruption of the times than to my own speculative notions of virtue; but I must give some allowance to the degeneracy of mankind, and the passion I have to my lady Kerry.

[a] This is ludicrously said, as being a common blundering expression of the Irish.

[b] The great-grandfather of the present marquis of Lansdowne.

D. never writes to me. No man alive can convince Talalderahla; and when we come next it is the same thing with Berby and Barnard. Plurality of dinners and dignities he has; and so Mandragorus confirms it to all members in an episode of sage and brandy.

FROM MRS. DONNELLAN

May 1735.

SIR,—I should before this have returned you thanks for the favour of your letter, but that I feared too quick a correspondence might be troublesome to you. When I receive a very great honour and favour, I think it ungenerous immediately to sue for another, though I have the highest sense of the obligation.

You say you want me to assert your right over our sex; and your letter is so powerful a bribe that I fear I shall give them up to you, though I am a great asserter of their rights and privileges. As to the employments you assign me I readily undertake them all, though I know myself very unfit for some of them; but I have such high examples on my side, that I am not at all ashamed of pretending to more than I can do. I think I can be a very good nurse; you shall teach me to be your companion; and, for housekeeper, I will assure you I know to a farthing the lowest price of everything, though I am ever so ignorant of the matter.

Mrs. Pendarves has, as you say, forsaken us; by my lord Lansdowne's death, her brother, Mr. Granville, is become possessed of 800*l*. a-year, and 20,000*l*. in money, which was so settled that my lord Lansdown could not touch it. Mr. Granville is a man of great worth, and a very kind brother, and has it now in his power to provide for their sister, Miss Granville, whom Mrs. Pendarves is extremely fond of: this you may imagine has been a cordial to her for lord Lansdowne's death, though she had a great regard for him. I tell her when she has married and settled her brother and sister, if she does not settle herself, she must think of her friends in Ireland; and she promises me she will.

It is so much my interest, sir, to believe you sincere, that I will not doubt it: I will rather think you want judgment (which is very hard for me to do), or why should not I (which is still more pleasing) believe I have really those good qualities you ascribe to me? It will only make me vain, and who can be humble when praised by you?

I think your indignation against our absenters very just, though some of my family suffer by it; but we are resolved to be no longer of the number, and propose leaving London this month. Poor Mrs. Barber has been confined with the gout these three months, and I fear we shall leave her so; her poems are generally greatly liked: there are, indeed, a few severe critics (who think that judgment is only shown in finding faults) that say they are not poetic; and a few fine ladies, who are not commended in them, that complain they are dull.

I am very sorry Dr. Delany has given up his house in Dublin; for one cannot, as often as one may wish it, command time and a coach to visit him at Delville. I hope though to be admitted into the new apartment, and to have the happiness of meeting you there.

My brother is highly honoured in the character you give him, which, though he is my brother, I must say I think a very just one: he will deliver you this letter, and with it my best thanks for all your favours; being, sir, with the highest gratitude, your most obliged obedient servant.

H. DONNELLAN.

My best respects attend Dr. Delany and Dr. Helsham.

TO MR. POPE

May 12, 1735.

YOUR letter was sent me yesterday by Mr. Stopford [afterwards bishop of Cloyne], who landed the same day, but I have not yet seen him. As to my silence, God knows it is my great misfortune. My little domestic affairs are in great confusion by the villany of agents and the miseries of this kingdom, where there is no money to be had; nor am I unconcerned to see all things tending towards absolute power in both nations (it is here in perfection already), although I shall not live to see it established. This condition of things, both public and personal to myself, has given me such a kind of despondency that I am almost unqualified for any company, diversion, or amusement. The death of Mr. Gay and the doctor have been terrible wounds near my heart. Their living would have been a great comfort to me, although I should never have seen them; like a sum of money in a bank, from which I should receive at least annual interest, as I do from you, and have done from my lord Bolingbroke. To show in how much ignorance I live, it is hardly a fortnight since I heard of the death of my lady Masham, my constant friend in all changes of times. God forbid that I should expect you to make a voyage that would in the least affect your health; but in the mean time how unhappy am I that my best friend should have perhaps the only kind of disorder for which a sea-voyage is not in some degree a remedy! The old duke of Ormond said he would not change his dead son (Ossory) for the best living son in Europe. Neither would I change you, my absent friend, for the best present friend round the globe.

I have lately read a book imputed to lord Bolingbroke, called "A Dissertation upon Parties."* I think it very masterly written.

Pray God reward you for your kind prayers: I believe your prayers will do me more good than those of all the prelates in both kingdoms, or any prelates in Europe, except the bishop of Marseilles. And God preserve you for contributing more to mend the world than the whole pack of (modern) parsons in a lump. I am ever entirely yours,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO WILLIAM PULTENEY, ESQ.

Dublin, May 12, 1735.

SIR,—Mr. Stopford landed yesterday, and sent me the letter which you were pleased to honour me with. I have not yet seen him, for he called when I was not at home. The reason why I ventured to recommend him to your protection was your being his old patron, to whom he is obliged for all the preferment he got in the church. He is one of the most deserving gentlemen in the country, and has a tolerable provision, much more than persons of so much merit can in these times pretend to, in either

* The best, perhaps, of all Bolingbroke's works; written with great force of reasoning, and in a style equally spirited and elegant. One of the severest attacks ever made on sir Robert Walpole was the dedication prefixed to this Dissertation, when the papers that had been first separately printed in the "Craftsman" were collected into one volume octavo. After the many things that have been said for and against his long ministry, his want of skill and knowledge in conducting foreign affairs was most frequently repeated. In a letter written in 1776 the king of Prussia affirms expressly, that Walpole used to say, "leave Europe to my brother, and reserve only England to my-kingdom. I love the duke of Dorset very well, having known him from his youth, and he has treated me with great civility since he came into this government. It is true his original principles, as well as his instructions from your side the water, make him act the usual part in managing this nation, for which he must be excused; yet I wish he would a little more consider that people here might have some small share in employments civil and ecclesiastic, wherein my lord Carteret acted a more popular part. The folks here, whom they call a parliament, will imitate yours in everything, after the same manner as a monkey does a human creature. If my health were not so bad, although my years be many, I fear I might outlive liberty in England. It has continued longer than in any other monarchy, and must end as all others have done which were established by the Goths, and is now falling in the same manner that the rest have done. It is very natural for every king to desire unlimited power; it is as proper an object to their appetites as a wench to an abandoned young fellow, or wine to a drunkard. But what puzzles me is, to know how a man of birth, title, and fortune can find his account in making himself and his posterity slaves. They are paid for it; the court will restore what their luxury has destroyed; I have nothing to object. But let me suppose a chief minister, from a scanty fortune almost eaten up with debts, acquiring by all methods a monstrous overgrown estate, why he will still go on to endeavour making his master absolute, and thereby in the power of seizing all his possessions at his pleasure, and hanging or banishing him into the bargain. Therefore, if I were such a minister, I would act like a prudent gamester, and cut, as the sharper calls it, before luck began to change. What if such a minister, when he had got two or three millions, would pretend conviction, seem to dread attempts upon liberty, and bring over all his forces to the country-side? As to the lust of absolute power, I despair it can ever be cooled, unless princes had capacity to read the history of the Roman emperors, how many of them were murdered by their own army; and the same may be said of the Ottomans by their janissaries; and many other examples are easy to be found. If I were such a minister I would go further, and endeavour to be king myself. Such feats have happened among the petty tyrants of old Greece, and the worst that happened was only their being murdered for their pains.

I believe in my conscience that you have some mercenary end in all your endeavours to preserve the liberty of your country at the expense of your quiet, and of making all the villains in England your enemies. For you stand almost alone, and therefore are sure, if you succeed, to engross the whole glory of recovering a desperate constitution, given over by all its other physicians. May God work a miracle by changing the hearts of an abandoned people, whose hearts are waxen gross, whose ears are dull of hearing, and whose eyes have been closed; and may he continue you as his chief instrument by whom this miracle is to be wrought.

I send this letter in a packet to Mr. Pope, and by a private hand. I pray God protect you against all your enemies; I mean those of your country, for you can have no other; and as you will never be weary of well-doing, so may God give you long life and health the better to support you.

You are pleased to mention some volumes of what are called my works. I have looked on them very little. It is a great mortification to me, although I should not have been dissatisfied if such a thing had been done in England by booksellers agreeing among themselves. I never got a farthing by anything I writ, except one about eight years ago, and that was by Mr. Pope's prudent management for me. Here the printers and booksellers have no property in their copies. The printer [Mr. George Faulkner] applied to my friends, and got many things from England. The man was civil and humble, but I had no dealings with him, and therefore he consulted some friends, who were readier to direct him than I desired they should. I saw one poem on you and a great minister, and was not sorry to find it there.

I fear you are tired; I cannot help it; nor could avoid the convenience of writing when I might be in no danger of post officers. I am, sir, with the truest respect and esteem, your most obedient and obliged humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

I desire to present my most humble respects to Mrs. Pulteney.

FROM MRS. PENDARVES.

May 16, 1735.

SIR,—You have never yet put it in my power to accuse you of want of civility; for since my acquaintance with you, you have always paid me more than I expected; but I may sometimes tax you with want of kindness, which, to tell you the truth, I did for a month at least. At last I was informed your not writing to me was occasioned by your ill state of health; that changed my discontent, but did not lessen it; and I have not yet quite determined it in my mind whether I would have you sick or negligent of me; they are both great evils, and hard to choose out of; I heartily wish neither may happen. You call yourself by a great many ugly names, which I take ill; for I never could bear to hear a person I value abused. I, for that reason, must desire you to be more upon your guard when you speak of yourself again: I much easier forgive your calling me knave and fool. I am infinitely obliged to you for the concern you express for the weakness of my eyes; they are now very well. I have had a much greater affliction on my spirits, which prevented my writing sooner to you. My sister (the only one I have, and an extraordinary darling) has been extremely indisposed this whole winter. I have had all the anxiety imaginable on her account; but she is now in a better way, and I hope past all danger. I would rather tell you somewhat that is pleasant; but how can I? I am just going to lose Mrs. Donnellan, and that is enough to damp the liveliest imagination; it is not easy to express what one feels on such an occasion; the loss of an agreeable, sensible, useful companion, gives a pain at the heart not to be described. You happy Hibernians, that are to reap the benefit of my distress, will hardly think of anything but your own joy, and not afford me one grain of pity. Thus things are carried in this world, the rich forget the poor. I am sorry the sociable Thursdays, that used to bring together so many agreeable friends at Dr. Delany's, are broke up: though Delville has its beauties, it is more out of the way than Stafford-street. I believe you have had a quiet winter in Dublin; not so has it been with us in London. Hurry, wrangling, extravagance, and matrimony have reigned with great impetuosity. The newspapers, I suppose, have mentioned the number of great fortunes that are going to be married. Our operas have given much cause of dissension. Men and women have been deeply engaged; and no debate in the house of commons has been urged with more warmth: the dispute of the merits of the composers and singers is carried to so great a height that it is much feared by all true lovers of music that operas will be quite overturned. I own I think we make a very silly figure about it. I am obliged to you for the two Latin lines in your last letter: it gave me a fair pretence of showing the letter to have them explained; and I have gained no small honour by that. I hope, sir, though you threaten me with not writing, that you will change your mind: the season of the year will give you spirits, and I shall be glad to share the good effects of them. I am, sir, your most obliged humble servant, M. PENDARVES.

When you see Mrs. Donnellan, she will entertain you with a second edition of Fauset, too tedious for a letter. I have made a thousand blunders which I am ashamed of.

FROM LADY BETTY BROWNLOWE.

May 19, 1735.

SIR,—I have the honour to send you the enclosed letter and the cover as it came to Mr. Brownlowe. I hope your frugal correspondent has not, at your expense, incurred the proverb of being penny-wise, &c., and thereby occasioned your being a sufferer by any delay of business. I should beg pardon for not having obeyed your commands in writing sooner, but that I am the only sufferer by it, by being deprived of the satisfaction of hearing of your health. The extreme cold weather we have had this month has made the country much less agreeable than usual at this time of the year; but this having been a fine morning I have been amused very much to my satisfaction, with laying out what I think a very pretty design in my garden. I like my gardener mightily, and found everything in his care in perfect good order; but the coldness of the season makes everything very backward: the cucumbers are not larger than gherkins. I beg, if you honour me with a line, you will let me know how both lady Acheson and Mrs. Acheson do, for I have a sincere concern for both their welfares. We go next week to make a visit to our friends at Seaford, where we propose staying about a fortnight. I heard yesterday you had thoughts of going to Cashel: if it were possible for me to have the happiness to be present at yours and the archbishop's conversation, I am certain I should retrieve my character, and that you would allow me to be a good listener, which, through other people's faults, you do not know; for I assure you I have too great a desire to be informed and improved to occasion any interruption in your conversation, except when I find you purposely let yourself down to such capacities as mine, with an intention, as I suppose, to give us the pleasure of babbling. Mr. Brownlowe desires you will accept of his compliments; and I am sir, with great respect, your truly affectionate and obedient humble servant, ELIZABETH BROWNLOWE.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

May 27, 1735.

IT is true enough, my love to business is not great, without my capacity was better; but, however, you should have had a quicker answer to your letter, but that I find Mr. Fitzmaurice has already made application by several other hands, and so have many members of parliament. The answer given to them all has been, that it will not yet be disposed of; and my opinion is, that probably when lord George Sackville comes over he will humbly desire his father, or whoever is chief governor, that he may, without any political view, have the disposal of it himself, as it is his own private concern.

I did not know lady Kerry had the honour of being your mistress and favourite: however, I approve of your taste. For many years, or rather an age ago, she and I were very well acquainted, and I thought her a mighty sensible, agreeable woman; so upon that account, as well as yours, I should be very glad to be serviceable to her in anything in my power.

Now I have given you what answer I can on this subject, I must recommend to you an affair which has given me some small palpitations of the heart, which is, that you should not wrap up old shoes or neglected sermons in my letters; but that what of them have been spared from going toward making gin for the ladies, may henceforth be committed instantly to the flames: for, you being stigmatized with the name of a wit, Mr. Curll will rake to the dunghill for your correspondence. And, as to my part, I am satisfied with having been honoured in print, by your amorous, satirical, and gallant letters.*

The summer has done your old friend Mrs. Floyd a great deal of service. As for my saucy niece, I would advise you both to be better acquainted before you fall foul of one another. The duchess of Dorset is still at Bath, and the waters have done her good. The duke is now confined by a fit of the gout, which, I believe, is very well for him, because I doubt he had a little of it in his stomach. Adieu, &c.

FROM THE ARCHBISHOP OF CASHELL.

Cashell, May 31, 1735.

DEAR SIR,—I have been so unfortunate in all my contests of late, that I am resolved to have no more, especially where I am likely to be overmatched: and as I have some reason to hope what is past will be forgotten, I confess I did endeavour in my last to put the best colour I could think of upon a very bad cause. My friends judge right of my idleness, but, in reality, it has hitherto proceeded from a hurry and confusion, arising from a thousand unlucky unforeseen accidents, rather than mere sloth.

I have but one troublesome affair now upon my hands, which, by the help of the prime serjeant, I hope soon to get rid of; and then you shall see me a true Irish bishop. Sir James Ware has made a very useful collection of the memorable actions of all my predecessors. He tells us, they were born in such a town of England or Ireland; were consecrated such a year, and if not translated, were buried in their cathedral church, either on the north or south side. Whence I conclude, that a good bishop has nothing more to do than to eat, drink, grow fat, rich, and die; which laudable example I propose for the remainder of my life to follow; for to tell you the truth, I have for these four or five years past met with so much treachery, baseness, and ingratitude among mankind, that I can hardly think it incumbent upon any man to endeavour to do good to so perverse a generation.

I am truly concerned at the account you give me of your health. Without doubt a southern ramble will prove the best remedy you can take to recover your flesh; and I do not know, except in one stage, where you can choose a road so suited to your circumstances as from Dublin hither. You have to Kilkenny a turnpike, and good inns at every ten or twelve miles end. From Kilkenny hither is twenty long miles, bad road, and no inn at all: but I have an expedient for you. At the foot of a very high hill, just midway, there lives, in a neat thatched cabin, a parson, who is not poor: his wife is allowed to be the best little woman in the world. Her chickens are the fattest, and her ale the best in all the country

* See a letter from lady Betty Germain, dated July 12, 1735.

Besides, the parson has a little cellar of his own, of which he keeps the key, where he always has a hogshead of the best wine that can be got, in bottles well corked, upon their side; and he cleans and pulls out the cork better, I think, than Robin. Here I design to meet you with a coach: if you be tired, you shall stay all night; if not, after dinner, we will set out about four, and be at Cashell by nine; and by going through fields and by-ways, which the parson will show us, we shall escape all the rocky and stony roads that lie between this place and that, which are certainly very bad. I hope you will be so kind as to let me know, a post or two before you set out, the very day you will be at Kilkenny, that I may have all things prepared for you. It may be, if you ask him, Cope will come: he will do nothing for me. Therefore, depending upon your positive promise, I shall add no more arguments to persuade you. And am, with the greatest truth, your most faithful and obedient humble servant, THEO. CASHELL.

TO THE REV. MR. JOHN TOWERS,

Prebendary of St. Patrick's, at Powerscourt, near Bray.

SIR,—I cannot imagine what business it is that so employs you. I am sure it is not to gain money, but to spend it; perhaps it is to new cast and contrive your house and gardens at 400*l.* more expense. I am sorry it should cost you twopence to have an account of my health, which is not worth a penny; yet I struggle, and ride, and walk, and am temperate, and drink wine on purpose to delay, or make abortive, those schemes proposed for a successor; and if I were well I would counterfeit myself sick, as Toby Matthews, archbishop of York, used to do when all the bishops were gaping to succeed him. It is one good sign that giddiness is peculiar to youth, and I find I grow giddier as I grow older, and, therefore, consequently I grow younger. If you will remove six miles nearer I shall be content to come and spunge upon you, as poor as you are; for I cannot venture to be half a day's journey from Dublin, because there is no sufficient medium of flesh between my skin and my bones, particularly in the parts that lie upon the saddle. Therefore, be pleased to send me three dozen ounces of flesh before I attempt such an adventure, or get me a six-mile inn between this town and your house. The cathedral organ and backside are painting and mending, by which I have saved a sermon; and, as the rogues of workmen go on, I may save another.

How, a wonder, came young Acheson to be among you? I believe neither his father nor mother know anything of him; his mother is at Grange with Mrs. Acheson, her mother, and I hear is very ill of her asthma and other disorders, got by cards, and laziness, and keeping ill hours. Ten thousand sacksful of such knights and such sons are, in my mind, neither worth rearing nor preserving. I count upon it that the boy is good for nothing. I am, sir, with great truth, your obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

June 8, 1735.

MADAM,—I trouble you sooner than usual in acknowledging your letter of May 27th, because there are some passages in it that seem to require a quick answer. If I forgot the date of mine, you must impute it to my ill head; and if I live two years longer I shall first forget my own name and last your ladyship's. I gave my lady Kerry an account of what you said in relation to her son, with which she is fully satisfied. I detest the house of lords for their indulgence to such a profligate, prostitute villain as Curll; but am at a loss how he could procure any letters written to Mr. Pope; although, by the vanity or indiscretion of correspondents, the rogue might have picked up some that went from him. Those letters have not yet been sent hither; therefore I can form no judgment on them. When I was leaving England upon the queen's death I burnt all the letters I could find that I had received from ministers for several years before. But as to the letters I receive from your ladyship, I neither ever did nor ever will burn any of them, take it as you please; for I never burn a letter that is entertaining, and consequently will give me new pleasure when it is forgotten. It is true I have kept some letters merely out of friendship, although they sometimes wanted true spelling and good sense, and some others whose writers are dead; for I live like a monk, and hate to forget my departed friends. Yet I am sometimes too nice; for I burnt all my lord *'s letters upon receiving one where he had used these words to me, "all I pretend to is a great deal of sincerity;" which indeed was the chief virtue he wanted. Of those from my lord Halifax I burnt all but one, which I keep as a most admirable original of court promises and professions. I confess also that I have read some passages in many of your letters to a friend, but without naming you, only "that the writer was a lady," which had such marks of good sense that often the hearers would not believe me. And yet I never had a letter of mine printed, nor of any others to me.

Your ladyship very much surprises me with one passage in your letter, which, however, I do not in the least understand; where you say you "have been honoured in print by amorous, satirical, and gallant letters," where there was no word but your bare name mentioned. I can assure you this is to me altogether a riddle, and what I never heard the least syllable of, and wish you would explain it. No, madam, I will never forgive your insolent niece, without a most humble submission under her own hands; which if she will not comply with, I shall draw up letters between us and send them to Curll.

I will tell your ladyship a cause I have of complaint against the duke of Dorset. I have written to him about four times since he was lieutenant; and three of my letters were upon subjects that concerned him much more than it did any friend of mine, and not at all myself; but he was never pleased to return me an answer; which omission (for I disdain to call it contempt) I can account for only by some of the following reasons. He is either extremely busy in affairs of the highest importance; or he is a duke with a garter; or he is a lieutenant of Ireland; or he is of a very ancient noble extraction; or so obscure a man as I am, is not worth his remembrance; or, like the duke of Chandos, he is an utter stranger to me; and it would grieve me to the soul to put them together upon any one article. The last letter I wrote to his grace was upon an affair relating to one of the favourite party, and yet a very honest gentleman; which last circumstance, with submission to your ladyship, is what I seldom grant; and the matter desired was a trifle. The letter before that related to a request made him by a senior fellow of this university, upon which I was earnestly pressed to write by some considerable members of the same body, which it highly concerned, as well as his grace's honour; the demand being directly contrary to their statutes, and of the most pernicious consequence not only to the university but the kingdom; and for that reason it is thought his grace has chosen to let it fall, I suppose by much better causes of conviction than mine. I do assure you, madam, that I have not been troublesome to my lord duke in any particular; since he has been governor, my letters have been at most but once a-year, and my personal requests not so many; nor any of them for the least interest that regarded myself. And although it be true that I do not much approve the conduct of affairs in either kingdom, wherein I agree with vast numbers of both parties, yet I have utterly waived intermeddling even in this enslaved kingdom, where perhaps I might have some influence to be troublesome; yet I have long quitted all such thoughts, out of perfect despair; although I have sometimes wished that the true loyal Whigs here might be a little more considered in the disposition of employments, notwithstanding their misfortune of being born on this side the channel, which would gain abundance of hearts both to the crown and his grace. My paper is so full that I have not room to excuse its length. I remain your ladyship's, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD OXFORD.

Dover-street, June 19, 1735.

GOOD MR. DEAN,—I could not suffer Mr. Jebb to pass into Ireland without giving you the trouble of reading a few lines from your humble servant to inquire how you do, and to return you many thanks for your kind remembrances of me in your letters to my good friend Mr. Pope. I am much concerned for the account you give in your late letter to him of the state of your own health. I should think that the change of air, and seeing some of your remaining friends you have left in this island, would be of service to you, at least to entertain and amuse you; as for any other agreeable view, I cannot pretend to flatter you so far as that you must expect any; that is over, as I believe you know very well; but as I know you to be a truly good-natured man, I hope you will come over, for I assure you it will be an infinite satisfaction and pleasure to your friends to embrace you here. If this motive will not do, I do not know what argument to make use of.

I troubled you last year with an account of the disposal of my daughter; it has in every point answered our expectations and wishes. I was in hopes I should have been able to have given you an account that my daughter was safely brought to bed; we expect it every day. My wife is pretty well; desires your acceptance of her humble service; she among others would be very glad to see you here. My uncle, the auditor, is in a very ill state of health. I am afraid he cannot last very long; his son has this spring put to Westminster school two sons; he has three more and a daughter. Mr Thomas Harley has had the gout, but he is better, and is at his seat in Herefordshire. The duke of Leeds is returned from his travels a fine gentleman, and has imported none of the fopperies and fooleries of the countries he has passed through. My nephew Robert Hay travelled with the duke, and he is come home untainted, but much improved; he is returned to Oxford to follow his studies; he designs for holy orders. My two youngest nephews are still at Westminster school. Lord Dupplin has not yet got an employment, but lives upon hopes and promises.. My sister lives in Yorkshire with her daughters, as well as she can, considering the times, &c. &c. Now I ask your pardon, dear sir, for saying so much of family affairs; but as you are a good man, and have always wished my family well, I have ventured to be thus impertinent to give you the state of it. Master Pope is pretty well; he is under persecution from Curll, who has by some means (wicked ones most certainly) got hold of some of Pope's private letters, which he has printed, and threatens more. We are in so free a state that there is no remedy against these evils.

It is now time to release you from this dull paper, but I must assure you, what I hope you know already, that I am, with true respect and esteem, sir, your most obliged and most faithful humble servant,

OXFORD.

Please to be so good as to make my compliments to lord Orrery.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

June, 1735.

I SUPPOSE you are now angle ling with your tack ling in a purr ling stream, or pad ling and say ling in a boat, or sad ling your stum ling horse with a sap ling in your hands, and snare ling at your groom, or set ling your affairs, or tick ling your cat, or tat ling with your neighbour Price; not always toy ling in your school. This dries ling weather we in Dub ling are glad of a dump ling, and bab ling is our dare ling. Pray do not look as cow ling at me when I come, but get a fat ling for my dinner, or go a fow ling for fill ling my belly. I hope none of your townsfolks are bub ling you. Have you a bow ling green at Cavan? I have been ill of my old ay ling, and yet you see I am now as crib ling. Can you buy me an amb ling nag? I am bat ling for health, and just craw ling out. My breakfast is cut ling sand sugar to cure the curd ling, of my blood. My new summer coat is cock ling already, and I am cal ling for my old one. I am cob ling my riding shoes* and cur ling my riding periwig. My maid's hens keep such a cack ling, and chuck ling, that I scarce know what I write. My mare is just foe ling, for which my groom is grum ling and grow ling, while the other servants are gob ling and gut ling, and the maids gig ling, and the dogs how ling. My bung ling tailor was tip ling from morning to night. Do you know drive ling Doll with her drab ling tail, and drag ling petticoat, and gog ling eyes; always gag ling like a goose, and hob ling to the alehouse, hand ling a mug, and quarry ling and squab ling with porters, or row ling in the kennel? I bought her a muzzle ling pinner. Mr. Wall walks the streets with his strip ling boy, in his sham ling gait, as cuff ling for the wall, and just ling all he meets. I saw his wife with her pop ling gown, pill ling oranges and pick ling cucumbers. Her eyes are no longer spark ling, you may find her twat ling with the neighbours, her nose trick ling, and spaw ling the floor, and then smug ling her husband.

A lady whose understanding was sing ling me out as a wit ling or rather a suck ling, as if she were tick ling my fancy, tang ling me with questions, tell ling me many stories, her tongue toe ling like a clapper; says she, an old man's dar ling is better than a young man's war ling. I liked her dad ling and plain deal ling; she was as wise as a goes ling or a duck ling, yet she counted upon gull ling and grave ling me. Her maid was hack ling flax and hum ling her mistress, and how ling in the Irish manner: I was fool ling and fiddle ling and fade ling an hour with them. We hear Tisdall is puss ling the curates, or mud ling in an alehouse, or muff ling his chops, or rump ling his band, or mum ling songs, though he be but a mid ling versifier at best, while his wife, in her mac ling lace, is mull ling claret, to make her husband maud ling, or mill ling chocolate for her breakfast, or rust ling in her silks, or net ling her spouse, or nurse ling and swill ling her grand-children and a year ling calf,

* As Dr. Swift was on all occasions fond of walking, when he rode he wore strong jack spatterdashes which he could slip off as soon as he alighted from his horse; and to match these spatterdashes he had shoes strong in proportion to bear the dirt and the weather; but he never wore boots.

or oil ling her pimple ling face, or set ling her head dress, or stif ling a f— to a fizz ling, or boy ling sowins for supper, or pew ling for the death of her kit ling, or over rue ling the poor doctor. As to madame votre femme, I find she has been coup ling her daughters; I wish she were to live upon a cod ling, or a chit or ling. She has as mile ling countenance, which is yet better than as well ling belly; I wish she were to go a bull ling and begin with a bill ling, and then go to hick ling. She hath been long as cram ling for power, and would fain be a fond ling, and delights in a fop ling, when she should be fur ling her sails, and fill ling her belly, or game ling about Cavan, or gall ling her company. Why do not you set her a truck ling, with a vengeance, and use her like an under ling, and stop her ray ling, rat ling, rang ling behaviour? I would cure her ram ling and rum ling; but you are spy ling all, by rig ling into her favour, and are afraid of ruff ling her. I hear you are fell ling your timber at Quilca; you love to have a fee ling of money, which is a grove ling temper in you, and you are for shove ling it up like a lord ling, or rather like a star ling. I suppose now you are vail ling your bonnet to every squire. I wish you would grow a world ling, and not be strow ling abroad, nor always shake ling yourself at home. Can I have stabe ling with you for my horse? Pray keep plain wholesome table ling for your boys, and employ your maids in teaz ling cloth and reel ling yarn, and unravel ling thread without stay ling it. Set the boys a race ling for diversion; set the scullion a rid ling the cinders without rife ling them. Get some scrub to teach the young boys their spell ling, and the cow-boy to draw small beer without spill ling or pall ling it; have no more pis to ling lads: employ yourself in nay ling your broken stools. Whip all the libel ling rogues who are loll ling out their tongues, and kind ling quarrels, and rave eye ling their school-fellows, and stick ling with their seniors, and snuff ling in a jeer, and scraw ling on the school walls, and scut ling to the pie house, and yawl ling and yell ling to frighten little children, and fowl ling the house for mischief sake, and grape ling with the girls. Pray take care of spy ling your younger daughters, or sty ling them pets. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO SIR CHARLES WOGAN,
In Spain.

HONOURED SIR,—I think you are the only person alive who can justly charge me with ingratitude; because, although I was utterly unknown to you, and become an obscure exile in a most obscure and enslaved country, you were at the pains to find me out, and send me your very agreeable writings, with which I have often entertained some very ingenious friends, as well as myself: I mean not only your poetry in Latin and English, but your poetical history in prose of your own life and actions inscribed to me; which I often wished it were safe to print here, or in England, under the madness of universal party now reigning: I mean particularly in this kingdom, to which I would prefer living among the Hottentots, if it were in my power.

I have been often told that you have a brother and some near relations in this country; and have oftener employed my friends in vain to learn when any of them came to this town. But, I suppose on account of their religion, they are so prudent as to live in privacy; although the court has thought it better in point of politics (and, to keep the good will of cardinal Fleury, has thought it proper), to make the catholics here much more easy than their ill-willers, of no religion, approve of in their hearts. And I can assure you that those wretches here, who call themselves a parliament, abhor the clergy of our church more than those of yours, and have made a universal association to defraud us of our undoubted dues.

I have further thanks to give you for your generous present of excellent Spanish wine, whereof I have been so choice that my butler tells me there are still some bottles left. I did very often ask some merchants here who trade with Spain, whether this country could not afford something that might be acceptable in Spain; but could not get any satisfaction. The price I am sure would be but a trifle. And I am told by one of them, that he heard you were informed of my desire; to which you answered in a disinterested manner, "that you only desired my works." It is true, indeed, that a printer here, about a year ago, did collect all that was printed in London which passed for mine, as well as several single papers in verse and prose, that he could get from my friends; and desired my leave to publish them in four volumes. He reasoned, "that printers here had no property in their copies; that mine would fall into worse hands; that he would submit to me and my friends what to publish or omit." On the whole, I would not concern myself, and so they have appeared abroad, as you will see them in those I make bold to send you. I must now return to mention wine. The last season for it was very bad in France: upon which our merchants have raised the price twenty per cent. already, and the present weather is not likely to mend it. Upon this I have told some merchants my opinion, or perhaps my fancy, that when the warmth of summer happens to fail in the several wine countries, Spain and Portugal wines, and those of the south of Italy, will be at least as ripe as those of France in a good year. If there be any truth in this conceit, I would desire our merchants to deal this year in those warmer climates; because I hear that in Spain French vines are often planted, and the wine is more mellow; although, perhaps, the natural Spanish grape may fail for want of its usual share of sun. In this point I would have your opinion; wherein if you agree, I will direct Mr. Hall, an honest catholic merchant here, who deals in Spanish wine, to bring me over as large a cargo as I can afford, of wines as like French claret as he can get; for my disorders, with the help of years, make wine absolutely necessary to support me. And if you were not a person of too considerable a rank (and now become half a Spaniard), I would try to make you descend so low as to order some merchants there to consign to some of ours, directed to me, some good quantity of wine that you approve of; such as our claret drinkers here will be content with; for when I give them a pale wine (called by Mr. Hall caesalia) they say it will do for one glass, and then (to speak in their language) call for honest claret.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD HOWTH.

Kilfane, July 6, 1735.

I AM very much obliged to my good dean of St. Patrick's for the honour he did me in sitting for his picture; and have wrote to Dr. Grattan to give Mr. Bindon strict charge in the finishing of it; and when that is done to bring it to his house, for fear I should get a copy instead of the original. I am very much concerned at the account you give me of your health, but do not in the least doubt but the change of air would be of service to you, and a most hearty welcome you may be sure of. The archbishop of Cashell told me he would wait on you the day after he went to Dublin; and does mightily admire he has not seen you oftener. I have taken your advice, and kept very good hours since I came last here. Every second day I am out six or seven hours an otter-hunting. As to reading and working, my wife observes your directions; and could wish she would do the same as to exercise. She desires me to tell you that the liking she has to the baboon[a] is out of the true regard she has for you, he being one of your greatest favourites. Your giant[b] will use her endeavours to make lord Bacon a liar, and instead of adding two inches to her height, would be very well satisfied to part with four. I am very sorry Mrs. Acheson is so much out of order; she is one I have a great regard for; and shall desire the favour of you to give my wife's service and mine to her and lady Acheson, when you see them. I thank God my family and I are very well. Some time this summer I design drinking Ballispellin waters for a month. As for news, we have no such thing here: only the baboon has done his visitation; that is, he goes into the churches and looks about, then asks the tumbler Sykes how long they have been coming? So long, says Sykes. Ay, replies the baboon, and we shall be as long going back: so mounts his horse and away. Who durst say the church is in danger when we have so good bishops? My wife and all here join in their kind service to the Drapier. I am, good Mr. dean, your most assured and affectionate humble servant, HOWTH.

TO MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

Dublin, July 12, 1735.

DEAR MR. ALDERMAN,—I write to you at the command of a gentleman for whom I have a perfect friendship and esteem, and the request he desires me to make appears to me altogether reasonable. The gentleman I mean is doctor Helsham, the most eminent physician of this city and kingdom. There is a person of quality, an intimate friend of the doctor's, my lord Tyrone, formerly sir Tristram Beresford, who is a tenant to the Londonderry Society. His lordship is going to build two houses upon their estate; and to assist him in so good a work, I desire that when the particulars of the request shall be laid before the society, you, who are the governor, will please, if you find them just and reasonable, to forward them as far as lies in your power; by which you will much oblige me and several worthy persons, particularly my friend Dr. Helsham.

Do you sometimes honour poor Mrs. Barber with a visit? We are afraid here that the gout has got too strong a possession of her, and pray let me have some account of your own health: I wish we three valetudinarians were together, we should make excellent company; but I can drink my pint of wine twice a-day, which I doubt both of you could not do in a week. I long excessively to be in England, but am afraid of being surprised by my old disorder in my head, far from help, or at least from conveniency; and I dare not so much as travel here without being near enough to come back in the evening to lie in my own bed. These are the effects of living too long: and the public miseries of this kingdom add to my disease. I am, dear sir, with true esteem and friendship, your most obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] The bishop of Ossory so called:—

Could you see his grim grace, for a pound to a penny,
You'd swear it must be the baboon of Kilkenny.
See Swift's Poem on the Bishops.

[b] Miss Rice, an exceeding tall young lady, and niece to my lord Howth.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

London, July 12, 1735.

I HAVE not answered yours of the 15th of June so soon as I should; but the duke of Dorset had answered all yours ere your letter came to my hands. So I hope all causes of complaint are at an end, and that he has showed himself as he is, much your friend and humble servant, though he wears a garter, and had his original from Normandy, if heralds do not lie or his grannams did not play false; and while he is lord-lieutenant (which I heartily wish may not be much longer), I dare say will be very glad of any opportunity to do what you recommend to him. Thus far I will answer for his grace, though he is now in the country and cannot subscribe to it himself.

Now to quite another affair. The countess of Suffolk (whom you know I have long had a great esteem and value for) has been so good and gracious as to take my brother George Berkeley for better, for worse; though I hope in God the last will not happen, because I think he is an honest, good-natured man. The town is surprised; and the town talks, as the town loves to do, upon these ordinary extraordinary occasions. She is indeed four or five years older than he, and no more; but for all that, he has appeared to all the world as well as to me to have long had (that is, ever since she has been a widow, so pray do not mistake me) a most violent passion for her, as well as esteem and value for her numberless good qualities. These things well considered, I do not think they have above ten to one against their being very happy: and if they should not be so, I shall heartily wish him hanged, because I am sure it will be wholly his fault. As to her fortune, though she has been twenty years a court-favourite, yet I doubt she has been too disinterested to enlarge it as others would have done. And sir Robert [Walpole], her greatest enemy, does not tax her with getting quite 40,000*l.* I wish—but fear it is not near that sum. But what she has she never told me, nor have I ever asked; but whatever it is, they must live accordingly; and he had of his own wherewithal to live by himself easily and genteelly.

In this hurry of matrimony I had like to forget to answer that part of your letter where you say you never heard of our being in print together. I believe it was about twenty years ago Mr. Curll set forth "Letters Amorous, Satirical, and Gallant, between Dr. Swift, Lady Mary Chambre, Lady Betty Germain, and Mrs. Anne Long, and several other Persons." I am afraid some of my people used them according to their desert; for they have not appeared above ground this great while. And now to the addition of writing the brave large hand you make me do for you, I have bruised my fingers prodigiously, and can say no more but adieu.

July 16, 1735.

DEAR SIR,—I received your 20*l.* from lord Lanesborough's agent yesterday, and it travels to you from this on Saturday next, by one John Donaldson, one of our nobility. You will get it I believe on Monday. I have nothing to say to the 380*l.* you mention. That is, as I told you, the fine and rent of Drumlane which I owe the bishop, and which will be paid him August 26th. I cleared off the rent which I owed him for your purchase the other day, or I should have sent your poor money, poor as I am, before this. Now are you satisfied that I am not negligent or giddy? But what in the name of God is the matter with you to delay so long? Can I oversee my workmen and a school too? If you will not come and take your charge in hand, I must employ somebody else. There is a long walk begun: stones a-drawing home for an addition to my house: the schoolhouse repaired at the charge of the county: a gravel-walk from the market-cross to my house at the town's expense; item, a gravel-walk by the river, which will all require your attendance. As you were a good and faithful overseer of my improvements at Quilca, I am willing to employ you rather than another: therefore I expect your answer immediately, for the summer is flying off apace. My lord Orrery wrote to me that he would come from Munster to see me soon; if you will but have the prudence to be here, you may have a fair opportunity of recommending yourself to him: and I shall perhaps give you the character of a vigilant overseer if I find you be not altered since you were last in my service.

Now to be serious. I shall send you some venison soon. You shall know next Monday when it sets out; and you are to dispose of it thus:—

To Dr. Helsham, four cuts.
Dr. Delany, four.
Mrs. Helsham, one and a half.
Mrs. Whiteway, ditto.
Lady Acheson, because of her good stomach, three scruples.
Mr. Worrall, a pound and a quarter.

Pray let them be all wrapped up in clean paper and sent to the several above-mentioned persons. Dine upon the rest with your own company.

I have got you a mare, a very easy trotter; she shall go up with the venison. Whether she will be shy at your city objects I know not; here she is not in the least. Your best way will be to let your servant ride her. She is one of my own rearing, sprung of a good-natured family. If you like, she costs you nothing but a low bow when you come to Cavan. I have a chaise just finished to the lining in Dublin, made by a man so much in my debt: it will be your best way to come down in it. I tell you a project I have which I believe will do: my scholars are to club and build me a little library in my garden. The lime and stones (freestone) are in my own fields, and building is dog-cheap here.

I beseech you let me know how soon you will be here, that all things may be to your heart's desire: such venison! such mutton! such small beer! such chickens! such butter! such trouts! such pouts! such ducks! such beef! such fish! such eels! such turkeys! such fields! such groves! such lakes! such ladies! such fruit! such potatoes! such raspberries! such bilberries! and such a boat as Mr. Hamilton's were never yet seen in any one county yet!

God Almighty bless you and send you safe to our Elysium. My service to Mrs. Whiteway, and to everybody in Dublin, man, woman, and child. I am, with all respect, your most obedient and very humble servant, THOMAS SHERIDAN.

FROM MR. MOTTE.

London, July 31, 1735.

HONOURED SIR,—I have not had an opportunity of writing to you otherwise than by the post for above a twelvemonth; and though in that time I did trouble you with a letter or two relating to Mr. Lancelot's business, yet I thought proper to mention only what related to that particular, considering I was then under the hands of the law, whence I was not discharged till the last day of the last term. I do not doubt but you have heard before now that Mrs. Barber was discharged at the same time.

I desired therefore Mrs. Hyde* to deliver this to your own hand, and make bold to trouble you with an account of some transactions which have happened within these two years, which I have long wished for the pleasure of doing by word of mouth, in hopes my behaviour would be excused at least (if not approved) by you, the assurance whereof I should receive with the utmost satisfaction.

Soon after Mr. Pilkington had received the twenty guineas you ordered me to pay him, "the Life and Character" was offered me, though not by his own hands, yet by his means, as I was afterward convinced by many circumstances: one was that he corrected the proof sheets with his own hand; and as he said he had seen the original of that piece, I could not imagine he would have suffered your name to be put to it if it had not been genuine. When I found by your advertisement and the letter you were pleased to write to me, that I had been deceived by him, I acted afterward with more reserve, and refused a pamphlet about Norton's will which he pretended came from an eminent hand. It was bought afterward by another bookseller, who printed it, and lost money by it.

He could not forbear observing my coldness, and applied to Mr. Gilliver about the copy of verses for which we were all brought into trouble; and by the way, when once an affair was communicated to two persons it was not in the power of any one, how just and faithful soever, to answer for its being kept a secret. It was published three months before it was taken notice of; and when the printer was taken up and had named Gilliver as the bookseller, and it was reported a warrant was out against G., and he was likely to be apprehended next morning, we two had a meeting over night, and I promised to take the advice of a gentleman of sense and honour whose name I did not mention to him, and to meet G. early the next morning at a certain tavern to consult further. Accordingly, I went to a gentleman in Cork-street, and from thence to the tavern we had appointed to meet at, where, after I had waited above an hour, a message was sent me that I need stay no longer, for Mr. G. was gone to Westminster, and would not come. I went to see him in the messenger's hands, but he was so closely watched by a couple of sharp sluts, the messenger's daughters, that I could say nothing to him but about indifferent matters. The consequence was he was examined, and made a confession like poor Dr. Yalden's, of all that he knew, and more too: naming Mr. Pilkington first and then myself; which last, as many people have told me, was unnecessary; only, as he before said, he was resolved if he came into trouble I should have a share of it, though I offered, in case he would not name me, that I would bear one half of his expenses. This confession of his, together with his bearing the character of a wealthy man, exposed him to an information; but as it was not my business to be industrious in recollecting what passed three months before, I could not remember anything that could affect me or anybody else.

I am sorry for the trouble this has caused to poor Mrs. Barber. I saw her the other day: she was confined to her bed with the gout. She desired when I wrote that I would present her humble service to you.

I would be glad to receive your directions what I must do with the two notes I have under Mr. Pilkington's hands of ten guineas each. They were allowed by you in the last account we settled; but whether you would please they should be destroyed or sent over to you I am not certain. As for the state of the account, as I have heard no exception to it, I flatter myself you find it all right.

* Widow to Mr. Hyde, bookseller in Dublin.

Mr. Faulkner's impression of four volumes has had its run. I was advised that it was in my power to have given him and his agents sufficient vexation by applying to the law; but that I could not sue him without bringing your name into a court of justice, which absolutely determined me to be passive. I am told he is about printing them in an edition in twelves; in which case I humbly hope you will please to lay your commands upon him (which, if he has any sense of gratitude, must have the same power as an injunction in chancery) to forbear sending them over here. If you think this request to be reasonable, I know you will comply with it: if not, I submit.

As we once had a meeting upon this affair, and he may possibly have misrepresented the offers he then made me, I beg leave to assure you that his proposal was that I should have paid him a larger price for the book than I could have had it printed for here in England; and surely I had the same right of printing them here as he had in Ireland, especially having bought and paid for them. If he made any other offer, I declare I misunderstood him; and I am sure if I had complied with those terms I should have been a laughing-stock to the whole trade.

Mr. Pope has published a second volume of his poetical works, of which I suppose he has made you a present. I am surprised to see he owns so little in the four volumes, and speaks of these few things as inconsiderable. I am a stranger to what part of the copy money he received:[a] but you, who know better, are a competent judge whether he deserved it. "I always thought the 'Art of Sinking' was his, though he there disowns it."[b]

Curll's edition of Letters to and from Mr. Pope, I suppose you have seen. They were taken notice of in the house of lords; and Curll was ruffled for them in a manner as, to a man of less impudence than his own, would have been very uneasy. It has provoked Mr. Pope to promise the world a genuine edition, with many additions. It is plain the rascal has no knowledge of those letters of yours that Ewin of Cambridge has. Few as they are, he would tack some trash to them, and make a five or six shilling book of them.

The "Persian Letters" have been well received, so I chose to send them; beside that they make a convenient cover for this letter.

Mr. Tooke, who desires me to present his most humble service to you, acquainted me some time ago of your intention to erect an hospital for lunatics and idiots. I am glad to find by the newspapers that so noble a design proceeds; for beside the general benefit to mankind that is obvious to everybody, I am persuaded there will be a particular one arise by your example: namely, that you will lay down a scheme, which will be a pattern for future founders of public hospitals, to prevent many of the vile abuses which, in process of time, do creep into those foundations, by the indolence, ignorance, or knavery of the trustees. I have seen so many scandalous instances of misapplications of that kind, as have raised my indignation so, that I can hardly think upon it with temper; and I heartily congratulate you that a heart to bestow is joined in you with a head to contrive: and therefore, without any mercenary views, (at the same time not declining any instance of your favour,) I would beg leave to say, that as, while your thoughts are employed in this generous undertaking, you must necessarily consider it in the light I have placed it in; so, if you would please to communicate these thoughts to the public, you might possibly give useful hints to persons of fortune and beneficent intentions, though of inferior abilities. I heartily wish you success in this and all other your undertakings; being, with grateful respect, sir, your obliged and obedient humble servant,

B. MOTTE.

Upon second thoughts I have enclosed Mr. Pilkington's two notes; for I do not see how they can possibly be of any service to you on this side the water.

[a] Mr. Pope sold the Miscellanies for a considerable sum, and offered part of it to Dr. Swift, which he refused.

[b] The "Art of Sinking" was written by Mr. Pope.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

August 13, 1735.

DEAR SIR,—Because of some dropping young lads coming to me, and because it was impossible for me to get any money before the 23rd of this month, I could not fix my vacation. Now I do. On Saturday se'nnight, the 23rd, I set out for Dublin to bring you home: and so, without ifs, ands, and ors, get ready before our fields be stripped of all their gaiety. I thank God I have every good thing in plenty but money; and that, as affairs are likely to go, will not be my complaint a month longer. Belturbet Fair will make me an emperor. I have all this town, and six men of my own, at work at this juncture, to make you a winter-walk by the river-side. I have raised mountains of gravel, and diverted the river's course for that end—Regis opus; you will wonder and be delighted when you see it. Your works at Quilca are to be as much inferior to ours here as a sugar-loaf to an Egyptian pyramid. We had a county of Armagh rogue, one Mackay, hanged yesterday: Griffith the player never made so merry an exit. He invited his audience the night before, with a promise of giving them such a speech from the gallows as they never heard: and indeed he made his words good; for no man was ever merrier at a christening than he was upon the ladder.

When he mounted to his proper height, he turned his face to each side of the gallows, and said, in a cheerful manner, "Hah, my friend, am I come to you at last!" Then, turning to the people, "Gentlemen, you need not stand so thick, for the farthest shall hear me as easily as the nearest." Upon this a fellow interrupted him, and asked him, "Did he know anything of a gray mare which was stolen from him?" "Why, what if I should, would you pay for a mass for my soul?"—"Ay, by G—," said the fellow, "will I pay for seven."—"Why then," said the criminal, laughing, "I know nothing of your mare." After this he entertained the company with two hours' history of his villanies, in a loud unconcerned voice. At last he concluded with his humble service to one of the inhabitants of our town, desiring that he might give him a night's lodging, which was all he would trouble him for. He was not the least touched by any liquor; but soberly and intrepidly desired the hangman to do his office: and at last went off with a joke. Match me this with any of your Englishmen, if you can. I have no more news from Cavan, but that you have all their hearts, and mine among the rest, if it be worth anything. My love, and service to Mrs. Whiteway, and all friends. I am, dear sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

THOMAS SHERIDAN.

TO THE ARCHBISHOP OF CASHELL.

Dublin, August 14, 1735.

MY LORD,—The bearer, Mr. Faulkner, our famous printer, goes in an hour to see Kilkenny and Cashell, to gather up his country debts. Ten to one your grace may owe him a dozen shillings, and your town coffee-house (if you have one) a dozen more. But his pretences to me for writing, are the honour of being admitted to your grace by a line in my hand. I am not in fear of his shaming me as others have done; however, I would not have you leave your manuscripts scattered about your room, for he would be terribly tempted to beg them, and return them back next winter in four volumes, as he served me; although I never let him touch or see one. He has the name of an honest man, and has good sense and behaviour. I have ordered him to mark narrowly whatever you are doing, as a prelate, an architect, a country gentleman, a politician, and an improver, and to bring me a faithful account when he returns; but chiefly about your health, and what exercise you make use of to increase or preserve it. But he is in haste to be gone, and I am forced to conclude. I am, with the greatest respect, my lord, your grace's most obedient humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO LORD HOWTH.

Dublin, August 14, 1735.

MY LORD,—The bearer, Mr. Faulkner, came to me just an hour before he was taking a journey to Kilkenny and Cashell, and desired I would write by him to your lordship and the archbishop, only to let your lordship know that he is an honest man, and the chief printer; and that I know him, and treat him with indulgence, because I cannot help it. For, although he printed what I never would have done, yet he got the consent of my friends, and so I shall get nothing by being angry with him. He hopes, as a citizen, to be admitted to your lords and ladies in the country, and I am contented you shall make him welcome; but take care you put no manuscripts in his hands; otherwise, perhaps, there will be the works of the right hon. &c., and of my lady and the giant, neatly bound, next winter. My lady Acheson has not been well since she left the town; but her mother is almost perfectly cured, except the loss of her eye. I owe my lady Howth[a] a letter, I believe. I desire my most humble service to her and the giant. I have time to say no more, but that I am your lordship's most obedient servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO ALDERMAN BARBER.

September 3, 1735.

SIR,—The bearer, Mr. Faulkner, tells me he has the honour to be known to you, and that I have credit enough to prevail on you to do him all the good offices that lie in your way. I presume he goes about some affairs that relate to his own calling, which would be of little value to him here, if he were not the printer most in vogue, and a great undertaker, perhaps too great a one: wherein you are able to be the best adviser, provided he be not too sanguine, by representing things better than he probably may find them in this wretched, beggarly, enslaved country. To my great grief, my disorder is of such a nature, and so constantly threatening, that I dare not ride so far as to be a night from ——: and yet when the weather is fair I seldom fail to ride ten or a dozen miles. Mr. Faulkner will be able to give you a true journal of my life; that I generally dine at home, and alone, and have not two houses in this great kingdom where I can get a bit of meat twice a-year. That I very seldom go to church for fear of being seized with a fit of giddiness in the midst of the service. I hear you have likewise some ailments to struggle with, yet I am a great deal leaner than you: but I have one advantage, that wine is good for me, and I drink a bottle to my own share every day to bring some heat into my stomach. Dear Mr. Alderman, what a number of dear and great friends have we buried, or seen driven to exile, since we came acquainted! I did not know till six months after that my best friend, my lady Masham, was gone. I would be glad to know whether her son be good for anything, because I much doubted when I saw him last. Tell me, do you make constant use of exercise? It is all I have to trust to, though not in regard to life, but to health: I know nothing wherein years make so great a change as in the difference of matter in conversation and writing. My thoughts are wholly taken up in considering the best manner I ought to die, and how to dispose of my poor fortune for the best public charity. But in conversation I trifle more and more every day, and I would not give threepence for all I read, or write, or think in the compass of a year.

Well, God bless you, and preserve your life as long as you can reasonably desire. I take my age with less mortification, because, if I were younger, I should probably outlive the liberty of England, which, without some unexpected assistance from Heaven, many thousands now alive will see governed by an absolute monarch.

Farewell, dear sir; and believe me to be, with true esteem, your most obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. POPE.

September 3, 1735.

THIS letter will be delivered to you by Faulkner, the printer, who goes over on his private affairs. This is an answer to yours of two months ago, which complains of that profligate fellow Curll. I heartily wish you were what they call disaffected, as I am. I may say as David did, I have sinned greatly, but what have these sheep done! You have given no offence to the ministry, nor to the lords, nor commons, nor queen, nor the next in power. For you are a man of virtue, and therefore must abhor vice and all corruption, although your discretion holds the reins. "You need not fear any consequence in the commerce that has so long passed between us; although I never destroyed one of your letters. But my executors are men of honour and virtue, who have strict orders in my will to burn every letter left behind me." Neither did our letters contain any turns of wit, or fancy, or politics, or satire, but mere innocent friendship; yet I am loath that any letters from you and a very few other friends should die before me; I believe we neither of us ever leaned our head upon our left hand to study what we should write next; yet we have held a constant intercourse from your youth and my middle age, and from your middle age it must be continued till my death, which my bad state of health makes me expect every month. I have the ambition, and it is very earnest, as well as in haste, to have one epistle inscribed to me while I am alive, and you just in the time when wit and wisdom are in the height; I must once more repeat Cicero's desire to a friend: orna me. A month ago were sent me over, by a friend of mine, the works of John Hughes, esq.; they are in verse and prose. I never heard of the man in my life, yet I find your name as a subscriber too. He is too grave a poet for me, and I think among the mediocribus in prose as well as verse. I have the honour to know Dr. Rundle; he is indeed worth all the rest you ever sent us, but that is saying nothing, for he answers your character; I have dined thrice in his company. He brought over a worthy clergyman of this kingdom as his chaplain, which was a very wise and popular action. His only fault is, that he drinks no wine, and I drink nothing else.

[a] Lucy, youngest daughter of lieutenant-general Richard Gorges, was married to lord Howth, August 1, 1728; and after that nobleman's death became the lady of Nicholas Welden, of Gravelment, esq.

This kingdom is now absolutely starving, by the means of every oppression that can be inflicted on mankind—shall I not visit for these things? saith the Lord. You advise me right, not to trouble myself about the world: but oppression tortures me, and I cannot live without meat and drink, nor get either without money; and money is not to be had, except they will make me a bishop, or a judge, or a colonel, or a commissioner of the revenues. Adieu.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. POPE.

To answer your question as to Mr. Hughes, what he wanted as to genius he made up as an honest man: but he was of the class you think him.

I am glad you think of Dr. Rundle as I do. He will be an honour to the bishops, and a disgrace to one bishop; two things you will like: but what you will like more particularly, he will be a friend and benefactor even to your unfriended, unbenefited nation; he will be a friend to the human race wherever he goes. Pray tell him my best wishes for his health and long life: I wish you and he came over together, or that I were with you. I never saw a man so seldom whom I liked so much as Dr. Rundle.

Lord Peterborough I went to take a last leave of at his setting sail for Lisbon: no body can be more wasted, no soul can be more alive. Immediately after the severest operation, of being cut into the bladder for a suppression of urine, he took coach and got from Bristol to Southampton. This is a man that will neither live nor die like any other mortal.

Poor lord Peterborough! There is another string lost that would have helped to draw you hither! he ordered on his death-bed his watch to be given me (that which accompanied him in all his travels), with this reason, "That I might have something to put me every day in mind of him." It was a present to him from the king of Sicily, whose arms and insignia are graved on the inner case; on the outer I have put this inscription: "Victor Amadeus, rex Siciliæ, dux Sabaudiæ, &c. &c. Carolo Mordaunt, Comiti de Peterborow, D.D. Car. Mor. Com. de Pet. Alexandro Pope moriens legavit. 1735."

Pray write to me a little oftener: and if there be a thing left in the world that pleases you, tell it one who will partake of it. I hear with approbation and pleasure that your present care is to relieve the most helpless of this world, those objects [idiots and maniacs] which most want our compassion, though generally made the scorn of their fellow-creatures, such as are less innocent than they. You always think generously; and of all charities this is the most disinterested and least vain-glorious, done to such as never will thank you, or can praise you for it.

God bless you with ease, if not with pleasure; with a tolerable state of health, if not with its full enjoyment; with a resigned temper of mind, if not a very cheerful one. It is upon these terms I live myself, though younger than you; and I repine not at my lot, could but the presence of a few that I love be added to these. Adieu.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

September 4, 1735.

IF you are not angry with me for my long silence, I take it ill, and need make no excuse; and if you are angry, then I would willingly make you sorry too, which I know you will be when I tell you that I was laid up at Knowle with a severe fit of the gout. And since that infallible cure for all diseases, which all great fools and talkers wish joy of, I have never been quite well, but have had continually some disorder or other upon me, which made my head and spirits unfit for writing, or indeed doing anything I should; and am still so much out of order, that I am under great apprehensions I shall not be able to go next year part of the journey to Ireland with their graces; which is also part of the road to Drayton, where I intend to stay till November, in hopes that summer deferred its coming till I was there: for I am sure hitherto we have had little but winter weather.

I am glad matters are settled between his grace of Dorset and you; and I dare answer, as you are both right thinkers, and of course upright actors, there wants but little explanation between you, since I, that am the go-between, can easily find out that he has as sincere a value for you as you have for him. I do assure you I am extremely delighted, that since lady Suffolk would take a master (commonly called a husband), she chose my brother George: for if I am not partial to him, which indeed I do not know that I am, his sincere value, love, and esteem for her must make him a good one.

We are now full of expectation of his royal highness's wedding.[a] She has jewels bought for her, and clothes bespoke; and a gallery of communication is making between his apartment and St. James's; but as I do not love to pry into mysteries of state, I do not at all know when the lady will come over.

Your friend Mrs Floyd is grown fat and well under the duchess of Dorset's care and direction at Knowle; and my saucy niece is gone for a few days (and I verily believe as far as she can decently help) to her father's. Our friend Curll has again reprinted what he called our letters, as a proper third part of Mr. Pope's. He should have made those bitter, silly verses on me to have been his too, instead of sir William Trumbull's, whom they just as much belonged to. But your patriots are so afraid of suppressing the press, that everybody must suffer under that and the lies of the newspapers without hopes of redress. Adieu, my dear dean.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

September 12, 1735.

HERE is a very ingenious observation upon the days of the week, and in rhyme, worth your observation, and very proper for the information of boys and girls, that they may not forget to reckon them: Sunday's a pun day, Monday's a dun day, Tuesday's a news day, Wednesday's a friend's day, Thursday's a cursed day, Friday's a dry day, Saturday's the latter day. I intend something of equal use upon the months: as January, women vary. I shall likewise in due time make some observation upon each year as it passes. So for the present year:

One thousand seven hundred and thirty-five,
When only the d—— and b——ps will thrive

And for the next:

One thousand seven hundred and thirty-six,
When the d—— will carry the b——ps to Styx.

Perge.

One thousand seven hundred and thirty-seven,
When the Whigs are so blind they mistake hell for heav'n

I will carry these predictions no further than to year 2001, when the learned think the world will be at an end, or the fine-all cat-a-strow-fee.

The last is the period, two thousand and one,
When m— and b— to hell are all gone.

---

a Frederick, then prince of Wales.

When that time comes, pray remember the discovery came from me.

It is now time I should begin my letter. I hope you got safe to Cavan, and have got no cold in those two terrible days. All your friends are well, and I as I used to be. I received yours. My humble service to your lady and love to your children. I suppose you have all the news sent to you. I hear of no marriages going on. One dean Cross, an eminent divine, we hear is to be bishop of Cork. Stay till I ask a servant what Patrick's bells ring for so late at night—You fellow, is it for joy or sorrow? I believe it some of our royal birthdays. O, they tell me it is for joy a new master is chosen for the corporation of butchers. So farewell.

FROM LORD BATHURST.

Cirencester, September 13, 1735.

Dear Dean,—Though you never answer any of my letters, and I can never have a line from you except in Parliament-time about an Irish cause, I do insist that without delay you give me, either by yourself or agents, immediate satisfaction in these points. First, whether that article which I read in the news about one Butler, a shooting parson, be true or not? Secondly, whether he has yet begged pardon, and attested upon oath that it was without design and by accident that the gun went off? In case the fact be true, and that he has not yet made any sufficient or reasonable excuse, I require of you that you do immediately get some able painter to draw his picture and send it over to me, and I will order a great number of prints to be made of it, which shall be dispersed over all parts of the known world, that such a worthless rascal may not go anywhere without being known. I make no doubt of his being immediately drove out of Ireland; such a brutal attempt upon the Drapier cannot be borne there; and he would not venture into England when these prints of his person are sent about, for he would certainly be knocked on the head in the first village he passes through. Perhaps he may think to skulk in Holland, the common refuge of all scoundrels; but he would find out that doctor Swuft (for so they pronounce the name) is in great esteem there for his learning and political writings. In France he would meet with worse reception, for his wit is relished there; and many of his tracts, though spoiled by translation, are yet more admired than what is written by any among themselves. Should he go into Spain, he would find that Don Swifto is in the highest estimation, being thought to be lineally descended from Miguel de Cervantes, by a daughter of Quevedo's. Perhaps he may think to be safe in Poland during the time of these troubles: but I can assure him, from the mouth of a Polish lady who was lately in London, by name Madame de Montmorency (for she was married to a French gentleman of that great family), that Dr. Swift is perfectly well known there; and she was very solicitous to know whether he were a Stanislaist or not, she being a zealous partisan for that cause.

Now if this brute of a parson should find no security in Europe, and therefore slip into the East Indies in some Dutch ship (for a Dutchman may be found who would carry the devil for a stiver or two extraordinary), he will be confoundedly surprised to find that Dr. Swift is known in China, and that next to Confucius his writings are in the greatest esteem. The missionaries have translated several European books into their language; but I am well informed that none of them have taken so well as his; and the Chinese, who are a very ingenious people, reckon Sif the only author worth reading. It is well known that in Persia Kouli Khan was at the pains to translate his works himself; being born a Scotchman, he understood them very well, and I am credibly informed that he read "The Battle of the Books" the night before he gave that great defeat to the Persian army. If he hears of this, he may imagine that he shall find good reception at Constantinople; but he will be bit there; for many years ago an English renegado slave translated Effendi Soif for them, and told them it was written by an Englishman, with a design to introduce the Mahometan religion; this having got him his liberty; and although it is not believed by the effendi, the book and the author are in the greatest esteem among them. If he goes into America, he will not be received into any English, French, or Spanish settlement: so that in all probability he would be soon scalped by the wild Indians; and in truth there would be no manner of shame that a head should be uncovered that has so little brains in it. Brutality and ill nature proceed from the want of sense; therefore, without having ever heard of him before, I can decide what he is from this single action. Now I really believe no layman could have done such a thing. The wearing petticoats gives to most of the clergy (a few only excepted of superior understanding) certain feminine dispositions. They are commonly subject to malice and envy, and give more free vent to those passions; possibly for the same reason that women are observed to do so, because they cannot be called to account for it. When one of us does a brutal action to another, he may have his head broke or be whipped through the lungs: but all who wear petticoats are secure from such accidents. Now, to avoid further trouble, I hope by this time his gown is stripped off his back and the boys of Dublin have drawn him through a horse-pond. Send me an account of this and I shall be satisfied. Adieu, dear dean; I am got to the end of my paper, but you may be assured that my regard for you will only end with the last breath of your faithful servant.

Will you let me know whether such coin can pass in Dublin? that I may pay you some money which I owe. My purse, God help me, is grown as slender as a famished weasel. I long much to see it have an alderman's belly; but

[a] "I cannot but reprimand you for writing so long an epistle about business, when to my knowledge you could as easily write upon nothing. Mr. Dean, what is your meaning to play on us in every epistle you write in Anglo Latino? Cannot you write in a plain method, as I do? I know you are a punner on all occasions. But cannot you get another subject to satirize besides my wife?"

[b] "I know you say it is every day of her life, but I say it is not true, for it is only every hour of it. She swears if you come to Cavan she will give you a dowse in the chops."

Quando, Mr. Dean, quando? We cannot say that our weather is the devil here; for it is all water. If it continues, I must have thoughts of building an ark; but I shall not, like Noah, let any unclean beast enter. Eat pone linck waiter conjux. [Et pone linquetur conjux.] My mutton is growing too fat, and I want you much to eat of it while it is in its prime. I hear of no cadger going to Dublin, or I would send you a basket full of it. All I can do now is to send a fine roasted shoulder in my wishes, and pray invite Mrs. Whiteway to share of it. I wish you both a good stomach to it, with all my heart. Pray do not chide her for asking you to eat, as you used to do. I assure you (if I may be allowed to judge) she presses you to her victuals out of pure good nature and friendship.

I am sorry that the shortness of my last letter gave you cause to complain. This shall may cup for that deaf he she Ann she, [make up for that deficiency] for I have laid in a good stock of learning this last week; and therefore quoniam tu inter literatos primaria sedes in classe, quorundam decanorum nomina (minime nostratium) qui scientiis omnigenis inclaruerunt, tibi mittam. This part I mention in Latin, for fear the letter should fall into dean Crosse's hands.

Having lately read a very entertaining book, whose title-page runs thus—Histoire Generale des Pais-bas, I met with accounts of several great men whose names I never read before, and every one of them were deans, some became bishops, others cardinals: all of them on account of their great learning and merit. Lord, have mercy upon us! Christ, have mercy upon us! How the world is altered since! But you must know, that Charles the Great lived in that age, alias Char Lay Main. Now for the great scholars I promised. Among those who became bishops of Antwerp, you will find Philip Nigri, Aubert Vanden Eade, Jean Ferdinand de Benghem, Pierre Joseph Franken-Sierstorff. Among those of Bois-le-Duc, Clement Crabeels, Gisbert Masius, Michel Ophove, Joseph de Bergaigne. In the same town you will find among the Vicaires Apostoliques, Henry Van Leemputc, Josse Houbraecken, Martin Steyaert, Pierre,Govaerts, &c. &c. &c. The next place you dine you may make a figure with those names, and silence even Robin Leslie.* But a pox upon learning, I say. It is enough to turn a man's head. I have a great mind to have done with it; for the devil a thing is to be got by it. Idcirco libris valedico.

I cannot, now my memory serves me, omit an account of some learned physicians, which I read of in other authors, viz., Hermannus Conringius, Lucas Schrochius, Melchior Sebizius, Sebastian Schefferus, Guernerus Rolfinckius, Hoffmannus Altorfi, Seb. Jovius Lugani, Petrus Dapples, Theodore Kerchringius, Regnerus de Graef, Swammerda, Antonius Scarellius, Hieronymus Copelazzi, Jacobus Gonzato, Bernardinus Malacreda, Johannes Petrus Lotichius, Christianus Keekins, Julius Richeltus, Joan. Christoph. Vaganseilius, Jacobus Kerscheus, Antonius Magliabechius, and many others. Pray ask Grattan how many of these he has read.

You say, (I thank you for that,) That you know nobody. No matter for that; so much the better for me, because I know everybody knows you, and therefore more likely to succeed in subscriptions for mice cool. Pray is this letter long enough? If it be not, send it back, and I will fill the other side. In the mean time I remain your most obedient and very humble serve aunt, THOMAS SHERIDAN.

Mice or vice two awl my if rends. [My service to all my friends.]

Send me word what o'clock it is, that I may set my watch by yours.

* Mr. Leslie was the most incessant talker, one of them, in the world. However, he had a great variety of learning, and talked well.

FROM DR. KING.

London, September 20, 1735.

SIR,—Soon after I came into England I was obliged to cross the seas again, and go into France, upon a business of consequence to my private affairs. I am but just returned to this place, where I have met with your letter of 21st of last month. Since you are so kind as to repeat me the promise you made me when I was in Ireland, I shall expect the paper with the greatest impatience. While I was reading your letter, a person called on me who does business for you. I was in hopes he had brought it with him; but he told me it would be sent by another hand. I will say nothing more of it here, than that I am very sure it will please the public, and do honour to the author.

The gentleman concerning whom you inquire is a member of our hall; but I have never yet seen him. He had left Oxford about the time I came from Dublin, to spend the summer vacation in Herefordshire. My son, who is well acquainted with him, assures me that he is very sober, that he studies hard, and constantly attends the exercises of the house. But I shall be able to give you a more particular account of him the next term, when I shall probably meet him in the hall; and he shall find me ready to do him any kind of service that may be in my power.

I do not know whether my lawsuit will force me into Ireland again the next term; as yet I have not received any summons from my managers. I should indeed be well pleased to defer my journey till the next spring, for Dublin is not a very good winter abode for a water-drinker.* However, I do not neglect my defence, especially that part of it which you mention. It is now in such forwardness, that, as I compute, it will be finished in six weeks at furthest. There are some alterations, which I hope you will approve.

I rejoice to hear that the honest doctor [Sheridan] has good success in his new school. If the load of his baggage should endanger his vessel again, I think he has no other remedy left but to throw it into the sea. What is he doing with his bon mots? and when does he design to send them abroad?

My son, who is very proud to be in your thoughts, desires me to present his most humble service to you. I am, with great truth, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant, W. KING.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

September 30, 1735.

YESTERDAY was the going out of the last lord-mayor, and to-day the coming in of the new, who is Alderman Grattan. The duke* was at both dinners, but I thought it enough to go to-day, and I came away before six, with very little meat or drink. The club [the Irish parliament] meets in a week, and I determine to leave the town as soon as possible, for I am not able to live within the air of such rascals; but whither to go, or how far my health will permit me to travel, I cannot tell; for my mind misgives me, that you are neither in humour nor capacity to receive me a guest. I had your law-letter. Those things require serious consideration: in order to bring them to a due perfection, a wise man will prepare a large fund of idioms, which are highly useful when literally translated by a skilful, eloquent hand, and, except our Latino-Anglicus, is the most necessary as well as ornamental part of human learning. But then we must take special care of infusing the most useful precepts for the direction of human life, particularly for instructing princes and great ministers, distributing out praises and censures with the utmost impartiality and justice. This is what I have presumed to attempt, although very conscious to myself of my inferior abilities for such a performance. I begin with "lady;" and because the judicious Mr. Locke says it is necessary to settle terms before we write upon any subject, I describe a certain female of your acquaintance, whose name shall be "Dorothy;" it is in the following manner:[a] "Dolis astra per, astra mel, a sus, a quoque et; atra pes, an id lar, alas ibo nes, a præ ter, at at lar, avi si ter, age ipsi, astro lar, an empti pate, aræ lar, aram lar, an et, ades e ver, ast rumpet, ad en, a gam lar, agrum lar, ac ros pus, afflat error, ape e per, as noti nos, ara ver, adhuc stare, asso fis ter, avi per, ad rive lar, age lar, apud lar, a fis lar, a fis ter, a far ter, as hi ter, annus lar, a mus lar, arat lar, a minximus, a prata pace, a gallo per, a sive." Most learned sir, I entreat you will please to observe, (since I must speak in the vulgar language,) that in the above forty-three denominations for females, many of them end with the domestic deity Lar, to show that women were chiefly created for family affairs; and yet I cannot hear that any other author hath made the same remark. I have likewise begun a treatise of geography (the Angloanglarians call it erroneously Jog Ralph I.) "Mei quo te summo fit? Astra canis a miti citi; an dy et Ali cantis qui te as bigas it. Barba dos is more populus. An tego is a des arti here."[b] I have a third treatise to direct young ladies in reading. "Ama dis de Gaulis a fine histori, an dy et Belli anis is ab et er. Sumin as eurus Valent in an Dorso ne isthmos te legant ovum alto bis ure. I canna me fore do mæsti cani males o falli que nat ure; na mel I, ac at arat, amesti fanda iardi; I mæ ad amo usto o; a lædi inde edi mite ex cæptas a beasti e verme et aram lingo ut. Præis mi cum pari sono dius orno?"[c]

I believe some evil spirit has got possession of you and a few others, in conceiving I have any power with the duke of Dorset, or with any one bishop or man of power. I did but glance a single word to the duke about as proper a thing as he could do, and yet he turned it off to some other discourse. You say one word of my mouth will do, &c. I believe the rhyme of my word would do just as much. Am I not universally known to be one who dislikes all present persons and proceedings? Another writes to desire that I would prevail on the archbishop of Dublin to give him the best prebend of St. Patrick's. Let bishop Clayton allow the resignation, since Donnellan is provided for. I mentioned to the duke that Donnellan should be dean of Cork, on purpose to further the resignation of old Caulfield, but it would not do, though Caulfield seems to have some hopes, and it is bishop Clayton's fault if he does not yield, &c.

FOM MR. MOTTE.

London, October 4, 1735.

Honoured Sir,—Mrs. Launcelot, who dined with me to-day, and desired me to present her humble service, showed me part of a letter from you, which gave me so much concern, that I would not let a post slip without writing to you upon the subject of it. You are pleased to express an apprehension that Mrs. Fenton's money has not been regularly paid, because you have not heard from me for above a twelvemonth. I hope I have accounted to your satisfaction for my silence in a letter which Mrs. Hyde delivered to you since the date of yours to Mrs. Launcelot; and as to Mrs Fenton's annuity, I have punctually paid it, and shall continue to do so until I receive your commands to the contrary. The next payment will be called for a few days after the 1st of November, and unless you forbid it before that time I shall pay it. Mr. Fenton, her son, who receives it, is a man of worth and honour, and I am persuaded will return me the money, should it be paid him from any other quarter. I am surprised to find by Mrs. Hyde that my last, which was written the latter end of July, had so slow a passage as not to come to your hand until the 13th of September.

I have been so particular (I fear even to tediousness) in that letter, that I have nothing to add, but a repetition of the sincere profession I there made, that I am, with all possible gratitude, truth, and sincerity, sir, your obliged and obedient humble servant, B. Motte.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

October 5, 1735.

Dear Sir,—In the first place I was heartily rejoiced to see your letter, for I was afraid you were not well. Now I shall answer as much as my time will permit: (but before I proceed, remember I expect you here next Saturday; for I am both in humour and capacity to receive you. I shall get your answer on Thursday next, and then I shall go as far as Virginia to meet you. Leave Dublin on Wednesday; ride to Dunshaglan that day, 12 miles. From thence to Navan on Thursday, 11 miles. A Friday to Virginia, 15 miles, where I will meet you that evening with a couple of bottles of the best wine in Ireland, and a piece of my own mutton, &c. A Saturday morning we set out for Cavan, where you will find dinner ready at your arrival. Bring a cheese-toaster to do a mutton-chop now and then: and do not forget some rice; we have none good here; but all other eatables in perfection.) He had like to break al Lisb on in Portugal: he Mad rid through Spain: he could not find Room in Italy: he was Constant in a pull among the Turks: he met with his namesake Peter's burgh, in Musk O vye: he had like to Crack O in Poland: when he came to Vye any, he did there jeer many: in France he declared

I can name four domestic animals of a like nature; namely, a cat, a rat, a mastiff, and a lady. I may add a mouse too. A lady, indeed, I might except as a beast I ever met a-rambling out. In Holland met with a G—amster,—Dam you, said he in a passion, for a cheat: he was there poxed by a whore; and he cried out, Rot her dam her. Thus far I know of his travels to the Low-Countries, and no further. Thus far you see I am in humour: although the devil be in one end of my house, I defy her, because I have the other for you and me. Another thing I must promise when you come, that we shall not quit our learned correspondence, but write up and down stairs to one another, and still keep on our agreeable flights. The devil take all the D's in Christendom, for a pack of saucy scabs. When you are here you will despise them all; and you shall be troubled with no club, but such as will keep you out of the dirt. Do not lose this good weather, I beseech you; for everything is ready for you. If you do not like your lodgings, you shall not pay a farthing; and if you do, I have the remedy in my own purse. Do not think to sponge upon me for anything but meat, drink, and lodging; for I do assure you, as the world goes, I can afford you nothing else. Yes, I beg pardon, I can give your horses good grass, and perhaps a feed of oats now and then. My turf is all home, so is my corn, but my hay not yet. I expect it on Monday, which is the next day after Sunday, the very day you will receive this, the day before Tuesday, and I hope two days before you begin your journey, which I hope will be a happy one. May you arrive safe, is the sincere wish of, dear sir, your most obedient and very humble servant, THOMAS SHERIDAN.

FROM DR. SICAN.

Paris, October 20, 1735.

HONOURED SIR,—Mr. Arbuthnot's absence from Paris was the occasion of his not receiving your kind letter till within these few days; but upon the reception of it he treated me with great civility, invited me to dinner, and inquired very earnestly concerning your health, which was drunk by a large company then present; for though you were pleased to tell me you had no acquaintance at Paris, I can safely affirm that, as often as I have been for half an hour with any English gentlemen, some one or other has had the vanity to say he knew you. He has, in a very obliging manner, promised me any acts of friendship in his power, whether I remain at Paris or should proceed to the south of France; and seems to be a gentleman possessed of a large share of wit, good humour, sincerity, and honesty; though, upon the closest inspection, I could not perceive the hair in the palm of his hand. I have met with another exception to that rule in the chevalier Ramsay, who sends you his best respects. I have employed the greatest part of this summer in taking a view of everything curious within four leagues of this city; but shall not trouble you with a detail of palaces, paintings, statues, &c., as I flatter myself Mr. Arbuthnot's friendly solicitations, joined to a due regard to your health, will prevail upon you to undertake that journey next summer. The roads are excellent, post-chaises very commodious, and the beds the best in the world; but the face of the country in general is very wretched; of which I cannot mention a more lively instance than that you meet with wooden shoes and cottages like those in Ireland before you lose sight of Versailles. I am persuaded, sir, you will find a particular pleasure in taking a view of the French noblemen's houses, arising from the similitude between the good treatment the Houyhnhnms meet with here and that which you have observed in your former travels. The stables that Lewis XIV. has built are very magnificent; I should do them an injury in comparing them to the palace of St. James's, yet these seem but mean to any one who has seen that of the duke of Bourbon at Chantilli, which lies in a straight line, and contains stalls for near a thousand horses, with large intervals between each; and might very well, at first view, be mistaken for a noble palace: some hundreds of yahoos are constantly employed in keeping it clean. But if any one would be astonished, he must pay a visit to the machine of Marly, by means of which water is raised half a mile up a hill, and from thence conveyed a league further to Versailles, to supply the waterworks. Lewis might have saved this vast expense, and have had a more agreeable situation, finer prospects, and water enough, by building his palace near the river; but then he would not have conquered nature.

Upon reading Boileau's account of the Petit Maison, or Bedlam of Paris, I was tempted to go see it: it is a low flat building, without any upper rooms, and might be a good plan for that you intend to found, but that it takes up a greater space than the city perhaps would give; this is common to men and women: there is another, vastly more capacious, and consisting of several stories, called the Hospital des Femmes, for the use of the fair sex only. I shall not presume to take up any part of your time in describing the people of France, since they have been so excellently painted by Julius Cæsar near two thousand years ago: if there be any difference, they are obliged for it to the tailors and peruke-makers. The ladies only might help to improve the favourable opinion you have always entertained of the sex, upon account of their great usefulness to mankind, learning, modesty, and many other valuable qualities. I should have informed you, sir, that Mr. Arbuthnot inquired very kindly after Mr. Leslie: but as I have not the honour to know that gentleman, I was not able to satisfy him, but referred him to you, who can do it much better than, sir, your most obliged humble servant, J. SICAN.

TO MR. POPE.

October 21, 1735.

I ANSWERED your letter relating to Curll, &c. I believe my letters have escaped being published, because I write nothing but nature and friendship, and particular incidents which could make no figure in writing. I have observed that not only Voiture, but likewise Tully and Pliny, writ their letters for the public view, more than for the sake of their correspondents; and I am glad of it, on account of the entertainment they have given me. Balsac did the same thing, but with more stiffness, and consequently less diverting: now I must tell you that you are to look upon me as one going very fast out of the world: but my flesh and bones are to be carried to Holyhead, for I will not lie in a country of slaves. It pleases me to find that you begin to dislike things in spite of your philosophy; your muse cannot forbear her hints to that purpose. I cannot travel to see you; otherwise I solemnly protest I would do it. I have an intention to pass this winter in the country with a friend forty miles off, and to ride only ten miles a-day, yet is my health so uncertain that I fear it will not be in my power. I often ride a dozen miles, but I come home to my bed at night: my best way would be to marry, for in that case any bed would be better than my own. I found you a very young man, and I left you a middle-aged one; you knew me a middle-aged man, and now I am an old one. Where is my lord ——? methinks I am inquiring after a tulip of last year.—"You need not apprehend any Curlls meddling with your letters to me; I will not destroy them, but have ordered my executors to do that office." I have a thousand things more to say, longæ vitas est garrula, but I must remember I have other letters to write if I have time, which I spend to tell you so; I am, ever dearest sir, your, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE REV. MR. DONNELLAN.

Cloyne, October 31.

SIR,—Though I have hitherto forbore troubling you with my acknowledgments for many favours which very justly demanded them, yet the late application to the duke in my behalf (which I had an account of from my sister) is such an instance of kindness and regard as will not suffer me to be silent: I must beg leave to return you my best thanks for it, and at the same time let you know what a thorough and true sense I have of your goodness to me, and the great honour you have done me by appearing in my favour. I am sufficiently acquainted with your dislike to recommending, as well as the deserved regard that is paid to your judgment and opinion, to know how to set a proper value on both. And be the success of this affair what it will, I think myself happy in having engaged in it, as it has been the occasion of your showing that you honoured me with some share of your friendship and regard, which will always be my greatest pleasure and praise.

I suppose, sir, you have heard what a handsome mark I have lately received of the bishop of Cloyne's favour; and how handsomely it was given; unasked and unexpected, and without any regard to kindred or application. It is a very good preferment, worth at least 300*l*. per annum; and is made much more valuable and agreeable, by the manner in which it was bestowed, and especially by coming from a person whom you have an esteem for. I was the other day to view my house, and was much pleased with the situation, which is very pretty and romantic. It stands on the bank of a fine river, in a vale between two ridges of hills, that are very green, pleasant, and woody. Its nearness to Cork (being within four miles of it) would make the deanery of that place a very convenient and desirable addition, and was what induced my friends to think of it for me. What success their applications are likely to meet with I cannot say: this I am sure of, that I cannot be deprived of the sincere satisfaction I receive from having your interest and good wishes, and shall always retain a most grateful remembrance of them. The bishop of Cloyne desires you will accept of his best services: and I beg you will believe me, with the greatest respect, sir, your most obliged and obedient humble servant, CHR. DONNELLAN.

TO MR. MOTTE.

November 1, 1735.

SIR,—Mr. Faulkner in printing those volumes did what I much disliked, and yet what was not in my power to hinder; and all my friends pressed him to print them, and gave him what manuscript copies they had occasionally gotten from me; my desire was, that those works should have been printed in London, by an agreement between those who had a right to them. I am, sir, with great truth, your most humble and affectionate servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MRS. PENDARVES.

Paradise, November 9, 1735.

SIR,—I think I have been a great while without writing to you, and hope your are of my mind. I would rather be chid by you for my silence than have you pass it over quietly, for that would have such an air of indifference as would greatly alarm me. Absence is generally thought a great weakner of inclination; I am apt to think it will prove my friend with you. Our acquaintance was so short, I had not time to disgrace myself with you. I was ambitious of gaining your esteem, and put on all my best airs to effect it: I left you at a critical moment; another month's conversation might have ruined all. I still beg you will encourage your indulgent way of thinking of me. What will you gain by discovering my follies? and I shall lose the honour of your friendship; which loss cannot be repaired in England or Ireland. If Mrs. Donnellan is my true friend, she has, by way of excusing me, told you my distress for my sister, which now I hope is over. I refer you to Mrs. Donnellan for her character; and that will justify to you my great care and concern for her.

I cannot help lamenting Dr. Delany's retirement. I expected his benevolent disposition would not have suffered him to rob his friends of the pleasure and advantage of his company; if you have not power to draw him from his solitude, no other person can pretend to do it. I was in hopes the weekly meetings would have been renewed and continued. Mrs. Donnellan is much disappointed, and I fear I am no longer a toast.

I am thoroughly convinced that a reasonable creature may live with more comfort and credit in Dublin than in London; as much convinced of it as that I should be richer with eight hundred pounds a-year than four. But to what purpose is it for me to regret my poverty! My lot is thrown on English ground; I have no pretence to fly my country: furnish me with one, and you have laid temptations enough in my way to make me ready to embrace it.

I have been two months in this place, which has all the advantages of the country; as quietness, cheapness, and wholesome air. I use a good deal of exercise in the morning; in the evening I read a play with an audible voice. I am now reading Beaumont and Fletcher's works: they entertain me extremely. Sometimes I read a little philosophy, Derham's Lectures: many things are too abstruse for me in that study; but I fancy myself in some respects much wiser than I was before I read them. If you do not appove of my studies, I hope you will recommend what you think will be more to my advantage.

I am sorry to find by your letter that Mrs. Donnellan does not see you often: she cannot be pleased with a situation that prevents her having that satisfaction. I depended upon your meeting often, and what is more, upon being sometimes the subject of your conversation. I am glad to hear of her brother's promotion: he very well deserves good fortune; he knows how to enjoy it handsomely, and scorns to court it meanly. I think I have made you a country visit; if I have not quite tired you I hope you will soon challenge another: I know you pay me a great compliment in writing; and, if I was very well bred, I ought not to insist upon your doing anything that may give you trouble: but I only consider my own advantage, and cannot give up a correspondence I value so much. I am, sir, your most obliged and humble servant, M. PENDARVES.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.[a]

Those parts of the letter distinguished by inverted commas (" ") were written by Dr. Sheridan.

November 8, 1735.

MADAM,—November 3, to Dunshallan, 12 long miles, very weary; November 4, to Kells, 16 miles, ten times wearier; the 5th, to Crosskeys, 17 long miles, fifty times wearier; the 6th, to Cavan, five miles, weariest of all: yet I baited every day, and dined where I lay; and this very day I am weary and my shin bad, yet I never looked on it. I have been now the third day at Cavan, the doctor's Canaan, the dirtiest place I ever saw, with the worst wife and daughter, and the most cursed sluts and servants on this side Scotland. Let the doctor do his part.—" Not quite so bad, I assure you, although his teal was spoiled in the roasting: and I can assure you that the dirt of our streets is not quite over his shoes, so that he can walk dry. If he would wear golashes, as I do, he would have no cause of complaint. As for my wife and daughter, I have nothing to say to them, and therefore nothing to answer for them. I hope, when the weather mends, that everything will be better, except the two before-mentioned. Now the dean is to proceed."—In short, but not literally in short, I got hither, not safe and sound, but safe and sore. Looking in my equipage I saw a great packet that weighed a pound: I thought it was iron, but found it Spanish liquorice, enough to serve this whole county who had coughs for nine years. My beast told me it was you forced him to put it all up. Pray go sometimes to the deanery, and see how the world goes there. The doctor is a philosopher above all economy, like philosopher Webber. I am drawing him into a little cleanliness about his house. The cook roasted this day a fine teal to a cinder; for the wife and daughter said they did not know but I loved it well roasted. The doctor, since his last illness, complains that he has a straitness in his breast and a difficulty in breathing. Pray give him your advice, and I will write to your brother Helsham this post for his. Write me no news of the club, and get one of them to frank your letters, that they may be worth reading.—" Dear madam, I beg you may rather think me like the devil, or my wife, than Webber. I do assure you that my house, and all about it, is clean in potentia. If you do not understand so much logic, Mr. Harrison[b] will tell you; but I suppose you ignorant of nothing but doing anything wrong. Be pleased to send me one of your fattest pigeons in a post letter, and I will send you in return a fat goose, under cover to one of the club. The dean may say what he pleases of my ay con O my; but I assure you I have this moment in my house a quarter of fat beef, a fat sheep, two mallards, a duck, and a teal, beside some fowl in squadrons. I wish you were here. Ask the dean if I have not fine ale, table drink, good wine, and a new pair of tables. Now hear the dean."—It grows dark, and I cannot read one syllable of what the doctor last wrote: but conclude all to be a parcel of lies. How are eldest master and miss? with your clerk and schoolboy? So God bless you all. If the doctor has anything more to say, let him conclude, as I do, with assurance that I am ever, with great affection, yours, &c.

Read as you can, for I believe I have made forty mistakes. Direct for me at Dr Sheridan's in Cavan; but let a clubman[c] frank it, as I do this. Mr. Rochfort is my franker: yours may be general —— or some other (great beast of a) hero. My two puppies have, in the whole journey, over puppied their puppyships. Most abominable bad firing; nothing but wet turf.—" The devil a lie I wrote, nor will I write to the end of my life. May all happiness attend you and your family. I am, with all good wishes and affection, your most obedient humble servant, " THOMAS SHERIDAN.

" You were plaguy saucy, who did not like my nuts: I do assure you my dog Lampey cracks them; the dean is my witness."

a A first cousin of the dean's, who came from her own house, at the other end of Dublin, three days in each week, to read and chat with him, after Stella's death, being the principal female that frequented his table for many years while his memory remained.

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY.

November 8, 1735.

SIR,—I know the moment you took this letter into your hand what you said, which was Pox on all Irish writers and Irish letters. It is very little trouble I am going to give you, only be pleased to answer the following questions. How does your leg do? How is your head? How is your stomach? How many days were you on the road? How did you lie? How does Dr. Sheridan? How do you like Cavan? And how do all the good victuals Dr. Sheridan promised you turn out? And now, sir, I beg you will be pleased[a] to suppose that I began my letter by entreating the favour of hearing from you, and, if that is too great an honour for me, that you will order somebody else to do it. Dr. Sheridan would give sixpence I would ask who; rise off his chair, make me a low bow, and uncover, to have the opportunity of telling me.

Now to write politely, when I change my subject I always break off and begin a new paragraph.

Mr. Waller has printed an advertisement, offering ten guineas reward to any person that will discover the author of a paragraph, said to be the case of one Mr. Throp. I do not know whether you heard anything of such an affair before you left town, but I think it is said there is some trial to be about it before the house of commons, either next week or the week following. I beg you will not leave your papers and letters on the table as you used to do at the deanery, for boys and girls and wives will be peeping; particularly be pleased to take care of mine. It is certain I write correctly, and with a great deal of method; but however I am afraid of Curll. Dr. Sheridan has my free leave to read this on condition he burns it instantly; but first let him take notice of all the compliments I make him. May-be you imagine that if you answer this you will be no more plagued with my letters; but I have learned from Molly [Miss Harrison] never to have done with my demands on you: therefore, write or not write (unless you command otherwise), you shall hear once a-week from, your most obedient and most obliged humble servant, MARTHA WHITEWAY.

Molly is just come from the deanery; everything is in good order. She saw Mrs. Ridgeway there. Young Harrison and his sister present you their most obedient respects.

FROM AN UNKNOWN LADY.

Castletown, November 9, 1735.

HONOURED SIR,—Excuse a stranger's address; nothing but the opinion I have of your generosity and humanity could encourage me to lay before you the enclosed poem, being the product of a woman's pen.[b] I see the severe strokes you lay on the faulty part of our sex, from which number I do not pretend to exempt myself, yet venture to desire your judgment of this little unfinished piece, which I send you without giving myself the leisure to correct it, willing that your hand should bestow the last beauties. The muse is my best companion; and if you compassionate the desolate permit me this satisfaction, since a book and a lonely walk are all the gratifications I afford my senses, though not dulled with years. I must entreat you to throw away two or three lines in answer to this? and beg leave to conceal my name till I have the honour of writing to you again, which, if you will allow, I shall trouble you with a view of several sketches that I wrote occasionally, and will no longer conceal the name of, honoured sir, your most humble servant, M. M.

Sir, direct to Mrs. Mary Moran, at Castletown, near Gorey, in the county of Wexford.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

London, November 13, 1735.

I HONESTLY confess I was honoured with yours above a month ago, which ought in all love and reason to have been answered a great while since; but I know your sauciness, as well as you know my niece's, with this difference, that, as age is to mend hers, it makes yours grow worse; and the answer to mine had been,—Oh! she can give a quick reply to mine! Now the duke and duchess are here she wants to know more frequently how and what they do.

I can tell you no story of the ring (which you want to know), but that it came to my hands through proper windings and turnings from an earl of Peterborough; and the connoisseurs say it is an antique, and a pretty good one. I am very well pleased and happy if it ever serves to put you in mind that I am your humble servant.

I came last week from my house in Northamptonshire. I cannot say the weather permitted me much exercise abroad; but as that house is large, the necessary steps the mistress must make is some, and I never lost any time I could get to walk out, and sometimes drove abroad in a chair with one horse, for, being a bad rider, I approve much more of that than mounting my palfrey. And whether it was this or the country air, or chance, I know not; but thank God, I am at present as well as ever I was in my life.

I am wholly ignorant who is or will be bishop of Cork, for his grace is such a silly conceited man that he never vouchsafes to consult me in the affairs of his kingdom. I only know that I wish heartily for Dr. Whetcombe, because he seems to be a modest, good sort of a man; and that besides, by your commands, I was the thoroughfare for a step to his preferment before, and therefore, if I was his grace, since there can be no objection against him in this, he should have it. But as these things are above my capacity, I do assure you I do not in the least pretend to meddle with them.

I hope whenever you ask me about the countess and George, I shall be able to answer you, as I can safely do now, that as yet there is no sort of appearance that they like one another the worse for wearing. Mrs. Composition is much your humble servant, and has not yet got her winter cough. God bless you, and adieu.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Cavan, November 15, 1735.

DEAR MADAM,—

* * * * * * * *

I wrote the above lines in the dark, and cannot read them by a candle: what I meant was, to boast of having written to you first, and given you a full account of my journey. I enclosed it in a cover to Mr. Rochfort, in which I desired he would send it to your house: the doctor had his share in the letter; although we could not give satisfaction to all your questions, I now will to some. My leg is rather worse; but an honest man, an apothecary here, says it begins to ripen, and it is in no manner of danger: but I ventured to walk, which inflamed it a little. I now keep my leg upon a level, and the easier because the weather is so foul that I cannot walk at all. This is the dirtiest town, and, except some few, the dirtiest people I ever saw, particularly the mistress, daughter, and servants of this house. My puppy butler is very happy by finding himself among a race of fools almost as nasty as himself. I must now put you upon travelling. You must inquire where Shele my wine-merchant lives, and order him to have the twelve dozen of wine in bottles ready packed up. It must be the wine that was two months in bottles (as he assured me) before I left Dublin: for these a carrier will be ready next week, to bring them hither. The deanery woman must be ready, and Kenrick and Laud must assist; and the carrier must take them from Shele's cellar, ready packed up. My service to Miss Harrison. Pray send her hither by the first carrier, and give her eighteenpence to bear her charges, of which I will pay threepence, and the doctor intends paying another penny. By the conduct of this family I apprehend the day of judgment is approaching; the father against the daughter, the wife against the husband, &c. I battle as well as I can, but in vain; and you shall change my name to Dr. Shift. We abound in wild-fowl, by the goodness of a gentleman in this town, who shoots ducks, teal, woodcocks, snipes, hares, &c., for us. Our kitchen is a hundred yards from the house, but the way is soft and so fond of our shoes that it covers them with its favours. My first attempt was to repair the summer-house, and make the way passable to it; whereupon Boreas was so angry that he blew off the roof. This is the seventh day of my landing here, of which we have had two and a half tolerable. The doctor is at school; when he comes I will inquire who is this romantic chevalier Tisdal. As to Waller's advertisement, if I were in town I would, for the ten guineas, let him know the author of the narrative; and I wish you would, by a letter in an unknown hand, inform him of what I say; for I want the money to repair some deficiencies here. My service to Miss Harrison and the doctor,[a] and my love to the two boys. I shall still enclose to John Rochfort, except he fails in sending you my letters. Service to Mrs. Morgan; I hope her husband's man has prevailed to be of the club. Adieu. Pray take care of the wine, on which my health depends. Beg a duck from the doctor.

"Beg a duck? beg a dozen. You shall not beg, but command. The dean may talk of the dirtiness of this town; but I can assure you that he had more upon his shoes yesterday than is at the worst in our corporation, wherever he got it. As for my part, I am tired of him, for I can never get him out of the dirt, and that my stairs and the poor cleanly maids know very well. You know that he talks ironically."

FROM MRS. SICAN.

November 15, 1735.

REV. SIR,—A gentleman who has just arrived from Paris brought me a letter from my son, who presents his duty to you, and desires me to send you the enclosed. I am sure I was glad of any occasion to write to you, in hopes of the pleasure of hearing you were well, and arrived safe at the land of Canaan. The hurt you received in your shin I was afraid would prevent your going out of town. I beg to know how it is now. I believe you will be pleased to hear poor Throp has justice done him in College-green. The trial lasted till midnight, and two-thirds of the house were for him; he is now going to petition the house to oblige colonel Waller to waive his privilege; but it is thought he will not obtain that favour.

Lady Acheson came to town yesterday. She desired me to present her best respects to you, and tell you she is something better. Lord Orrery is fretting himself to death that he did not come to town time enough to enjoy the happiness of your conversation. Our Irish ladies made a fine appearance the birth-day at the Castle; nothing about them Irish but their souls and bodies: I think they may be compared to a city on fire, which shines by that which destroys them. Several dealers in raw silks are broke: the weavers, having no encouragement to work up the silk, sold it, and drank the money. I beg you will give my service to Dr. Sheridan, who I hope is recovered. His old friend lord Clancarty drinks so hard, it is believed he will kill himself before his lawsuit is ended. I hope you will like the country about a month, and then order Mrs. Whiteway and me to bring a coach and six and set you safe at home, for this is no riding weather. I am, with the most profound respect, dear sir, your most obliged humble servant E. Sican.

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY.

November 15, 1735.

Sir,—I am most extremely obliged to you for the honour you have done me, and the account is just what I feared, that you would be excessively weary, your shin bad, and disappointed in the doctor's Canaan. The latter I am sorry is not agreeable to you, but your shin gives me infinite trouble. I hope in God you have taken care of it: if it is any running sore, dress it twice a-day with Venice turpentine and the yolk of an egg beaten together—an equal quantity of each. Spread it thick on a cloth, and bathe it once a-day in warm milk; if it is only black and painful, apply warm rum to it often. Pray, sir, give orders your meat may be indifferently done: and if the cook fails, then desire it may be ill done; I have known this receipt very successful, and a dinner eaten with pleasure cooked with these directions. You are very rude, Dr. Sheridan, to interrupt me when I am speaking to the dean; no wonder I am so bad a listener, when you are always putting in your word. Pox take that straitness in your breast and difficulty in breathing. Drink warm ptisan, and nothing else, except liquorice-tea in the morning, and ride every day. Sir, I know nothing of the Spanish liquorice, unless it came with the rest of the things from the apothecary's or Mrs. Sican; but so far your servant is right, that what bundles I found on the bed I put up; I was wrong that I did not examine them; let Dr. Sheridan take it plentifully, it is very good for him. I was at the deanery two days ago: everything is right there; the floor you lie in is all clean, and I desired Mrs. Ridgeway to get the great chair covered, and Jane to put a fire once a-week in your chamber and in the drawing-room, to air the ladies and gentlemen. One of the enclosed papers Mr. Kenrick desired me to send; you see I keep to my word, and am determined never to trouble you with other people's business. The vengeance take you, doctor, will you never be quiet? I tell you I have never a fat pigeon for you, your goose I will not have; we are overstocked with them; but I send you colonel Waller's case, that came before the house on Thursday. I believe you will wonder that, after the heavy charges laid on Mr. Throp so justly by the colonel, that he was not ordered into custody; but to the surprise of everybody the chairman was voted out of the chair at one of the clock in the morning, and so the affair ended. It is true there was a mistake of about a month between colonel Waller's account and Mr. Throp's in the serving of a subpœna; and I think it was a scandalous thing that a worthy member's word should not be taken before a little parson's oath. I suppose you expect I should answer your logic and compliments; but do you think I have nothing else to employ me but trifling away my time in murdering the language with your ay con O mys? I am no more a liar than yourself; therefore you are obliged to accept of my best wishes and most humble respects; so I have done with you this time for good and all. Mr. Dean, I am sure Rochefoucault's maxim never fails; I am this moment an instance of it, taking a secret pleasure in all the little ruffles you meet with in the country, in hopes it will hasten you to town. My he olive-branch has a more immediate loss than any of us; his body suffers as well as his mind; for since he cannot enjoy the happiness and benefit of your conversation he applies himself too close to his studies; in short, I think he is almost in the state of the company he entertains himself with all this morning; and if you saw him in company of the attendants of the governor of Glubbdubdrib, you will find the same horror seize you by looking on his countenance.* My fair daughter presents you her most humble and obedient respects; says she is not at all changed by your absence, for whenever she has the honour to see you, you will still find her the same. I am, sir, your most obedient and obliged humble servant,

Martha Whiteway.

Jane just came here with a poem of Mr. Dunkin's that was sent to the deanery, and this letter that I enclose.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Cavan, November 18, 1735.

Dear Madam,—We were undone for want of your answer, and thought that Mr. Rochfort was at his country seat to whom I directed mine, as he was a franker. Never anything of so small a kind was so vexatious to me as this broken shin. If I had apprehended the consequences, I would not have stirred from Dublin until it was cured. It has prevented my walking and riding. An apothecary, the only doctor here, has it in care, and I cannot say I am better. But the surgeon of the barrack here, a friend to the doctor, has been with me this morning, saw the sore, and says it is in a good way; and that he will consult with the apothecary, and soon make me well. It smarts more to-day than ever; but the surgeon said it was because some power called precipitate (an like you) was put on this morning, to eat off the black skin in the middle of the sore. It digests every day, but I cannot digest it. I shall lose my health by sitting still, and my leg in a chair, like a Grattan in the gout. I wish I had stayed at home, and you had been my surgeon. To say truth, this town and country are so disagreeable by nature and art, that I have no other temptation to ride or walk except that of health; our house, and shoes, and streets, are so perpetually and abominably dirty. Eight of the inhabitants came out to meet me a mile or two from the town. The rest would have come but for some unexpected impediment. In some days after, I invited the principal men in town to sup with me at the best inn here. There were sixteen of them, and I came off rarely for about thirty shillings. They were all very modest and obliging.

* Mr. Harrison was always very thin, and of a weekly constitution. The young gentleman died in the February following.

Wild-fowl is cheap, and all very good, except the ducks, which, though far from sea, have a rank taste from the lakes. It is nothing to have a present of a dozen snipes, teal, woodcock, widgeon, duck, and mallard, &c. You would admire to see me at my endeavours to supply deanery conveniences. The cursed turf is two hours kindling, and two minutes decaying. You are a little too jocose upon Mr. Harrison's countenance. I hope he has no return of illness, nor is more lean than I left him. He must borrow an hour more from his studies, and bestow it on exercise and mirth; otherwise he may be like the miser, who, by not affording himself victuals, died a dozen years the sooner, by which he lost many a thousand pounds more than if he had fed upon pheasants, and drank burgandy every day. I must now repeat the commission I mentioned. The old woman, Kenrick, and Laud, must find out Shele the wine-merchant; a carrier will go next week to the deanery, be taught to find out Shele with Kenrick. Shele must, as he promised, pack up twelve dozen of his claret which has been bottled three months already. This must be given to the carrier by Shele, and ready put up in some hampers as he will contrive. I hope Mr. Rochfort will be in town to send you this letter. I am ever yours; and my love to the girl and boys. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY.

November 22, 1735.

SIR,—I receive as a high favour your just reprimand for not answering your letter by the first post; nay, I will add another fault to it, by endeavouring to excuse myself. It was out of the highest respect I did not write, lest you should think me too forward in giving trouble. But, since I have your licence, I will not miss an opportunity of paying my most humble duty, and of acknowledging the greatest obligations I ever lay under to any mortal. I have had the very ill fortune to come late under your care; yet even these disadvantages do not hinder you from acting the most friendly part, of endeavouring to enlarge my mind and mend my errors; you see how industriously I avoid mentioning the word faults. When you left us I did not think it would be possible for me to dread getting a letter from you; but the account of your leg, which I find worse and worse, alarms me to that degree that I tremble for the consequence. I conjure you, dear sir, not to trust any longer to country helps; your appetite, your health, is in the greatest danger by sitting so much as you must be obliged to do till that is well. I know life is as little regarded by you as any one; but to live in misery is what I am sure you ought to avoid. The wine was packed up on Tuesday last in a hogshead; I thought that was safer than a hamper: Mr. Kenrick and Laud were by all the time; they and Mr. Shele were here with me that night; they tell me they got large bottles, of which I gave a great charge. Mr. Shele desires the wine may be kept in the same manner it is now packed, and taken out by half-dozens as it is used; the numbers taken out may be chalked on the head of the vessel, to see that justice is done; he thinks it will keep better that way than perhaps in a cellar. I think you came off scandalously cheap, with treating sixteen gentlemen for a moidore. Pray, Dr. Sheridan, when the dean next uses you ill, tell him of his pitiful doings.

My son is greatly obliged to you, sir, for your care and advice; and assures me your word shall be an oracle to him. He has not had a return of his disorder; yet his stomach is gone, and of consequence his spirits. Mr. and Mrs. Morgan have commanded me to send you their most obedient respects, and are much concerned about your leg. Pray, sir, date your letters. I believe both you and Dr. Sheridan hate writing the word November; for not one of them have been dated. I only hate the day of the month; the truth was, in my last I could not recollect it (for I think I forgot it) and watched for some of the brats to tell me. Lest I should do the same now, be pleased to remember I write this November 22, 1735. I am, sir, your most obedient and most obliged humble servant, MARTHA WHITEWAY.

If you are pleased to direct to me under cover to Mr. Morgan, I shall get your letters. Perhaps Mr. Rochfort may go out of town, and then I should be long without them.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

November 22, 1735.

DEAR MADAM,—Having answered your long letter, which was improved by the doctor's (Mr. Harrison's) additions, I now tell you that a Monday next, which will be the 24th instant, a carrier will go from hence, and is directed, by another letter to you, to manage the business of sending the twelve dozen of wine, which Mr. Shele has ready bottled, and must see it packed up in his best manner in hampers or hogsheads, as I mentioned in my last, and that the wine was bottled (as he says) two months before I came away. Kenrick and Laud and the women will be your assistants. The fellow will be with you by Wednesday night or Thursday morning, and I will write by him. I cannot say my shin is yet better, although our apothecary and the barrack-surgeon attend me; but they see no danger, and promise I shall recover in a few days. Meantime, I dare neither walk nor ride; and yet I think my stomach is better, and so may continue until I grow weary of snipe, teal, widgeon, woodcock, hare, leveret, wild-duck, fieldfare, &c. My service to your he and she brats. Let Kenrick, my verger, know what I write about the wine, that he and Laud and the woman may be prepared; this will save me a letter to him. I am ever entièrement à vous.

Cavan, November 22, 1735

I SHALL never be quiet; a country author unknown has sent me a manuscript of two hundred pages for my judgment. Pray send me the three quires of paper in quarto, for the doctor has swallowed up mine, and we have none left.

"I can assure you, dear madam, with pleasure, that the dean begins to look healthier and plumper already; and I hope will mend every day. But to deal plainly with you, I am a little afraid of his good stomach, though victuals are cheap, because it improves every day, and I do not know how far this may increase my family expenses. He pays me but two crowns a-week for his ordinary; and I own that I am a little too modest to grumble at it; but if you would give him a hint about wear and tear of goods, I make no doubt but his own discretion would make him raise his price. Pray do this (as you do all other things) in the handsomest manner you can. I am, to you and yours, as much yours as the dean aforesaid."

I desire you will hint to the doctor that he would please to abate four shillings a-week from the ten, which he most exorbitantly makes me pay him; but tell him you got this hint from another hand, and that all Dublin cries shame at him for it.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM WILLIAM PULTENEY, ESQ.

Bath, November 22, 1735.

SIR,—I have been waiting for an opportunity to write you with safety, because I had a mind to do it with freedom; and particularly to explain to you what I meant, when I told you some time ago that I was almost tired with struggling to no purpose against universal corruption. I am now at the Bath, where there are at present many Irish families, and though I have inquired of them all if any gentleman or servant was returning thither, yet I can hear of none, so that I am forced, if I write at all, to trust my letter by the common post. Nothing is more certain than that this letter will be opened there, the rascals of the office have most infamous directions to do it upon all occasions; but they would every man of them be turned out if a letter of mine to you should escape their intuition. I am thinking what the ministers may get by their peeping; why, if I speak my mind very plainly, they may discover two things: one is, that I have a very great regard for you; the other, that I have a very great contempt for them; and in everything I say or do still set them at defiance. These things, if they do not know before, they are welcome to find out now; and I am determined in some other points likewise to speak my mind very plainly to you. You must know, then, that when I said I grew weary of contending with corruption, never meant absolutely to withdraw myself from parliament; perhaps I may not slacken even my personal opposition to the wicked measures of the administration, but really I find my health begins to require some attention, and I labour under a distemper which the long sittings in parliament by no means agree with. When Mr. Faulkner delivered me your former letter (for I have since had one sent me hithe by Mr. Pope) I was just got up from my bed, where I had lain the whole night in most excessive torture, with a violent fit of the gravel. I was not able to write you any answer by him, who was to depart in two days, and ever since I have been at this place drinking the waters, in hopes they may be of service to me. Beside this of my ill state of health, I am convinced that our constitution is already gone, and we are idly struggling to maintain what in truth has been long lost, like some old fools here, with gout and palsies at fourscore years old, drinking the waters in hopes of health again. If this was not our case, and that the people are already in effect slaves, would it have been possible for the same minister who had projected the excise scheme (before the heats it had occasioned in the nation were well laid) to have chosen a new parliament again exactly to his mind? and though perhaps not altogether so strong in numbers, yet as well disposed in general to his purposes as he could wish. His master, I doubt, is not so well beloved as I could wish he was; the minister, I am sure, is as much hated and detested as ever a man was, and yet, I say, a new parliament was chosen of the stamp that was desired, just after having failed in the most odious scheme that ever was projected. After this, what hopes can there ever possibly be of success? unless it be from confusion, which God forbid I should live to see. In short, the whole nation is so abandoned and corrupt, that the crown can never fail of a majority in both houses of parliament; he makes them all in one house, and he chooses above half in the other. Four-and-twenty bishops and sixteen Scotch lords is a terrible weight in one; forty-five from one country, beside the west of England, and all the government boroughs, is a dreadful number in the other. Were his majesty inclined to-morrow to declare his body-coachman his first minister, it would do just as well, and the wheels of government would move as easily as they do with the sagacious driver who now sits in the box. Parts and abilities are not in the least wanting to conduct affairs; the coachman knows how to feed his cattle, and the other feeds the beasts in his service, and this is all the skill that is necessary in either case. Are not these sufficient difficulties and discouragements, if there were no others; and would any man struggle against corruption, when he knows that if he is ever near defeating it those who make use of it only double the dose, and carry all their points further, and with a higher hand, than perhaps they at first intended? Beside all this, I have had particular misfortunes and disappointments; I had a very near relation of great abilities, who was my fellow-labourer in the public cause: he is gone; I loved and esteemed him much, and perhaps wished to see him one day serving his country in some honourable station; no man was more capable of doing it, nor had better intentions for the public service than himself; and I may truly say that the many mortifications he met with in ten or twelve years' struggling in parliament was the occasion of his death. I have lost likewise the truest friend, I may almost say servant, that ever man had, in Mr. Merrill;[a] he understood the course of the revenues and the public accounts of the kingdom as well, perhaps better, than any man in it, and it is utterly impossible for me to go through the drudgery by myself, which I used to do easily with his assistance, and herein it is that opposition galls the most.

These several matters I have enumerated you will allow to be some discouragements; but nevertheless, when the time comes, I believe you will find me acting the same part I have ever done, and which I am more satisfied with myself for having done, since my conduct has met with your approbation; and give me leave to return you my sincere thanks for the many kind expressions of your friendship, which I esteem as I ought, and will endeavour to deserve as well as I can. You inquire after Bolingbroke, and when he will return from France. If he had listened to your admonitions and chidings about economy he need never have gone there; but now I fancy he will scarce return from thence till an old gentleman, but a very hale one, pleases to die.[b] I have seen several of your letters on frugality to our poor friend John Gay (who needed them not), but true patriotism can have no other foundation. When I see lords of the greatest estates meanly stooping to take a dirty pension because they want a little ready money for their extravagancies, I cannot help wishing to see some papers writ by you that may, if possible, shame them out of it. This is the only thing that can recover our constitution and restore honesty. I have often thought that, if ten or a dozen patriots who are known to be rich enough to have ten dishes every day for dinner would invite their friends only to two or three, it might perhaps shame those who cannot afford two from having constantly ten, and so it would be in every other circumstance of life; but luxury is our ruin. This grave stuff that I have written looks like preaching, but I may venture to say to you it is not, for I speak from the sincerity of my heart. We are told a peace is made; if it be true, I am satisfied our ministers did not so much as knew of the negotiation; the articles, which are the ostensible ones, are better than could be expected, but I doubt there are some secret ones that may cost us dear, and I am fully convinced the fear of these will furnish our ministers a pretence for not reducing a single man of our army.

I have just room to tell you a ridiculous story has happened here. In the diocese of Wells the bishop and his chancellor have quarrelled: the consequence has been the bishop has excommunicated the chancellor, and he in return has excommunicated the two archdeacons. A visitation of the clergy was appointed: the bishop not being able to go himself directed his archdeacons to visit for him. The chancellor alleges from the constitution of him this cannot be, and that the bishop can delegate his power to nobody but himself; so that probably all the clergy who attend on the chancellor will be excommunicated by the bishop, and all who obey the orders of the archdeacons will be excommunicated by the chancellor. The bishop in the cathedral, when the sentence of excommunication was going to be read, sent for it, and tore it in the open church; the chancellor afterwards affixed it on the church-doors. There are a great many more very ridiculous circumstances attending this affair, which I cannot well explain; but upon a reference of the whole to my lord high-chancellor, I am told he has declared his opinion in support of his brother chancellor. I am glad I have left no space to put my name to the bottom of this letter; after some things I have said it may be improper, and I am sure it is needless, when I assure you no man can be with more sincerity and regard than I am your most obedient humble servant.

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY.

November 25, 1735.

Sir,—I have not known for some years the pleasure of a post-day till within these three weeks. I read your letters twenty times over. I tell you this to induce you to continue me your favour; for I know it is your study to make the wretched happy. The wine is ready for the carman, and all the caution taken that you commanded. If I durst I would repine that you could think I should require your orders three times repeated to take care of what you told me your health depended on. I rejoice to find your stomach is better, but grieve to hear your leg continues so long bad. I shall despise your surgeon and apothecary if they do not cure it immediately. Apollo has always waited on you when it was not half so material. Where the vengeance is he now? After all he justly quits you since you have left off invoking him. Idleness is your crime: to punish you he confines you to a chair; and the penance he enjoins is to employ your pen once more; if not, there are vultures to play on legs as well as livers: I wish you were safe out of their hands. I was at the deanery on Saturday, though I forgot to mention it in my last letter. My son was there yesterday; and I would have been there to-day if a swelled face had not prevented me. I have sent for Mr. Kenrick, or Mr. Laud, to let them know your commands. I must beg the favour of you to deliver the enclosed to Dr. Sheridan, and to pardon my sealing it. You are sensible there are secrets that the nearest friends must not see. As you have nothing to do be pleased to write to me the heads of the two hundred pages in manuscript, and I will give my opinion about it. I must now entreat you to think of coming to town; I trust in God your shin will not require it; but consider how it is possible for me to spend the winter evenings, who have been so delightfully entertained all summer at the deanery. I have stayed till the last moment before I sealed this, in expectation of seeing somebody from your house, but am disappointed. I promise to take care to see the wine leave this place safe, and to send the paper by the carman. My son and daughter are your most obedient servants. I am, sir, with the highest respect, your most obliged and most humble servant,

Martha Whiteway.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Cavan, November 28, 1735

Dear Madam,—I take advantage a day before the post to write to you; and this is the first day I have ventured to walk this fortnight past, except yesterday, when I dined with my surgeon at the barrack. This morning I visited four ladies in the town, of which your friend Mrs. Donaldson was one. My whole journey has been disappointed by this accident, for I intended to have been a constant rider, and as much a walker as this dirty town would allow. Here are a thousand domestic conveniences wanting; but one pair of tongs in the whole house; the turf so wet that a tolerable fire is a miracle; the kitchen is a cabin a hundred yards off and a half; the house back and fore door always left open, which, in a storm, our constant companion, threatens the fall of the whole edifice; madam as cross as the devil, and as lazy as any of her sister sows, and as nasty. These are some of our blind sides. But we have a good room to eat in, and the wife and lodgers have another, where the doctor often sits and seems to eat, but comes to my eating-room (which is his study), there finishes his meal, and has share of a pint of wine; the other pint is left till night. Then we have an honest neighbour, Mr. Price, who sits the evening, and wins our money at backgammon, though the doctor sometimes wins by his blundering. As to meat we are hard put to it. It is true, our beef and mutton are very good; but for the rest we are forced to take up with hares, partridges, teal, grouse, snipes, woodcocks, plover, silver-eels, and such trash, which, although they be plentiful and excellent in their kinds, you know are unworthy of a refined Dublin dean. I expect before this letter goes that the carrier will be here with the wine, and that I shall have time to chide you for five dozen of bottles broke by the ill packing up. He set out from hence on Tuesday, but I suppose cannot return till next week. I had, several days ago, a letter from Mrs. Sican, and another from her French son,[a] an excellent good one; when you go that way tell her of this, with my service, and that I will write to her soon. Your letters have been so friendly, so frequent, and so entertaining, and oblige me so much, that I am afraid in a little time they will make me forget that you are a cousin, and treat you as a friend. If Apollo has entirely neglected my head, can you think he will descend to take care of my shin? Earthly ladies forsake us at forty, and the muses discard us at fifty-five. I have mentioned that rascal R—— to Dr. Delany, who defended him as well as he could, but very weakly; if the doctor will not cast him off he will justly expose himself to censure.

I wish you would speak to your dearly beloved monster, Mr. L——, when he comes to town, about my Laracor agent, to pay me some money, and to reproach G—— for his infamous neglect of my affairs. He is one of your favourites, and L—— another; I hope I am not the third.

I have just spoken about the thread to Mrs. Sheridan, who tells me that what you desire is to be had here every market-day; and that Mrs. Donaldson understands it very well. "To carry on the thread of the discourse, I discovered the little dirty b—h, the fire-maker, to be the opener of the doors, and the leaver of them" so; for which the dean had her lugged this evening by the cookmaid; for which he paid her a threepence,[a] and gave the little girl a penny for being lugged; and because the cook did not lug her well enough he gave her a lugging to show her the way. These are some of our sublimer amusements. I wish you were here to partake of them. The only thing of importance I can tell you is"—(Ay, what is it? He shall be hanged rather than take up any more of this paper. It is true that the legion club is sinking the value of gold and silver to the same with England, and are putting four pounds a hogshead more duty on wine! The cursed vipers use all means to increase the numbers of absentees. Well, I must go to the market about this thread. It is now Nov. 29; I fear the doctor will hedge in a line. I have now got Mr. Morgan's heathenish christian name, and will direct my letters to him. I am to finish a letter to Mrs. Sican; I desire you will call on her sometimes. My love to your brats. I have settled with Mrs. Donaldson about the thread but will order a double quantity, that you may knit stockings for your dear self. Let the doctor conclude. I am ever, &c. "Madam, I have only room to tell you that I will see you the 12th or 13th of December) excuse a long parenthesis: your most obedient and"—

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY.

Dublin, November 29, 1735.

SIR,—I never was more out of temper in my life than I have been these two days; yesterday that I did not hear from you, and to-day at the rogue that brought your letter to Mr. Kenrick at ten last night, and the disappointment we have met with from him that was to carry the wine to Cavan. The enclosed letter gives so full an account, that I need add nothing to it but his being a right county of Cavan man. I desire Dr. Sheridan will take care for the future not to employ them about your business; I owe him this reflection for trusting such rogues. Pray sir tell me what I shall do in this business; shall I get Mr. Shele and Mr. Kenrick to look out for an honest carman, and agree, as cheap as we can, to carry it to you? for I find there is no depending on the doctor's countrymen. Had you assured me, as you say the surgeon does, that your leg was better, my joy would be equal to the uneasiness I have suffered on that occasion. I fear I shall never have the pleasure of being with you on your birthday; were my purse as heavy as my heart is that I cannot be with you to-morrow, I would this night have been at Cavan, and have left it on Monday morning.

I shall make a great entertainment to-morrow for my family, to celebrate the drapier's birthday, and drink his health. My two eldest cubs (match me that) present you their most humble and obedient respects, with their hearty wishes of long life, health, and happiness, to attend you. They durst not take the liberty to send this with their hand, but do it with their heart. I send you their own words; but where shall I find any that can express what I would say on the subject? The most sincere would be what I desire for myself whilst I continue in this world, which is health and quietness. This I pray God grant you in the largest proportion, and life as long as you shall desire it!

Mr. Morgan's heathenish name is Marcus Antonius; I saw him and his lady yesterday, who both say they should be glad to kiss your hand; his eldest son is in the measles. Last night died the bishop of Ossory, of an inflammation on the lungs; he caught cold on Sunday at the castle chapel. We have provided one of the bishoprics for Dr. Marlay.

I am told by some people that lord Orrery intends to make you and Dr. Sheridan a visit; if so I fear it will be long time before you will think of returning here. I expect a long letter from Dr. Sheridan, in answer to all that I have said to him in this.

I think this is so well written that it needs no apology for a bad pen. I am, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant, MARTHA WHITEWAY.

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY.

Dublin, December 2, 1735.

SIR,—I waded this morning through dirt and rain to the deanery; but I place no more to your account than from High-street. I found everything in great order; your bed and window-curtains cleaned, and, to my satisfaction, the great chairs covered; the dogs in high spirits, the women in good humour, and Mr. Kenrick and Mrs. Ridgeway on duty. I am quite ashamed of my entertainment on Sunday. The drapier's birthday was celebrated by Mr. Laud with a dinner of wild-duck, plover, turkey, and pullet; two bowls of punch, and three bottles of claret. At night Mr. Kenrick gave a supper, with an ocean of punch. Their houses were illuminated and the bells rung Several other houses followed their example.

I am almost reconciled to your surgeon; the next letter I hope will finish our quarrel. When he has set you firmly on your legs, if making gods were not out of fashion, I would translate him; however he shall be my saint.

As you have been remarkable for never being severe on the ladies, I am surprised you should say that we forsake the men at forty. I deny the fact; while they sing our praises, we continue to hold them in admiration. For an example of this, I give the author of the "Lady's Dressing-room," and "Strephon and Chloe," who, by writing these poems, gained the hearts of the whole sex.

I heartily pity you for want of meat; I wish I could send you a large shoulder of mutton, fresh killed; how pure and sweet it would eat! I have just left part of one in the parlour; the very thoughts of it make me hungry again: I think I will go down and take the other slice.[b] I know it is not to any purpose to reproach you with avarice for a poor pint of wine among three of you. Whatever you do at home, I am ashamed to find you show it at Cavan: I suppose your excuse will be at the expense of the poor carman; but if you had any generosity you would live on the public, as I do, till your rents came in. Dr. Sheridan says "you gave private orders, and countermanded the wine, to sponge on him." I own I think it looks like it, or you would not have let the man come to town without a car.

I see you are proof against storms within and without doors, or you would not think of staying in the country when the doctor leaves it. There is no occasion for you to convince the world that you want but one trial to outdo Socrates in everything; let not this keep you, for I promise to provide one for three shillings and fourpence that shall outshine Solomon's brawler.

Molly and young Harrison are grown so saucy at seeing their names so often in your letters, that I cannot govern them: pray be pleased to take them down a little. All that I can do to vex them is not to send you their compliments. My son entreats you will finish your Latina Anglia treatise; which he desires you will immediately send him a copy of.

Doctor Sheridan's last letter is so long and full of particulars, that I cannot answer it till I see him. I am so proud of being discarded from being a cousin, that for the future I shall not own either esq. ——— or Mr. ——— for relations; nor ever dare to think you a favourite. But I hope you will allow me to term you my oracle, and to acknowledge myself, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant,

MARTHA WHITEWAY.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Cavan, December 6, 1735.

DEAR MADAM,—I have yours of November the 29th. The doctor, who is always sanguine, reckoned upon the wine as sure as if it had been in his cellar under the stairs; but I, who am ever desponding, told him I was sure there would be some disappointment. I matter it not, for we have enough still to hold us a reasonable term, at one bottle a-day between us, at least if he would leave off inviting young Mr. Price, Parson Richardson, Mr. Nash, Mr. Jacob, surgeon of the troop, squire Fleming of Balhaynockhye, Dr. O'Neil, Dr. Fludd, parson Charlton of Evacthonyeul, besides the rest of our Cavan gentry and neighbourhood. I will not have the wine sent by any carrier on purpose: it would be a confounded expense: but we will wait until a further opportunity by Marcus Tully, the genuine orator and carrier of our city. I refused a long time to show the doctor that part of your letter which reflects upon not only his countrymen but his townsmen, and fifty to one but upon one of his own or madam's cousins; yet there is no danger of kindred, for our town agrees that Tully is an honest carrier. I was in hopes your great entertainment had been for your tenant, with his half-year's rent. I am sorry that it was on account of some scrub drapier of whom I never heard. Only I know they are all rogues, and I shall not pay for their extravagance. I forgot to tell you that the barrack-surgeon prescribed the very same medicine that you advised for my shin. My leg is so well that I have been twice riding, and walk in the town, that is to say in the dirt, every day. We have now a fine frost, and walk safe from dirt; but it is like a life at court, very slippery. I do not like to see my money laid out in cleaning curtains and covering chairs; but since, as you say, you are pleased to be at that expense, I thankfully submit. The doctor will be with you on Friday next: he goes to see the grand monde, and beg subscriptions to build a schoolhouse. He taxes you only at ten guineas. I am to stay with madam and her daughter until his return, which will be about a month hence, when the days grow longer and warmer. Pox take country ladies' dinners. In spite of all I could say, I was kept so late by their formality on Thursday last, that I was forced to ride five miles after nightfall on the worst road in Europe or county of Cavan. The doctor cannot have time to write a word: he expects a rogue of an agent this evening, who will not come, with two or three hundred pounds arrears, by which means I shall be kept here for want of money, which I was fool enough to expect to get from him, to bear my charges back. My shin cost me three guineas, and I brought but twenty pounds. I desire the room and bed I lie in may be often aired. The doctor will not lie at the deanery, because it is far from his friends, and he is afraid of robbers. I approve your name of cub; but may your male cub never sit in the club! I will not pay the three shillings and fourpence for a wife, as you propose, because I can get one here for two thirteens. Mrs. Donaldson is making the thread with her own fair fingers. I dare not come to town till Miss Harrison gives me a general discharge. I desire to know her utmost demands. My chief amusement here is backgammon. Dr. Sheridan is a peevish bungler, and I sometimes win his money. Mr. Price is an expert civil gamester, and I always lose to him. This is the state of my affairs. The doctor is come up, and says he will not write a word, because he is busy, and will see you soon. Entre nous, I will not stay when the doctor is gone; but this is a secret; and if my health and the weather will permit, I will be in town two or three days after him. So I close this letter, and remain entièrement à vous, &c.

My humble service to the bearer[a] and his lady. God ever bless you and your fire-side.

TO THE DUKE OF DORSET.

December 30, 1735.

MY LORD,—Your grace fairly owes me one hundred and ten pounds a-year in the church, which I thus prove. I desired you would bestow a preferment of one hundred and fifty pounds a-year to a certain clergyman. Your answer was, that I asked modestly; that you would not promise, but you would grant my request. However, for want of good intelligence in being (after a cant word used here) an expert kingfisher, that clergyman took up with forty pounds a-year; and I shall never trouble your grace any more on his behalf. Now, by plain arithmetic it follows that one hundred and ten pounds remain: and this arrear I have assigned to one Mr. John Jackson, a cousin-german of the Grattans, who is vicar of Santry, and has a small estate, with two sons and as many daughters, all grown up. He has lain some years as a weight upon me, which I voluntarily took up on account of his virtue, piety, and good sense, and modesty almost to a fault. Your grace is now disposing of the débris[b] of two bishoprics, among which is the deanery of Ferns, worth between eighty and one hundred pounds a-year, which will make this gentleman easier; who, besides his other good qualities, is as loyal as you could wish.

I cannot but think that your grace, to whom God has given every amiable quality, is bound, when you have satisfied all the expectations of those who have power in your club,[c] to do something at the request of others, who love you on your own account, without expecting anything for themselves. I have ventured once or twice to drop hints in favour of some very deserving gentlemen, who I was assured had been recommended to you by persons of weight; but I easily found by your general answers, that, although I have been an old courtier, you knew how to silence me, by diverting the discourse: which made me reflect that courtiers resemble gamesters, the latter finding new arts unknown to the older; and one of them assured me that he has lost fourteen thousand pounds since he left off play, merely by dabbling with those who had contrived new refinements.

My lord, I will, as a divine, quote Scripture: Although the children's meat should not be given to dogs, yet the dogs eat the scraps that fall from the children's table. This is the second request I have ever made your grace directly. Mr. Jackson is condemned to live on his own small estate, part whereof is in his parish, about four miles from hence, where he has built a family house, more expensive than he intended. He is a clergyman of long standing, and of a most unblemished character; but the misfortune is, he has not one enemy to whom I might appeal for the truth of what I say. Pray, my lord, be not alarmed[d] at the word deanery, nor imagine it a dignity like those we have in England; for, except three or four, the rest have little power, rather none, as dean and chapter, and seldom any land at all. It is usually a living, consisting of one or more parishes, some very poor and others better endowed; but all in tithes. Mr. Jackson cannot leave his present situation, and only desires some very moderate addition. My lord, I do not deceive your grace when I say you will oblige great numbers even of those who are most at your devotion by conferring this favour, or any other that will answer the same end. Multa, &c., veniet manus auxilio quæ—Sit mihi (nam multo plures sumus), ac veluti te —Judæi cogemus in hanc decedere turbam.

[a] Mr. Morgan, to whom this letter was enveloped.
[b] The shattered remains.
[c] The parliament of Ireland.

I would have waited on your grace, and taken the privilege of my usual thirteen minutes, if I had not been prevented by my old disorder in my head; for which I have been forced to confine myself to the precepts of my physicians.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY.

January 3, 1736.

Dear Sir,—I have thought it more than a century since I saw you. I crawled out to you on Saturday, but was forced to come from your house and go to bed; since which time I have not stirred out of my chamber. My cold continues still bad, and has been hanging upon me now for above a fortnight. Pray tell me when I may hope to see you again: et notas audire et reddere voces. I dine at home to-morrow: will you share a fowl with me? I am scarce able to hold up my head; but the sight of you will go a great way toward recovering your ever obliged and faithful servant,

Orrery.

FROM MRS. PENDARVES.

Bath, January, 1736.

Sir,—I am told you have some thoughts of coming here in the spring. I do not think it proper to tell you how well pleased I am with that faint prospect: for such I must call it till the report is confirmed with your own hand. I write all in haste to know if you really have any such design; for if you have, I shall order my affairs accordingly, that I may be able to meet you here. The good old custom of wishing a happy new year to one's friends is now exploded amongst our refined people of the present age; but I hope you will give me leave to tell you, without being offended, that I wish you many years of happiness. The physicians have at last advised my sister to the Bath waters. We have been here a fortnight: they do not disagree with her; this is all can be said of them at present. I wrote to you from Paradise, and hope there is a letter of yours travelling towards me: I think I have used you to a bad custom of late, that of writing two letters for one of yours. I am often told I have great assurance in writing to you at all; and to be sure I must do it with great fear and trembling. I am not believed when I affirm I write to you with as much ease as to any correspondent I have; for I know you are as much above criticising a letter of mine as I should be below your notice if I gave myself any affected airs: you have encouraged my correspondence, and I should be a brute if I did not make the best of such an opportunity.

Bath is full of people, such as they are; none worth giving you any account of: my solace is Mrs. Barber, whose spirit and good countenance cheers me whenever I hear or see her; she is at present pretty well.

Company is this moment coming up stairs, and I can only add that I am, sir, your most faithful humble servant,

M. Pendarves.

TO MR. FAULKNER.

January 8, 1736.

Mr. Faulkner,—I am answering a letter I had from Mr. Pope when I was at Cavan. My absence and sickness, since I retired, have hindered me from writing to him. He complains of his unluckiness that you could never find him at home, which, he says, since his mother's death, he is often absent from. I here will transcribe a paragraph which relates to you, and I desire you will return an answer to it time enough for me to send a letter to-night, and I will insert the sum of it.

"As to his (Mr. Faulkner's) design about my works, I beg you will desire him to postpone it until he sees the duodecimo edition of them here with the first volume, published by Lintot: for that, joined to the rest by Gilelver,[a] will make the completest hitherto extant, and is revised by me. I guess they will be out at Christmas."

Pray, let me know what answer I shall make to Mr. Pope: write it down and send it by any messenger, the sooner the better, for I am an ill writer at night. I am yours, &c.

Jonathan Swift.

I think you may send your answer by the bearer, for it need not take above two lines.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

Cavan, January 17, 1736.

Dear Sir,—I received your letter of reproaches with pleasure; and as I know you hate excuses, I shall make none. Whoever has informed you that I was not in my school at the right time appointed has not done me justice; for whatever else I may disappoint, that shall be inviolably and punctually observed by me.

* * * * As for my quondam friends, as you style them, quon-dam them all. It is the most decent way I can curse them; for they lulled me asleep till they stole my school into the hands of a blockhead, and have driven me toward the latter end of my life to a disagreeable solitude, where I have the misery to reflect upon my folly in making such a perfidious choice, at a time when it was not in my nature to suspect any soul upon earth. * * * * *

Now to think a little for myself. The duke of Dorset does certainly owe me a small living for the expensive entertainment I gave him from Terence.[b] I only want a proper person to dun him; and I know it will be done if my lord Orrery will undertake it. Do not think me sanguine in this; for more unlikely and less reasonable favours have been granted. God knows whether, during my life, we shall have another scholar sent us for a lord-lieutenant. * * *

I wish you as much happiness as I have plague, which is enough for any honest man. I am, dear sir, your most obedient, very humble servant,

Thomas Sheridan.

TO MR. POPE.

February 7, 1736.

It is some time since I dined at the bishop of Derry's, where Mr. Secretary Cary told me, with great concern, that you were taken very ill. I have heard nothing since, only I have continued in great pain of mind, yet for my own sake and the world's more than for yours; because I well know how little you value life, both as a philosopher and a Christian; particularly the latter, wherein hardly one in a million of us heretics can equal you. If you are well recovered you ought to be reproached for not putting me especially out of pain, who could not bear the loss of you; although [a] Lawton Gillever, a bookseller.

[b] This was a play of Terence, acted by the doctor's scholars for the entertainment of the duke.

we must be for ever distant as much as if I were in the grave, for which my years and continual indisposition are preparing me every season. I have stayed too long from pressing you to give me some ease by an account of your health; pray do not use me so ill any more. I look upon you as an estate from which I receive my best annual rents, although I am never to see it. Mr. Tickell was at the same meeting under the same real concern; and so were a hundred others of this town who had never seen you.

I read to the bishop of Derry the paragraph in your letter which concerned him, and his lordship expressed his thankfulness in a manner that became him. He is esteemed here as a person of learning, and conversation, and humanity, but he is beloved by all people.

I have nobody now left but you: pray be so kind as to outlive me, and then die as soon as you please, but without pain, and let us meet in a better place, if my religion will permit, but rather my virtue, although much unequal to yours. Pray let my lord Bathurst know how much I love him; I still insist on his remembering me, although he is too much in the world to honour an absent friend with his letters. My state of health is not to boast of; my giddiness is, more or less, too constant; I sleep ill and have a poor appetite. I can as easily write a poem in the Chinese language as my own; I am as fit for matrimony as invention; and yet I have daily schemes for innumerable essays in prose, and proceed sometimes to no less than half a dozen lines, which the next morning become waste paper. What vexes me most is, that my female friends, who could bear me very well a dozen years ago, have now forsaken me, although I am not so old in proportion to them as I formerly was: which I can prove by arithmetic, for then I was double their age, which now I am not. Pray put me out of fear as soon as you can, about that ugly report of your illness; and let me know who this Cheselden[a] is, that has so lately sprung up in your favour. Give me also some account of your neighbour [Mr. Pulteney] who wrote to me from Bath: I hear he resolves to be strenuous for taking off the test; which grieves me extremely, from all the unprejudiced reasons I ever was able to form, and against the maxims of all wise Christian governments, which always had some established religion, leaving at best a toleration to others.

Farewell, my dearest friend! ever, and upon every account that can create friendship and esteem.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. POPE.

I CANNOT properly call you my best friend because I have not another left who deserves the name, such a havoc have time, death, exile, and oblivion made.[b] Perhaps you would have fewer complaints of my ill health and lowness of spirits, if they were not some excuse for my delay of writing even to you. It is perfectly right what you say of the indifference in common friends, whether we are sick or well, happy or miserable. The very maid-servants in a family have the same notion: I have heard them often say, Oh, I am very sick, if anybody cared for it! I am vexed when my visitors come with the compliment usual here, Mr. Dean, I hope you are very well. My popularity that you mention is wholly confined to the common people, who are more constant than those we miscal their betters. I walk the streets, and so do my lower friends, from whom, and from whom alone, I have a thousand hats and blessings upon old scores, which those we call the gentry have forgot. But I have not the love, or hardly the civility, of any one man in power or station; and I can boast that I neither visit or am acquainted with any lord, temporal or spiritual, in the whole kingdom; nor am able to do the least good office to the most deserving man, except what I can dispose of in my own cathedral upon a vacancy. What has sunk my spirits more than even years and sickness is reflecting on the most execrable corruptions that run through every branch of public management.

I heartily thank you for those lines translated Singula de nobis anni,[*] &c. You have put them in a strong and admirable light; but however I am so partial as to be more delighted with those which are to do me the greatest honour I shall ever receive from posterity, and will outweigh the malignity of ten thousand enemies. I never saw them before, by which it is plain that the letter you sent me miscarried.—I do not doubt that you have choice of new acquaintance, and some of them may be deserving: for youth is the season of virtue: corruptions grow with years, and I believe the oldest rogue in England is the greatest. You have years enough before you to watch whether these new acquaintance will keep their virtue when they leave you and go into the world; how long will their spirit of independency last against the temptations of future ministers and future kings.—As to the new lord-lieutenant, I never knew any of the family; so that I shall not be able to get any job done by him for any deserving friend.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

February 10, 1736.

I AM sorry to hear your complaints still of giddiness. I was in hopes you would have mended, like my purblind eyes, with old age. According to the custom of all old women, I must recommend to you a medicine, which is certainly a very innocent one, and they say does great good to that distemper, which is only wearing oil-cloth the breadth of your feet and next to your skin. I have often found it to do me good for the headache.

I do not know what offences the duke of Dorset's club, as you call them, commit in your eyes; but, to my apprehension, the parliament cannot but behave well, since they let him have such a quiet session. And as to all sorts of politics, they are now my utter aversion, and I will leave them to be discussed by those who have a better skill in them.

If my niece has been humbled by being nine years older, her late inherited great fortune will beautify her in the eyes of a great many people; so she may grow proud again upon that. The countess of Suffolk is your humble servant. Mr. Pope and she appear to have a true value for one another, so I suppose there is no doubt of it; I will answer for my friend's sincerity, and I do not question Mr. Pope's. Why, pray, do you fancy I do not desire to cultivate Mr. Pope's acquaintance? But perhaps, if I seek it too much, I might meet with a rebuff, as you say her M. did. However, we do often dine together at third places; and as to my own house, though he would be extremely welcome, he has too numerous friends and acquaintance already to spare me a day, unless you will come to England, and then he might be induced to meet you here. Mrs. Biddy Floyd has passed thus [illegible] of the winter in

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

February 18, 1736.

MY DEAR MADAM,—I pity you and your family, and I heartily pray for both: I pity myself, and my prayers are not wanting: but I pity not him.[a] I count already that you and I and the world must lose him: but do not lose yourself. I was born to a million of disappointments; I had set my heart very much upon that young man; but I find he has no business in so corrupt a world. Therefore pray take courage from christianity which will assist you when humanity fails: I wish I were in his condition, with his virtues. I am a little mending, to my shame be it spoken. I shall also lose a sort of a son as well as you; only our cases are different; for you have more, and it is your duty to preserve yourself for them. I am ever your most affectionate and obedient, &c.

FROM THE BISHOP OF KILMORE.[b]

February 23, 1736.

REVEREND SIR,—I send you the whole piece,[c] such as it is: I fear you will find the addition pursuant to your hint heavy; for I could not get my imagination warmed to the same degree as in the former part. I hope you will supply what shall be wanting of spirit; and when you have pruned the rough feathers, the ands and thats, &c., you will send the kite to the faulconer to set it a-flying. I am your very faithful and obedient servant,

J. HORT.

May not I claim three or four copies when printed?

TO MISS HARRISON.

February 23, 1736.

DEAR MISS HARRISON,—I am in all possible concern for your present situation: I heartly wish you could prevail on your mother to remove immediately to some friend or neighbour's house, that she may be out of the sight and hearing of what must be done to-day. I wish your eldest brother Whiteway would take care to carry her to some part of the town where she might continue until your house may be put in order, and everything that might renew the memory of melancholy objects be removed. Let your brother Whiteway write to me, that I may know how you all are, particularly your poor mother. I am ever, &c.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

February 23, 1736.

DEAR SIR,—I am extremely concerned to find your old disorder has got hold of you again, which would not have happened if you had taken my advice to continue here where you were well. I cannot help retorting that I never knew any person so unadvisable as you are, especially as it comes from me who am famous for giving the best advice and following the worst. Surely Mr. —— cannot be so unjust as to let me be above —— pounds a sufferer for that profligate brute he shaked off upon me; if he does persevere in it I will let all mankind know that he acts rather like a little rascally Irish solicitor than a man of honour. I have already almost finished a dialogue between lady Betty Tattle and John Solemn, (if my money be not paid, necessity must make me write for bread,) upon a subject they will not much like: which I vow to God shall be published. As I do not wear a sword I must have recourse to the weapon in my hand. It is a better method than a lawsuit. My school only supplies me with present food, without which I cannot live. I hope, if I have any friends left, it may increase, and once more put me out of a miserable dependence upon the caprice of friendship. This year has been to me like steering through the Cyclades in a storm without a rudder; I hope to have a less dangerous and more open sea the next; and as you are out of all danger to feel the like sufferings, I pray God you may never feel a dun to the end of your life: for it is too shocking to an honest heart. It grieves me much to hear poor Mr. Harrison i in such a dangerous way. I pray God perserve him, not only for his poor mother's sake, but the good of mankind; for I think I never knew so valuable a young man. I beseech you to let me know by the next post how he is. I fear the worst of that horrid treacherous distemper. I am, dear sir, with all respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,

THOMAS SHERIDAN.

I lost 66*l*. by a rogue who ran off to Drumcor last year.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

February 25, 1736.

DEAR MADAM,—In the midst of your grief and my own for the same misfortune, I cannot forbear complaining of your conduct through the whole course of your affliction, which made you not only neglect yourself, but the greater part of those who are left, and by the same law of nature have an equal title to your care. I wrote on Monday to Miss Harrison, that she would beg you, in my name, to remove some hours to a neighbour, that your ears might not be harassed with the preparations for what was then to be done. She told me you would not yield: and, at the same time, she much feared she must lose you too. Some degree of wisdom is required in the greatest calamity, because God requires it; because he knows what is best for us, because he never intended anything like perfect happiness in the present life; and because it is our duty, as well as interest, to submit. I will make you another proposal, and shall take it very unkindly if you do not comply. It is, that you would come hither this day immediately, where you will have a convenient apartment, and leave the scene that will be always putting you in mind of your loss. Your daughter can manage the house and sometimes step to see you. All care should be taken of you, and Dr. Robinson will visit you with more ease if you have occasion for him. Mrs. Ridgeway shall attend you, and I will be your companion. Let Miss Harrison return me an answer, and things shall be ready for you. I am ever, with true esteem and affection, dear madam, your most obedient servant and cousin,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

February 29, 1736.

DEAR SIR,—I sincerely condole with you for the unspeakable loss of Mr. Harrison, which cannot be repaired in any other of his age in this world. It wounds my heart every moment I recollect him. I do verily believe no man living has met with such severe trials in losses of this kind as you have; and for this last I must own that I have great compassion for you, as he was every day growing more and more into a friend and companion; especially at a time of life which requires such a comfort. God Almighty support his poor mother; for none else can give her consolation under such a dreadful affliction.

Henrietta-street, March 11, 1736.

SIR,—I would have waited on you when I sent my servant with a message, but was informed you did not see company.

I have no doubt the printer will have occasion for a great many cargoes from our friend Mr. Jervas.[b]

I am very glad I had an opportunity of doing anything agreeable to you. I have long wished for some instance of assuring you that I am, with great respect, your most obedient and most humble servant,

FROM MR. POPE.

March 25, 1736.

IF ever I write more epistles in verse, one of them shall be addressed to you. I have long concerted it and begun it, but I would make what bears your name as finished as my last work ought to be, that is to say, more finished than any of the rest. The subject is large, and will divide into four epistles, which naturally follow the "Essay on Man," viz. 1. "Of the Extent and Limits of Human Reason and Science:" 2. "A View of the useful and therefore attainable, and of the unuseful and therefore unattainable, Arts:" 3. "Of the Nature, Ends, Application, and Use of different Capacities:" 4. "Of the Use of Learning, of the Science of the World, and of Wit." It will conclude with a satire against the misapplication of all these, exemplified by pictures, characters, and examples.

But, alas! the task is great, and non sum qualis eram! My understanding, indeed, such as it is, is extended rather than diminished: I see things more in the whole, more consistent, and more clearly deduced from, and related to, each other. But what I gain on the side of philosophy I lose on the side of poetry: the flowers are gone when the fruits begin to ripen, and the fruits perhaps will never ripen perfectly. The climate (under our heaven of a court) is but cold and uncertain; the winds rise and the winter comes on. I find myself but little disposed to build a new house; I have nothing left but to gather up the relics of a wreck, and look about me to see how few friends I have left. Pray, whose esteem or admiration should I desire now to procure by my writings? whose friendship or conversation to obtain by them? I am a man of desperate fortunes, that is, a man whose friends are dead, for I never aimed at any other fortune than in friends. As soon as I had sent my last letter I received a most kind one from you expressing great pain for my late illness at Mr. Cheselden's. I conclude you was eased of that friendly apprehension in a few days after you had despatched yours, for mine must have reached you then. I wondered a little at your quere who Cheselden was? it shows what the truest merit does not travel so far any way as on the wings of poetry; he is the most noted and most deserving man in the whole profession of chirurgery; and has saved the lives of thousands by his manner of cutting for the stone. I am now well, or what I must call so.

I have lately seen some writings of lord Bolingbroke's since he went to France. Nothing can depress his genius: whatever befalls him he will still be the greatest man in the world, either in his own time or with posterity.

Every man you know or care for here inquires of you, and pays you the only devoir he can, that of drinking your health. I wish you had any motive to see this kingdom. I could keep you, for I am rich; that is, I have more than I want. I can afford room for yourself and two servants; I have indeed room enough; nothing but myself at home; the kind and hearty housewife is dead; the agreeable and instructive neighbour is gone; yet my house is enlarged, and the gardens extend and flourish, as knowing nothing of the guest they have lost. I have more fruit-trees and kitchen-garden than you have any thought of; nay I have good melons and pine-apples of my own growth. I am as much a better gardener as I am a worse poet than when you saw me; but gardening is near akin to philosophy, for Tully says, agricultura proxima sapientiæ. For God's sake, why should not you (that are a step higher than a philosopher, a divine, yet have more grace and wit than to be a bishop) even give all you have to the poor of Ireland, (for whom you have already done everything else,) so quit the place, and live and die with me? And let tales animæ concordes be our motto and our epitaph.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

DEAR SIR,—I had a pleasure and grief at once in your letter, to find you had not forgotten me, and to find you uneasy at a thing which God only can mend. The dream which I had before the receipt of yours was so odd and out of the way, that if Artemidorus were living he would confess it to be out of all methods of interpretation; yet I cannot avoid imparting it to you, because, if you be not much changed, no man ever could sift a matter to the truth beyond you. Thus it was:—

Imprimis, I fell asleep, (or I could not dream,) and what was the first thing I saw but honest Cato in a cockboat by himself, engaging not only a large fleet of foreigners, but now and then obliged to tack about against some dirty shattered floats, filled with his own countrymen. All were his enemies, except a very few, who were pressed and carried on against their will by the arbitrary power of the rowers. I would give a shilling, as low as money is reduced, to know the meaning of it.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

April 3, 1736.

DEAR SIR,—I would have written last post, but I had such a violent headache that I could no more think than a cabbage. And now all the business I have is to make you a paper visit, only to ask you how you do? You may think me impertinent for the question; but when I tell you that I have not above three friends, you will not wonder that I should be afraid of losing one of them; and therefore I must give you some rules of regimen.

1. Walk little and moderately.
2. Ride slow and often.
3. Keep your temper, even with my friend Mrs. Whiteway.
4. Do not strain your voice.
5. Fret not at your servants' blunders.
6. Take a cheerful glass.
7. Study as little as possible.
8. Find out a merry fellow, and be much with him.

FROM MRS. PENDARVES.

London, April 22, 1736.

SIR,—I am sorry you make use of so many good arguments for not coming to Bath. I was in hopes you might be prevailed with. And though one of my strongest reasons for wishing you there was the desire I had of seeing you, I assure you the consideration of your health took place of it. I have heard since I received the favour of your last letter that you have been much out of order. I believed we sympathized, for I was very ill with a feverish disorder and cough for a month, which obliged me to defer answering your letter till I came to town. I left the Bath last Sunday se'nnight, very full and gay. I think Bath a more comfortable place to live in than London; all the entertainments of the place lie in a small compass, and you are at your liberty to partake of them, or let them alone, just as it suits your humour. This town is grown to such an enormous size, that above half the day must be spent in the streets, going from one place to another. I like it every year less and less. I was grieved at parting with Mrs. Barber. I left her pretty well. I had more pleasure in her conversation than from anything I met with at the Bath. My sister has found the good effect of your kind wishes. She is very much recovered, and in town with me at present; but leaves me in a fortnight to go to my mother.

When I went out of town last autumn the reigning madness was Farinelli;[a] I find it now turned on "Pasquin," a dramatic satire on the times.[b] It has had almost as long a run as the "Beggars' Opera;" but, in my opinion, not with equal merit, though it has humour. Monstrous preparations are making for the royal wedding.[c] Pearl, gold and silver, embroidered on gold and silver tissues. I am too poor and too dull to make one among the fine multitude. The newspapers say my lord Carteret's youngest daughter is to have the duke of Bedford.[d] I hear nothing of it from the family, but think it not unlikely. The duke of Marlborough and his grandmother are upon bad terms. The duke of Bedford, who has also been ill treated by her, has offered the duke of Marlborough to supply him with 10,000*l.* a-year if he will go to law and torment the old dowager. The duke of Chandos's marriage has made a great noise, and the poor duchess is often reproached with her being bred up in Bur-street, Wapping.[e]

Mrs. Donnellan, I am afraid, is so well treated in Ireland, that I must despair of seeing her here: and how or when I shall be able to come to her I cannot yet determine. She is so good to me in her letters as always to mention you.

I hope I shall hear from you soon; you owe me that pleasure for the concern I was under when I heard you were ill. I am, sir, your faithful and obliged humble servant, M. PENDARVES.

I beg my compliments to all friends that remember me, but particularly to Dr. Delany.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, April 22, 1736.

MY common illness is of that kind which utterly disqualifies me for all conversation; I mean my deafness; and indeed it is that only which discourages me from all thoughts of going to England: because I am never sure that it may not return in a week. If it were a good honest gout, I would catch an interval to take a voyage, and in a warm lodging get an easy chair, and be able to hear and roar among my friends.

As to what you say of your letters, since you have many years of life more than I, my resolution is to direct my executors to send you all your letters, well sealed and packeted, along with some legacies mentioned in my will, and leave them entirely to your disposal: those things are all tied up, indorsed, and locked in a cabinet, and I have not one servant who can properly be said to write or read; no mortal shall copy them, but you shall surely have them when I am no more.

I have a little repined at my being hitherto slipped by you in your epistles; not from any other ambition than the title of a friend, and in that sense I expect you shall perform your promise, if your health and leisure, and inclination will permit. I deny your losing on the side of poetry; I could reason against you a little from experience; you are, and will be some years to come, at the age when invention still keeps its ground, and judgment is at full maturity: but your subjects are much more difficult when confined to verse. I am amazed to see you exhaust the whole science of morality in so masterly a manner. Sir W. Temple said that the loss of friends was a tax upon long life; it need not be very long, since you have had so great a share; but I have not above one left; and in this country I have only a few general companions of good nature and middling understandings. How should I know Cheselden? On your side, men of fame start up and die before we here (at least I) know anything of the matter. I am a little comforted with what you say of lord Bolingbroke's genius still keeping up, and preparing to appear by effects worthy of the author and useful to the world. Common reports have made me very uneasy about your neighbour Mr. Pulteney. It is affirmed that he hath been very near death: I love him for being a patriot in most corrupted times, and highly esteem his excellent understanding. Nothing but the perverse nature of my disorders, as I have above described them, and which are absolute disqualifications for converse, could hinder me from waiting on you at Twickenham, and nursing you to Paris. In short, my ailments amount to a prohibition: although I am, as you describe yourself, what I must call well, yet I have no spirits left to ride out, which (excepting walking) was my only diversion. And I must expect to decline every month, like one who lives upon his principal sum, which must lessen every day; and indeed I am likewise literally almost in the same case, while everybody owes me, and nobody pays me. Instead of a young race of patriots on your side, which gives me some glimpse of joy, here we have the direct contrary, a race of young dunces and atheists, or old villains and monsters, whereof four-fifths are more wicked and stupid than Chartres. Your wants are so few that

TO DR. SHERIDAN.[a]

April 24, 1736.

I HAVE been very ill for these two months past with giddiness and deafness, which lasted me till about ten days ago, when I gradually recovered, but still am weak and indolent, not thinking anything worth my thoughts; and although (I forget what I am going to say, so it serves for nothing)—I am well enough to ride, yet I will not be at the pains. Your friend Mrs. Whiteway, who is upon all occasions so zealous to vindicate, is one whom I desire you to chide; for during my whole sickness she was perpetually plaguing and sponging on me; and though she would drink no wine herself, yet she increased the expense by making me force it down her throat. Some of your eight rules I follow, some I reject, some I cannot compass, I mean merry fellows. Mr. J. R—— never fails; I did within two days past ring him such a peal in relation to you, that he must be the d—l not to consider it; I will use him the same way if he comes to-morrow (which I do not doubt) for a pint of wine. I like your project of a satire on Fairbrother, who is an errant rascal in every circumstance.

"Every syllable that is worth reading in this letter you are to suppose I wrote: the dean only took the hints from me, but he has put them so ill together that I am forced to tell you this in my own justification. Had you been worth hanging, you would have come to town this vacation, and I would have shown you a poem on the 'Legion Club.' I do not doubt but that a certain person will pretend he wrote it, because there is a copy of it in his hand lying on his table; but do not mind that, for there are some people in the world will say anything. I wish you could give some account of poor Dr. Sheridan; I hear the reason he did not come to town this Easter is, that he waited to see a neighbour of his hanged."

Whatever is said in this page by Goody Whiteway, I have not read, nor will read; but assure you, if it relates to me, it is all a lie; for she says you have taught her that art, and as the world goes, and she takes you for a wise man, she ought to follow your practice. To be serious, I am sorry you said so little of your own affairs and of your health; and when will you pay me any money? for, upon my conscience, you have half starved me.

"The plover-eggs were admirable, and the worsted for the dean's stockings so fine that not one knitter here can knit them."

We neither of us know what the other hath written; so one answer will serve if you write to us both, provided you justly give us both our share, and each of us will read our own part. Pray tell us how you breathe, and whether that disorder be better.

"If the dean should give you any hint about money, you need not mind him, for to my knowledge he borrowed 20*l.* a month ago to keep himself alive."

I am sorry to tell you that poor Mrs. Whiteway is to be hanged on Tuesday next for stealing a piece of Indian silk out of Bradshaw's shop, and did not set the house on fire, as I advised her. I have written a very masterly poem on the "Legion Club;" which, if the printer should be condemned to be hanged for it, you will see in a threepenny book; for it is two hundred and forty lines. Mrs. Whiteway is to have half the profit and half the hanging.

"The drapier went this day to the Tholsel as a merchant, to sign a petition to the government against lowering the gold, where we hear he made a long speech, for which he will be reckoned a jacobite, God send hanging does not go round!"

[a] The paragraphs in inverted commas ("") were written by Mrs Whiteway.

TO BISHOP HORT.

May 12, 1736.

MY LORD,—I have two or three times begun a letter to your lordship, and as often laid it aside; until, by the unasked advice of some friends of yours, and of all my own, I resolved at last to tell you my thoughts upon the affair of the poor printer who suffered so much upon your lordship's account, confined to a dungeon among common thieves, and others with infectious diseases, to the hazard of his life; beside the expense of above 25*l.*, and beside the ignominy to be sent to Newgate like a common malefactor.

His misfortunes do also very highly and personally concern me. For, your lordship declaring your desire to have that paper looked for, he did at my request search his shop, and unfortunately found it; and, although he had absolutely refused before to print it, because my name as the author was fixed to it, which was very legible, notwithstanding there was a scratch through the words; yet at my desire he ventured to print it. Neither did Faulkner ever name you as the author, although you sent the paper by a clergyman, one of your dependants; but your friends were the only persons who gave out the report of its having been your performance. I read your lordship's letter written to the printer, wherein you argue "that he is in these dealings the adventurer, and must run the hazard of gain or loss." Indeed, my lord, the case is otherwise. He sells such papers to the running boys for farthings a-piece, and is a gainer by each less than half a farthing; and it is seldom he sells above a hundred, unless they be of such as only spread by giving offence, and consequently endanger the printer both in loss of money and liberty, as was the case of that very paper, which, although it be written with spirit and humour, yet, if it had not affected Bettesworth, would scarce have cleared above a shilling to Faulkner: neither would he have done it at all but at my urgency, which was the effect of your lordship's commands to me. But as your lordship has since been universally known for the author, although never named by Faulkner or me, so it is as generally known that you never gave him the least consideration for his losses, disgraces, and dangers of his life. I have heard this, and more, from every person of my acquaintance whom I see at home or abroad; and particularly from one person too high to name, who told me all the particulars; and I heartily wished, upon your account, that I could have assured him that the poor man had received the least mark of your justice, or, if you please to call it so, your generosity, which I would gladly inform that great person of before he leave us.

Now, my lord, as God, assisting your own good management of a very ample fortune, has made you extremely rich, I may venture to say that the printer has a demand, in all conscience, justice, and honour, to be fully refunded, both for his disgraces, his losses, and the apparent danger of his life; and that my opinion ought to be of some weight, because I was an innocent instrument, drawn in by your lordship, against Faulkner's will, to be an occasion of his sufferings. And if you shall please to recompense him in the manner that all people hope or desire, it will be no more in your purse than a drop in the bucket; and as soon as I shall be informed of it I shall immediately write to that very great person, in such a manner as will be most to the advantage of your character, for which I am sure he will rejoice, and so will all your friends, or, if you have any enemies, they will be put to silence

Your lordship has too good an understanding to imagine that my principal regard in this affair is not to your reputation, although it be likewise mingled with pity to the innocent sufferer. And I hope you will consider that this case is not among those where it is a mark of magnanimity to despise the censure of the world; because all good men will differ from you, and impute your conduct only to a sparing temper, upon an occasion where common justice and humanity required a direct contrary proceeding.

I conclude with assuring your lordship again, that what I have written was chiefly for your lordship's credit and service: because I am, with great truth, your lordship's most, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN TO DR. SWIFT AND MRS. WHITEWAY.

May 12, 1736.

DEAR SIR,—I send you an encomium upon Fowlbrother, enclosed, which I hope you will correct; and if the world should charge me with flattery, you will be so good as to explain the obligations I lie under to that great and good bookseller.

MADAM,—how the plague can you expect that I should answer two persons at once, except you should think I had two heads? but this is not the only giddiness you have been guilty of. However, I shall not let the dean know it.

SIR,—I wonder you would trust Mrs. Whiteway to write anything in your letter. You have been always too generous in your confidence. Never was any gentleman so betrayed and abused. She said more of you than I dare commit to this paper.

MADAM,—I have let the dean know all the kind things you said of him to me, and that he has not such a true friend in the world. I hope you will make him believe the same of me.

SIR,—I wish you would banish her your house, and take my wife in her stead, who loves you dearly, and would take all proper care if any sickness should seize you. She would as infallibly take as much care of you as ever she did of me; and you know her to be a good-natured, cheerful, agreeable companion, and a very handy woman; whereas Mrs. Whiteway is a morose, disagreeable prater, and the most awkward devil about a sick person, and very ill-natured into the bargain.

MADAM,—I believe it will not require any protestations to convince you that you have not a more sincere friend upon the earth than I am. The dean confesses that he had some little dislikings to you (I fancy he hears some whispers against you), but I believe his share of this letter will set all matters right. I know he has too much honour to read your part of it; and therefore I may venture to speak my mind freely concerning him. Pray, between ourselves, is he not grown very positive of late? He used formerly to listen to his friends' advice, but now we may as well talk to a sea-storm. I could say more, only I fear this letter may miscarry.

SIR,—I beg that impertinent woman, who has unaccountably got your ear, may not interrupt you while you read the encomium, and while you give it a touch of your brush; for I fear the colours are not strong enough. Cannot you draw another picture of him? I wish you would; for he is a subject fit for the finest hand. What a glorious thing it would be to make him hang himself!

As to business, I have nothing to say about money yet awhile; but by the next post you shall have two scholars' notes, which will amount to about fourteen or fifteen pounds; and if Mr. —— can force himself to do me justice, it will put about 25*l.* in your pocket. But then you must remark that you will put twenty of it out again, and send it to Mrs. ——. I have nobody after that to gather for but you; and if money comes in as I expect, you may borrow from, sir, yours. My tenants are as poor as job, and as wicked as his wife, or the dogs would have given me some money before this. Mr. Jones swears he will not pay you the bond which I gave you, except you come down to receive it; for he thinks it but reasonable that you should honour Belturbet as well as Cavan. Mr. Coote would give three of his eyes to see you at Cootehill. All the country long for you. My green geese, &c., are grown too fat. I have twenty lambs, upon honour, as plump as puffins, and as delicate as ortolans. I eat one of them yesterday. A bull, a bull! hoh! I cry mercy. As I return from the county of Galway next vacation, I intend to make Dublin my way, in order to conduct you hither. Our country is now in high beauty, and every inch of it walkable. I wish you all happiness till I see you; and remain with all respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,

THOMAS SHERIDAN.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Dublin, May 15, 1736.

MRS. WHITEWAY and I were fretting, raging, storming, and fuming that you had not sent a letter since you got to your Caban (for the V consonant was anciently a B), I mean Cavan: but, however, we mingled pity, for we feared you had run away from school, and left the key under the door. We were much disappointed that the spring and beginning of summer had not introduced the muses, and that your now walkable roads had not roused your spirits. We are here the happiest people in the universe; we have a year and a half before the club will meet to be revenged further on the clergy, who never offended them; and in England their parliament are following our steps, only with two or three steps for our one. It is well you have done with the church, but pray take care to get money, else in a year or two more they will forbid all Greek and Latin schools, as Popish and Jacobite. I took leave of the duke and duchess today. He has prevailed on us to make a promise to bestow upon England 25,000*l.* a-year for ever, by lowering the gold coin, against the petition of all the merchants, shopkeepers, &c., to a man. May his own estate be lowered the other forty parts, for we now lose by all gold two and a half per cent. He will be a better (that is to say a worse) man by 60,000*l.* than he was when he came over; and the nation better (that is to say worse) by above half a million; beside the worthy method he hath taken in a disposal of employments in church and state. Here is a cursed long libel running about in manuscript on the Legion Club; it is in verse, and the foolish town imputes it to me. There were not above thirteen abused (as it is said) in the original; but others have added more, which I never saw, though I have once read the true one. What has Fowlbrother done to provoke you? I either never heard or have forgot your provocations; but he was a fellow I have never been able to endure. If it can be done, I will have it printed, and the title shall be, "Upon a certain bookseller (or printer) in Utopia." Mrs. Whiteway will be here to-morrow, and she will answer your sincere, open-hearted letter very particularly; for which I will now leave room. So adieu for one night.

MRS. WHITEWAY HERE BEGINS.

"SIR,—I am most sincerely obliged to you for all the civil things you have said to me, and of me to the dean. I found the good effects of them this day; when I waited on him he received me with great good humour, said something had happened since he saw me last that had convinced him of my merit; that he was sorry he had treated me with so little distinction, and that hereafter I should not be put upon the foot of an humble companion, but treated like a lady of wit, and learning, and fortune; that if he could prevail on Dr. Sheridan to part with his wife, he would make her his friend, his nurse, and the manager of his family. I approved entirely of his choice, and at the same time expressed my fears that it would be impossible for you to think of living without her; this is all that sticks with me. But considering the friendship you express to me for the dean, I hope you will be persuaded to consider his good rather than your own, and send her up immediately; or else it will put him to the expense of giving three shillings and fourpence for a wife; and he declares that the badness of pay of his tithes, since the resolutions of the parliament of Ireland, puts this out of his power."

I could not guess why you were so angry at Fowlbrother, till Mrs. Whiteway, who you find is now with me, said it was for publishing some works of yours and mine like a rogue: which is so usual to their trade that I now am weary of being angry with it. I go on to desire that Mrs. Donaldson will let me know what I owe her, not in justice but generosity. If you could find wine and victuals, I could be glad to pass some part of the summer with you, if health would permit me; for I have some club enemies that would be glad to shoot me, and I do not love to be shot; it is a death I have a particular aversion to. But I shall henceforth walk with servants well armed, and have ordered them to kill my killers: however I would have them be the beginners. I will do what I can with Mr. Richardson, who (money excepted) is a very honest man. How is your breathing? As to myself, my life and health are not worth a groat. How shall we get wine to your cabin? I can spare some, and am preparing diaculum to save my skin as far as Cavan, and even to Belturbet.[a] Pray God preserve you. I am, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. BENJAMIN MOTTE.

Dublin, May 25, 1736.

SIR,—I lately received a long letter from Mr. Faulkner, grievously complaining, upon several articles, of the ill treatment he hath met with from you,[b] and of the many advantageous offers he hath made you, with none of which you thought fit to comply. I am not qualified to judge in the fact, having heard but one side; only one thing I know, that the cruel oppressions of this kingdom by England are not to be borne. You send what books you please hither, and the booksellers here can send nothing to you that is written here. As this is absolute oppression, if I were a bookseller in this town I would use all the safe means to reprint London books, and run them to any town in England that I could, because, whoever offends not the laws of God or the country he lives in commits no sin. It was the fault of you and other booksellers, who printed anything supposed to be mine, that you did not agree with each other to print them together if you thought they would sell to any advantage. I believe I told you long ago that Mr. Faulkner came to me and told me his intention to print everything that my friends told him they thought to be mine, and that I was discontented at it, but when he urged that some other bookseller would do it, and that he would take the advice of my friends, and leave out what I pleased to order him, I said no more but that I was sorry it should be done here.——But I am so incensed against the oppressions from England, and have so little regard to the laws they make, that I do, as a clergyman, encourage the merchants both to export wool and woollen manufactures to any country in Europe or anywhere else; and conceal it from the custom-house officers as I would hide my purse from a highwayman, if he came to rob me on the road, although England hath made a law to the contrary; and so I would encourage our booksellers here to sell your authors' books printed here, and send them to all the towns in England, if I could do it with safety and profit; because (I repeat it) it is no offence against God or the laws of the country I live in. Mr. Faulkner hath dealt so fairly with me that I have a great opinion of his honesty, although I never dealt with him as a printer or a bookseller; but since my friends told me those things called mine would certainly be printed by some hedge bookseller, I was forced to be passive in the matter. I have some things which I shall leave my executors to publish after my decease, and have directed that they shall be printed in London. For, except small papers, and some treatises writ for the use of this kingdom, I always had those of any importance published in London, as you well know. For my own part, although I have no power anywhere, I will do the best offices I can to countenance Mr. Faulkner; for although I was not at all pleased to have that collection printed here, yet none of my friends advised me to be angry with him; although if they had been printed in London by you and your partners, perhaps I might have pretended to some little profit. Whoever may have the hazard or advantage of what I shall leave to be printed in London after my decease, I will leave no other copies of them here; but if Mr. Faulkner should get the first printed copy, and reprint it here, and send his copies to England, I think he would do as right as you London booksellers who load us with yours. If I live but a few years, I believe I shall publish some things that I think are important; but they shall be printed in London although Mr. Faulkner were my brother. I have been very tedious in telling you my thoughts on this matter, and so I remain, sir, your most humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM CHARLES FORD, ESQ.

London, June 3, 1736.

DEAR SIR,—Though you have left off corresponding with me these two years and a half, I cannot leave you off yet; and I think this is the sixth letter I have sent you since I have heard one word of you from your own hand. My lord Oxford told me last winter that he had heard from you, and you were then well. Mr. Cæsar very lately told me the same. It is always the most welcome news that can come to me; but it would be a great addition to my pleasure to have it from yourself; and you know my sincere regard for you may in some measure claim it.

I have been engaged these five months in a most troublesome lawsuit with an Irish chairman. Those fellows swarm about St. James's, and will hardly allow you to walk half a street, or even in the Park, on the fairest day. This rascal rushed into the entry of a tavern to force me into his chair, ran his poles against me, and would not let me pass till I broke his head. He made a jest of it that night; but the next morning an Irish solicitor came, out of profound respect, to advise me to make the fellow amends; he told a dismal story of the surgeon and the bloody shirt, and spoke against his own interest merely to hinder me, whom he had never seen before, from being exposed. Neither his kind persuasions, nor the prudent counsels of our friends, Mr. L—— and a few more, could prevail on me. A few days after, the solicitor brought me a bill found by the grand jury and a warrant under the hand of three justices against John Ford, without any other addition. To show his good-will he would not affront me by executing the warrant; but desired I would go to any justice of peace, and give bail to appear the next quarter-sessions. By my not doing it, he found out the mistake of the name, which he said should be rectified in a new bill, and if I would not comply with their demands, after they had tried me for the assault, they would bring an action of 80*l.* or 100*l.* damages. I threatened in my turn, at which he laughed as I should do if a little child should threaten to knock me down. As they proceeded against me, I thought it time to begin with them, and spoke to an acquaintance of mine, a justice of peace, who sent a warrant for the fellow, upon the waiter's oath, for assaulting me, and, by a small stretch of power, committed him to the Gatehouse, where he remained some days for want of bail. I believe his bail would hardly have been judged sufficient if his Irish solicitor had not gone to another justice and taken a false oath that the gentleman who committed him was out of town. This perjury, it seems, cannot be punished, because it was not upon record. We presented bills against each other to the grand-jury, among whom there happened luckily to be some gentlemen; and though I did not know them, by their means my bill was found, and his returned ignoramus. Then I indicted him in the crown-office, the terror of the low people, where they often plague one another, and always make use of against those of better rank. Still the fellow blustered, and refused to make it up unless I would pay his expenses; for his lawyer had persuaded him that in the end he should recover damages sufficient to make amends for all. While he ruined himself by law he lost his business, for no gentleman would take his chair. This brought down his proud stomach; he came to me two days ago, made his submissions, we gave reciprocal releases from all actions, &c., and I have already received the thanks of above forty gentlemen for procuring them liberty to walk the streets in quiet. Thus this great affair has ended like the Yorkshire petition, which has been the chief business of the house of commons this session. Toward the end, indeed, they found a little time to show their good will to the church. It is the general opinion that the Act for repealing the Test would have passed if sir Robert Walpole had not seen the necessity of his speaking, which he did in the most artful manner he had ever done in his life. Several courtiers voted against him, as well as most of the patriots, and, among others, lord Bathurst's two sons. In the house of lords, next to the duke of Argyll, your friend Bathurst and lord Carteret have shown most rancour against ——. It is a melancholy reflection that all the great officers of state, and the whole bench of bishops, joined to the Tories, could not prevent any one question in disfavour of the church.

[a] Mr Richardson's Rectory

[b] Motte filed a bill in Chancery in England against Faulkner, for printing Swift's works, to stop the sale of them there, which made the author write this letter.

I am asked every day if there be no hopes of ever seeing you here again; and am sorry not to be able to give any account of your intentions. I doubt my long letters quite tire your patience; and therefore conclude with assuring you that nobody wishes you all happiness more than I do, who am most entirely yours, &c.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

June 3, 1736.

Dear Sir,—Mr. Lucas is now in Dublin, who will pay that small bill on demand. I hope Mr. —— will not disappoint us, and then poor Mrs. —— will be relieved. I must set out soon for Dublin. At my return I will wait upon you to bring you home with me. The weather must and shall be good; and you must and shall be in good health; you must and shall come with me.

My walk it is finished,
My money diminished;
But when you come down,
I'll hold you a crown
You'll soon make me rich,
Or I'll die in a ditch.

Pray think of things beforehand, and do not be giddy as usual. The walk is a hundred and twelve yards long; I hope that will please you. My rolling-stone cost me dear. If I should ever grow rich, as God forbid I should, I would buy two hogsheads of wine at once. You must know I have bought turf for you, which burns like so many tapers. My son writes me word that Mr. Vesey's family are angry with me for inserting some lines in the Legion Club touching him. Upon my soul I never inserted one line in it; and upon the whole I care not whether they believe me or not. All my garden things are in top order. Are not you sick of Dublin this hot weather? How can you stew in such an oven? My sheep begin now to fatten; I hope they will please you very well. You saw the king's speech I suppose. I am glad to find by it that he resolves to stand by us. Our breams here are exceedingly good and fat; we dress them with carp sauce. Doctor Walmsley writes me word by last post that they are making way to bring me to Armagh. Mr. —in is quite outrageous mad, and his relations are now taking out a writ of lunacy; so that if my lord Orrery would only mention me to the lord-primate it would do. I know my lord-chancellor is so well inclined toward me that he would willingly join in the request. Consider the lands are worth 400*l.* a-year, and the situation much more advantageous. This must be a secret upon several accounts. So much for business, and no more. My artichokes, I do not mean my hearty jokes, are in great plenty, so are my strawberries. I hear that the czarina, Kouli Kan, and the emperor will overrun Turkey. You will not know my house when you see it next, it will be so altercated. Pray what says Goody Whiteway to the world? I hear she gives herself strange airs of late in calling me nothing but Sheridan. This comes of too much familiarity. When I come next to your house, I shall make her keep her distance, especially when company is present; for she wants to be pulled down. My young turnips, carrots, beans, and pease are in fine order; you must pay 2*s.* 6*d.* a-quart if you eat any. I shall be very reasonable as to the rest of your diet.

You shall want nothing fit for mortal man
To eat or drink, 'tis all that I do can.
And all that's expedient,
From your most obedient.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

June 5, 1736.

Dear Sir,—I am so tormented, and have been for eight days, that I lie stretched in my bed as I now write; however, I begin to be easier, and I have hopes that I shall be able to attend in my school on Monday. Surely no person can be so stupid as to imagine you wrote the "Panegyric on the Legion Club"? I have seen and read it in various editions, which indeed makes me imagine everybody to be its author; and what they have done to deserve such treatment is to me a mystery.

I never wrote in this posture before, and therefore wonder not if lines and words be crooked. My pains are likewise great; and therefore, whether I will or not, I must take pains with this letter.

Now as to your coming down here, the weather will be good, the roads pleasant, and my company likewise, to set out with you from Dublin on Thursday fortnight, and to bring you here in three days. I have three deer parks at my command; Coote's, Fleming's, and Hamilton's. I have at present forty chickens, all fat; twenty sheep of my own, and sixteen lambs (for lamb will be in season a month longer), geese, turkey, &c.

My hens are hatching,
My house is thatching,
My geese a-gaggling,
My wife a-draggling,
My corn a-thrashing,
My sheep a-washing,
My turf a-drawing,
My timber sawing,
My gravel-walk raking,
My rolling-stone making,
My ale a-brewing,
Myself a-stewing,
My boys a teaching,
My webs a-bleaching,
My daughters reading,
My garden weeding,
My lime a-burning,
My milk a-churning;

In short, all nature seems to be at work,
Busy as Kouli Kan against the Turk.

I do not wonder that Mr. Towers has discarded that graceless whelp, but I wonder more he kept him above a week. He has a genius for mischief would jade even the devil to attend him. If Mrs. Whiteway will prove false, I have willows enough to crown me, and ladies enough here to pick and choose where I like best. The summer has brought them and the flies in great abundance into our country; the latter, I think, indeed, less troublesome. All of them long for your coming; but I know not whether you long for them. I am grieved to hear you have lost so much flesh, which indeed is my present case. If my skin were dry my bones would rattle like a bag of bobbins. However, I make no doubt but to plump us both up by help of some housewife's remedies. My poor dear wife has run mad for joy of your coming: sure I have a gravel walk finished twelve perches in length, eight gradations of pease which will last you to October. You cannot imagine what a good housewife I am grown; my garden is well stocked; I have everything but money; but that is neither here nor there. Mr. Jones will order the money by first opportunity. May all happiness attend you.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

Dublin, June 5, 1736.

You must pay your groat (as if you had been drunk last night) for this letter, because I am neither acquainted with any frank er, nor the ——— of frank ing. I am glad you have got the piles, because it is a mark of health and a strong constitution. I believe what you say of the Legion Club poem: for it plainly appears a work of a legion club, for I hear there are fifty different copies; but what is that to me? And you are in the right that they are not treated according to their merit. You never writ so regular in your life, and therefore when you write to me always take care to have the piles; I mean any piles except those of lime and stone, and yet piles are not so bad as the stone. I find you intend to be here (by your date) in a dozen days hence. The room shall be ready for you, though I shall never have you in a morning, or at dinner, or in an evening; at all other times I shall be pestered with you. John R——, (for he does not deserve the name of Jack) is gone to his six-miles-off country-seat for the summer. I admire at your bill of 10*l.* odd; for I thought your first was double; or is it an additional one? When you satisfy me, I will send down to him with a vengeance: although except that damned vice of avarice, he is a very agreeable man. As to your venison, vain is one who expects it. I am checking you for your chickens, and could lamb you for your lambs!—Addenda quædam.

My wife a-rattling,
My children tattling,
My money spent is,
And due my rent is.
My school decreasing,
My income ceasing.
All people teaze me,
But no man pays me.
My worship is bit,
By that rogue Nisbit,
To take the right way,
Consult friend Whiteway.
Would you get still more?
Go flatter Kilmore.[a]
Your geese are old,
Your wife a scold.

Mrs. Whiteway is ever your friend, but your old ones have forsaken you as mine have me. My head is very bad, and I have just as much spirits left as a drowned mouse. Pray do not you give yourself airs of pretending to have flies in summer at Cavan; and such a no summer as this: I, who am the best fly-catcher in the kingdom, have not thought it worth my time to show my skill in that art. I believe nothing of your garden improvements, for I know you too well. What you say of your leanness is incredible; for when I saw you last you were as broad as long. But if you continue to breathe free (which nothing but exercise can give), you may be safe with as little flesh as I, which is none at all.

I had your letter just before this was sealed; but I cannot answer it now. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

June 15, 1736.

MADAM,—I write this letter to your ladyship in the employment you have chosen of being a go-between the duke of Dorset and me. I must preface this letter with an honest declaration that I never proposed any one thing to his grace wherein I did not chiefly consult his honour and the general opinion of the kingdom. I had the honour to know him from a boy, as I did your ladyship from a child; and yet, excepting great personal civilities, I never was able to obtain the favour of getting one church preferment for any friend except one too inconsiderable to mention. I wrote to and told my lord duke that there was a certain family here called the Grattans, and that they could command ten thousand men; two of them are parsons, as you Whigs call them, another is lord mayor of this city, and was knighted by his grace a month or two ago. But there is another cousin of theirs, who is a Grattan, though his name be John Jackson, as worthy a clergyman as any in this kingdom. He lives upon his own small estate, four miles from this town, and in his own parish; but he has four children. He only wants some little addition of 100*l* a-year; for he has laid out 800*l.* to build upon his own small estate in his own parish, which he cannot leave; and we cannot spare him. He has lain a weight upon my shoulders for many years; and I have often mentioned him to my lord duke as a most deserving person. His grace has now an opportunity to help him. One Mr. Ward, who died this morning, had a deanery of small value; it was a hedge deanery, my lord duke will tell you what I mean; we have many of them in Ireland: but, as it does not require living there, except a month or two in the year, although it be but of 40*l.* or 50*l.* yearly rent, it will be a great ease to him. He is no party man, but a loyal subject. It is the deanery of Cloyne: he is well acquainted with the bishop, who is Dr. Berkeley; I have reasons enough to complain of my lord duke, who absolutely refused to provide for a most worthy man whom he had made one of his chaplains before he came over: and therefore, if he will not consent to give this poor deanery to Mr. John Jackson, I will fall out with him for ever. I desire your ladyship to let the duke know all this.

Somebody read a part of a newspaper to me the other day, wherein your saucy niece is mentioned as married with 45,000*l.* to her fortune. I desire to present her with my most humble service, and that we may be friends for the future. I hope your ladyship still preserves your health and good humour. Your virtues I am in no pain about; for you are confirmed in them by your education and birth as well as by constant practice. I pray God preserve you long, for the good you do to the world, and for your happiness hereafter.

I will (notwithstanding your commands to the contrary) be so bold to tell you that I am, with the greatest respect and esteem, madam, your ladyship's most obedient and obliged humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

June 23, 1736.

I OUGHT to begin with begging pardon for not answering yours of the 1st of May, before I thank you for that of the 15th of June: but I do not question the newspapers have informed you of the great loss I have had in my brother Henry Berkeley. And what is an addition to the grief for the best-natured, honest, sincere, disinterested, friendly brother, is the having left a wife, three daughters, and two sons, literally without bread to eat: though perhaps that part might soon be made easy, if those of his relations were as willing as they are able to help to take care of them, which hitherto they have only the benefit of from my two neices. She that you call the saucy one, has bestowed her very great fortune (much more than you mention) on lord Vere Beauclerk, and had my approbation of her own choice, for I think him a very deserving gentleman; and all that know him give him a great character. I am now with them in the country; but shall go in about a fortnight to Knowle; and when I am there will certainly obey your commands to the duke of Dorset. My brother George and lady Suffolk are gone to France to make a visit to lord Berkeley; which I am glad of, as I hope it will induce her to go to Spa and Aix-la-Chapelle, for her health, which I am afraid is very necessary for her, and truly believe is all she wants to make her easy and happy; or else my brother George is not the honest good-natured man I really take him to be; and she dissembles well if she is not so happy as she makes me believe, and I heartily wish her.

You order me to write long letters; but you may see by the nothingness of this, I am yet more unfit than ever to observe your orders, though in all things, and at all times, your most sincere and truly humble servant,

E. GERMAIN.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

June 23, 1736

DEAR SIR,—If you can believe me, I can assure you that we have a great plenty of flies at Cavan; and let me whisper you in this letter, nec desunt pediculi nec pulices; but [illegible] ou not to speak of it. Si me non fallit observatio, we shall have more of the Egyptian plagues, quippe multitudo militum die crastino adventura est in Cavanniam nostram. I do not know what the devil they will do for meat. De nostro cibo, nisi furtim, aut vi abripiunt, uxor me capiat, si gustaverint. The ladies are already bespeaking seats in my field upon the hill, Spectatum veniunt, veniunt spectentur ut ipsæ. Ho, brave colonels, captains, lieutenants, and cornets, adeo hic splendentes congregantur ut ipsis pavonibus pudorem incutiunt, of which I am an eyewitness, dejectis capitibus caudas demittunt. Our bakers are all so busy upon this occasion, that they double the heat of the weather, atque urunt officinas. But when the army fires on Friday, proh Jupiter! infernum redolebunt et spirabunt. The noise of guns, the neighing of the horses, and the women's tongues, cœlum atque terras miscebunt.

Grouse pouts are come in,
I've some in my bin,
To butter your chin;
When done with our din—ner, through thick and thin
We 'll walk out and in,
And care not a pin
Who thinks it a sin.
We make some folks grin,
By lashing their kin, &c.

I could not mention troop-horses, quin Pegasus noster lusit exultim ut vides; sed jam stabulo inclusus de versibus nihil amplius. You may be surprised at this motley epistle; but you must know that I fell upon my head the other day, and the fall shook away half my English and Latin, cum omnia lingua Gallica, Hispanica, necnon Italica. I would rather indeed my wife had lost her one tongue, totaliter, quoniam equidem nullus dubito nisi radicitus evelleretur tonitrui superaret.

I wish your reverence were here to hear the trumpets:
Mistake me not, for I mean not the strumpets.

Well, when will you come down, or will you come at all? I think you may, can, could, might, would, or ought to come. My house is enlarging, and you may now venture to bring your own company with you; namely, the provost, archdeacon Wall, the bishop of Clogher, and ——, by way of enlivening the rest. Do not let my lord Orrery come with them; for I know they will not be pleased with his company. My love to my sweetheart Mrs. Whiteway, if she continues constant; if not, my hatred and my gall. Excuse my haste. I hope by the next post to make up for this short epistle. I am, dear sir, with all affection and respect, your most obedient humble servant,

THOMAS SHERIDAN.

FROM MR. DONNELLAN.

Cork, July 3, 1736.

SIR,—I had the favour of your commands with relation to Mr. Dunkin;[a] and, in pursuance of them, have wrote to two of my friends among the senior fellows, and recommended his petition and your request, in the best and strongest manner I was able. I am, upon many accounts, obliged to execute whatever orders you are pleased to give me, with the greatest readiness and cheerfulness possible; which I assure you I do on this occasion, and shall think myself very happy if I can any way promote the success of an affair which you wish well to. But beside the right that you have to command me, I think Mr. Dunkin's case, as Mr. Sican has represented it, really very worthy of compassion, and on that account likewise should be very glad I could be of some service to him. To be sure he acted a very silly and wrong part in marrying, and in the affair of Dr. Cope's daughter; and I fear he has hurt himself very considerably in the opinion of the college by his strange behaviour at the board, without occasion. But I hope all this will be got over by your appearance in his favour, and that your request will have all that weight with the college that it ought. I reminded my friends (though I hope they had not forgot it) of the considerable services you had done their house at different times, and let them know how much their compliance in this point would oblige you. After this I think they must be very beasts if they do not show their gratitude when they have so fair an opportunity, and idiots if they neglect purchasing the dean's favour at so cheap a rate.

My sister and I were very sorry we had not the pleasure of seeing you the morning we called at the deanery-house. We were just then going out of town, and had not another opportunity of taking our leave of you. She desires me to make her compliments to you in a very particular manner. We are both exceedingly busy in getting our little house ready, and hope to remove into it next week. I shall not trouble you, sir, with a description of it; but, in a few words, it is really a very sweet little spot, and though so near a great town, has all the advantages of a complete retirement.

[a] A female relation of Mr. Dunkin had bequeathed an estate in land for ever to the college and fellows of Trinity College, Dublin, upon condition that they should take care of his education, and afterward assist to advance him in the world. The college, in consequence of this request, allowed him at this time an annuity, which he was now soliciting to get increased to 100*l*. He succeeded in his application; and the earl of Chesterfield, when he had the government of Ireland in the year 1746, gave him the school of Enniskilling, which is very richly endowed, and was founded by king Charles I.

Though I am come among a people that I think you are not very fond of, yet this I must say in their favour, that they are not such brutes as to be insensible of the dean's merit. Ever since we came down, this town and country rung of your praises, for opposing the reduction of the coin; and they look upon the stop that is likely to be put to that affair as a second deliverance they owe you.

I hope the late fine weather has contributed to the recovery of your health: I am sure it is what we have all reason to desire the continuance of; and what I beg you will believe no one more truly and sincerely wishes, with all other happiness, than, sir, your most obedient and obliged humble servant,

CHR. DONNELLAN.

TO THE PROVOST AND SENIOR FELLOWS OF TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.[a]

Deanery-house, July 5, 1736.

REV. AND WORTHY SIRS,—As I had the honour of receiving some part of my education in your university, and the good fortune to be of some service to it while I had a share of credit at court, as well as since, when I had very little or none, I may hope to be excused for laying a case before you, and offering my opinion upon it.

Mr. Dunkin, whom you all know sent me some time ago a memorial intended to be laid before you, which perhaps he hath already done. His request is that you would be pleased to enlarge his annuity at present, and that he may have the same right, in his turn, to the first church preferment vacant in your gift, as if he had been made a fellow, according to the scheme of his aunt's will; because the absurdity of the condition in it ought to be imputed to the old woman's ignorance, although her intention be very manifest; and the intention of the testator in all wills is chiefly regarded by the law. What I would therefore humbly propose is this, that you would increase his pension to 100*l.* a-year, and make him a firm promise of the first church living in your disposal, to the value of 200*l.* a-year, or somewhat more. This I take to be a reasonable medium between what he hath proposed in his memorial, and what you allow him at present.

I am almost a perfect stranger to Mr. Dunkin, having never seen him above twice, and then in mixed company, nor should I know his person if I met him in the streets. But I know he is a man of wit and parts, which, if applied properly to the business of his function, instead of poetry (wherein it must be owned he sometimes excels[b]), might be of great use and service to him.

I hope you will please to remember that, since your body hath received no inconsiderable benefaction from the aunt, it will much increase your reputation rather to err on the generous side toward the nephew.

These are my thoughts, after frequently reflecting on the case under all its circumstances; and so I leave it to your wiser judgments. I am, with true respect and esteem, reverend and worthy sirs, your most obedient and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] This letter plainly shows the author's friendship to gentlemen of genius and learning, although unacquainted with them; but soon after this, Mr. Dunkin was introduced to the dean, who did him further services, by recommending him to Dr. Bolton, archbishop of Cashell, who ordained him.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

July 6, 1736.

DEAR SIR,—I suspect that some secret villain has prevented the lord chancellor to sign my commission; and therefore I entreat the favour of you to know the meaning of it from his excellency; for I had his consent by a recommendation from my lord chief-baron Marley and Mr. Justice Ward. The summer is going off fast, so are my best fowl, and you are not yet come. Will you not come for your 660*l.*? We have no way to carry it, except you come for it yourself; and do not forget to bring the deed of sale with you for the Marahills and Drumcor. I wish you could sail with them hither, to save you the trouble of riding, which I would rather see than fifty pounds, which I would set my hand and seal to. Mr. Jones, as I told you before, will not pay anybody but yourself; so that you must inevitably come, nolens volens, right or wrong, whether you can or not. Our venison is plenty; our weather too hot for its carriage. We have not had two hundred drops of rain these six weeks past.

Our river is dry,	Oh, where shall I fly
And fiery the sky;	From Phœbus's eye!
I fret and I fry,	In bed when I lie,
Just ready to die:	I soak like a pie;
	And I sweat, oh! I sweat,
	Like a hog in a sty!

I know you love Alexandrines, for which reason I closed the above madrigal with one. I think it is of a very good proportion, which I hope you will set to music; and pray let me have a bass and second treble, with what other decorations and graces you can better design than I can direct. To let you see you can want for nothing if you come to Cavan, I write you the following catalogue:—

Good road,	Right bacon,
A clean house,	Cauliflowers,
A hearty welcome	Young chickens,
Good ale,	Fat venison,
Good beer,	Small mutton,
Good bread,	Green pease,
Good bed,	Good water,
Young turkeys,	Good wine,
Young beans,	Young ducks,
Young lambs,	Carrots,
Grouse pouts,	Parsnips, Item
Fine trouts,

A LONG GRAVEL-WALK.

I must trouble your reverence with a small sample of some things, to let you see that all I have said is truth.

FROM CHARLES FORD, Esq.

London, July 8, 1736.

You cannot imagine how much I was transported to see a superscription in your hand, after two years and a half intermission. The pleasure I had in not being quite forgotten was soon abated by what you say of your ill health. I doubt you live too much by yourself; and retirement makes the strongest impression upon those who are formed for mirth and society. I have not been these thirty years without a set of cheerful companions, by herding with new ones as the old marry and go off. Why have not you a succession of Grattans and Jacksons? Whatever resentment the men in power may have, everybody else would seek your company upon your own terms: and for those in great stations, I am sure, at this time, you would be ashamed to be well with them. If they hate you, it is because they fear you, and know your abilities better than you seem to do yourself: even in your melancholy you write with too much fire for broken spirits. Your giddiness and deafness give me the utmost concern; though I believe you would be less subject to them, and as well taken care of here: nor need you spunge for a dinner, since you would be invited to two or three places every day. I will say no more upon this subject, because I know there is no persuading you.

My legs have been swelled many years: it is above twelve since Beaufort gave me a prescription for them, which I never took till last winter. My lord Litchfield, and other of my acquaintance, persuaded me to it; and they tell me it had its effect, for I am no judge either of my own bad looks, or large legs, having always found myself perfectly well, except when I had my fever four years ago. I walk constantly every day in the Park, and am forced to be both temperate and sober, because my meat is so much overdone that I do not like it; and my dining acquaintance reserve themselves for a second meeting at night, which I obstinately refuse.

If your rents fall, I do not know what must become of us. I have considerable losses every year, and yet I think Crossthwaite a very honest man. Rents for some time have been ill paid here as well as in Ireland; and farms flung up every day which have not been raised since king Charles I.'s time. The graziers are undone in all parts, and it is bad enough with the farmers. One cause is, their living much higher than they did formerly; another is, the great number of enclosures made of late, enough to supply many more people than England contains. It is certain all last year a man came off well enough if he could sell a fat ox at the price he bought him lean. The butchers, by not lowering their meat in proportion, have been the only gainers.

I generally hear once a month, or oftener, from my sister. She writes to me with great affection; but I find she is still wrongheaded, and will be so as long as she lives. As she expected unreasonable presents, she makes them much more unreasonably: and, in my opinion, so ill-judged, that I do not wonder more at her than at those who receive them. I see no difference in giving thirty or forty guineas, or in paying thirty or forty guineas for a thing the person you give it to must have paid. I have heard no reason to doubt lord Masham. I know nothing of his son, not even by sight. Our friend Lewis is in constant duty with his sick wife, who has been some years dying, and will not die. Unless he calls, as he does upon me for a quarter of an hour at most twice in a year, there is no seeing him. I heartily wish you health and prosperity; and am ever most sincerely yours, &c.

My lord Masham was extremely pleased with your remembering him, and desired me to make his compliments to you.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

July 10, 1736.

I RECEIVED your two letters. The first is mingled with Latin and English, one following the other; now I scorn that way, and put both languages in one. However, for the sake of order, I will begin with answering your second letter before the first, because it deserves one on account of your presents from bogs, rivers, mountains, mosses, quagmires, heaths, lakes, kennels, ditches, weeds, &c. &c. &c. &c. Mrs. Whiteway was pleased, although very unjustly, to criticise upon every curiosity; she swears the paper of gravel was of your own voiding, as she found by the smell. That your whole artichoke leaf shows its mother to be smaller than a nutmeg; and I confess you were somewhat unwary in exposing it to censure. Your raspberry she compared with the head of a corking-pin, and the latter had the victory. Your currants were invisible, and we could not distinguish the red from the black. Your purslain passed very well with me, but she swore it was houseleek. She denies your Cavan fly to be genuine, but will have it that, for the credit of your town, you would have it born there, although Mrs. Donaldson confesses it was sent hither in a box of brown sugar, and died as it entered the gates. Mrs. Whiteway proceeds further in her malice, declaring your nasturtium to be only a piss-a-bed; your beans as brown as herself, and of the same kind with what we fatten hogs in Leicestershire. In one thing she admires your generosity, that for her sake you would spare a drop or two of your canal water, which by the spongy bottom needs it so much. The only defects of them all were, that they wanted colour, sight, and smell; yet as to the last, we both acknowledge them all to exhale a general fustiness, which, however, did much resemble that of your Cavan air. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

I RECEIVED your letter, which began with "lings." You have thirteen in all, and I have got but a hundred and sixty: a trifle! Find me ten more than mine and I will give you ten guineas for the eleventh. Mine are all down, and only twelve which are not entered in a letter, which I will send you when health permits, and I have nothing else to do, and that may be a twelvemonth hence, if my disorder will let me hold out so long. You were born to be happy, for you take the least piece of good fortune cheerfully. I suppose your arithmetic is that three boys a-week are a hundred and fifty-nine in a year; and seven guineas a-week are three hundred and sixty-five per annum. Can you reckon that the county, and the next, and Dublin, will provide you with thirty lads in all, and good pay, of which a dozen shall be lodgers? Does the cheapness of things answer your expectation? Have you sent away your late younger-married daughter, and will you send away the other? Let me desire you will be very regular in your accounts; because a very honest friend of yours and mine tells me that, with all your honesty, it is an uneasy thing to have any dealings with you that relate to accounts, by your frequent forgetfulness and confusion: for you have no notion of regularity; and I do not wonder at it, considering the scattered, confused manner in which you have lived. Mrs. Whiteway thanks you for the good opinion you have of her, and I know she always loved and defended you. I cannot tell when I shall be able to travel. I have three other engagements on my hands, but the principal is to see the bishop of Ossory. Yet I dread the lying abroad above five miles. I am never well. Some sudden turns are every day threatening me with a giddy fit; and my affairs are terribly embroiled. I have a scheme of living with you, when the College-green club is to meet; for in these times I detest the town, and hearing the follies, corruptions, and slavish practices of those misrepresentative brutes; and resolve, if I can stir, to pass that whole time at Bath or Cavan. I say again, keep very regular accounts, in large books and a fair hand; not like me, who to save paper confuse everything. Your mind is honest, but your memory a knave, and therefore the Scotch mean the same thing by "minding" that we do by "remembering." "Sirrah," said I to a Scotch footman, "why did not you go that errand?"—"Because I did not 'mind' it," quoth Sawney. A curse on these twenty soldiers, drumming through my liberty twice a-day, and going to a barrack the government hath placed just under my nose. I think of a line in Virgil Travesty. "The d—l cut their yelping weasons." We expect lord Orrery and bishop Rundle next week. This letter was intended for last post, but interruptions and horses hindered it. Poor Mrs. Acheson is relapsed at Grange, and worse than ever: I was there yesterday and met Dr. Helsham, who hopes she was a little better.—16. Here has nobody been hanged, married, or dead, that I hear of: Dr. Grattan is confined by a boil; if you ask him where, he will sell you a bargain. My chief country companion now is Philosopher Webber: for the Grattans and Jacksons are neither to be found at home nor abroad, except Robin, who cannot stir a foot. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

July 11, 1736.

SINCE, it seems, my letters are not for your own perusal, but kept for a female cousin, to her this ought to be addressed; only that I am not yet in spirits to joke. I did not do so by your request, as you apprehended by my letter, for I spoke to the duke much sooner than I told you I should, and did so as soon as it was possible for me, or as soon as I could have sent it. But my answer was, that he had that moment received a letter from lord Orrery, with the most pressing instances for a deserving friend of his that the duke could not refuse, especially as my lord Orrery had been most extremely obliging, and, for this whole session, neglected no opportunity to endeavour to make his administration easy; though at the same time he assured me he would otherwise have been very glad to oblige you, and does agree that the gentleman you recommended is a very deserving one also. All this you should have known before had I been able to write; but I have been laid up with the gout in my hand and foot, and thought it not necessary to make use of a secretary, since I had nothing more pleasing to tell you. I shall always be extremely willing to be employed by you to him; nor do I make any question but you will always recommend the worthy, as it is for your own honour as well as his. No more will I agree that you never did prevail on any one occasion; because the very first you did employ me about was instantly complied with, though against a rule he thought right, and I knew before he had set himself.

Lady Suffolk is now at Spa, with my brother George, for her health; and as I shall go for my own, to the Bath in September, I fear we shall not meet this great while. And now I must finish this long letter, which has not been quite easy to write, being still your gouty, but faithful humble servant.

DEAR SIR,—I received yours some day or other this week, by the hands of Mrs. Donaldson, who has made affidavit before our town magistrate, that I never borrowed a fly of her in my life; and I have likewise deponed upon oath, that I caught the fly perched upon a rose-tree in my own garden; and I would have you to know that I have above four hundred thousand of the same species, for I counted them last Sunday. If you will not believe me, pray come down and see. Mr. Jones has your 660*l.* ready, but can get no bills to remit it. I beseech you lose no time, for he is uneasy about it. * * * *

If you put off the time of coming down longer, you will lose the best things our country can afford. The ladies are full of your coming, viz.—

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

July 31, 1736.

DEAR SIR,—I went to Belturbet immediately upon the receipt of your letter, and found Mr. Jones ready for Mr Henry's draught, and glad of it; and so am I. But you are a very fine lawyer in calling your deed of sale a mortgage——Instead of cancelling, there is more to be done: you must not only cancel, but you must reconvey to me, in a formal manner, as if you sold to me—Pray ask advice, and do not do things hand over head, as you were going to do (observe my style[b]), like me. If I had not sworn never to set my foot in Dublin, except I were to pass through it for England,[c] I would go thither next vacation; but I have sworn solemnly I will not. If I had my few friends out of it, I would not care that all the rest were petrified.

Now you must know that I forbid you the town of Cavan as strenuously as I invited you to it; for the small-pox is the broom of death at present, and sweeps us off here by dozens. I never had it, which gives me some little palpitations, but no great fear. As soon as I can get 500*l.* in my pocket, to make a figure with, I may perhaps honour your metropolis with my presence; and that may be sooner than you imagine, for I have a guinea, a moidore, a cobb, and two Manks pence towards it already. You may think I swagger, but as I hope to be saved it is true.

How grieved I am that I am out of the way while doctor King is in Dublin! I wish with all my soul he would take a frolic to come hither, because he would cost me no wine, and I have the best water in Ireland.

My collection of witty sayings, &c., is finished, if I had any friends to recommend them. The best wares of that kind will not go off otherwise. Doctor King promised me his friendship at Oxford. If you would speak a kind word to the public in their behalf, I know they would bring me in l'argent, which I now want as much as I formerly did the gift of retention, when I had enough. But—that—is—neither—here—nor there.—

My son—I can affirm, is thoroughly reformed; and as an argument of it, I must acquaint you that his mother finds fault with everything he does.

My son—is so far poisoned by the serpent his mother, that I cannot get him home, although I sent horses for him. * * * *

May all happiness attend you is the sincere wish of, dear sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

FROM LADY HOWTH.

August 6, 1736.

SIR,—I do not know how this letter may be received, since I never had the favour of an answer to my last. I impute it to the neglect of the post, or anything rather than to think I am forgotten by my old friend. I am now in Connaught, where I assure you I spend the least of my time at cards. I am on horseback almost every day to view the beauties of Connaught, where I am told you have been. I live greatly under ground; for I view all the places under ground. I make nothing of going down sixty steps. I really think, could you lend me a little of your brains, I should be able to come nigh Addison in several of his descriptions of Italy: for upon my word I think there are several very remarkable things. As you took a journey last winter to Cavan, my lord and I hope you will take one to the county of Kilkenny this winter, where we assure you of a hearty welcome. I must now be troublesome to you; but lord Athunry begged I would write to you in favour of a young gentleman, one Mr. Ireland, who was usher to Mr. Garnett, schoolmaster of Tipperary. Mr. Garnett died lately; he has given Mr. Ireland a very good certificate; and most of the gentlemen in and about Tipperary have recommended Mr. Ireland to succeed Mr. Garnett; as you are one of the governors of that school, I hope you will do Mr. Ireland all the service you can, which will very much oblige me. Since I began this there came in a trout; it was so large that we had it weighed; it was a yard and four inches long, twenty-three inches round; his jaw-bone eight inches long, and he weighed thirty-five pounds and a half. My lord and I stood by to see it measured. I believe I have tired your patience; so beg leave to assure you I am your affectionate friend and humble servant,

L. HOWTH.

Direct to me at Turlaghvan, near Tuam. My lord begs you would accept of his compliments.

FROM THOMAS CARTE, ESQ.

August 11, 1736.

SIR,—Having at last, after a long application and in the midst of sharp rheumatic pains, the effects of a sedentary life, finished my "History of the Life of the first Duke of Ormond, and of the Affairs of Ireland in his Time," I here send you a copy of that work, of which I beg your acceptance. I have endeavoured to follow the instructions you gave me, and hope I have done so in some measure. If it have your approbation in any degree, it will be so much to my satisfaction.

It hath been a long subject of complaint in England that no history has yet been wrote of it upon authentic and proper materials; and even those who have taken notice of the military actions of our ancestors have yet left the civil history of the kingdom (the most instructive of any) untouched for want of a proper knowledge of the antiquities, usages, laws, and constitutions of this nation. Rapin de Thoiras, the last writer, was a foreigner, utterly ignorant in these respects, and, writing his history abroad, had no means of clearing up any difficulties that he met with therein. He made, indeed, some use of Rymer's "Fœdera;" but his ignorance of our customs suffered him to fall into gross mistakes for want of understanding the phraseology of Acts which have reference to our particular customs. Besides, Rymer's collection contains only such treaties as were enrolled in the Tower or in the rolls of Chancery; he knew nothing of such as were enrolled in the Exchequer, and of the public treaties with foreign princes enrolled in this latter office. I have now a list of above four hundred by me. Rymer never made use of that vast collection of materials for an English history which is preserved in the Cotton library; nor ever consulted any journal of our privy council whenever he refers to any, still quoting bishop Burnet for his author. He never read the rolls of parliament, nor any journal of either house, where the chief affairs within the nation are transacted; and did not so much as know there was such a place as the paper-office, where all the letters of the English ambassadors abroad, and all the despatches of our secretaries of state at home, from the time of Edward IV. to the Revolution (since which the secretaries have generally carried away the papers), are kept in a good method, and with great regularity; so that he wanted likewise the best materials for an account of our foreign affairs. These defects have made several of our nobility and gentry desire a new history to be wrote, in which the above-mentioned, and other materials as authentic as they, may be made use of. They have proposed it to me, and my objections regarding the vastness of the expense as well as labour, that, to satisfy myself, I must have all materials by me, not only copies out of our records, journals, &c., in England; but even copies of negotiations of foreign ambassadors at this court (e. g. of the French; all the negotiations and letters of which, for two hundred years past, I know where to have copied), they have proposed a subscription of 1000*l.* a-year, for as many years as the work will require, to defray this expense. The subscription is begun, and will (I believe) be completed this winter; and then that work will employ all my time. One advantage I already find from the very talk of this design, having been offered several collections and memoirs of particular persons, considerable in their time, which I did not know were in being, and which would else no part of them ever see the light; and the manner of the history's being carried on will probably make everybody open their stores.

This is one reason, among many others, which makes me very desirous of having your judgment of the work I have now published, and that you would point out to me such faults as I would fain correct in my designed work. It will be a very particular favour to a person who is, with the greatest esteem and respect, sir, your very obliged and obedient servant,

THOMAS CARTE.

DR. SHERIDAN TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Cavan, August 14, 1736.

DEAR MADAM,—Your account of the dean gives me much grief. I hope in God he will disappoint all his friends' fears and his enemies' hopes. Nothing can be a greater affliction to me than my distance from him; and, what is full as bad, my being so near to one who has been the occasion of it. Very rich folks in my debt have made such apologies for non-payment, that I now feel for Ireland, but much more for myself, because I was in hopes of being able to make my appearance in Dublin with a good grace; namely, to pay some debts, which I cannot.

My poor lady Mountcashell has a right to a visit from me; and thither I will venture for a day and a night; and I will venture to the deanery for another. I could wish the best friend I had in the world (you may guess who I mean), and am sure is so still, would take a little of my advice. You may depend upon this, it should be all for my own advantage.

Now I have done raving, I must turn my pen, which is my tongue's representative, against you for awhile, because I am certain it might be in your power to paint my Siberia so agreeably to the dean as to send him hither while our good weather lasted. My new kitchen is disappointed; so is my gravel walk, but what is worse, his only favourite, my rib,—who dreamed with great pleasure that he would never come. I am sorry she is disappointed; for I am certain she would run away if he had come—God forgive him for not doing it—I will make all the haste I can out of this hell; and I hope my friends (I beg pardon, I mean my friend) will cast about a little for me; if he does not, I will try England, where the predominant phrase is, Down with the Irish. I will say no more, but tell you that you are a false mistress; and if you do not behave yourself better, I will choose another. In the mean time, God bless you and my dearest friend the dean. I am, notwithstanding all your upbraidings, dear madam, your most obedient humble servant,

THOMAS SHERIDAN.

FROM MR. POPE.

August 17, 1736.

I FIND, though I have less experience than you, the truth of what you told me some time ago, that increase of years makes men more talkative but less writative; to that degree, that I now write no letters but of plain business, or plain how-d'ye's, to those few I am forced to correspond with, either out of necessity or love: and I grow laconic even beyond laconicism; for sometimes I return only Yes, or No, to questionary or petitionary epistles of half a yard long. You and lord Bolingbroke are the only men to whom I write, and always in folio. You are indeed almost the only men I know who either can write in this age, or whose writings will reach the next: others are mere mortals. Whatever failings such men may have, a respect is due to them as luminaries whose exaltation renders their motion a little irregular, or causes it to seem so to others. I am afraid to censure anything I hear of dean Swift, because I hear it only from mortals, blind and dull; and you should be cautious of censuring any action or motion of lord B., because you hear it only from shallow, envious, or malicious reporters. What you writ to me about him I find, to my great scandal, repeated in one of yours to ——. Whatever you might hint to me, was this for the profane? the thing, if true, should be concealed;[a] but it is, I assure you, absolutely untrue in every circumstance. He has fixed in a very agreeable retirement near Fontainbleau, and makes it his whole business vacare literis. But tell me the truth, were you not angry at his omitting to write to you so long? I may, for I hear from him seldomer than from you, that is twice or thrice a-year at most. Can you possibly think he can neglect you, or disregard you? If you catch yourself at thinking such nonsense, your parts are decayed. For believe me, great geniuses must and do esteem one another, and I question if any others can esteem or comprehend uncommon merit. Others only guess at that merit, or see glimmerings of their minds; a genius has the intuitive faculty: therefore, imagine what you will, you cannot be so sure of any man's esteem as of his. If I can think that neither he nor you despise me, it is a greater honour to me by far, and will be thought so by posterity, than if all the house of lords writ commendatory verses upon me, the commons ordered me to print my works, the universities gave me public thanks, and the king, queen, and prince, crowned me with laurel. You are a very ignorant man: you do not know the figure his name and yours will make hereafter: I do, and will preserve all the memorials I can that I was of your intimacy; longo, sed proximus, intervallo. I will not quarrel with the present age; it has done enough for me in making and keeping you two my friends. Do not you be too angry at it, and let not him be too angry at it; it has done, and can do, neither of you any manner of harm, as long as it has not, and cannot burn your works: while those subsist, you will both appear the greatest men of the time, in spite of princes and ministers; and the wisest, in spite of all the little errors you may please to commit.

Adieu. May better health attend you than I fear you possess; may but as good health attend you always as mine is at present; tolerable, when an easy mind is joined with it.

[a] One of Bolingbroke's letters to sir Charles Wyndham seems to explain this circumstance, written in the same year, in which he says, "It is reported among you that I play the Celadon here, &c."

FROM MRS. PENDARVES.

September 2, 1736.

SIR,—I never will accept of the writ of ease you threaten me with; do not flatter yourself with any such hopes: I receive too many advantages from your letters to drop a correspondence of such consequence to me. I am really grieved that you are so much persecuted with a giddiness in your head; the Bath and travelling would certainly be of use to you. Your want of spirits is a new complaint, and what will not only afflict your particular friends, but every one that has the happiness of your acquaintance. I am uneasy to know how you do, and have no other means for that satisfaction but from your own hand; most of my Dublin correspondents being removed to Cork, to Wicklow mountains, and the Lord knows where. I should have made this inquiry sooner, but that I have this summer undertaken a work that has given me full employment, which is making a grotto in sir John Stanley's garden at Northend; it is chiefly composed of shells I had from Ireland. My life, for two months past, has been very like a hermit's; I have had all the comforts of life but society, and have found living quite alone a pleasanter thing than I imagined. The hours I could spend in reading have been entertained by Rollins's "History of the Ancients," in French. I am very well pleased with it; and think your Annibals, Scipios, and Cyruses prettier fellows than are to be met with now-a-days. Painting and music have had their share in my amusements. I rose between five and six, and went to bed at eleven. I would not tell you so much about myself if I had anything to tell you of other people. I came to town the night before last; and if it does not, a few days hence, appear better to me than at present, I shall return to my solitary cell. Sir John Stanley has been all the summer at Tunbridge.

I suppose you may have heard of Mr. Pope's accident, which had like to have proved a very fatal one; he was leading a young lady into a boat, from his own stairs, her foot missed the side of the boat, she fell into the water and pulled Mr. Pope after her; the boat slipped away, and they were immediately out of their depth; and it was with some difficulty they were saved. The young lady's name is Talbot; she is as remarkable for being a handsome woman as Mr. Pope is for wit. I think I cannot give you a higher notion of her beauty, unless I had named you instead of him. I shall be impatient till I hear from you again; being, with great sincerity, sir, your most faithful humble servant, M. PENDARVES.

P.S. I forgot to answer, on the other side, that part of your letter that concerns my sister. I do not know whether you would like her person as well as mine, because sickness has faded her complexion; but it is greatly my interest not to bring you acquainted with her mind, for that would prove a potent rival; and nothing but your partiality to me as an older acquaintance could make you give me the preference.

I beg my particular compliments to Dr. Delany.[a] Sir John Stanley says, if you have not forgotten him, he desires to be remembered as your humble servant.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN.

September 15, 1736.

DEAR SIR,—I received a letter from Mr. Henry by the last post, wherein he tells me that the 660*l.* were short by 8*l.* of your principal, and that you expected I should send you my promissory note for that, and the interest of your money, which I will do most willingly, when you let me know whether you will charge me five or six per cent. that I may draw my note accordingly. Indeed, if you pleased, or would vouchsafe, or condescend, or think proper, I would rather that you would, I mean should charge only five per cent. because I might be sooner able to pay it. Upon second thoughts, mine eyes being very sore with weeping for my wife, you may let Mrs. Whiteway know (to whom pray present my love and best respects) that I have made an experiment of the lake-water, which I sent for, upon myself only twice, before my optics became as clear as ever; for which reason I sent for a dozen bottles of it for Miss Harrison, to brighten her stars to the ruin of all beholders. Remember, if she turns basilisk, that her mother is the cause. Tully the carrier (not Tully the orator) is to leave this to-morrow (if he does), by whom I shall send you a quarter of my own small mutton, and about six quarts of nuts to my mistress [Mrs. Whiteway] in Abbey-street, with a fine pair of Cavan nutcrackers to save her white teeth; and yours too, if she will deign to lend them to you. I would advise you to keep in with that same lady, as you value my friendship (which is your best feather). therwise you must forgive me if my affections shall withdraw with hers. Alas, my long evenings are coming on, bad weather, and confinement.

Somebody told me (but I forget who) that Mrs. Whiteway rid your mare at the Curragh, and won the plate; but surely she would not carry the frolic so far. They say the primate's lady[b] rid against her; and that Mrs. Whiteway, by way of weight, carried the bishop of Down and Connor behind her. Pray let me know the truth of this.

Mr. Faulkner wrote to me for some poems of yours which I have. I am collecting them as fast as I can from among my papers; and he shall have them in a post or two, so please to tell him

Three old women were lately buried at the foot of our steeple here; and so strong was the fermentation of their carcases, that our steeple has visibly grown forty foot higher; and what is wonderful, above twenty small ones are grown out of its sides. What surprises me most is, that the bell-rope is not one foot higher from the ground. Be so good as to communicate this to the provost of the college, or archdeacon Whittingham, or archdeacon Wall. I would be glad to have all or either of their opinions, as they are the chief virtuosi in this kingdom.

I wish you all happiness, and hope you will outlive every enemy, and then we may hope our church and kingdom will flourish, and so will your obedient and very humble servant, THOMAS SHERIDAN.

TO WILLIAM RICHARDSON, ESQ.[a]

Dublin, October 23, 1736.

SIR,—I had the favour of a letter from you about two months ago; but I was then, and have been almost ever since, in so ill a state of health and lowness of spirits, that I was not able to acknowledge it; and it is not a week since I ventured to write to an old friend upon a business of importance. I have long heard of you and your character; which, as I am certain was true, so it was very advantageous, and gave me a just esteem of you, which your friendly letter has much increased. I owe you many thanks for your goodness to Mr. Warburton and his widow. I had lately a letter from her, wherein she tells me of the good office you have done her. I would be glad to know whether she has been left in a capacity of living in any comfortable way, and able to provide for her children; for I am told her husband left her some. He served once a cure of mine; but I came over to settle here upon the queen's death, when consequently all my credit was gone, except with the late primate, who had many obligations to me, and on whom I prevailed to give that living to Mr. Warburton, and make him surrogate, which he lost in a little time. Alderman Barber was my old acquaintance. I got him two or three employments when I had credit with the queen's ministers; but upon her majesty's death he was stripped of them all. However, joining with Mr. Gumley, they both entered into the South-Sea scheme, and the alderman grew prodigiously rich: but by pursuing too far, he lost two-thirds of his gains. However, he bought a house with some acres near Richmond, and another in London, and kept 50,000*l.* which enabled him to make a figure in the city. This is a short history of the alderman, who, in spite of his Tory principles, got through all the honours of London. I cannot tell whether his office of governor of your society[b] be for his life, or only annual; I suppose you can inform me.

Your invitation is friendly and generous, and what I would be glad to accept, if it were possible; but, sir, I have not an ounce of flesh about me, and cannot ride above a dozen miles in a day without being sore and bruised and spent. My head is every day more or less disordered by a giddiness; yet I ride the strand here constantly when fair weather invites me. But if I live till spring next, and have any remainder of health, I determine to venture, although I have some objections. I do not doubt your good cheer and welcome; but you brag too much of the prospects and situations.. Dare you pretend to vie with the county of Armagh, which, excepting its cursed roads, and want of downs to ride on, is the best part I have seen of Ireland? I own you engage for the roads from hence to your house; but where am I to ride after rainy weather? Here I have always a strand or a turnpike for four or five miles. Your being a bachelor pleases me well; and as to neighbours, considering the race of squires in Ireland, I had rather be without them. If you have books in large print, or an honest parson with common sense, I desire no more. But here is an interval of above six months; and in the mean time God knows what will become of me, and perhaps of the kingdom, for I think we are going to ruin as fast as it is possible. If I have not tired you now, I promise never to try your patience so much again. I am, sir, with true esteem, your most obedient and obliged servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

I hear your brother the clergyman is still alive: I knew him in London and Ireland, and desire you will present him with my humble service.

TO THE RIGHT HON. SIR JOHN STANLEY, BART.

Dublin, October 30, 1736.

SIR,—I have had for several months a strong application made me, by a person for whose virtue, honour, and good sense I have a great esteem, to write to you in behalf of one of your tenants here, whose case I send you enclosed; and if he relates it with truth and candour, I expect you will comply with his request, because I have known you long and have always highly esteemed and loved you, as you cannot deny: I know you will think it hard for me or any one to interfere in a business of property: but I very well understand the practice of Irish tenants to English landlords, and of those landlords to their tenants. Yet, if what Mr. Wilding desires is rightly represented, that he has been a great improver, his offers reasonable, his gains by no means exorbitant, and his payments regular, you neither must nor shall act as an Irish racking squire. I have inquired about this tenant, and hear a good account of his honesty; and that worthy friend who recommends him to me durst not deceive me: so I fully reckon that you will obey my commands, or show me strong reasons to the contrary; in which case I will break with that friend and drive your tenant out of doors whenever he presumes to open his lips again to me on any occasion.

I have one advantage by this letter, that it gives me a fair occasion of inquiring after your health, and where you live, and how you employ your leisure, and what share I keep in your good will. As to myself, years and infirmities have sunk my spirits to nothing. My English friends are all either dead or in exile, or, by a prudent oblivion, have utterly dropped me; having loved this present world. And as to this country, I am only a favourite of my old friends the rabble, and I return their love because I know none else who deserve it. May you live long, happy, and beloved, as you have ever been by the best and wisest of mankind. And if ever you happen to think of me, remember that I have always been, and shall ever continue, with the truest respect and esteem, sir, your most obedient and obliged servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

I know not the present state of your family; but if there be still near you the ladies I had the honour to know, I desire to present them with my most humble service.

I am now at the age of blundering in letters, syllables, words, and half-sentences, as you see, and must pardon.

FROM LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

November 2, 1736.

I AM sorry to be so unlucky in my late errands between his grace and you; and he also is troubled at it, as the person you recommend is indeed what you say, a very worthy person; but Mr. Molloy, who was lord George's second tutor, had the promise of the next preferment, so he cannot put him by this. I wish I was more fortunate in my undertakings; but I verily believe it is a common calamity to most men in power, that they are often by necessity prevented from obliging their friends; and many worthy people go unrewarded. Whether you call this a court answer or not, I am very positively sure he is heartily vexed when it is not in his power to oblige you. I have been very much out of order, or you should have heard from me before: and I am now literally setting out for the Bath. So adieu! dear dean.

FROM MRS. BARBER.

Bath, November 3, 1736.

SIR,—I should long since have acknowledged the honour of your kind letter, but that I found my head so disordered by writing a little, that I was fearful of having the gout in it; so I humbly beseech you to pardon me; nor think me ungrateful, nor in the least insensible of the infinite obligations I lie under to you, which, Heaven knows, are never out of my mind.

How shall I express the sense I have of your goodness in inviting me to return to Ireland, and generously offering to contribute to support me there? But would it not be base in me not to try to do something for myself, rather than be burdensome where I am already so much indebted?

As to the friend who you say, sir, is in so much better circumstances, I should be very unjust if I did not assure you that friend has never failed of being extremely kind to me.

I find I need not tell you that I am not able to pursue the scheme of letting lodgings, your goodness and compassion for my unhappy state of health has made you think of it for me; it is impracticable, but am desirous to try if I can do any good by selling Irish linen, which I find is coming much into repute here: in that way my daughter, who is willing to do everything in her power, can be of service, but never in the other.

If I should go from Bath, I have reason to think that the remainder of my life would be very miserable, and that I should soon lose the use of my limbs for ever; since I find nothing but the blessing of God on these waters does me any good; besides this, the interest of my children is a great inducement to me, for here I have the best prospect of keeping up an acquaintance for them. My son,[a] who is learning to paint, goes on well; and if he be in the least approved of, in all probability he may do very well at Bath; for I never yet saw a painter that came hither fail of getting more business than he could do, let him be ever so indifferent; and I am in hopes that Con[b] may settle here. Dr. Mead, whose goodness to me is great, may be of vast use to him, if he finds, as I hope he will, that he is worthy of his favour. And if God blesses my sons with success, they are so well inclined that I do not doubt but they would take a pleasure in supporting me, if I can make a shift to maintain them and myself till then: and I find Mr. Barber is very willing to do what he can for them, though his circumstances are far from being what you are told they are; nor, I fear, half so good.

[a] Mr. Rupert Barber, an eminent painter in crayons and miniature.

[b] Dr. Constantine Barber, a learned physician, and president of the College of Physicians in Dublin.

But though I cannot hope to be supported by letting lodgings, I would willingly take a house a little larger than I want for myself, if I could meet with it on reasonable terms; that if any particular friend came, they might lodge in it, which would make it more agreeable: and if I live till my son the painter goes into business, he might be with me. As for Con, if he does not choose to settle here, good Dr. Helsham, with his usual friendliness, has promised to honour him with his protection if he returns to Ireland.

I have now, sir, told you my schemes, and hope they will be honoured with your approbation: and encouraged by your inexpressible goodness to me, I have at length got resolution enough to beg a favour; which if you, sir, condescend to grant, would make me rich without impoverishing you.

When Dr. King of Oxford was last in Ireland, he had the pleasure of seeing your "Treatise on Polite Conversation," and gave such an account of it in London as made numbers of people very desirous to see it. Lady Worsley,[a] who heard of it from Mrs. Cleland,[b] and many more of my patronesses, pressed me to beg it of you, and assured me I might get a great subscription if I had that and a few of your original poems; if you would give me leave to publish an advertisement that you had made me a present of them. This they commanded me to tell you above a year ago, and I have had many letters since upon that account; but, conscious of the many obligations I already lay under, I have thought it a shame to presume further upon your goodness: but when I was last in London, they made me promise I would mention it the next time I wrote to you; and indeed I have attempted it many a time since, but never could till now. I humbly beseech you, sir, if you do not think it proper, not to be offended with me for asking it; for it was others, that out of kindness to me, put me upon it. They said you made no advantage for yourself by your writings; and that since you honoured me with your protection, I had all the reason in the world to think it would be a pleasure to you to see me in easy circumstances; that everybody would gladly subscribe for anything Dr. Swift wrote; and indeed I believe in my conscience it would be the making of me.[c]

There are a great many people of quality here this season; among others, lady Carteret and Mrs. Spencer,[d] who commanded me to make their best compliments to you. They came on Mrs. Spencer's account, who is better in her health since she drank these waters. I daily see such numbers of people mended by them, that I cannot but wish you would try them: as you are sensible your disorders are chiefly occasioned by a cold stomach, I believe there is not anything in this world so likely to cure that disorder as the Bath waters; which are daily found to be a sovereign remedy for disorders of that kind: I know, sir, you have no opinion of drugs, and why will you not try so agreeable a medicine, prepared by Providence alone? if you will not try for your own sake, why will you not in pity to your country? O, may that Being that inspired you to be its defence in the day of distress influence you to take the best method to preserve a life of so much importance to an oppressed people!

Before I conclude, gratitude obliges me to tell you that Mr. Temple[e] was here lately, and was exceedingly kind to me and my daughters. He made me a present of a hamper of very fine Madeira, which he said was good for the gout, and distinguished me in the kindest manner. He commanded me to make his best compliments to you, and says he flatters himself you will visit Moor Park once again. Heaven grant you may! and that I may be so blest as to see you, who am, with infinite respect and gratitude, your most obliged, most dutiful humble servant,

MARY BARBER.

FROM DR. KING TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Paris, November 9, O. S. 1736.

MADAM,—As soon as ever you cast your eye on the date of this letter you will pronounce me a rambler; and that is a charge I will not deny. How I was transported from Edinburgh to this place requires more room to inform you than my paper will allow me. But I will give you a small hint; you know I am a Laplander,[a] and consequently I have the honour to be well acquainted with some witches of distinction. I speak in the phrase of this country; for the first man I spoke to in Paris told me he had the honour to live next door to Mr. Knight's hatter. But to our business. I would not have you imagine I forget my friends or neglect the great affairs I have undertaken. The next letter you will receive from me shall be dated from London, where I propose to arrive about the 20th of this month. I will then put the little MS. to the press, and oblige the whole English nation.[b] As to the history, the dean may be assured I will take care to supply the dates that are wanting, and which can easily be done in an hour or two. The tracts, if he pleases, may be printed by way of appendix. This will be indeed less troublesome than the interweaving them in the body of the history, and will do the author as much honour and answer the purpose full as well. This is all I need say in answer to that part of your letter which is serious; for I hope you are not in earnest when you throw out such horrible reflections against my friends in Scotland. Will you believe me when I tell you upon my word that I was entertained with the greatest politeness and delicacy during my short stay in that country? I found everything as neat and clean in the houses where I had my quarters as even you could desire. I cannot indeed much commend Edinburgh; and yet the s——ks which are so much complained of there are not more offensive than I have found them in every street in this elegant city, which the French say is the mistress of the world: Madame, il n'y a qu'un Paris. As to my own thoughts of this nation, you shall know them when I am out of it: and then I will write to the dean, and give him some account of his old friend my lord Bolingbroke. When the dean is informed of what that gentleman is doing, I am apt to believe it will be a motive to induce him to hasten the publication of his history. In the mean time I beg of you to assure him that nothing shall be wanting on my part to execute his commissions very faithfully. I am truly sensible of the great obligations I owe him and of the honour he hath done me, not in the French sense of that word.

I desire my humble service to Miss Harrison, and tell Mr. Swift[c] I shall be glad of any opportunity to do him a real service. At the same time I assure you, with the greatest truth, that I am, madam, your most humble and most obedient servant,

W. KING.

FROM DR. SHERIDAN TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

November 21, 1736.

DEAR MADAM,—I received the vexatious account of your disappointment in the nuts and water, which were both in perfection when they left me, and for which I will make the carrier an example as soon as I can lay hold of him. I do believe this same country, wherein I am settled, exceeds the whole world in villany of every kind, and theft. It is not long since a pair of millstones were stolen and carried off from within two miles of Quilca; the thieves traced and pursued as far as Killishandra, and further they were never more heard of, any more than if they had been dropt into hell. I do believe this dexterity may challenge history to match it. It has made all our country merry but the poor miller that lost them.

I sincerely congratulate with you upon the recovery of our dear friend the dean. May he live long to enjoy his friends and the vexation of his enemies! I have been for a week past composing an Anglo-Latin letter to him, which is not as yet finished. I hope it will make him a visit upon his birthday, which I intend to celebrate with some of his own money and some of his own friends here. Three tenants have lately run away with thirty pounds of my rent: I have by good fortune got one rich honest man in their place, who has commenced from September past, and is to pay me their arrears the next May; so that I am well off. I will gather as fast as I can for the dean; but indeed he must have a little longer indulgence for me. It is very hard that the squire —— should keep my money in his pocket when it is nothing out of his. I suppose he intends it shall keep him in coals for two or three years; for the devil a one he burns, except it be sometimes in his kitchen, and his nursery upon a cold day. I have this day written a complaint of him to my scholar —— of ——, who I hope will have gratitude enough to do me justice. There never was known such a scarcity of money as we have in the north, owing to the dismal circumstances of some thousands of families preparing to go off that have turned their leases and effects into ready money. Some squires will have their whole estates left to themselves and their dogs. O what compassion I have for them! I have written a little pretty birthday poem against St. Andrew's-day, which, when corrected, revised, and amended, I intend for Faulkner to publish. I do assure you, madam, it is a very pretty thing (although I say it that should not say it), and as humorous a thing as ever you read in your life; and I know the whole world will be in love with it, as I am with you. But how the devil came you to tell the dean you are no longer any mistress? I say that you are and shall be so in spite of the whole world.

THOMAS SHERIDAN.

DR. DUNKIN TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

November 30, 1736.

MADAM,—I had proposed vast pleasure to myself, from the hopes of celebrating the dean's birthday with you; but as I have been afflicted with a violent headach all day, which is not yet abated, I could not safely venture abroad. I have, however, as in annual duty bound, attempted to write some lines on the occasion; not indeed with that accuracy the subject deserved, being the crudities of last night's lucubrations, to which I attribute the indisposition of my pate: but if they should in any measure merit your approbation, I shall rejoice in my pain. One comfort, however, I enjoy by absenting myself from your solemnity, that I shall not undergo a second mortification by hearing my own stuff. Be pleased to render my most dutiful respects agreeable to the dean; and pardon this trouble from, madam, your most obliged, most obedient servant, W. DUNKIN.

TO MR. POPE.

December 2, 1736.

I THINK you owe me a letter, but whether you do or not, I have not been in a condition to write. Years and infirmities have quite broke me; I mean that odious continual disorder in my head. I neither read, nor write, nor remember, nor converse. All I have left is to walk and ride: the first I can do tolerably, but the latter, for want of good weather at this season, is seldom in my power; and having not an ounce of flesh about me, my skin comes off in ten miles riding, because my skin and bone cannot agree together. But I am angry because you will not suppose me as sick as I am, and write to me out of perfect charity, although I should not be able to answer. I have too many vexations by my station and the impertinence of people to be able to bear the mortification of not hearing from a very few distant friends that are left; and, considering how time and fortune have ordered matters, I have hardly one friend left but yourself. What Horace says,—Singula de nobis anni prædantur, I feel every month at furthest; and by this computation, if I hold out two years, I shall think it a miracle. My comfort is, you begin to distinguish so confounded early that your acquaintance with distinguished men of all kinds was almost as ancient as mine. I mean Wycherly, Rowe, Prior, Congreve, Addison, Parnell, &c., and in spite of your heart you have owned me a contemporary. Not to mention lords Oxford, Bolingbroke, Harcourt, Peterborough: in short, I was the other day recollecting twenty-seven great ministers, or men of wit and learning, who are all dead, and all of my acquaintance, within twenty years past; neither have I the grace to be sorry that the present times are drawn to the dregs as well as my own life. May my friends be happy in this and a better life! but I value not what becomes of posterity when I consider from what monsters they are to spring. My lord Orrery writes to you to-morrow, and you see I send this under his cover, or at least franked by him. He has 3000*l.* a-year about Cork and the neighbourhood, and has more than three years' rent unpaid; this is our condition in these blessed times. I wrote to your neighbour about a month ago, and subscribed my name: I fear he has not received my letter, and wish you would ask him; but perhaps he is still a-rambling; for we hear of him at Newmarket, and that Boerhaave has restored his health. How my services are lessened of late with the number of my friends on your side! yet my lord Bathurst, and lord Marsham, and Mr. Lewis remain; and being your acquaintance, I desire when you see them to deliver my compliments; but chiefly to Mrs. Patty Blount, and let me know whether she be as young and agreeable as when I saw her last? Have you got a supply of new friends to make up for those who are gone? and are they equal to the first? I am afraid it is with friends as with times; and that the laudator temporis acti se puero[a] is equally applicable to both. I am less grieved for living here, because it is a perfect retirement, and consequently fittest for those who are grown good for nothing; for this town and kingdom are as much out of the world as North Wales. My head is so ill that I cannot write a paper full as I used to do; and yet I will not forgive a blank of half an inch from you. I had reason to expect from some of your

[a] "Ill-natured censor of the present age,
And fond of all the follies of the past."

letters that we were to hope for more epistles of morality; and I assure you my acquaintance resent that they have not seen my name at the head of one. The subject of such epistles are more useful to the public by your manner of handling them than any of all your writings; and although in so profligate a world as ours they may possibly not much mend our manners, yet posterity will enjoy the benefit whenever a court happens to have the least relish for virtue and religion.

FROM LORD CASTLEDURROW.[a]

Castledurrow, December 4, 1736.

SIR,—It is now a month since you favoured me with your letter; I fear the trouble of another from me may persuade you to excuse my acknowledgments of it; but I am too sensible of the honour you do me to suffer a correspondence to drop which I know some of the greatest men in this age have gloried in. How then must my heart be elated! The fly on the chariot-wheel is too trite a quotation: I shall compare myself to a worm enlivened by the sun, and crawling before it. I imagine there is a tinge of vanity in the meanest insect, and who knows but even this reptile may pride itself in its curls and twists before its benefactor? This is more than the greatest philosopher can determine. Guesses are the privilege of the ignorant, our undoubted right, and what you can never lay claim to.

I am quite angry with your servant for not acquainting you I was at your door. I greatly commend both your economy and the company you admit at your table. I am told your wine is excellent. The additional groat is, I hope, for suet to your pudding. I fancy I am as old an acquaintance as most you have in this kingdom, though it is not my happiness to be so qualified as to merit that intimacy you profess for a few. It is now to little purpose to repine; though it grieves me to think I was a favourite of dean Alrich, the greatest man that ever presided in that high post; that over Virgil and Horace, Rag[b] and Philips smoked many a pipe and drank many a quart with me, besides the expense of a bushel of nuts, and that now I am scarce able to relish their beauties. I know it is death to you to see either of them mangled; but a scrap of paper I design to enclose will convince you of the truth. It was in joke to an old woman of seventy who takes the last line so heinously that, thanks to my stars, she hates me in earnest. So I devote myself to ladies of fewer years and more discretion.

This and such other innocent amusements I devote myself to in my retirement. Once in two years I appear in the anus of the world, our metropolis. His grace, my old acquaintance, told me I began to contract strange old-fashioned rust, and advised me to burst out of my solitude and refit myself for the public: but my own notion of the world for some time past is so confirmed by the sanction of your opinion of it, that I resolve this same rust shall be as dear to me as that which enhanced the value of poor Dr. Woodward's shield;[c] though it gave such offence to his cleanly maid that she polished it to none at all.

I shall appear very inconsistent with myself in now telling you that I still design the latter end of next month for England. You allow I have some pretence to go there. My progress with my son will be further; for which perhaps you too will condemn me as well as other friends do. I shall be proud of the honour of your commands, and with your leave will wait upon you for them. I design to send you a pot of woodcocks for a Christmas-box: small as the present is, pray believe I am, with sincere respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

CASTLEDURROW.

I hope you are as well as the news says. A propos, can you agree with me that the little operator of mine, whom you saw lately at his grace of Dublin's, has a resemblance of your friend Mr. Pope?

FROM DR. KING.

London, December 7, 1736

SIR,—I arrived here yesterday, and I am now ready to obey your commands. I hope you are come to a positive resolution concerning the "History." You need not hesitate about the dates or the references which are to be made to any public papers, for I can supply them without the least trouble. As well as I remember, there is but one of those public pieces which you determined should be inserted at length; I mean sir Thomas Hanmer's "Representation;" this I have now by me. If you incline to publish the two "Tracts" as an Appendix to the "History," you will be pleased to see if the character given of the earl of Oxford in the pamphlet of 1715 agrees with the character given of the same person in the "History." Perhaps on a review you may think proper to leave one of them quite out. You have (I think) barely mentioned the attempt of Guiscard, and the quarrel between Rechteren and Mesnager. But as these are facts which are probably now forgot or unknown, it would not be amiss if they were related at large in the notes; which may be done from the "Gazettes," or any other newspapers of those times. This is all I have to offer to your consideration; and you see here are no objections which ought to retard the publication of this valuable work one moment. I will only now add that if you intend this "History" should be published from the original manuscript, it must be done while you are living: and if you continue in the same mind to intrust me with the execution of your orders, I will perform them faithfully. This I would do, although I did not owe you a thousand obligations which I shall ever acknowledge. I am, with the greatest truth, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant,

W. KING.

TO JOHN BARBER, ESQ.,
ALDERMAN OF LONDON.

Dublin, December 8, 1736.

MY DEAR OLD FRIEND,—I am glad of any occasion to write to you, and therefore business will be my excuse. I had lately a letter from Mrs. Warburton, the widow of him for whom I got a living in those parts where your society's estate lies.* The substance of her request is a public affair wherein you and I shall agree; for neither of us are changed in point of principles. Mr. John Williams, your society's overseer, is worried by a set of people in one part of your estate, which is called Salter's Proportion, because he opposed the building of a fanatic meeting-house in that place. This crew of dissenters are so enraged at this refusal, that they have incensed sir Thomas Webster, the landlord (I suppose under you) of that estate, against him, and are doing all in their power to get him discharged from your service. Mr. Warburton was his great friend. By what I understand those factious people presume to take your timber at pleasure, contrary to your society's instructions, wherein Mr. Williams constantly opposes them to the utmost of his power, and that is one great cause of their malice. Long may you live a bridle to the insolence of dissenters, who, with their pupils the atheists, are now wholly employed in ruining the church; and have entered into public associations subscribed and handed about publicly for that purpose. I wish you were forced to come over hither, because I am confident the journey and voyage would be good for your health; but my ill health and age have made it impossible for me to go over to you. I have often let you know that I have a good warm apartment for you, and I scorn to add any professions of your being welcome in summer or winter, or both: pray God bless you, and grant that you may live as long as you desire, and be ever happy hereafter. Is our friend Bolingbroke well? He is older than either of us; but I am chiefly concerned about his fortune: for some time ago, a friend of us both wrote to me that he wished his lordship had listened a little to my thrifty lectures, instead of only laughing at them. I am ever, with the truest affection, dear Mr. alderman, your most hearty friend, and obedient humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. PULTENEY.

London, December 21, 1736.

SIR,—I was at the Bath when I had the favour of your letter of the 6th of last month. I remember I once wrote to you from thence, therefore I resolved not to hazard another by the cross post, but stay till my return to London to thank you for your kind remembrance of me. I am now, God be thanked, tolerably well in health again, and have done with all physic and water-drinking. My constitution must certainly be a pretty good one; for it has resisted the attacks of five eminent physicians for five months together, and I am not a jot the worse for any of them.

For the future I will preserve myself by your advice, and follow your rules of rising early, eating little, drinking less, and riding daily. I hope this regimen will be long of use to both of us, and that we may live to meet again. I am exceedingly rejoiced at Mr. Stopford's good success, and have acknowledged my obligation to the duke of Dorset, who I dare say will in time do more for him, because he has promised it. My first desire to serve him was solely because I knew you esteemed him. I was confident he must be a deserving man, since John Gay assured me he was a very particular friend of yours. I afterwards, upon further acquaintance, grew to love him for his own sake and the merit I found in him. Men of his worth and character do an honour to those who recommend them. There is a sentence, I think it is in Tully's "Offices," which I admire extremely, and should be tempted to take it for a motto if ever I took one,—Amicis prodesse, nemini nocere. It is a noble sentiment, and shall be my rule, though perhaps never my motto. I fancy there is no other foundation for naming so many successors to the duke of Dorset, than because he has served, as they call it, his time out. I am inclined to believe he will go once more among you, and the rather, since I am told he gave great satisfaction the last time he was with you. Lord Essex will hardly be the person to succeed him, though I should be glad he was, since I flatter myself he would be willing on many occasions to show some regard to my recommendations. I have lately seen a gentleman who is come from France, who assures me the person you inquire after [lord Bolingbroke], and to whom you gave so many lectures of frugality, is in perfect health, and lives in great plenty and affluence. I own I doubt it; but if it be true, I am sure it cannot last long, unless an old gentleman would please to die, who seems at present not to have the least inclination towards it, though near ninety years old.* I verily think he is more likely to marry again than die.

Pope showed me a letter he had lately from you. We grieved extremely to find you so full of complaints, and we wished heartily you might be well enough to make a trip here in spring. Shifting the scene was of great service to me; perhaps it might be so to you. I mended from the moment I had crossed the seas, and sensibly felt the benefit of changing air. His majesty is still on the other side. He has escaped being at sea in the tempestuous weather we have had; but when the wind will let him come, God knows. Lord Chesterfield says if he does not come by Twelfth-day the people will choose king and queen without him. I must tell you a ridiculous incident, perhaps you have not heard it: one Mrs. Mapp, a famous she bone-setter and mountebank, coming to town with a coach and six horses, on the Kentish road, was met by a rabble of people who, seeing her very oddly and tawdrily dressed, took her for a foreigner, and concluded she must be a certain great person's mistress. Upon this they followed the coach, bawling out "No Hanover whore! no Hanover whore!" The lady within the coach was much offended, let down the glass, and screamed louder than any of them, She was no Hanover whore! she was an English one! Upon which they cried out, God bless your ladyship! quitted the pursuit, and wished her a good journey.

I hope to be able to attend the house next sessions; but not with that assiduity as I have formerly done. Why should I risk the doing myself any harm, when I know how vain it is to expect to do any good? You, that have been a long time out of this country, can have no notion how wicked and corrupt we are grown. Were I to tell you of half the rogueries come to my knowledge, you would be astonished; and yet I dare say I do not know of half that are practised in one little spot of ground only; you may easily guess where I mean.

I will make your compliments to lord Carteret when he comes to town. I am sure he will be pleased with your kind mention of him; and if you will now and then let me hear from you, I shall look on the continuance of your correspondence as a very particular honour; for I assure you that I am, with the greatest truth and esteem, sir, your most obedient humble servant, WILLIAM PULTENEY.

FROM MR. POPE.

December 30, 1736.

Your very kind letter has made me more melancholy than almost anything in this world now can do. For I can bear everything in it, bad as it is, better than the complaints of my friends. Though others tell me you are in pretty good health and in good spirits, I find the contrary when you open your mind to me: and indeed it is but a prudent part to seem not so concerned about others, nor so crazy ourselves as we really are; for we shall neither be beloved nor esteemed the more by our common acquaintance for any affliction or any infirmity. But to our true friend we may, we must, complain of what (it is a thousand to one) he complains with us; for if we have known him long he is old, and if he has known the world long he is out of humour at it. If you have but as much more health than others at your age as you have more wit and good temper, you shall not have much of my pity, but if ever you live to have less, you shall not have less of my affection. A whole people will rejoice at every year that shall be added to you, of which you have had a late instance in the public rejoicings on your birthday. I can assure you something better and greater than high birth and quality must go towards acquiring those demonstrations of public esteem and love. I have seen a royal birthday uncelebrated but by one vile ode and one hired bonfire. Whatever years may take away from you, they will not take away the general esteem for your sense, virtue, and charity.

The most melancholy effect of years is that you mention, the catalogue of those we loved and have lost perpetually increasing. How much that reflection struck me you will see from the motto I have prefixed to my "Book of Letters," which, so much against my inclination, has been drawn from me. It is from Catullus:—

Quo desiderio veteres revocamus amores,
Atque olim amissas flemus amicitias!

"How pants my heart old friendship to renew!
How pierced with grief old loves decay'd I view!"

I detain this letter till I can find some safe conveyance, innocent as it is, and as all letters of mine must be, of anything to offend my superiors, except the reverence I bear to true merit and virtue. But I have much reason to fear those which you have too partially kept in your hands will get out in some very disagreeable shape in case of our mortality: and the more reason to fear it, since this last month Curll has obtained from Ireland two letters (one of lord Bolingbroke, and one of mine to you, which we wrote in the year 1723), and he has printed them to the best of my memory rightly, except one passage concerning Dawley, which must have been since inserted, since my lord had not that place at that time. Your answer to that letter he has not got; it has never been out of my custody; for whatever is lent is lost (wit as well as money) to these needy poetical readers.

The world will certainly be the better for his change of life. He seems in the whole turn of his letters to be a settled and principled philosopher, thanking fortune for the tranquillity he has been led into by her aversion, like a man driven by a violent wind from the sea into a calm harbour. You ask me if I have got any supply of new friends to make up for those that are gone? I think that impossible; for not our friends only but so much of ourselves is gone by the mere flux and course of years, that were the same friends to be restored to us we could not be restored to ourselves to enjoy them. But, as when the continual washing of a river takes away our flowers and plants, it throws weeds and sedges in their room, so the course of time brings us something, as it deprives us of a great deal; and instead of leaving us what we cultivated and expected to flourish and adorn us, gives us only what is of some little use by accident. Thus I have acquired, without my seeking, a few chance acquaintance of young men who look rather to the past age than the present, and therefore the future may have some hopes of them. If I love them, it is because they honour some of those whom I and the world have lost, or are losing. Two or three of them have distinguished themselves in parliament; and you will own in a very uncommon manner, when I tell you it is by their asserting of independency and contempt of corruption. One or two are linked to me by their love of the same studies and the same authors; but I will own to you my moral capacity has got so much the better of my poetical, that I have few acquaintance on the latter score, and none without a casting weight on the former. But I find my heart hardened and blunt to new impressions, it will scarce receive or retain affections of yesterday; and those friends who have been dead these twenty years are more present to me now than these I see daily. You, dear sir, are one of the former sort to me in all respects but that we can yet correspond together. I do not know whether it is not more vexatious to know we are both in one world without any further intercourse. Adieu. I can say no more, I feel so much: let me drop into common things.—Lord Masham has just married his son. Mr. Lewis has just buried his wife. Lord Oxford wept over your letter in pure kindness. Mrs. B. sighs more for you than for the loss of youth. She says she will be agreeable many years hence, for she has learned that secret from some receipts of your writing. Adieu.

FROM LORD CASTLEDURROW.

Castledurrow, January 11, 1737.

Sir,—I received the honour of your letter with that pleasure which they have always given me. If I have deferred acknowledging longer than usual, I should not be at a loss to make an excuse if I could be so vain as to imagine you required any. Virtue forbids us to continue in debt, and gratitude obliges us at least to own favours too large for us to pay; herefore I must write rather than reproach myself, and blush at having neglected it when I wait upon you; though you may retort, blushes should proceed rather from the pen than from silence, which pleads a modest diffidence that often obtains pardon.

I am delighted with the sketch of your Imperium, and beg I may be presented to your first minister, Sir Robert.[a] Your puddings I have been acquainted with these forty years; they are the best sweet thing I ever eat. The economy of your table is delicious; a little, and perfectly good, is the greatest treat; and that elegance in sorting company puts me in mind of Corelli's orcastro,[b] in forming which he excelled mankind. In this respect no man ever judged worse than lord-chancellor Middleton; his table the neatest served of any I have seen in Dublin, which to be sure was entirely owing to his lady. You really surprise me when you say you know not where to get a dinner in the whole town. Dublin is famous for vanity this way; and I think the mistaken luxury of some of our grandees, and feasting those who come to laugh at us from the other side of the water, have done us as much prejudice as most of our follies. Not any lord-lieutenant has done us more honour in magnificence than our present viceroy [the duke of Dorset]. He is an old intimate of my youth, and has always distinguished me with affection and friendship. I trust mine are no less sincere for him. I have joy in hearing his virtues celebrated. I wish that he had gratified you in your request. Those he has done most for I dare affirm love him least. It is pity there is any allay in so beneficent a temper; but if a friend can be viewed with an impartial eye, faults he has none; and if any failings, they are grafted in a pusillanimity which sinks him into complaisance for men who neither love nor esteem him, and has prevented him buoying up against their impotent threats in raising his friends. He is a most amiable man, has many good qualities, and wants but one more to make him really a great man.

[a] Mrs. Brent, the dean's housekeeper.
[b] His lordship probably uses this word for orchestre.

If you have any commands to England for so insignificant a fellow as I am, pray prepare them against the beginning of next month. At my arrival in town I shall send a message in form for audience; but I beg to see you in your private capacity, not in your princely authority; for as both your ministry and senate are full, and that I cannot hope to be employed in either, I fear your revenue is too small to grant me a pension. And as I am not fit for business, perhaps you will not allow me a fit object for one which charity only prompts you to bestow. Thus, without any view of your highness's favour, I am independent, and, with sincere esteem, your most obedient humble servant, CASTLEDURROW.

TO LADY BETTY GERMAIN.

January 29, 1737.

MADAM,—I owe your ladyship the acknowledgment of a letter I have long received, relating to a request I made to my lord duke. I now dismiss you, madam, for ever from your office of being a go-between upon any affair I might have with his grace. I will never more trouble him either with my visits or application. His business in this kingdom is to make himself easy; his lessons are all prescribed him from court; and he is sure at a very cheap rate to have a majority of most corrupt slaves and idiots at his devotion. The happiness of this kingdom is of no more consequence to him than it would be to the great Mogul; while the very few honest or moderate men of the Whig party lament the choice he makes of persons for civil employments or church preferments.

I will now repeat, for the last time, that I never made him a request out of any views of my own, but entirely by consulting his own honour, and the desires of all good men, who were as loyal as his grace could wish, and had no other fault than that of modestly standing up for preserving some poor remainder in the constitution of church and state.

I had long experience, while I was in the world, of the difficulties that great men lay under in the points of promises and employments; but a plain honest English farmer, when he invites his neighbours to a christening, if a friend happen to come late, will take care to lock up a piece for him in the cupboard.

Henceforth I shall only grieve silently when I hear of employments disposed of to the discontent of his grace's best friends in this kingdom; and the rather, because I do not know a more agreeable person in conversation, one more easy, or of a better taste, with a greater variety of knowledge, than the duke of Dorset.

I am extremely afflicted to hear that your ladyship's want of health has driven you to the Bath; the same cause has hindered me from sooner acknowledging your letter. But I am at a time of life when I am to expect a great deal worse; for I have neither flesh nor spirits left, while you, madam, I hope and believe, will enjoy many happy years in employing those virtues which Heaven bestowed on you for the delight of your friends, the comfort of the distressed, and the universal esteem of all who are wise and virtuous.

I desire to present my most humble service to my lady Suffolk and your happy brother. I am, with the truest respect, madam, your, &c.

TO JOHN TEMPLE, ESQ.[a]

Dublin, February, 1737.

SIR,—The letter which I had the favour to receive from you I read to your cousin Mrs. Dingley, who lodges in my neighbourhood. She was very well pleased to hear of your welfare, but a little mortified that you did not mention or inquire after her. She is quite sunk with years and unwieldiness, as well as a very scanty support. I sometimes make her a small present as my abilities can reach, for I do not find her nearest relations consider her in the least.

Jervas told me that your aunt's picture[b] is in sir Peter Lely's best manner, and the drapery all in the same hand. I shall think myself very well paid for it if you will be so good as to order some mark of your favour to Mrs. Dingley. I do not mean a pension, but a small sum to put her for once out of debt; and if I live any time I shall see that she keeps herself clear of the world; for she is a woman of as much piety and discretion as I have known.

I am sorry to have been so much a stranger to the state of your family. I know nothing of your lady, or what children you have, or any other circumstances; neither do I find that Mr. Hatch can inform me in any one point. I very much approve of your keeping up your family-house at Moor-park. I have heard it is very much changed for the better, as well as the gardens. The tree on which I carved those words, factura nepotibus umbram, is one of those elms that stand in the hollow ground just before the house; but I suppose the letters are widened and grown shapeless by time.

I know nothing more of your brother than that he has an Irish title (I should be sorry to see you with such a feather), and that some reason or other drew us into a correspondence which was very rough. But I have forgot what was the quarrel.

This letter goes by my lord Castledurrow, who is a gentleman of very good sense and wit. I suspect, by taking his son with him, that he designs to see us no more. I desire to present my most humble service to your lady, with hearty thanks of her remembrance of me. I am, sir, your most humble faithful servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO WILLIAM PULTENEY, ESQ.

March 7, 1737.

SIR,—I must begin by assuring you that I did never intend to engage you in a settled correspondence with so useless a man as I here am; and still more so by the daily increase of ill health and old age; and yet I confess that the high esteem I preserve for your public and private virtues urges me on to retain some little place in your memory for the short time I may expect to live.

That I no sooner acknowledged the honour of your letter is owing to your civility, which might have compelled you to write while you were engaged in defending the liberties of your country with more than an old Roman spirit; which has reached this obscure enslaved kingdom so far as to have been the constant subject of discourse and of praise among the whole few of what unprostituted people here remain among us.

I did not receive the letter you mentioned from Bath; and yet I have imagined, for some months past, that the meddlers of the post-offices here and in London have grown weary of their curiosity by finding the little satisfaction it gave them. I agree heartily in your opinion of physicians; I have esteemed many of them as learned, ingenious men; but I never received the least benefit from their advice or prescriptions. And poor Dr. Arbuthnot was the only man of the faculty who seemed to understand my case, but could not remedy it. But to conquer five physicians, all eminent in their way, was a victory that Alexander and Cæsar could never pretend to. I desire that my prescription of living may be published (which you design to follow) for the benefit of mankind, which, however, I do not value a rush, nor the animal itself, as it now acts; neither will I ever value myself as a Philanthropus, because it is now a creature (taking a vast majority) that I hate more than a toad, a viper, a wasp, a stork, a fox, or any other that you will please to add.

Since the date of your letter we understand there is another duke to govern here. Mr. Stopford was with me last night; he is as well provided for, and to his own satisfaction, as any private clergyman. He engaged me to present his best respects and acknowledgments to you. Your modesty, in refusing to take a motto, goes too far. The sentence is not a boast, because it is every man's duty in morals and religion.

Indeed we differ here from what you have been told of the duke of Dorset's having given great satisfaction the last time he was with us; particularly in his disposal of two bishoprics, and other church as well as civil preferments. I wrote to a lady in London, his grace's near relation and intimate, that she would no more continue the office of a go-between (as she called herself) betwixt the duke and me, because I never design to attend him again; and yet I allow him to be as agreeable a person in conversation as I have almost anywhere met. I sent my letter to that lady under a cover addressed to the duke; and in it I made many complaints against some proceedings, which I suppose he has seen. I never made him one request for myself; and if I spoke for another he was always upon his guard, which was but twice, and for trifles, but failed in both.

The father of our friend in France may outlive the son; for I would venture a wager that if you pick out twenty of the oldest men in England nineteen of them have been the most worthless fellows in the kingdom. You tell me with great kindness as well as gravity that I ought this spring to take a trip to England, and your motive is admirable, that shifting the scene was of great service to you, and therefore it may be so to me. I answer as an academic, Nego consequentiam. And besides, comparisons are odious. You are what the French call plein de vie. As you are much younger, so I am a dozen years older than my age makes me, by infirmities of mind and body; to which I add the perpetual detestation of all public persons and affairs in both kingdoms. I spread the story of Mrs. Mapp while it was new to us; there was something humorous in it throughout that pleased everybody here. Will you engage for your friend Carteret that he will oppose any step toward arbitrary power? he has promised me, under a penalty, that he will continue firm, and yet some reports go here of him that have a little disconcerted me. Learning and good sense he has to a great degree, if the love of riches and power do not overbalance.

Pray God long continue the gifts he has bestowed you, to be the chief support of liberty to your country, and let all the people say Amen.

I am, with the truest respect and highest esteem, sir, yours, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY.

Cork, March 15, 1737.

DEAR SIR,—I received your commands by Faulkner to write to you. But what can I say? The scene of Cork is ever the same; dull, insipid, and void of all amusement. His sacred majesty was not under greater difficulty to find out diversions at Helvoetsluys than I am here. The butchers are as greasy, the quakers as formal, and the presbyterians as holy and full of the Lord, as usual; all things are in statu quo; even the hogs and pigs gruntle in the same cadence as of yore. Unfurnished with variety, and drooping under the natural dulness of the place, materials for a letter are as hard to be found as money, sense, honesty, or truth. But I will write on; Ogilby, Blackmore, and my lord Grimston,* have done the same before me.

I have not yet been upon the Change; but am told that you are the idol of the court of aldermen. They have sent you your freedom. The most learned of them having read a most dreadful account in Littleton's Dictionary of Pandora's gold box, it was unanimously agreed not to venture so valuable a present in so dangerous a metal. Had these sage counsellors considered that Pandora was a woman (which perhaps Mr. Littleton forgets to mention), they would have seen that the ensuing evils arose from the sex, and not from the ore. But I shall speak with more certainty of these affairs when I have taken my seat among the greybeards.

My letters from England speak of great combustions. Absalom continues a rebel to royal David: the Achitophels of the age are numerous and high-spirited. The influence of the comet seems to have strange effects already. In the mean time here we live, drones of Cork, wrapped up in our own filth, procul a Jove et procul a fulmine. Heaven and all good stars protect you! For let the thunder burst where it will, so that you are safe and unsinged, who cares whether Persia submits its government to the renowned Kouli Khan, or that beardless, unexperienced youth, the Sophi. At least the vicar of Bray and I shall certainly be contented. ORRERY.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY.

Cork, March 18, 1737.

DEAR SIR,—This is occasioned by a letter I have received from Mr. Pope, of which I send you a copy in my own hand, not caring to trust the original to the accidents of the post. I likewise send you a part of a fifth volume of Curll's Thefts, in which you will find two letters to you (one from Mr. Pope, the other from lord Bolingbroke) just published, with an impudent preface by Curll. You see Curll, like his friend the devil, glides through all keyholes, and thrusts himself into the most private cabinets.

I am much concerned to find that Mr. Pope is still uneasy about his letters, but I hope a letter I sent him from Dublin (which he has not yet received) has removed all anxiety of that kind. In the last discourse I had with you on this topic you remember you told me he should have his letters; and I lost no time in letting him know your resolution. God forbid that any more papers belonging to either of you, especially such papers as your familiar letters, should fall into the hands of knaves and fools, the professed enemies of you both in particular, and of all honest and worthy men in general!

* Author of "Love in a Hollow Tree."

I have said so much on this subject in the late happy hours you allowed me to pass with you at the deanery, that there is little occasion for adding more upon it at present; especially as you will find, in Mr. Pope's letter to me, a strength of argument that seems irresistible. As I have thoughts of going to England in June you may depend upon a safe carriage of any papers you think fit to send him. I should think myself particularly fortunate to deliver to him those letters he seems so justly desirous of. I entreat you give me that pleasure! It will be a happy reflection to me in the latest hours of my life, which, whether long or short, shall be constantly spent in endeavouring to do what may be acceptable to the virtuous and the wise. I am, dear sir, your very faithful and obliged humble servant,

ORRERY.

MR. POPE TO THE EARL OF ORRERY.

MY LORD,—After having condoled several times with you on your own illness and that of your friends, I now claim some share myself; for I have been down with a fever, which yet confines me to my chamber. Just before I wrote a letter to the dean, full of my heart; and among other things pressed him (which I must acquaint your lordship I had done twice before for near a twelvemonth past) to secure me against that rascal printer by returning me my letters, which (if he valued so much) I promised to send him copies of, merely that the originals might not fall into such ill hands, and thereby a hundred particulars be at his mercy, which would expose me to the misconstruction of many, the malice of some, and the censure, perhaps, of the whole world. A fresh incident made me press this again, which I enclose to you that you may show him. The man's declaration, "that he had these two letters of the dean's from your side the water," with several others yet lying by (which I cannot doubt the truth of, because I never had a copy of either), is surely a just cause for my request. Yet the dean, answering every other point of my letter with the utmost expressions of kindness, is silent upon this; and the third time silent. I begin to fear he has already lent them out of his hands; and in whatever hands, while they are Irish hands, allow me, my lord, to say they are in dangerous hands. Weak admirers are as bad as malicious enemies, and operate in these cases alike to an author's disparagement or uneasiness. I think this I made the dean so just a request that I beg your lordship to second it by showing him what I write. I told him, as soon as I found myself obliged to publish an edition of letters to my great sorrow, that I wished to make use of some of these; nor did I think any part of my correspondencies would do me a greater honour, and be really a greater pleasure to me, than what might preserve the memory how well we loved one another. I find the dean was not quite of the same opinion, or he would not, I think, have denied this. I wish some of those sort of people always about a great man in wit, as well as a great man in power, have not an eye to some little interest in getting the whole of these into their possession: I will venture, however, to say they would not add more credit to the dean's memory by their management of them than I by mine; and if, as I have a great deal of affection for him, I have with it some judgment at least, I presume my conduct herein might be better confided in.

Indeed this silence is so remarkable it surprises me: I hope in God it is not to be attributed to what he complains, a want of memory. I would rather suffer from any other cause than what would be so unhappy to him. My sincere love for this valuable, indeed, incomparable man, will accompany him through life, and pursue his memory were I to live a hundred lives, as many of his works will live, which are absolutely original, unequalled, unexampled. His humanity, his charity, his condescension, his candour, are equal to his wit, and require as good and true a taste to be equally valued. When all this must die (this last I mean) I would gladly have been the recorder of so great a part of it as shines in his letters to me, and of which my own are but as so many acknowledgments. But perhaps before this reaches your hands my cares may be over; and Curll and everybody else may say and lie of me as they will; the dean, old as he is, may have the task to defend me.

TO MR. GIBSON.

March 23, 1737.

MR. GIBSON,—I desire you will give my hearty thanks to Mr. Richardson for the fine present he has made me; and I thank you for your care in sending it to me in so good a condition. I have invited several friends to dine upon it with me to-morrow, when we will drink his health. He has done everything in the genteelest manner, and I am much obliged to him. I am your friend and servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. POPE.

March 23, 1737.

THOUGH you were never to write to me, yet what you desired in your last, that I would write often to you, would be a very easy task; for every day I talk with you, and of you, in my heart; and I need only set down what that is thinking of. The nearer I find myself verging to that period of life which is to be labour and sorrow, the more I prop myself upon those few supports that are left me. People in this state are like props indeed; they cannot stand alone, but two or more of them can stand, leaning and bearing upon one another. I wish you and I might pass this part of life together. My only necessary care is at an end. I am now my own master too much; my house is too large; my gardens furnish too much wood and provision for my use. My servants are sensible and tender of me; they have intermarried, and are become rather low friends than servants; and to all those that I see here with pleasure they take a pleasure in being useful. I conclude this is your case too in your domestic life, and I sometimes think of your old housekeeper as my nurse, though I tremble at the sea which only divides us. As your fears are not so great as mine, and I firmly hope your strength still much greater, is it utterly impossible it might once more be some pleasure to you to see England? My sole motive in proposing France to meet in was the narrowness of the passage by sea from hence, the physicians having told me the weakness of my breast, &c., is such as a sea-sickness might endanger my life. Though one or two of our friends are gone, since you saw your native country, there remain a few more who will last so till death, and who I cannot but hope have an attractive power to draw you back to a country which cannot quite be sunk or enslaved while such spirits remain. And let me tell you there are a few more of the same spirit who would awaken all your old ideas, and revive your hopes of her future recovery and virtue. These look up to you with reverence, and would be animated by the sight of him at whose soul they have taken fire in his writings, and derived from thence as much love of their species as is consistent with a contempt for the knaves in it.

I could never be weary, except at the eyes, of writing to you; but my real reason (and a strong one it it is) for doing it so seldom is fear; fear of a very great and experienced evil, that of my letters being kept by the partiality of friends, and passing into the hands and malice of enemies; who publish them with all their imperfections on their head, so that I write not on the common terms of honest men.

Would to God you would come over with lord Orrery, whose care of you in the voyage I could so certainly depend on; and bring with you your old housekeeper and two or three servants. I have room for all, a heart for all, and (think what you will) a fortune for all. We could, were we together, contrive to make our last days easy, and leave some sort of monument, what friends two wits could be in spite of all the fools in the world. Adieu.

FROM LORD CARTERET.

Arlington-street, March 24, 1737.

SIR,—I this day attended the cause[a] you recommended to me in your letter of the 3rd of January; the decree was affirmed most unanimously, the appeal adjuged frivolous, and 100*l.* costs given to the respondent. Lord Bathurst attended likewise. The other lords you mention I am very little acquainted with; so I cannot deliver your messages, though I pity them in being out of your favour. Since you mention Greek, I must tell you that my son at sixteen, understands it better than I did at twenty, and I tell him, "Study Greek," καὶ οὐδὲν οὐδέποτε ταπεινὸν ἐνθυμηθήσῃ ὅτι ἄγαν ἐπιθυμήσεις τινός. He knows how to construe this, and I have the satisfaction to believe he will fall into the sentiment; and then, if he makes no figure, he will yet be a happy man.

Your late lord-lieutenant [duke of Dorset] told me some time ago he thought he was not in your favour. I told him I was of that opinion, and showed him the article of your letter relating to himself; I believe I did wrong: not that you care a farthing for princes or ministers, but because it was vanity in me to produce your acknowledgments to me for providing for people of learning, some of which I had the honour to promote at your desire, for which I still think myself obliged to you. And I have not heard that since they have disturbed the peace of the kingdom, or been jacobites, in disgrace to you and me.

I desire you will make my sincere respects acceptable to Mr. Delany. He sent me potted woodcocks in perfection, which lady Granville, my wife, and children, have eat, though I have not yet answered his letter. My lady Granville, reading your postscript, bids me tell you that she will send you a present; and if she knew what you liked she would do it forthwith. Let me know and it shall be done, that the first of the family may no longer be postponed by you to the third place. My wife and lady Worseley desire their respects should be mentioned to you rhetorically; but as I am a plain peer I shall say nothing, but that I am for ever, sir, your most humble and obedient servant, CARTERET.

When people ask me how I governed Ireland, I say that I pleased Dr. Swift.

Quaesitam meritis sume superbiam.

[a] An appeal depending between certain persons of the name

TO JOHN BARBER, ESQ.

Alderman of London.

Dublin, March 30, 1737.

DEAR MR. ALDERMAN,—You will read the character of the bearer, Mr. Lloyd, which he is to deliver to you, signed by the magistrates and chief inhabitants of Colrane. It seems your society has raised the rents of that town, and your lands adjoining, about three years ago, to four times the value of what they formerly paid; which is beyond all I have ever heard even among the most screwing landlords of this impoverished kingdom; and the consequence has already been that many of your tenants in the said town and lands are preparing for their removal to the plantations in America; for the same reasons that are driving some thousands of families in the adjoining northern parts to the same plantations; I mean the oppression by landlords. My dear friend, you are to consider that no society can, or ought in prudence or justice, let their lands at so high a rate as a squire who lives upon his own estate, and is able to distrain in an hour's warning. All bodies corporate must give easy bargains, that they may depend upon receiving their rents, and thereby be ready to pay all the incident charges to which they are subject. Thus bishops, deans, and chapters, as well as other corporations, seldom or never let their lands even so high as at half the value; and when they raise those rents which are scandalously low it is ever by degrees. I have many instances of this conduct in my own practice, as well as in that of my chapter. Although my own lands, as dean, be let for four-fifths under their value, I have not raised them a sixth part in twenty-three years, and took very moderate fines. On the other side, I confess there is no reason why an honourable society should rent their estate for a trifle; and therefore I told Mr. Lloyd my opinion, that if you could be prevailed on just to double the old rent, and no more, I hoped the tenants might be able to live in a tolerable manner; for I am as much convinced as I can be of anything human that this wretched oppressed country must of necessity decline every year. If, by a miracle, things should mend, you may in a future renewal make a moderate increase of rent, but not by such leaps as you are now taking; for you ought to remember the fable of the hen who laid every second day a golden egg, upon which her mistress killed her to get the whole lump at once. I am told that one condition in your charter obliges you to plant a colony of English in those parts: if that be so you are too wise to make it a colony of Irish beggars. Some ill consequences have already happened by your prodigious increase of the rent. Many of your old tenants have quitted their houses in Colrane; others are not able to repair their habitations, which are daily going to ruin, and many of those who live on your lands in the country owe great arrears, which they will never be in a condition to pay. I would not have said thus much in an affair and about persons to whom I am an utter stranger, if I had not been assured, by some whom I can trust, of the poor condition those people in and about Colrane have lain under since that enormous increase of their rents.

The bearer, Mr. Lloyd, whom I never saw till yesterday, seems to be a gentleman of great truth and good sense; he has no interest in the case, for although he lives at Colrane his preferment is some miles farther; he is now going to visit his father, who lives near Wrexham, not far from Chester, and from thence, at the desire of your tenants in and near Colrane, he is content to go to London and wait on you there with his credentials. If he has misrepresented this matter to me in any one particular I shall never be his advocate again.

And now, my dear friend, I am forced to tell you that my health is very much decayed, my deafness and giddiness are more frequent; spirits I have none left; my memory is almost gone. The public corruptions in both kingdoms allow me no peace or quiet of mind. I sink every day, and am older by twenty years than many others of the same age. I hope, and am told, that it is better with you. May you live as long as you desire; for I have lost so many old friends without getting any new, that I must keep you as a handsel of the former. I am, my long dear friend, with great esteem and love, your most obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY.

Cork, April 3, 1737.

DEAR SIR,—I am very glad there are twelve thousand pounds worth of halfpence arrived; they are twelve thousand arguments for your quitting Ireland. I look upon you in the same state of the unfortunate Achæmenides amidst tyrants and monsters.—Do you not remember the description of Polypheme and his den?—

> - Domus sanie dapibusque cruentis
> Intus opaca, ingens, ipse arduus, altaque pulsat
> Sidera. (Dii talem terris avertite pestem!)
> Nec visu facilis, nec dictu affabilis ulli:
> Visceribus miserorum et sanguine vescitur atro.[a]

Remember also, that

> Centum alii curva hæc habitant ad littora vulgo
> Infandi Cyclopes, et altis montibus errant.[b]

Translate these lines, and come away with me to Marston; there you shall enjoy otium cum dignitate; there you shall see the famous Sacsockishkash and his two pupils, who shall attend your altars with daily incense; there no archbishops can intrude; there you shall be the sole lord and master; while we your subjects shall learn obedience from our happiness.——If you ever can think seriously, think so now; and let me say with the curate of my parish, Consider what has been said unto you, ponder it well, lay it up in your heart, and God of his infinite mercy direct you!—Mrs. Whiteway shall be truly welcome to Marston's homely shade. Hector shall fawn upon the doctor; and I myself will be under the direction and government of sir Robert Walpole.

You tell me I am to carry a load for you to England; the most acceptable load will be yourself, and that I would carry with as true piety as Æneas bore the ancient Anchises on his shoulders when he fled from fire, from blood, from Greeks, and from ruined Troy!

Can you expect that lords move regularly? Is it not below our station to think where or when we are to go? But, if my coach and six is in order, perhaps I may have the honour to start a hare in Steven's-green about the first of next month. In the month of June I will hope to set sail with you to England. Mr. Pope will come out beyond the you will exchange Cyclops for men; and if one must fall, surely the choice is right:

> Si pereo, manibus hominum periisse juvabit.[a]

My next shall be longer. I am now forced to bid you farewell; but hereafter expect my whole life and conversation. You shall certainly have the cheeses: if you will come to Somersetshire I will eat one for joy;[b] the best in England are made in my manor.

I am so well that I had almost forgot to answer that kind part of your letter. It is only you that can add health and happiness to your very affectionate, obliged, and faithful servant,

ORRERY.

FROM THE EARL OF OXFORD.

Dover-street, April 7, 1737.

GOOD MR. DEAN,—I am extremely obliged to you for several letters which I, with great shame and concern, acknowledge that I have not answered, as also several remembrances of me and my family in your letters to Mr. Pope: I stand very strongly obliged to you upon these accounts; I dare say you will do me that justice that you will not attribute my not writing to proceed from any neglect of you or from any forgetfulness: I am certain of this, that I do retain the warmest esteem and sincerest regard for you of any one, be he who he will; and therefore I hope you will pardon what is past, and I promise to amend if my letters would in the least be agreeable to you.

One reason of my writing to you now is (next to my asking your forgiveness) this; I am told that you have given leave and liberty to some one or more of your friends to print a history of the last four years of queen Anne's reign, wrote by you.

As I am most truly sensible of your constant regard and sincere friendship for my father, even to partiality (if I may say so), I am very sensible of the share and part he must bear in such a history; and as I remember, when I read over that history of yours, I can recollect that there seemed to me a want of some papers to make it more complete which was not in our power to obtain; besides there were some severe things said which might have been very currently talked of, but now will want a proper evidence to support; for these reasons it is that I do entreat the favour of you, and make it my earnest request, that you will give your positive directions that this history be not printed and published until I have had an opportunity of seeing it; with a liberty of showing it to some family friends whom I would consult upon this occasion. I beg pardon for this; I hope you will be so good as to grant my request: I do it with great deference to you. If I had the pleasure of seeing you I could soon say something to you that would convince you I am not wrong: they are not proper for a letter, as you will easily guess.

My wife desires your acceptance of her most humble service; my daughter is extremely pleased with the notice you are pleased to take of her; she is very well: she brought me another grand-daughter last month: she desires your acceptance of her most humble service, and would be glad of the pleasure of seeing you here in England.

The duke of Portland so far answers our expectations that indeed he exceeds them, for he makes the best husband, the best father, and the best son; these qualities are I assure you very rare in this age.

I wish you would make my compliments to my lord Orrery; do you design to keep him with you?

[a] The cave, though large, was dark; the dismal floor
Was paved with mangled limbs and putrid gore.
One monstrous host, of more than human size,
Erects his head, and stares within the skies:
Bellowing his voice, and horrid is his hue;
Ye gods, remove this plague from mortal view!
The joints of slaughter'd wretches are his food,
And for his wine he quaffs the streaming blood.
DRYDEN.

[b] Such and so vast as Polypheme appears,
A hundred more this hated island bears:
Like him, in caves they shut their woolly sheep,
Like him, their herds on tops of mountains keep;
Like him, with mighty strides they stalk from steep to steep.
DRYDEN.

[a] I die, content to die by human hands.—DRYDEN.

[b] The earl of Orrery hated cheese to such a degree that he could scarcely bear the sight of it

I do not blame you if you can. I am, with true esteem and regard, sir, your most obliged and most faithful humble servant, OXFORD.

I wish Master Faulkner, when he sends anything to me, would say how you do.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

April 9, 1737.

ABOUT a month ago I received your last letter, wherein you complain of my long silence; what will you do when I am so long in answering? I have one excuse which will serve all my friends; I am quite worn out with disorders of mind and body; a long fit of deafness, which still continues, hath unqualified me for conversing, or thinking, or reading, or hearing; to all this is added an apprehension of giddiness, whereof I have frequently some frightful touches. Besides, I can hardly write ten lines without twenty blunders, as you will see by the number of scratchings and blots before this letter is done: into the bargain, I have not one rag of memory left; and my friends have all forsaken me except Mrs. Whiteway, who preserves some pity for my condition, and a few others who love wine that costs them nothing. As to my taking a journey to Cavan, I am just as capable as of a voyage to China, or of running races at Newmarket. But, to speak in the Latinitas Grattaniana, Tu clamas meretrix primus; for we have all expected you here at Easter as you were used to do. Your muster-roll of meat is good, but of drink in sup port able. Yew wan twine. My strass Albavia has eaten here all your hung beef, and said it was very good. The affair of high importance in their family is that Miss Molly hath issued out orders, with great penalties, to be called Mrs. Harrison; which caused many speck you'll ash owns.——I am now come to the noli me tan jerry, which begg inns wyth mad dam.—So I will go on by the strength of my own wit upon points of the high est imp or taants. Pray, tell me, does the land of Quilca pay any rent? or is any paid by the tenant? or is there not any part of 50*l.* to be got? But before you make complaints of ill payments from your school, I will declare I was never so ill paid as now, even by my richer debtors. I have finished my will for the last time, wherein I left some little legacy which you are not to receive till you shall be entirely out of my debt, and paid all you owe to my executors. And I have made very honourable mention of you in the will as the consideration of my leaving these legacies to you.

A Specimen of Latinitas Grattaniana.

Ego ludam diabolum super duos baculos cum te Voca super me cras.
Profecto ego dabo tibi tuum ventrem plenum legis.
Sine me solum cum illo. Ego capiam tempus.
Quid pestis velles tu esse apud?
Ego faciam te fumare,
Duc uxorem veni super.
Ego dabo tibi pyxidem in aure.
Ego faciam te secare saltum.
Veni, veni, solve tuum scotum, et fac non plura verba.
Id est plus expensi quam veneratio.
Si tu es pro lege, dabo tibi legem, tuum ventrem plenum.
Ut diabolus voluit habere id.
Quid est materia tecum?
Tu habes vetus proverbium super tuum latus: Nihil est nunquam in periculo.
Cape me apud illud, et suspende me
Ego capio te apud tuum verbum.
Tu venis in forti tempore.
Est formosus corporatus homo in facie
Esne tu super pro omni die?
Momus: Esne tu ibi cum tuis ursis?
Ille est ex super suam servationem.
Tu es carcer avis.
Ego amo mendacem in meo corde, et tu aptas me ad crinem
Ego dicam tibi quid: hic est magnus clamor, et parva lana.
Quid! tu es super tuum altum equum.
Tu nunquam servâsti tuum verbum.
Hic est diabolus et omne agere.
Visne tu esse tam bonus, quam tuum verbum
Ego faciam porcum vel canem de id.
Ego servo hoc pro pluvioso die.
Ego possum facere id cum digito madido.
Profecto ego habui nullum manum in id.
Esne tu in aure nido?
Tu es homo extranei renis.
Precor, ambula super.
Ego feci amorem virgini honoris.
Quomodo venit id circum, quod tu ludis stultum [illegible]?
Vos ibi, fac viam pro meo domino.
Omnes socii apud pedem pilam.
Fœminæ et linteum aspiciunt optimè per candelæ lucem.

TO MR. RICHARDSON.

April 9, 1737.

SIR,—I have wondered, since I have had the favour to know you, what could possibly put you upon your civility to me. You have invited me to your house, and proposed everything according to my own scheme that would make me easy. You have loaded me with presents, although it never lay in my power to do you any sort of favour or advantage. I have had a salmon from you of 26lb. weight, another of 18lb., and the last of 14lb.: upon which my ill-natured friends descant that I am declining in your good-will by the declining of weight in your salmon. They would have had your salmon double the weight: the second should have been of 52lb., the third of 104lb., and the last of 208lb. It seems this is the way of Dublin computors, who think you country gentlemen have nothing to do but to oblige us citizens, who are not bound to make you the least return further than, when you come hither, to meet you by chance in a coffeehouse, and ask you what tavern you dine in, and there pay your club. I intend to deal with you in the same manner; and if you come to town for three months I will invite you once to dinner, for which I shall expect to stay a whole year with you; and you will be bound to thank me for honouring your house. You saw me ill enough when I had the honour to see you at the deanery. Mrs. Whiteway, my cousin, and the only cousin I own, remembers she was here in your company, and desires to present her humble service to you: and no wonder, for you sent so much salmon that I was forced to give her a part. Some ten days ago there came to see me one Mr. Lloyd, a clergyman who lives, as I remember, near Colrane. He had a commission from the people in and about that town which belongs to the London Society. It seems that three years ago the society increased their rents from 300*l.* to 1200*l.* a-year; since which time the town is declined, the tenants neglect their houses, and the country tenants are not able to live. I writ a letter by him to alderman Barber, because their demands seem very extravagant; but I had no other reason for doing so than the ample commission he had from the town of Colrane. I wish I knew your sentiments in this affair. I never saw the gentleman before; but the commission he had encouraged me so far that I could not refuse him the letter. Although I was ill enough when I saw you, I am forty times worse at present, and am no more able to be your guest this summer than to travel to America. I have been this month so ill with a giddy head, and so very deaf, that I am not fit for human conversation: besides, my spirits are so low that I do not think anything worth minding; and most of my friends with very great justice have forsaken me. I find you deal with Faulkner. I have read his "Rollin's History." The translator did not want knowledge enough, but is a coxcomb by running into those cant words and phrases which have spoiled our language and will spoil it more every day. Your presents are so numerous that I had almost forgot to thank you for the cheese; against which there can be no objection but that of too much rennet, for which I so often wish ill to the housewife. I am, sir, with true esteem, your most obedient humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. RICHARDSON.

April 17, 1737.

REVEREND SIR,—I returned last night from Derry, where I have been for some time past, and where you will be received with great respect. I pleased myself with the hopes of finding at home an account of the time you design being here. My disappointment occasions you this trouble; and I hope you will suffer that which can do it best to plead my excuse for being so importunate.

Sir, I take the country to be as pleasant the latter end of this, and all the next month, as any in the year; the fields are putting on their gayest liveries to receive you; the birds will warble their sweetest notes to entertain you; and the waters in the river Bann, when they come in view of your apartment, will tumble in great hurry to wait on you, and leave you with reluctance.

I must brag of my situation, and will pawn my credit with you in those matters, that you will pronounce it the most delightful you have seen in Dublin at least.

Sir, I will not conceal from you any longer a self-interest I have in honouring this place with your presence. All the enclosures I intend in my demesne are now finished, and I am ready to begin what I intend by way of ornament; but until I am fixed in the scheme of the whole, which I would have adapted in the best manner to the place, I would do nothing. I have delayed coming to a final resolution till I shall have the opportunity of entreating your opinion and assistance after viewing the whole. It will perhaps afford yourself no disagreeable amusement, and occasion something elegant, and correct in miniature, where nature has almost done everything. When you let me know that you have fitted your stages, I will contrive to meet you as far as Armagh or Stewarttown. I will only add that it is one that loves you, as well as admires you, that is thus troublesome to you; and that I am, with the greatest truth, as well as esteem, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant, WILLIAM RICHARDSON.

TO MR. RICHARDSON.

Dublin, April 30, 1737.

SIR,—If it had pleased God to restore me to any degree of health, I should have been setting out on Monday next to your house; but I find such a weekly decay, that has made it impossible for me to ride above five or six miles at farthest, and I always return the same day heartily tired. I have not an ounce of flesh or a dram of spirits left me; yet my greatest load is not my years but my infirmities. In England, before I was twenty, I got a cold which gave me a deafness that I could never clear myself of. Although it came but seldom, and lasted but a few days, yet my left ear has never been well since; but when the deafness comes on I can hear with neither ear, except it be a woman with a treble and a man with a counter-tenor. This unqualifies me for any mixed conversation: and the fits of deafness increase; for I have now been troubled with it near seven weeks, and it is not yet lessened, which extremely adds to my mortification. I should not have been so particular in troubling you with my ailments, if they had not been too good an excuse for my inability to venture anywhere beyond the prospect of this town.

I am the more obliged to your great civilities because I declare, without affectation, that it never lay in my power to deserve any one of them. I find by the conversation I have had with you that you understand a court very well for your time, and are well known to the minister on the other side. The consequence of which is, that it lies in my power to undo you, only by letting it be known at St. James's that you are perpetually sending me presents and holding a constant correspondence with me by letters. Another unwary step of yours is, inviting me to your house, which will render your election desperate, by making all your neighbour squires represent you as a person disaffected to the government. Thus I have you at my mercy on two accounts, unless you have some new court refinements to turn the guilt upon me. I wrote a long letter some weeks ago: but I could not find by the messenger of your last salmon that he knew anything of that letter; for you take, in every circumstance, a special care that I may know nothing more than of a salmon being left at the deanery. Thus there is a secret commerce between your servant and my butler. The first writes a letter to the other—says the carriage is paid, that the salmon weighs so much, and was sent by his master to me. If some of our patriots should happen to discover the management of this intrigue, they would inform the privy council, from which an order would be brought by a messenger to seize on the salmon, have it opened, and search all its entrails to find some letter of dangerous consequence to the state. I believe I told you in my former letter that Mr. Lloyd, a clergyman, minister of Colrane, but who lives four miles from it, came to me upon his going to England, to see his old father in Chester, and from thence goes to London to wait upon the society. He showed me very ample credentials from the magistrates of Colrane to deliver to the society, upon some hard things that colony lies under. It seems, about three years ago their lease was out; the rent was 300*l.* a-year; but upon the renewal it was raised to 1200*l.*, which was beyond what I have known in leases from corporations. I had never seen or heard of Mr. Lloyd. He is middle aged, and walks with a stick as if he were infirm. I wrote by him to alderman Barber, putting the case as Mr. Lloyd gave it me, who says that the townsfolks and tenants of the estate round Colrane would be content to double the rent; but that the present prodigious addition had made the townsfolks let their buildings decay, and the country tenants were in despair. I then wondered you came to mention nothing of this to me, since you are concerned for the society. If Mr.

Lloyd has not fairly represented the matter he has not behaved himself suitable to his function: however, pray let me know the truth of the matter, and how he came to be employed: only I find that he is not known to any of my acquaintance that I have seen since.

Pray God preserve you, sir, and give you all the good success that I am convinced you deserve.

I am, with true esteem and gratitude, your most obedient and obliged servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO DR. SHERIDAN.

May 22, 1737.

I WILL on Monday (this is Saturday, May 22, as you will read above in this date) send to talk to Mr. Smith: but I distrust your sanguinity so much (by my own desponding temper) that I know not whether that affair of your justiceship be fixed, but I shall know next week, and write or act accordingly. I battled in vain with the duke and his clan against the lowering of gold, which is just a kind settlement upon England of 25,000*l.* a-year for ever: yet some of my friends differ from me, though all agree that the absentees will just be so much gainers. I am excessively glad that your difficulty of breathing is over; for what is life but breath? I mean not that of our nostrils, but our lungs. You must in summer ride every half-holiday, and go to church every Sunday some miles off. The people of England are copying from us to plague the clergy, but they intend far to outdo the original. I wish I were to be born next century, when we shall be utterly rid of parsons, of which, God be thanked, you are none at present; and until your bishop give you a living, I will leave off (except this letter) giving you the title of reverend. I did write him lately a letter with a witness, relating to his printer of "Quadrille," (did you ever see it?) with which he half ruined Faulkner. He promises (against his nature) to consider him, but interposed an exception, which I believe will destroy the whole. Mrs. Whiteway gives herself airs of loving you; but do not trust her too much, for she grows disobedient, and says she is going for to get another favourite. In short, she calls you names, and has neither Mr. nor Dr. on her tongue, but calls you plain Sheridan, and pox take you. She is not with me now, else she would read this in spite of me; and, between ourselves, she sets up to be my governor. I wish you had sent me the christian name of Knatchbull,[a] and I would have written to him; but I will see him on Monday, if he will be visible. The poem on "Legion Club" is so altered and enlarged, as I hear, (for I only saw the original,) and so damnably murdered, that they have added many of the club to the true number. I hear it is charged to me, with great personal threatenings from the puppies offended. Some say they will wait for revenge to their next meeting. Others say the privy-council will summon the suspected author. If I could get the true copy I would send it you. Your bishop (Dr. Hort) writes me word that the real author is manifest by the work. Your loss of flesh is nothing if it be made up with spirit. God help him who hath neither, I mean myself. I believe I shall say with Horace, Non omnis moriar; for half my body is already spent.

FROM THE HON. MISS DAVYS.

May 27, 1737.

SIR,—I know you are always pleased to do acts of charity, which encourages me to take the liberty of recommending a boy about ten years old, the bearer of this, to your goodness, to beg you would employ it in getting him put into the Bluecoat Hospital. I received the enclosed letter from him this morning. Your compliance with this request, and pardon for this trouble, will oblige, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant, M. DAVYS.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, May 31, 1737.

IT is true I owe you some letters, but it has pleased God that I have not been in a condition to pay you. When you shall be at my age, perhaps you may lie under the same disability to your present or future friends. But my age is not my disability, for I can walk six or seven miles and ride a dozen. But I am deaf for two months together. This deafness unqualifies me for all company, except a few friends with counter-tenor voices, whom I can call names if they do not speak loud enough for my ears. It is this evil that has hindered me from venturing to the Bath and to Twickenham; for deafness, being not a frequent disorder, has no allowance given it; and the scurvy figure a man affected that way makes in company is utterly insupportable.

It was I began with the petition to you of Orna me, and now you come like an unfair merchant, to charge me with being in your debt; which, by your way of reckoning, I must always be, for yours are always guineas and mine farthings; and yet I have a pretence to quarrel with you, because I am not at the head of any one of your epistles. I am often wondering how you come to excel all mortals on the subject of morality, even in the poetical way; and should have wondered more if nature and education had not made you a professor of it from your infancy.

All the letters I can find of yours I have fastened in a folio cover, and the rest in bundles endorsed; but, by reading their dates, I find a chasm of six years, of which I can find no copies; and yet I keep them with all possible care: but I have been forced, on three or four occasions, to send all my papers to some friends, yet those papers were all sent sealed in bundles to some faithful friends; however, what I have are not much above sixty. I found nothing in any one of them to be left out: none of them have anything to do with party, of which you are the clearest of all men, by your religion and the whole tenor of your life; while I am raging every moment against the corruption of both kingdoms, especially of this, such is my weakness.

I have read your "Epistle of Horace to Augustus:" it was sent me in the English edition as soon as it could come. They are printing it in a small octavo. The curious are looking out, some for flattery, some for ironies in it; the sour folks think they have found out some: but your admirers here, I mean every man of taste, affect to be certain that the profession of friendship to me in the same poem will not suffer you to be thought a flatterer. My happiness is that you are too far engaged, and in spite of you the ages to come will celebrate me, and know you are a friend who loved and esteemed me, although I died the object of court and party hatred.

Pray who is that Mr. Glover who wrote the epic poem called "Leonidas," which is reprinting here, and has great vogue? We have frequently good poems of late from London. I have just read one upon "Conversation," and two or three others. But the crowd do not encumber you, who, like the orator or preacher, stand aloft, and are seen above the rest, more than the whole assembly below.

I am able to write no more; and this is my third endeavour, which is too weak to finish the paper: I am, my dearest friend, yours sincerely, as long as I can write, or speak, or think. JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] Secretary to lord-chancellor Wyndham.

TO THE EARL OF OXFORD.

June 14, 1737.

MY LORD,—I had the honour of a letter from your lordship, dated April the 7th, which I was not prepared to answer until this time. Your lordship must needs have known that the history you mention, of the "Four last Years of the Queen's Reign," was written at Windsor, just upon finishing the peace; at which time your father and my lord Bolingbroke had a misunderstanding with each other that was attended with very bad consequences. When I came to Ireland to take this deanery (after the peace was made) I could not stay here above a fortnight, being recalled by a hundred letters to hasten back, and to use my endeavours in reconciling those ministers. I left them the history you mention, which I finished at Windsor, to the time of the peace. When I returned to England I found their quarrels and coldness increased. I laboured to reconcile them as much as I was able: I contrived to bring them to my lord Masham's, at St. James's. My lord and lady Masham left us together. I expostulated with them both, but could not find any good consequences. I was to go to Windsor next day with my lord-treasurer; I pretended business that prevented me; expecting they would come to some * * * . But I followed them to Windsor; where my lord Bolingbroke told me that my scheme had come to nothing. Things went on at the same rate; they grew more estranged every day. My lord-treasurer found his credit daily declining. In May before the queen died I had my last meeting with them at my lord Masham's. He left us together; and therefore I spoke very freely to them both; and told them "I would retire, for I found all was gone." Lord Bolingbroke whispered me, "I was in the right." Your father said, "All would do well." I told him "that I would go to Oxford on Monday, since I found it was impossible to be of any use." I took coach to Oxford on Monday; went to a friend in Berkshire; there stayed until the queen's death; and then to my station here; where I stayed twelve years, and never saw my lord your father afterward. They could not agree about printing the "History of the Four last Years:" and therefore I have kept it to this time, when I determine to publish it in London, to the confusion of all those rascals, who have accused the queen and that ministry of making a bad peace; to which that party entirely owes the protestant succession. I was then in the greatest trust and confidence with your father the lord-treasurer, as well as with my lord Bolingbroke, and all others who had part in the administration. I had all the letters from the secretary's office during the treaty of peace: out of those, and what I learned from the ministry, I formed that history, which I am now going to publish for the information of posterity, and to control the most impudent falsehoods which have been published since. I wanted no kind of materials. I knew your father better than you could at that time; and I do impartially think him the most virtuous minister, and the most able that ever I remembered to have read of. If your lordship has any particular circumstances that may fortify what I have said in the history, such as letters or materials, I am content they should be printed at the end by way of appendix. I loved my lord your father better than any other man in the world, although I had no obligation to him on the score of preferment; having been driven to this wretched kingdom, to which I was almost a stranger, by his want of power to keep me in what I ought to call my own country, although I happened to be dropped here, and was a year old before I left it; and, to my sorrow, did not die before I came back to it again. I am extremely glad of the felicity you have in your alliances; and desire to present my most humble respects to my lady Oxford and your daughter the duchess. As to the history, it is only of affairs which I know very well; and had all the advantages possible to know, when you were in some sort but a lad. One great design of it is, to do justice to the ministry at that time, and to refute all the objections against them, as if they had a design of bringing in popery and the pretender: and further to demonstrate that the present settlement of the crown was chiefly owing to my lord your father. I can never expect to see England: I am now too old and too sickly, added to almost a perpetual deafness and giddiness. I live a most domestic life: I want nothing that is necessary; but I am in a cursed, factious, oppressed, miserable country; not made so by nature, but by the slavish, hellish principles of an execrable prevailing faction in it.

Farewell, my lord. I have tired you and myself. I desire again to present my most humble respects to my lady Oxford and the duchess your daughter. Pray God preserve you long and happy! I shall diligently inquire into your conduct from those who will tell me. You have hitherto continued right: let me hear that you persevere so. Your task will not be long; for I am not in a condition of health or time to trouble this world, and I am heartily weary of it already; and so should be in England, which, I hear is full as corrupt as this poor enslaved country. I I am, with the truest love and respect, my lord, your lordship's most obedient and most obliged, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

* Here is a blank left for some word or other; such as agreement, reconciliation, or the like.

FROM MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

London, June 23, 1737.

MOST HONOURED FRIEND,—I was favoured with a letter some time since by the hands of the bearer, Mr. Lloyd, and by him take the opportunity of answering it.

I do assure you, sir, that as the society have always had the greatest regard for your recommendation, so in this affair they have given a fresh instance of their respect; for they have resolved to relieve their tenants in Colrane from their hard bargains; and, to that end, have put it in a way that is to the entire satisfaction of the bearer.

I hope this will find you in good health, and that the hot weather will contribute thereto; which will be a great satisfaction to all honest men who wish well to their country.

Our friend Mr. Pope is very hearty and well, and has obliged the town lately with several things in his way; among the rest, a translation of Horace's Odes; in one of which you are mentioned "as saving your nation:" which gave great offence; and, I am assured, was under debate in the council, whether he should not be taken up for it: but, it happening to be done in the late king's time, they passed it by.

I hope you see the paper called "Common Sense," which has wit and humour.

I had thoughts of kissing your hand this summer; but we are all in confusion at Derry about power, which will prevent my coming at present; but I am in hopes of having that happiness before I die. I thank God I hold out to a miracle almost; for I am better in my health now than I was many years ago.

Lord Bolingbroke is in France, writing, I am told, the "History of his Own Time:" he is well. You will please to make my compliments to lord Orrery and Dr. Delany.

I have many things to say, which in prudence I must defer.

I shall conclude with my hearty prayers to Almighty God to preserve your most valuable life for many years, as you are a public blessing to your country and a friend to all mankind; and to assure you that I am, with sincerity, dear sir, your most affectionate and most faithful humble servant,

JOHN BARBER.

FROM DR. KING.

St. Mary Hall, Oxford, June 24, 1737.

SIR,—I do not know for what reason the worthy gentlemen of the post-office intercepted a letter which I did myself the honour to write to you about two months ago. I cannot remember I said anything that could give them the least offence. I did not mention the new halfpence; I did not praise the royal famly; I did not blame the prime-minister; I only returned you my thanks for a very kind letter I had just then received from you. It is true I enclosed in that letter a printed paper called "Common Sense," in which the author proposes a new scheme of government to the people of Corsica, advising to make their king of the same stuff of which the Indians make their gods.[a] I thought to afford you some diversion: but perhaps it was this made the whole packet criminal.

I have this day received a letter from Mrs. Whiteway, in which she tells me that I am to expect the manuscript by lord Orrery. I will have the pleasure to wait on him as soon as I can do it without crossing the Irish channel: as soon as I receive the papers you shall hear from me again. I shall have an opportunity of writing fully to you by Mr. Deane Swift, who proposes to set out for Ireland the next vacation. In making mention of this gentleman I cannot help recommending him to your favour. I have very narrowly observed his conduct ever since I have been here; and I can, with great truth, give him the character of a modest, sober, ingenious young man. He is a hard student, and will do an honour to the society of which he is now a member.

Mrs. Whiteway says that, notwithstanding all your complaints, you are in good health and in good spirits. What think you of making a trip to England this fine season, and visiting our Alma Mater? I can offer you an airy cool room during the summer and a warm bedchamber in the winter; and I will take care that your mutton commons shall be kept long enough to be tender. If you will accept of this invitation I promise to meet you at Chester, and to conduct you to king Edward's lodgings: and then St. Mary Hall may boast of a triumvirate that is not to be matched in any part of the learned world, sir Thomas More, Erasmus, and the Drapier. Believe me to be, with the greatest esteem, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

WILLIAM KING.

[a] This paper was written by Dr. King himself.

FROM DR. KING TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

St. Mary Hall, Oxon, June 24, 1737.

MADAM,—I have this day the favour of your letter of the 14th, which hath given me great pleasure: however, I could not help bestowing some maledictions on those gentlemen at the post-office who have been so impertinent as to intercept our correspondence; for you ought to have received another letter from me, with one enclosed for our friend, in some few days after you had the packet from Hartley. This was in answer to the letter you mention, which I got the very next day (as well as I remember) after Hartley went from London.

As soon as I hear of my lord Orrery's arrival on this side the water I will wait on him to receive the papers. The moment they are put into my hands I will write you again.

I do not know why the dean's friends should think it derogatory either to his station or character to print the history by subscription, considering how the money arising by the sale of it is to be applied. I am not for selling the copy to a bookseller: for, unless a sufficient caution be taken, the bookseller, when he is master of the copy, will certainly print it by subscription, and so have all the benefit which the dean refuses. But I shall be better able to send you my thoughts of this matter when I have talked with some of my friends who have had more dealings in this way than I have.

And have you at last got store of copper halfpence, and are content to give us gold and silver in exchange for this new coin? This serves to verify an observation I have frequently made, that the grossest imposition on the public will go down, if the managers have but patience to try it twice, and art enough to give it a new name. The excise scheme, which made such a noise here a few years ago, passed here last winter with little opposition, under a new shape and title. How would the ghost of Wood triumph over the drapier, and rattle his copper chains, if the spectre were permitted to meet him in his walks? But I am unawares running into politics, without considering that these reflections may occasion the loss of my letter. I have therefore done with your copper.

You cannot imagine how greatly I am vexed and disappointed that I have been so long obliged to keep back my conversation-piece.[a] I have, in this respect, wholly complied with the reasoning, or rather with the humours, of some of my friends. They were willing to try their skill in accommodating my Irish affairs; in which, after all, I believe they will be disappointed as much as I have been: for the adversaries I have to deal with proceed on a principle that will hear no reason, and do no good, not even to themselves, if others are at the same time to receive any benefit by the bargain. However, since you seem so earnestly to desire a second view of this work, I will send you a book by Mr. Swift, who intends to go from hence about ten days or a fortnight hence. You will be so kind as to keep it in your hands until the publication.

As I think it proper to write a postscript in your letter to a certain person that must be nameless, and finding I have but room for my address to him, I will say no more to you now than I am, and always must be, madam, your most obedient and most humble servant,

WILLIAM KING

P.S. To the gentleman of the post-office who intercepted my last letter addressed to Mrs. Whiteway, at her house in Abbey-street, together with a letter enclosed and addressed to the dean of St. Patrick's.

SIR,—when you have sufficiently perused this letter, I beg the favour of you to send it to the lady to whom it is directed. I shall not take it ill though you should not give yourself the trouble to seal it again. If anything I have said about the copper halfpence and excise should offend you, blot it out. I shall think myself much obliged to you if at the same time you will be pleased to send Mrs. Whiteway those letters which are now in your hands, with such alterations and amendments as you think proper. I cannot believe that your orders will justify you in detaining letters of business: for as you are a civil officer, I conceive you have not a licence to rob on the highway. If I happen to be mistaken, of which I shall be convinced if this letter should be likewise intercepted, I will hereafter change my address and enrol you and your superior in my catalogue of heroes.

FROM MR. LEWIS.

London, June 30, 1737.

Our friend Pope tells me you could wish to revive a correspondence with some of your old acquaintances, that you might not remain entirely ignorant of what passes in this country: on this occasion I would offer myself with pleasure if I thought the little trifles that come to my knowledge could in the least contribute to your amusement; but, as you yourself judge very rightly, I am too much out of the world, and see things at too great a distance; and besides this, my age, and the use I have formerly made of my eyes in writing by candlelight, have now reduced me almost to blindness, and I see nothing less than the pips of the cards, from which I have some relief in a long winter evening. However, to show my dear dean how much I love him, I have taken my pen in my hand to scratch him out a letter, though it be little more than to tell him most of those he and I used to converse with are dead; but I am still alive, and lead a poor animal life. Lord Masham is much in the same way: he has married his son, and boards with him: the lady is the daughter of Salway Winnington, and they all live lovingly together; the old gentleman walks a-foot, which makes me fear that he has made settlements above his strength. I regret the loss of Dr. Arbuthnot every hour of the day: he was the best-conditioned creature that ever breathed, and the most cheerful; yet his poor son George is under the utmost dejection of spirits, almost to a degree of delirium; his two sisters give affectionate attendance, and I hope he will grow better. Sir William Wyndham makes the first figure in parliament, and is one of the most amiable men in the world: he is very happy in his wife lady Blandford: but I fear his eldest son will not come into his measures: this may create him some uneasiness.

Lord Bathurst is in Gloucestershire, where he plants, transplants, and unplants: thus he erects an employment for himself independent of a court.

I have the happiness to live near lord Oxford, who continues that kindness and protection to me that I had from his father. God Almighty has given him both the power and the will to support the numerous family of his sister, which has been brought to ruin by that unworthy man lord Kinnoul.

Now I name him, I mean lord Oxford, let me ask you if it be true that you are going to print a "History of the Four last Years of the Queen?" if it is, will not you let me see it before you send it to the press? Is it not possible that I may suggest some things that you may have omitted, and give you reasons for leaving out others? The scene is changed since that period of time: the conditions of the peace of Utrecht have been applauded by most part of mankind, even in the two houses of parliament: should not matters rest here, at least for some time? I presume your great end is to do justice to truth; the second point may perhaps be to make a compliment to the Oxford family: permit me to say as to the first, that, though you know perhaps more than any one man, I may possibly contribute a mite; and, with the alteration of one word, viz. by inserting parva instead of magna, apply to myself that passage of Virgil, et quorum pars parva fui. As to the second point, I do not conceive your compliment to lord Oxford to be so perfect as it might be, unless you lay the manuscript before him, that it may be considered here.

Our little captain blusters, reviews, and thinks he governs the world, when in reality he does nothing, for the first minister stands possessed of all the regal power: the latter prates well in the house, and by corruption is absolute master of it: as to other matters, his foreign treaties are absurd, and his management of the funds betrays a want of skill: he has a low way of thinking. My dear dean, adieu; believe me to be, what I really am, most affectionately yours, Erasmus Lewis.

FROM THE EARL OF OXFORD.

Dover-street, July 4, 1737.

Good Mr. Dean,—Your letter of June 14th, in answer to mine of the 7th of April, is come to my hands; and it is with no small concern that I have read it, and to find that you seem to have formed a resolution to put the "History of the Four last Years of the Queen" to the press; a resolution taken without giving your friends, and those that are greatly concerned, some notice, or suffering them to have time and opportunity to read the papers over and to consider them. I hope it is not too late yet, and that you will be so good as to let some friends see them before they are put to the press; and as you propose to have the work printed here, it will be easy to give directions to whom you will please to give the liberty of seeing them; I beg I may be one: this request I again repeat to you, and I hope you will grant it. I do not doubt but there are many who will persuade you to publish it; but they are not proper judges: their reasons may be of different kinds, and their motives to press on this work may be quite different and perhaps concealed from you.

I am extremely sensible of the firm love and regard you had for my father, and have for his memory; and upon that account it is that I now renew my request that you would at least defer this printing until you have had the advice of friends. You have forgot that you lent me the history to read when you were in England, since my father died; I do remember it well. I would ask your pardon for giving you this trouble; but upon this affair I am so nearly concerned, that if I did not my utmost to prevent it I should never forgive myself.

I am extremely obliged to you for your good and kind concern for me and my family. My wife desires your acceptance of her most humble service; my daughter desires the same; they both are sensible of your good wishes for them. I am, with true esteem and respect, dear sir, your obliged and most affectionate humble servant, Oxford.

MR. POPE TO THE EARL OF ORRERY.

July 12, 1737.

My Lord,—The pleasure you gave me in acquainting me of the dean's better health is one so truly great as might content even your own humanity; and, whatever my sincere opinion and respect of your lordship prompts me to wish from your hands for myself, your love for him makes me happy. Would to God my weight, added to yours, could turn his inclinations to this side, that I might love to enjoy him here through your means, and flatter myself it was partly through my own! But this I fear will never be the case: and I think it more probable his attraction will draw me on the other side, which, I protest, nothing less than a probability of dying at sea, considering the weak frame of my breast, would have hindered me from two years past. In short, whenever I think of him, it is with the vexation of all impotent passions, that carry us out of ourselves only to spoil our quiet and make us return to a resignation, which is the most melancholy of all virtues.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY.

July 23, 1737.

Dear Sir,—If I were to tell you who inquire for you, and what they say of you, it would take up more paper than I have in my lodgings and more time than I stay in town. Yet London is empty; not dusty, for we have had rain; not dull, for Mr. Pope is in it; not noisy, for we have no cars;[a] not troublesome, for a man may walk quietly about the streets; in short, it is just as I would have it till Monday, and then I quit St. Paul's for my little church at Marston.

Your commands are obeyed long ago; Dr. King has his cargo,[b] Mrs. Barber her conversation,[c] and Mr. Pope his letters. To-morrow I pass with him at Twickenham; the olim meminisse will be our feast. Leave Dublin and come to us. Methinks there are many stronger reasons for it than heretofore; at least I feel them: and I will say with Macbeth, Would thou could'st!

My health is greatly mended; so I hope is yours; write to me when you can in your best health and utmost leisure; never break through that rule. Can friendship increase by absence? Sure it does; at least mine rises some degrees, or seems to rise: try if it will fall by coming nearer; no, certainly it cannot be higher. Yours most affectionately, Orrery.

TO MR. LEWIS

July 23, 1737.

Dear Friend,—While any of those who used to write to me were alive I always inquired after you. But since your secretaryship in the queen's time I believed you were so glutted with the office that you had not patience to venture on a letter to an absent useless acquaintance; and I find I owe yours to my lord Oxford. The history you mention was written above a year before the queen's death. I left it with the treasurer and lord Bolingbroke when I first came over to take this deanery. I returned in less than a month; but the ministry could not agree about printing it. It was to conclude with the peace. I stayed in London above nine months; but not being able to reconcile the quarrels between those two, I went to a friend in Berkshire, and, on the queen's death, came hither for good and all. I am confident you read that history; as this lord Oxford did, as he owns in his two letters, the last of which reached me not above ten days ago. You know, on the queen's death, how the peace and all proceedings were universally condemned. This I knew would be done; and the chief cause of my writing was, not to let such a queen and ministry lie under such a load of infamy, or posterity be so ill informed, &c. Lord Oxford is in the wrong to be in pain about his his father's character, or his proceedings in his ministry; which is so drawn that his greatest admirers will rather censure me for partiality; neither can he tell me anything material out of his papers which I was not then informed of; nor do I know anybody but yourself who could give me more light than what I then received; for I remember I often consulted with you, and took memorials of many important particulars which you told me, as I did of others, for four years together. I can find no way to have the original delivered to lord Oxford or to you; for the person who has it will not trust it out of his hands; but I believe would be contented to let it be read to either of you, if it could be done without letting it out of his hands,[a] although perhaps that may be too late. If my health would have permitted me for some years past to have ventured as far as London I would have satisfied both my lord and you. I believe you know that lord Bolingbroke is now busy in France writing the "History of his Own Time;" and how much he grew to hate the treasurer you know too well; and I know how much lord Bolingbroke hates his very memory. This is what the present lord Oxford should be in most pain at, not about me. I have had my share of affliction sufficient in the loss of Dr. Arbuthnot and poor Gay and others; and I heartily pity poor lord Masham. I would fain know whether his son be a valuable young man; because I much dislike his education. When I was last among you sir William Wyndham was in a bad state of health; I always loved him, and I rejoice to hear from you the figure he makes. But I know so little of what passes that I never heard of lady Blandford, his present wife.

Lord Bathurst used to write to me, but has dropped it some years. Pray is Charles Ford yet alive? for he has dropped me too; or perhaps my illness has hindered me from provoking his remembrance; for I have been long in a very bad condition. My deafness, which used to be occasional and for a short time, has stuck by me now several months without remission; so that I am unfit for any conversation except one or two Stentors of either sex; and my old giddiness is likewise become chronical, although not in equal violence with my former short fits.

I was never so much deceived in any Scot as by that execrable lord Kinnoul, whom I loved extremely, and now detest beyond expression.

You say so little of yourself that I know not whether you are in health or sickness, only that you lead a mere animal life; which, with nine parts in ten, is a sign of health. I find you have not, like me, lost your memory, nor I hope your sense of hearing, which is the greatest loss of any, and more comfortless than even being blind; I mean in the article of company. Writing no longer amuses me, for I cannot think. I dine constantly at home in my chamber, with a grave housekeeper whom I call sir Robert; and sometimes receive one or two friends and a female cousin, with strong, high, tenor voices. I am, &c.

Jonathan Swift.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, July 23, 1737.

I sent a letter to you some weeks ago, which my lord Orrery enclosed in one of his, to which I received as yet no answer; but it will be time enough when his lordship goes over, which will be, as he hopes, in about ten days, and then he will take with him all the letters I preserved of yours, which are not above twenty-five. I find there is a great chasm

[a] Alluding to the Irish cars.

[b] The MS. of "The History of the Four last Years.

[c] The "Treatise on Polite Conversation.'

[a] As, a little before this period, the great abilities of Dr Swift had begun to fail, he had, in order to gratify some of his acquaintance, called for "The History of the Four last Years of the Queen's Reign" once or twice out of his friend's hands, and lent it abroad; by which means part of the contents were whispered about the town, and several had pretended to have read it who perhaps had not seen a line of it.

of some years, but the dates are more early than my two last journeys to England, which makes me imagine that in one of those journeys I carried over another cargo. But I cannot trust my memory half an hour; and my disorders of deafness and giddiness increase daily. So that I am declining as fast as it is easily possible for me if I were a dozen years older.

We have had your volume of letters, which I am told are to be printed here. Some of those who highly esteem you, and a few who know you personally, are grieved to find you make no distinction between the English gentry of this kingdom and the savage old Irish (who are only the vulgar, and some gentlemen who live in the Irish parts of the kingdom), but the English colonies, who are three parts in four, are much more civilised than many counties in England, and speak better English, and are much better bred. And they think it very hard that an American, who is of the fifth generation from England, should be allowed to preserve that title only because we have been told by some of them that their names are entered in some parish in London. I have three or four cousins here who were born in Portugal, whose parents took the same care, and they are all of them Londoners. Dr. Delany, who, as I take it, is of an Irish family, came to visit me three days ago, on purpose to complain of those passages in your letters; he will not allow such a difference between the two climates, but will assert that North Wales, Northumberland, Yorkshire, and the other northern shires, have a more cloudy, ungenial air than any part of Ireland. In short, I am afraid your friends and admirers here will force you to make a palinody.

As for the other parts of your volume of letters, my opinion is that there might be collected from them the best system that ever was writ for the conduct of human life, at least to shame all reasonable men out of their follies and vices. It is some recommendation of this kingdom and of the taste of the people that you are at least as highly celebrated here as you are at home. If you will blame us for slavery, corruption, atheism, and such trifles, do it freely, but include England, only with an addition of every other vice. I wish you would give orders against the corruption of English by those scribblers who send over their trash in prose and verse, with abominable curtailings and quaint modernisms. I now am daily expecting an end of life; I have lost all spirit and every scrap of health; I sometimes recover a little of my hearing, but my head is ever out of order. While I have any ability to hold a commerce with you I will never be silent, and this chancing to be a day that I can hold a pen, I will drag it as long as I am able. Pray let my lord Orrery see you often; next to yourself I love no man so well; and tell him what I say if he visits you. I have now done, for it is evening, and my head grows worse. May God always protect you and preserve you long for a pattern of piety and virtue.

Farewell, my dearest and almost only constant friend. I am ever, at least in my esteem, honour, and affection to you, what I hope you expect me to be, yours, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFUL THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, SHERIFFS, AND COMMON-COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF CORK.

Deanery-house, Dublin, August 15, 1737.

GENTLEMEN,—I received from you some weeks ago the honour of my freedom in a silver box, by the hands of Mr. Stannard,[a] but it was not delivered to me in as many weeks more, because I suppose he was too full of more important business. Since that time I have been wholly confined by sickness, so that I was not able to return you my acknowledgment; and it is with much difficulty I do it now, my head continuing in great disorder. Mr. Faulkner will be the bearer of my letter, who sets out this morning for Cork.

I could have wished, as I am a private man, that in the instrument of my freedom you had pleased to assign your reasons for making choice of me. I know it is a usual compliment to bestow the freedom of the city on an archbishop, or lord-chancellor, and other persons of great titles, merely upon account of their stations or power; but a private man, and a perfect stranger, without power or grandeur, may justly expect to find the motives assigned in the instrument of his freedom on what account he is thus distinguished. And yet I cannot discover in the whole parchment scrip any one reason offered. Next, as to the silver box;[a] there is not so much as my name upon it, nor any one syllable to show it was a present from your city. Therefore I have, by the advice of friends, agreeable with my opinion, sent back the box and instrument of freedom by Mr. Faulkner, to be returned to you, leaving to your choice whether to insert the reasons for which you were pleased to give me my freedom, or bestow the box upon some more worthy person whom you may have an intention to honour, because it will equally fit everybody. I am with true esteem and gratitude, gentlemen, your most obedient and obliged servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. FARREN.

Cork, September 14, 1737.

REVEREND SIR,—I am favoured with yours by Mr. Faulkner, and am sorry the health of a man the whole kingdom has at heart should be so much in danger.

When the box with your freedom was given the recorder to be presented to you, I hoped he would, in the name of the city, have expressed their grateful acknowledgments for the many services the public have received from you, which are the motives that induced us to make you one of our citizens; and as they will ever remain monuments to your glory, we imagined it needless to make any inscription on the box, and especially as we have no precedents on our books for any such. But as so great and deserving a patriot merits all distinction that can be made, I have, by the consent and approbation of the council, directed the box to you, and hope what is inscribed upon it, although greatly inferior to what your merit entitled to, will, however, demonstrate the great regard and respect we have for you, on account of the many singular services your pen and your counsel have done this poor country; and am, reverend sir, your most obedient humble servant,

THOMAS FARREN, mayor.

FROM LORD BATHURST.

Cirencester, October 5, 1737.

DEAR MR. DEAN,—That I often think of you is most certain, but if I should write to you as often you would think me extremely troublesome. I was alarmed some time ago with hearing that you were much indisposed, but if later accounts are to be depended upon you are now in perfect health. I should be heartily glad to have that news confirmed to me by two lines under your hand; however, I write to [a] Eaton Stannard, esq., then recorder of Dublin, and afterwards prime serjeant-at law.

[a] In consequence of this letter, there was an inscription and the city-arms of Cork engraved on the box, and reasons on the parchment instrument for presenting him with the freedom of that city.

you now under that supposition, for which reason have cut out a little business for you.

That very pretty epistle which you wrote many years ago to lord Oxford is printed very incorrectly. I have a copy (of which I send you a transcript) which has some very good lines in it that are not in the printed copy; and besides, if you will compare it with the original, you will find that you left off without going through with the epistle. The fable of the "Country and City Mouse" is as prettily told as anything of that kind ever was: possibly, if you look over your papers you may find that you finished the whole; if not, I enjoin you as a task to go through with it, and I beg of you do not suffer an imperfect copy to stand while it is in your power to rectify it.[a] Adieu! do me the justice to believe me most faithfully and unalterably yours.

TO MR. COPE.

Deanery-house, November 11, 1737

Sir,—I was just going to write to you when your clerk brought me your note for 36*l.*, which was more by a third part than I desired, and for which I heartily thank you. I have been used since my illness to hear so many thousand lies told of myself and others, and so circumstantially, that my head was almost turned; and if I gave them any credit it was because one thing I knew perfectly, that we differed entirely in our opinions of public management. I did and do detest the lowering of the gold, because I saw a resolution seven years old of your house of commons of a very different nature, and have since seen tracts against it, which to me were demonstrations; and am assured, as well as know by experience, that I have not received a penny except from you. However, although I know you to be somewhat of what we call a giber, yet I am convinced by your assertions that I was ill informed; and yet we differ so much in the present politics that I doubt it will much affect the good-will you formerly seemed to bear me. I grant that the bishops, the people in employments of all kinds who receive salaries, and some others, will not lose a penny by lowering the money, because they must still have their pay; and if your estate be set much under value you will be no sufferer, though I and thousands of others will soundly feel the smart, and particularly the lower clergy, who I find are out of everybody's good graces, but for what reasons I know not. I hear your house is forming a bill[b] against all legacies to the church or any public charity, which puts me under a great difficulty, because by my will I have bequeathed my whole fortune to build and endow an hospital for lunatics and idiots.[c] I wish I had any certainty in that matter. You mistook me in one expression: what I said was, that I wished all who were for lowering the gold were lowered to the dust; and I might explain it so that it would bear the sense of causing them to repent in dust and ashes. I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] On the back of the original letter Dr. Swift has observed that upon receiving it he added twenty lines to the poem. It is in imitation of the sixth satire of the second book of Horace, and is printed with the additional lines in the works of Pope.

[b] This bill did not pass.

[c] The dean drew up a petition to the house of lords in Ireland to be excepted in the heads of the bill for a mortmain act, then in agitation, that he might be at liberty to fulfil his benevolent intention: but the bill did not pass. The hospital (endowed by Dr. Swift's legacy of 10,000*l.*) was incorporated by charter in August, 1746. By a printed statement in 1770 it appears that, by the addition of other legacies, the trustees were enabled at that time to admit thirty-four patients on the establishment; and had also sixteen boarders under cure, at the rate of thirty guineas a-year for each.

FROM LORD MOUNTJOY.[a]

November 17, 1737.

Sir,—I shall with great pleasure bring in your petition to-morrow, the house of lords not sitting until then; but I find there is a small mistake in point of form, which will be proper to be set right before the petition shall be presented.[b]

You mention the bill as if it would certainly pass, and be transmitted into England; instead of which I must beg the favour of you to say that "there are heads of a bill depending now before your lordships' committee, in order to prevent," &c. &c.; for until such time as it shall have gone through that no one can declare the fate of it.

I should not be so impertinent as to pretend to direct you in this, but that I apprehend you did not know the progress the bill has taken; if you will get it written over again my servant shall wait to bring it to me, and I shall take care, as soon as the petition is received, to have a clause ready, in pursuance of it, to except your charity. I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

MOUNTJOY.

FROM MR. FORD.

November 22, 1737.

I cannot help putting you in mind of me sometimes, though I am sure of having no return. I often read your name in the newspapers, but hardly have any other account of you, except when I happen to see lord Orrery. He told me the last time that you had been ill, but were perfectly recovered.

I hear they are going to publish two volumes more of your works. I see no reason why all the pamphlets published at the end of the queen's reign might not be inserted. Your objection of their being momentary things will not hold. "Killing no Murder," and many other old tracts, are still read with pleasure, not to mention "Tully's Letters," which have not died with the times. My comfort is, they will some time or other be found among my books with the author's name, and posterity obliged with them. I have been driven out of a great house, where I had lodged between four and five years, by new lodgers, with an insupportable noise, and have taken a little one to myself in a little court, merely for the sake of sleeping in quiet. It is in St. James's-place, and called Little Cleveland-court. I believe you never observed it; for I never did, though I lodged very near it, till I was carried there to see the house I have taken. Though coaches come in, it consists of but six houses in all. Mine is but two stories high, contrived exactly as I would wish, as I seldom eat at home. The ground-floor is of small use to me, for the fore parlour is flung into the entry, and makes a magnificent London hall. The back one, by their ridiculous custom of tacking a closet almost of the same bigness to it, is so dark that I can hardly see to read there in the middle of the day. Up one pair of stairs I have a very good dining-room, which on the second floor is divided into two, and makes room for my whole family, a man and a maid, both at board wages. Over my bedchamber is my study, the pleasantest part of the house, from whence you have a full view of Buckingham-house and all that part of the park. My furniture is clean and new, but of the cheapest things I could find out. The most valuable goods I have are two different prints of you. I am still in great hopes I shall one day have the happiness of seeing you in it.

[a] William Stewart, viscount Mountjoy, created earl of Blessington December 7, 1745.

[b] The dean's petition to be excepted from the mortmain-bill in case it should pass.

Everybody agrees the queen's death was wholly owing to her own fault. She had a rupture, which she would not discover; and the surgeon who opened her navel declared if he had known it two days sooner she should have been walking about the next day. By her concealing her distemper they gave her strong cordials for the gout in her stomach, which did her great mischief. The king is said to have given her the first account of her condition: she bore it with great resolution, and immediately sent for the rest of her children, to take formal leave of them, but absolutely refused to see the prince of Wales; nor could the archbishop of Canterbury, when he gave her the sacrament, prevail on her, though she said she heartily forgave the prince. It is thought her death will be a loss, at least in point of ease, to some of the ministers.

Since Lewis has lost his old wife he has had an old maiden niece to live with him, continues the same life, takes the air in his coach, dines moderately at home, and sees nobody.

It was reported, and is still believed by many, that sir Robert Walpole, upon the loss of his, made Miss Skirret an honest woman; but if it be so the marriage is not yet owned.

That you may, in health and happiness, see many 30th of Novembers, is the most sincere and hearty wish of yours, &c. C. FORD.

If you will be so kind as to let me hear from you once again, you may either direct to me at the Cocoa-tree, or to Little Cleveland-court, in St. James's-place.

FROM THE CHEVALIER RAMSAY.

Paris, November 29, 1737.

REVEREND SIR,—I received only some weeks ago the works you were pleased to send me, and have perused them with new pleasure. I still find in them all the marks of that original genius and universal beneficence which compose your character. I cannot send you in return any such valuable compositions of mine, but you will receive by the first ships that go for Ireland my "History of the Mareschal de Turenne," the greatest French hero that ever was. I shall be glad to know your opinion of the performance.

I am, with the greatest respect, veneration, and friendship, dear sir, your most humble and most obedient servant, THE CHEVALIER RAMSAY.

Pray allow me to assure Mr. Sican of my most humble respects.

If you have any commands for me in this country or for any of your friends, pray direct for me, under a cover, A son altesse monseigneur le compte d'Evreux, général de la cavallerie à Paris.

FROM LORD BATHURST.

Searcliffe Farm, December 6, 1737.

DEAR SIR,—I received a letter from you at Cirencester, full of life and spirits, which gave me singular satisfaction; but those complaints you make of the deplorable state of Ireland made me reflect upon the condition of England, and I am inclined to think it is not much better; possibly the only difference is, that we shall be the last devoured.[a] I have attended parliament many years, and never found that I could do any good; I have therefore entered upon a new scheme of life, and am determined to look after my own affairs a little. I am now in a small farm-house in Derbyshire, and my chief business is to take care that my agents do not impose upon my tenants. I am for letting them all good bargains, that my rents may be paid as long as any rents can be paid; and when the time comes that there is no money, they are honest fellows, and will bring me in what corn and cattle I shall want. I want no foreign commodities; my neighbour the duke of Kingston has imported one,[a] but I do not think it worth the carriage

I passed through London in my way here, and everybody wondered I could leave them, they were so full of speculations upon the great event which lately happened;[b] but I am of opinion some time will be necessary to produce any consequences. Some consequences will certainly follow; but time must ripen matters for them. I could send you many speculations of my own and others upon this subject, but it is too nice a subject for me to handle in a post letter. It is not everybody who ought to have liberty to abuse their superiors; if a man has so much wit as to get the majority of mankind on his side he is often safe; or if he is known to have talents that can make an abuse stick close he is still safer. You may say where is the occasion of abusing anybody? I never did in my life; but you have often told truth of persons who would rather you had abused them in the grossest manner.

I may say in parliament that we are impoverished at home and rendered contemptible abroad, because nobody will care to call upon me to prove it; but I do not know whether I may venture to put that in a letter, at least in a letter to a disaffected person: such you will be reputed as long as you live; after your death perhaps you may stand rectus in curia.

I met our friend Pope in town; he is as sure to be there in a bustle as a porpus in a storm. He told me that he would retire to Twickenham for a fortnight; but I doubt it much. Since I found by your last that your hand and your head are both in so good a condition, let me hear from you sometimes. And do not be discouraged that I send you nothing worth reading now. I have talked with nobody for some time past but farmers and ploughmen; when I come into good company again I may possibly be less insipid; but in whatever condition I am I shall always be most ambitious of your friendship and most desirous of your esteem, being most faithfully and sincerely, dear sir, your obedient humble servant, BATHURST.

TO MR. FAULKNER.

Deanery-house, December 15, 1737.

MR. FAULKNER,—The short treatise that I here send you enclosed was put into my hands by a very worthy person [Alexander Macaulay, esq.], of much ancient learning, as well as knowledge in the laws of both kingdoms. He is likewise a most loyal subject to king George, and wholly attached to the Hanover family, and is a gentleman of as many virtues as I have anywhere met. However, it seems he cannot be blind or unconcerned at the mistaken conduct of his country in a point of the highest importance to its welfare. He has learnedly shown, from the practice of all wise nations in past and late ages, that tillage was the great principle and foundation of their wealth, and recommends the practice of it to this kingdom with the most weighty reasons. He mentions the prodigious sums sent out yearly for importing all sorts of corn, in the miserable moneyless condition we are now in. To which I cannot but add, that, in reading the resolutions of the last sessions, I have observed in several papers that the honourable house of commons seem to be of the same sentiment, although the increase of tillage may be of advantage to the clergy, whom I conceive to be as loyal a body of men to the present king and family as any in the nation; and by the great providence of God it is so ordered that, if the clergy be fairly dealt with, whatever increases their maintenance will more largely increase the estates of the landed men and the profits of their farmers.

I desire you, Mr. Faulkner, to print the treatise in a fair letter and a good paper. I am your faithful friend and servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO DR. CLANCY.

Deanery-house, Christmas-day, 1737.

SIR,—Some friend of mine lent me a comedy,[a] which I am told was written by you: I read it carefully, with much pleasure, on account both of the characters and the moral. I have no interest with the people of the playhouse, else I should gladly recommend it to them. I send you a small present,[b] in such gold as will not give you trouble to change; for I much pity your loss of sight,[c] which if it pleased God to let you enjoy, your other talents might have been your honest support, and have eased you of your present confinement. I am, sir, your well-wishing friend and humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

I know not who lent me the play; if it came from you I will send it back to-morrow.

This letter and the packet were sealed with the head of Socrates.

FROM LADY HOWTH.

December 26, 1737.

DEAR SIR,—Knowing you to be very poor I have sent you a couple of wild-ducks, a couple of partridges, a side of venison, and some plover, which will help to keep your house this Christmas. You may make a miser's feast, and drink your blue-eyed nymph[d] in a bumper, as we do the drapier; and when these are out let me know, and you shall have a fresh supply. I have sent them by a blackguard, knowing you to be of a very generous temper, though very poor. My lord and husband joins with me in wishing you a merry Christmas, and many of them; and am sincerely your affectionate friend and sea-nymph.

If I signed my name, and the letter should be found, you and I might be suspected.

FROM DR. CLANCY.

December 27, 1737.

REVEREND SIR,—When I strive to express the thorough sense I have of your humanity and goodness, my attempt ceases in admiration of them. You have favoured my performance with some degree of approbation, and you have considered my unfortunate condition by a mark of your known benevolence; from my very soul I sincerely thank you. That approbation, which in some more happy periods of my life would have made me proud even to vanity, has now in my distress comforted and soothed my misery.

If I did not fear being troublesome I should do myself the honour of waiting upon you if you will be pleased to permit me to do so. At any time I am ready to obey your command; and am, with the utmost respect and gratitude, sir, your most obliged humble servant, MIC. CLANCY.

TO MR. FAULKNER.

Deanery-house, Dublin, January 6, 1738.

SIR,—I have often mentioned to you an earnest desire I had, and still have, to record the merit and services of the lord-mayor, Humphrey French, whom I often desired, after his mayoralty, to give me an account of many passages that happened in his mayoralty, and which he has often put off on the pretence of his forgetfulness, but in reality of his modesty: I take him to be a hero in his kind, and that he ought to be imitated by all his successors, as far as their genius can reach. I desire you therefore to inquire among all his friends whom you are acquainted with to press them to give you the particulars of what they can remember, not only during the general conduct of his life, wherever he had any power or authority in the city, but particularly from Mr. Maple, who was his intimate friend, who knew him best, and could give the most just character of himself and his actions.

When I shall have got a sufficient information of all these particulars, I will, although I am oppressed with age and infirmities, stir up all the little spirit I can raise to give the public an account of that great patriot; and propose him as an example to all future magistrates, in order to recommend his virtues to this miserable kingdom. I am, sir, your very humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

Dublin, January 17, 1738.

MY DEAR OLD FRIEND,—I have for almost three years past been only the shadow of my former self, with years and sickness, and rage against all public proceedings, especially in this miserable, oppressed country. I have entirely lost my memory, except when it is roused by perpetual subjects of vexation. Mr. Richardson, who is your manager in your society of Londonderry, tells me he hears you are in tolerable health and good spirits. I lately saw him, and he said he intended soon to wait on you in London. He is a gentleman of very good abilities, and a member of parliament here. He comes often to town, and then I never fail of seeing him at the deanery, where we constantly drink your health. I have not been out of doors farther than my garden for several months, and, unless the summer will assist me, I believe there will be the end of my travels. Our friend Lewis has written to me once or twice, and makes the same complaint that I do, so that you are the heartiest person of the three. I luckily call to mind an affair that many of my friends have pressed me to. There is a church-living in your gift, and upon your society lands, which is now possessed by one Dr. Squire, who is so decayed that he cannot possibly live a month. This living, I am told, is about 120*l.*, or something more, a-year; I remember I got it for him by the assistance of sir William Withers and you; and since it is now likely to be so soon vacant, I insist upon it that if Dr. Squire dies you will bestow it to Mr. William Dunkin, a clergyman upon whose character I have lately taken him into my favour. He is a gentleman of much wit, and the best English, as well as Latin, poet in this kingdom: he has 100*l.* a-year from our university, to be continued till he is provided for. He is a pious regular man, highly esteemed; but our bishops, like yours, have little regard for such accomplishments while they have any dunces of

[a] "The Sharper," the principal character of which performance was designed to represent colonel Chartres nephews or cousins. I therefore charge you to use your influence and authority that Mr. Dunkin may have this church-living upon the decease of Dr. Squire; because you know that my talent was a little (or rather too much) turned to poetry; but he is wiser than I because he writes no satires, whereby you know well enough how many great people I disobliged, and suffered by angering great people in favour. Farewell, my dear friend of thirty years' standing. How many friends have we lost since our acquaintance began? I desire you will present my most humble service and respect to my lord and lady Oxford. I am ever, with great affection and esteem, dear sir, your most obedient humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

My kind love and service to Mr. Pope when you see him, and to my old true friend, and yours, Mr. Lewis.

To show my memory gone, I wrote this letter a week ago, and thought it was sent, till I found it this morning, which is January 28, 1738.

TO MISS RICHARDSON.

January 28, 1738.

MADAM,—I must begin my correspondence by letting you know, that your uncle is the most unreasonable person I was ever acquainted with; and next to him you are the second, although I think impartially that you are worse than he. I never had the honour and happiness of seeing you, nor can ever expect it, unless you make the first advance by coming up to town, where I am confined by want of health; and my travelling days are over. I find you follow your uncle's steps by maliciously bribing a useless man, who can never have it in his power to serve or divert you. I have indeed continued a very long friendship with alderman Barber, who is governor of the London Society about your parts; whereon Mr. Richardson [of Kilmacduac] came to the deanery, although it was not in my power to do him the least good office, further than writing to the alderman. However, your uncle came to me several times, and I believe, after several invitations, dined with me once or twice. This was all the provocation I ever gave him, but he had revenge in his breast, and you shall hear how he gratified it. First, he was told "that my ill stomach, and a giddiness I was subject to, forced me, in some of those fits, to take a spoonful of usquebaugh:" he discovered where I bought it, and sent me a dozen bottles, which cost him 3*l*. He next was told "that, as I never drank malt-liquors, so I was not able to drink Dublin claret without mixing it with a little sweet Spanish wine:" he found out the merchant with whom I deal, by the treachery of my butler, and sent me twelve dozen pints of that wine, for which he paid 6*l*. But what can I say of a man who, some years before I ever saw him, was loading me every season with salmons, that surfeited myself and all my visitors, whereby it is plain that his malice reached to all my friends as well as myself? At last, to complete his ill designs, he must needs force his niece into the plot, because it can be proved that you are his prime minister, and so ready to encourage him in his bad proceedings that you have been his partaker and second in mischief by sending me half a dozen of shirts, although I never once gave you the least cause of displeasure. And what is worse, the few ladies that come to the deanery assure me they never saw so fine linen, or better worked up, or more exactly fitted. It is a happiness they were not stockings, for then you would have known the length of my foot. Upon the whole, madam, I must deal so plainly as to repeat that you are more cruel even than your uncle; to such a degree that, if my health and a good summer can put it in my power to travel to Summerseat, I must take that journey on purpose to expostulate with you for all the unprovoked injuries you have done me. I have seen some persons who live in your neighbourhood, from whom I have inquired into your character; but I found you had bribed them all by never sending them any such dangerous presents; for they swore to me "that you were a lady adorned with all perfections, such as virtue, prudence, wit, humour, excellent conversation, and even good housewifery;" which last is seldom the talent of ladies in this kingdom. But I take so ill your manner of treating me that I shall not believe one syllable of what they said, until I have it by letter under your own hand. Our common run of ladies here dare not read before a man, and much less dare to write, for fear (as their expression is) of being exposed. So that, when I see any of your sex, if they be worth mending, I beat them all, call them names, until they leave off their follies and ask pardon. And therefore, because princes are said to have long hands, I wish I were a prince with hands long enough to beat you at this distance, for all your faults, particularly your ill treatment of me. However, I will conclude with charity. May you never give me cause to change, in any single article, the opinion and idea I have of your person and qualities! may you ever long continue the delight of your uncle and your neighbours round, who deserve your good will, and of all who have merit enough to distinguish you!

I am, with great respect and the highest esteem, madam, your most obedient and most obliged humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Duke-street, Westminster, February 14, 1738.

MADAM,—I must answer a letter I never received. The dean tells me you wrote to me; but the seas or the postmasters are in possession of the manuscript. Should it fall into Curll's hands it may come into print, and then I must answer it in print, which will give me a happy opportunity of letting the world know how much I am your admirer and servant.

I agree entirely with the person who writes three or four paragraphs in the dean's letter. Humour and wit are, like gold and silver, in great plenty in Ireland; nor is there anybody that wants either but that abominable dean, the bane of all learning, sense, and virtue. I wish we had him here to punish him for his various offences, particularly for his abhorrence of the dear dear fashions of this polite age. Pray, madam, send him, and you will hear what a simple figure he will make among the great men of our island, who are every day improving themselves in all valuable qualities and noble principles.

I rejoice to hear your fair daughter is in health. I am, to her and you, a most obedient humble servant, ORRERY.

FROM CHEVALIER RAMSAY.

Paris, February 20, 1738.

I SEND you here enclosed the bill of lading for the small box of books I wrote of to you some time ago. I shall be glad to hear you received them, much more to know if the perusal pleased you: no man having a higher idea of your talents, genius, and capacity, than he who is, with great respect, reverend sir, your most humble and most obedient servant, A. RAMSAY.

FROM MISS RICHARDSON.*

Summerseat, February 23, 1738.

SIR,—I was favoured some time ago with your most obliging letter, wherein you are pleased to say so many civil things to me that I have been altogether at a loss how to make proper acknowledgments for the honour you have done me. The commendations you are so good as to bestow upon me would make my vanity insufferable to my neighbours if I were not conscious that I do not deserve them; and although I shall always account it a great unhappiness to me that I never have been in your company, yet this advantage I have from it, that my faults are unknown to you. If I have anything commendable about me I sincerely own myself indebted to you for it, having endeavoured as much as I could to model myself by the useful instructions that are to be gathered from your works; for which my sex in general (although I believe some of them do not think so) is highly obliged to you. The opinion you are pleased to entertain of me I fancy is owing to my uncle's partiality, who has frequently been so kind as to take pains to make persons unacquainted with me think better of me than afterwards they found I deserved. I have great reason to complain of his treatment in this particular; but in all others I have met with so much kindness from him that I must think it my duty to lay hold of every opportunity that falls in my way to oblige him. Sir, you have it in your power to give me one, by making him a visit at Summerseat, where all the skill I have in housekeeping should be employed to have everything in that manner that would be most pleasing to you, which I know is the most agreeable service I could do for him. You are pleased to wish in your letter that you had hands long enough to beat me. What an honour and happiness would I esteem it to be thought worthy of your correction! But I fear you would find my faults so numerous that you would think me one of those ladies that do not deserve to be mended.

Your letter would have given me the greatest pleasure of anything I have ever met with, had it not been for the complaints you make of your health, which give me a most sensible concern, as they ought to do everybody that has any regard for this kingdom. I hope the good weather will set you right, and that the summer will induce you to visit this northern part of the world. I fear I have by this time tired out your patience with female impertinence, and given you too great reason to change the favourable thoughts you did me the honour to entertain of me: I will forbear to be longer troublesome to you, only I beg leave to add my best wishes for your good health, that you may live many years to be a blessing to mankind in general, and this country in particular. I am, with the highest esteem and greatest respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant, KATH. RICHARDSON.

TO MR. FAULKNER.

March 8, 1738.

SIR,—Some of my friends wonder very much at your delaying to publish that treatise of "Polite Conversation," &c., when you so often desired that I should hasten to correct the several copies you sent me, which, as ill as I have been, and am still, I despatched as fast as I got them. I expect you would finish it immediately and send it to me; I hope you have observed all the corrections. I hear you have not above four or five pages remaining. I find people think you are too negligent; and if you delay longer what you fear may come to pass, that the English edition may come over before you have your own ready. I am your humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT

TO MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

Dublin, March 9, 1738.

MY DEAR AND CONSTANT FRIEND,—I received yours of February 11th, and find with great pleasure that we preserve the same mutual affection we ever professed, as well as the same principles in church and state. As to what you hint, as if I were not cautious enough in making recommendations, you know I have conversed too long with ministers to offend upon that article, which I never did but once, and that when I was a beginner. You may remember that, on Mr. Addison's desire, I applied to my lord-treasurer Oxford in favour of Mr. Steele, and his lordship gave me a gentle rebuke, which cured me for ever: although I got many employments for my friends where no objection could be made, yet I confess that Dr. Delany, the most eminent preacher we have, is a very unlucky recommender; for he forced me to countenance Pilkington, introduced him to me, and praised the wit, virtue, and humour of him and his wife; whereas he proved the fallest rogue, and she the most profligate whore in either kingdom. She was taken in the fact by her own husband: he is now suing for a divorce, and will not compass it; she is suing for a maintenance, and he has none to give her. As to Mr. Richardson, his father was a gentleman, and his eldest brother is a dean. Their father had but a small fortune; your manager was the younger son; he has an excellent understanding in business, with some share of learning; his prudence obliges him to keep fair with all parties, which, in this kingdom, is necessary for one who has to deal with numbers, as the business of your society requires. It is his interest to deal justly with your corporation, because people who envy his employment would be ready enough to complain; and yet, although he has a good estate, I have not heard him taxed with any unjust means in procuring it. He is a bachelor, like you and me, and lives with a maiden niece, who is a young woman of very good sense and discretion. He is a member of the house of commons, and acts as smoothly there as he does in the country. I am so long upon this because I believe it will give you a true notion of the man; and if you find, by his management, that he gives you, who are the governor, any cause of complaint, let me know the particulars, which I will farther inquire into. I must next say something of Mr. Dunkin. I told you he was a man of genius, and the best poet we have, and you know that is a trade wherein I have meddled too much for my quiet, as well as my fortune; but I find it generally agreed that he is a thorough churchman in all regards. His aunt, to whom he was legal heir, bequeathed her whole estate to his university, only leaving him an allowance of 70*l.* per annum to support him till he was better provided for; but I prevailed on the provost and fellows to make it 100*l.* a-year. Yesterday I sent for Mr. Dunkin, and catechised him strictly on his principles, and was fully satisfied in them by himself, as I was before by many of his friends; therefore I insist that you shall think of nobody else, much less of Mr. Lloyd, who is not to be compared in any one view. Dr. Squire may linger out for some time, as consumptive people happen to do, but is past hopes of recovery. My dear friend, I cannot struggle with disorders as well as you, for, as I am older, my deafness is very vexatious, and my memory almost entirely gone, except what I retain of former times and friends, besides frequent returns of that cruel giddiness which you have seen me under, although not as yet with so much violence. You, God be praised, keep your memory and hearing, and your health is much better than mine, besides the assistance of much abler physicians. If you know Dr. Mead pray present him with my most humble service and grateful acknowledgments of his favours. Dear Mr. Alderman, why do you make excuses for writing long letters? I now nobody who writes better, or with more spirit, with your memory as entire as a young man of wit and humour. I repeat that you present my most humble service to my lord and lady Oxford, and my old friend Mr. Lewis. What is become of Mr. Ford? Is he alive? I never hear from him. We thank your good city for the present it sent us of a brace of monsters called blasters, or blasphemers, or bacchanalians (as they are here called in print), whereof Worsdail the painter, and one Lints (a painter too as I hear), are the leaders. Pray God bless you, my dear friend, and let us have a correspondence as long as I live. I am ever, most dear sir, your constant esteemer, and most obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

I have five old small silver medals of Cæsar's, very plain, with the inscription: they were found in an old churchyard. Would my lord Oxford think them worth taking?

FROM MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

London, March 13, 1738.

MOST DEAR AND HONOURED FRIEND,—It was with great pleasure I received yours of the 9th of March, with the state of your health, which was the more agreeable as it contradicted the various reports we had of you; for you remember that our newspapers take the privilege of killing all persons they do not like as often as they please. I have had the honour to be decently interred about six times in their weekly memoirs, which I have always read with great satisfaction.

I am very well satisfied with your character of Mr. Dunkin, and desire that he would immediately draw a petition in form, directed to the governor, &c., which petition I desire that you only would underwrite, with your recommendation, and a character of him, which you will please to send to me, to be made use of at my discretion. He need not come over, but inform me as soon as possible of Dr. Squire's death.

I have made your compliments to lord and lady Oxford, who are both well, and rejoiced to hear of your health. They give you their thanks for your remembrance, and are your faithful friends.

His lordship is very well pleased with your present of the medals, and desires you will send them by the first safe hand that comes over. Is it not shocking that that noble lord, who has no vice (except buying manuscripts and curiosities may be called so), has not a guinea in his pocket, and is selling a great part of his estate to pay his debts? and that estate of his produces near 20,000*l.* a-year. I say, is it not shocking? But indeed most of our nobility with great estates are in the same way. My lord Burlington is now selling, in one article, 9000*l.* a-year in Ireland, for 200,000*l.*, which won't pay his debts.

Dr. Mead[a] is proud of your compliments, and returns his thanks and service.

Mr. Lewis I have not seen, but hear he is pretty well.

Mr. Ford, I am told, is the most regular man living; for from his lodgings to the Mall—to the Cocoa—to the tavern—to bed, is his constant course.

These cold winds of late have affected me; but as the warm weather is coming on I hope to be better than I am, though I thank God I am now in better health than I have been in for many years. Among the other blessings I enjoy I am of a cheerful disposition, and I laugh, and am laughed at in my turn, which helps off the tedious hours.

I hope the spring will have a good effect upon you, and will help your hearing and other infirmities, and that I shall have the pleasure to hear so from your own hand.

You will please to observe that I am proud of every occasion of showing my gratitude to you, sir, to whom I must ever own the greatest obligations.

Pray God bless you and preserve you, and believe me always, dear sir, your most faithful and most obedient humble servant, JOHN BARBER.

[a] The dean had made Dr. Mead a present of his works.

FROM DR. KING TO MR. DEANE SWIFT.[a]

St. Mary-hall, Oxon, March 15, 1738.

SIR,—I did not receive your letter of the 4th till yesterday. It was sent after me to London, and from thence returned to Oxford.

I am much concerned that I cannot see you before you go to Ireland, because I intended to have sent by you a packet for the dean. It has been no fault of mine that he has not heard from me. I have written two letters for him (both enclosed to Mrs. Whiteway) since I received the manuscript from lord Orrery. I wrote again to Mrs. Whiteway, when I was last week in London, to acquaint her that I would write to the dean by a friend of mine who is going for Ireland in a few days. I do not wonder my letters by the post have been intercepted, since they wholly related to the publication of ——,[b] which I am assured is a matter by no means agreeable to some of our great men, nor indeed to some of the dean's particular friends in London. In short, I have been obliged to defer this publication till I can have the dean's answer to satisfy the objections which have been made by some of his friends. I had likewise a particular reason of my own for deferring this work a few months, which I have acquainted the dean with.

I must beg the favour of you to leave behind you the copy of the "Toast," at least to show it to nobody in Ireland; for as I am upon the point of accommodating my suit, the publication of the book would greatly prejudice my affairs at this juncture. But this is a caution I believe I needed not have given you.

Your friends in the hall are all well. We are now very full.

Believe me to be, sir, your most affectionate and most humble servant, WILLIAM KING.

Notwithstanding your letter I am still in some hopes of seeing you before you go for Ireland.

TO MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

Dublin, March 31, 1738.

MY DEAR GOOD OLD FRIEND IN THE BEST AND WORST TIMES,—Mr. Richardson is come to town, and stays only for a wind to take shipping for Chester, from whence he will hasten to attend you as his governor in London. I have told you that he is a very discreet, prudent gentleman, and I believe your society can never have a better for the station he is in. I shall see him some time to-day or to-morrow morning, and shall desire, with all his modesty, that he press you to write me a long letter if your health will permit, which I believe is better than mine, for I have a constant giddiness in my head, and, what is more vexatious, as constant a deafness. I forget everything but old friendship and old opinions. I did desire you that you would, at your leisure, visit the few friends I have left; I mean those of them with whom you have any acquaintance, as my lord and lady Oxford, my lord Bathurst, the countess of Granville, my lord and lady Carteret, my lord Worsley, my dear friend Mr. Pope, and Mr. Lewis, who always loved both you and me. My lord Masham and some others have quite dropped and forgot me. Is lord Masham's son good for anything? I did never like his disposition or education. Have you quite forgot your frequent promises of coming over hither, and pass a summer in attending your government in Derry and Colrane as well as your visitation at the deanery? the last must be for half the months of your stay. Let me know what is become of my lord Bolingbroke—how and where he lives, and whether you ever expect he will come home. Here has run about a report that the duke of Ormond has an intention, and some countenance, to come from his banishment, which I would be extremely glad to find confirmed. That glorious exile has suffered more for his virtues than ever the greatest villain did from the cruelest tyrant. I desire and insist that Mr. Dunkin may have the church living upon Dr. Squire's decease, who I am still assured cannot long hold out; and I take it for granted that Mr. Richardson will have no objection against him. God preserve and bless you, my dear friend. I am ever, with true esteem and friendship, your most obedient humble servant,

[a] Then at Monmouth.

[b] Swift's "History of the Four Last Years of the Queen."

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MR. POPE TO THE EARL OF ORRERY.

April 2, 1738.

I WRITE by the same post that I received your very obliging letter. The consideration that you show toward me, in the just apprehension that any news of the dean's condition might alarm me, is most kind and generous. The very last post I wrote to him a long letter, little suspecting him in that dangerous circumstance. I was so far from fearing his health that I was proposing schemes and hoping possibilities for our meeting once more in this world. I am weary of it, and shall have one reason more, and one of the strongest that nature can give me (even when she is shaking my weak frame to pieces), to be willing to leave this world when our dear friend is on the edge of the other. Yet I hope, I would fain hope, he may yet hover a while on the brink of it, to preserve to this wretched age a relic and example of the last.

FROM MR. MACAULAY.[a]

April 13, 1738.

REVEREND SIR,—I have received your letter of this date, and will wait upon you to-morrow morning. I am extremely sorry to find you meet with anything that affects or perplexes you. I hope I shall never be guilty of such black ingratitude as to omit any opportunity of doing you every good office in my power.

I am, with the greatest esteem and gratitude, rev. sir, your most obliged and most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER M'AULAY.

[a] Author of "A Treatise on Tillage," and of a pamphlet in favour of the tithes of the clergy, called "Property Inviolable." To this pamphlet the dean alludes in the clause of his will where he leaves Mr. Macaulay "the gold box in which the freedom of Dublin was presented to me, as a testimony of the esteem and love I have for him, on account of his great learning, fine natural parts, unaffected piety and benevolence, and his truly honourable zeal in defence of the legal rights of the clergy, in opposition to all their unprovoked oppression."

DR. KING TO MR. DEANE SWIFT.

St. Mary-hall, Oxon, April 25, 1738.

DEAR SIR,—I have just received your letter by Mr. Birt, for which I thank you. It is now more than a month since I wrote to Mrs. Whiteway to acquaint the dean with the difficulties I met with in regard to the publication of his history, and to desire his advice and directions in what manner I should proceed. I have not yet had any answer, and till I receive one I can do nothing more. I may probably hear from Ireland before you leave Monmouth, in which case I may trouble you with a packet.

I am pretty much of your opinion about the old poets, and perhaps may confirm you in your whimsies (as you call them) when I have the pleasure of seeing you here again. I heartily wish you a good journey and voyage: but methinks I can hardly excuse you for having been so long absent from us. I wish you had returned to this place, though for one week, because I might have talked over with you all the affair of the "History," about which I have been much condemned, and no wonder, since the dean has continually expressed his dissatisfaction that I have so long delayed the publication of it. However, I have been in no fault: on the contrary, I have consulted the dean's honour and the safety of his person. In a word, the publication of this work, as excellent as it is, would involve the printer, publisher, author and every one concerned, in the greatest difficulties if not in a certain ruin, and therefore it will be absolutely necessary to omit some of the characters.

I thank you for the promise you make me concerning "The Toast."

Your friends here are all well. Believe me, dear sir, your most obedient humble servant,

WILLIAM KING.

FROM MISS RICHARDSON TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Belturbet, May 6, 1738.

DEAR MADAM,—I received the favour of your letter last post. I was deprived of having that pleasure sooner by removing from Summerseat to this place the beginning of last month, where I was sent for by my father to attend him in a fit of the gout, of which he has been very ill these three months past. My sister, who takes care of him and his family, being near the time of her lying-in, I trouble you with this account that you may know how I am engaged at present, which I fear will prevent me having an opportunity of waiting upon you before my uncle returns.

I most humbly thank you for your kind invitation, and do heartily wish it were any way in my power to let you know the grateful sense I have of my obligations to you. I hope the dean of St. Patrick's is very well: it would have given me infinite pleasure to have had the honour of being in his company with you.

When I parted with my uncle he proposed to make but a short stay in England at this time; and at his return he intended to leave nothing undone that he could think of to prevail with the dean and you to spend some time at his house this summer. I hope you will be so good as to give him all the assistance you can to persuade the dean to take that jaunt: I really believe it would do him great service as to his health: I please myself greatly with the thoughts of having you there, and your daughter, whom I believe to be a very accomplished young lady, having had the happiness to be educated under your direction. I beg you will make my compliments to her; and be assured that I am, with great respect, madam, your most obedient and most humble servant,

KATH. RICHARDSON.

TO MISS HAMILTON[a] OF CALEDON.

Deanery-house, Dublin, June 8, 1738.

MADAM,—Some days ago my lord Orrery had the assurance to show me a letter of yours to him, where you did me the honour to say many things in my favour; I read the letter with great delight, but at the same time I reproached his lordship for his presumption in pretending to take a lady from me who had made so many advances and confessed herself to be nobody's goddess but mine. However, he had the boldness to assure me that he had your consent to take him for a husband. I therefore command you never to accept him without my leave, under my own hand and seal. And as I do not know any lady in this kingdom of so good sense or so many accomplishments, I have at last, with a heavy heart, permitted him to make himself the happiest man in the world; for I know no fault in him except his treacherous dealing with me.

Pray God make you happy in yourselves and each other, and believe me to be, with the truest esteem and respect, madam, your most obedient and obliged servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

I have neither mourning paper nor gilt at this time, and if I had I could not tell which I ought to choose.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY.

June 13, 1738.

DEAR SIR,—I am engaged to-morrow at dinner, but I will try to put it off, and send you word in the morning whether I can meet Mrs. Whiteway or not. To show you what a generous rival I am (now I am sure of the lady), I should be glad to carry down a letter from you to my mistress on Friday. She never drinks any wine; but she told me the other day, to do you good she would drink a bottle. I wish you would insist on it, that I might see whether wine would alter the sweetness of her temper, for I am sure nothing else can.

I rejoice to find there is some little amendment in your health, and I pray God to increase it.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY.

June 29, 1738.

DEAR SIR,—I have but this paper left, and how can I employ it better than in triumphing over my rival? Mea est Lavinia conjux. To-morrow Miss Hamilton gives me her heart and hand for ever. Do I live to see the day when toupets, coxcomical lords, powdered squires, and awkward beaux, join with the dean of St. Patrick's in loss of one and the same object? My happiness is too great, and in pity to you I will add no more than that I hope to see grief for this loss strongly wrote in your face even twenty years hence. Adieu: your generous rival, ORRERY.

FROM MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

London, July 2, 1738.

MOST HONOURED AND WORTHY SIR,—I have deferred answering the favours of yours of the 9th and 31st of March, in hopes to have something to entertain you with, and I have succeeded in my wishes, for I am sure I give you great pleasure when I tell you the enclosed I received from the hands of my lord Bolingbroke and Mr. Pope, your dearest friends. My lord has been here a few days, and is come to sell Dawley, to pay his debts; and he will return to France, where, I am told he is writing the "History of his Own Times," which I heartily rejoice at (though I am not likely to live to see it published), because so able a hand can do nothing but what must be instructive and entertaining to the next generation. His lordship is fat and fair, in high spirits, but joins with you and all good men to lament our present unhappy situation. Mr. Pope has a cold, and complains, but he is very well; so well that he throws out a twelvepenny touch in a week or ten days with as much ease as a friend of ours formerly used to roast the enemies of their country.

The report of the duke of Ormond's return is without foundation. His grace is very well in health and lives in a very handsome manner, and has Mr. Kelly with him as his chaplain, the gentleman who escaped out of the Tower. A worthy friend of yours and mine passed through Avignon about a month since, and dined with his grace, from whom I have what I tell you.

I hear nothing of Dr. Squire's departure: I believe I may say that matter is secured for Mr. Dunkin.

I have seen lord and lady Oxford, who make you their compliments. He thanks you for your medals. I believe I told you he is selling Wimple to pay off a debt of 100,000*l*. That a man without any vice should run out such a sum is monstrous. It must be owing to the roguery of his stewards, and his indolency, which is vice enough.

Lord Bathurst is heartily yours; so is Mr. Lewis, who wears apace, and the more (would you believe it?) since the loss of his wife.

I do not see lord —— in an age; his son is married, and proves bad enough; ill-natured and proud, and very little in him.[a] Our friend Ford lives in the same way, as constant as the sun, from the Cocoa-tree to the park, to the tavern, to bed, &c.

So far in the historical way, to obey your several commands. You will now give me leave to hope this will find you free from all your complaints, and that I shall have the great pleasure of seeing it very quickly under your own hand. I thank God I am better than I have been many years, but yet have many complaints, for my asthma sticks close by me, but less gout than formerly, so that, though I cannot walk far, I ride daily, and eat and drink heartily at noon; and impute my being so much better to my drinking constantly the asses' milk, which is the best specific we have. I wish to God you would try it; I am sure it would do you much good. I take it betimes in the morning, which certainly gives me a little sleep, and often a small breathing or sweat.

If Mr. Richardson has not made you his acknowledgments for your great favour and friendship to him he is much to blame, for to you he owes the continuance of his employment. An alderman of Derry came from thence on purpose to attach him, and he had many articles of impeachment; and I believe he had twenty out of twenty-four of our society against him: and the cry has been against him for two or three years past, and I had no way to save him many times, but only by saying that while I had the honour to preside in that chair I would preserve the great privilege every Englishman had, of being heard before he was condemned; and I never put any question against him while he was in Ireland. Well, he came, and, after a long and tedious hearing of both sides, the society were of opinion that he had acted justly and honourably in his office.

I do not deal in politics; I have left them off a long while, only we talk much of war, which I do not believe a word on. A fair lady in Germany[a] has put the king in a good humour they say.

I shall trouble you no more at present, but to assure you I never think of you but with the utmost pleasure, and drink your health daily, and heartily pray for your long, long life, as you are an honour to your country, and will be the glory of the present and succeeding ages.

I am, dear sir, your most affectionate humble servant, JOHN BARBER.

TO MR. FAULKNER.

Thursday, July 13, 1738.

SIR,—I desire you will print the following paper in what manner you think most proper. You see my design in it; I believe no man had ever more difficulty or less encouragement to bestow his whole fortune for a charitable use. I am your humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

IT is known enough that the above-named doctor has, by his last will and testament, bequeathed his whole fortune (except some legacies) to build and endow an hospital, in or near this city, for the support of lunatics, idiots, and those they call incurables; but the difficulty he lies under is, that his whole fortune consists in mortgages on lands and other the like securities; for as to purchasing a real estate in lands, for want of active friends he finds it impossible; so that, much against his will, if he should call in all his money lent, he knows not where to find a convenient estate in a tolerable part of the kingdom which can be bought; and in the mean time his whole fortune must lie dead in the hands of bankers. The great misfortune is that there seems not so much public virtue left among us as to have any regard for a charitable design, because none but the aforesaid unfortunate objects of charity will be the better for it. However, the said doctor, by calling in the several sums he has lent, can be able, with some difficulty, to purchase three hundred pounds per annum in lands for the endowment of the said hospital, if those lands could be now purchased, otherwise he must leave it, as he has done in his will, to the care of his executors, who are very honest, wise, and considerable gentlemen, his friends; and yet he has known some of very fair and deserved credit prove very negligent trustees. The doctor is now able to lend two thousand pounds, at five per cent., upon good security, of which the principal, after his decease, is to be disposed of by his executors, in buying lands for the further endowment of the said hospital.

FROM MR. RICHARDSON.

July 25, 1738.

THERE are but very few things would give me a greater concern than the dean of St. Patrick's becoming indifferent toward me; and yet I fear one of those few things is the cause I have not had a line from you since I came hither. I beseech you ease me of my present pain, by telling me that you are well; that summer, which hath but lately reached us here, hath invited you, and tempted you to ride again.

If anything occurs to you I can do that is agreeable to you, if you have the least inclination to oblige me, let me know of it.

My hurry here is almost over; but one affair or other will detain me till the latter end of October, if I get away then. I cannot say I pass my time disagreeably. I have had some opportunities of doing good offices; and when I am not engaged by business I live with a few friends that I love, and love me, and, for the most part, go every week with one of them to the country for two or three days.

Your friend Bolingbroke is well, and at present with Mr. Pope. I am told he has sold Dawley. Alderman Barber, who has promised me to write to you by the next post, tells me his lordship inquired much about you and your health. The alderman plays his cards so as that his credit in the city daily increases. There is nothing but the vacancy wanted to put Mr. Dunkin in possession of the parish of Colrane.

I hear you have seen Pope's "First Dialogue, 1738." Have you seen his "Universal Prayer?" This "Second Dialogue," together with the copy of the inscription intended by the old duchess of Marlborough for a statue she is to erect of queen Anne, and a few lines attributed to lord Chesterfield on another subject, wait on you enclosed.

Believe that I love as much as I admire you; and that I am, with the most perfect respect, dear sir, your most obliged and most truly faithful servant,

WILLIAM RICHARDSON.

This packet goes franked by the secretary of the foreign office, who can frank any weight.

I expect the prime-serjeant[a] here this night in his way to France

LORD GOWER TO A FRIEND OF DEAN SWIFT.

Trentham, August 1, 1738.

SIR,—Mr. Samuel Johnson (author of "London," a satire, and some other poetical pieces) is a native of this country, and much respected by some worthy gentlemen in this neighbourhood, who are trustees of a charity-school now vacant; the certain salary is 60*l.* a-year, of which they are desirous to make him master; but, unfortunately, he is not capable of receiving their bounty, which would make him happy for life, by not being a master of arts; which, by the statutes of the school, the master of it must be.

Now these gentlemen do me the honour to think that I have interest enough in you to prevail upon you to write to dean Swift to persuade the university of Dublin to send a diploma to me, constituting this poor man master of arts in their university. They highly extol the man's learning and probity, and will not be persuaded that the university will make any difficulty of conferring such a favour upon a stranger, if he is recommended by the dean. They say he is not afraid of the strictest examination, though he is off so long a journey, and will venture it if the dean thinks it necessary, choosing rather to die upon the road than be starved to death in translating for booksellers, which has been his only subsistence for some time past.

I fear there is more difficulty in this affair than these good-natured gentlemen apprehend; especially as their election cannot be delayed longer than the 11th of next month. If you see this matter in the same light as it appears to me, I hope you will burn this, and pardon me for giving you so much trouble about an impracticable thing; but if you think there is a probability of obtaining the favour asked, I am sure your humanity and propensity to relieve merit in distress will incline you to serve the poor man, without my adding more to the trouble I have already given you than assuring you that I am, with great truth, sir, your faithful servant, GOWER.

TO MR. RICHARDSON

August 5, 1738.

SIR,—It was not my want of friendship and esteem that hindered me from answering your several letters, but merely my disorders in point of health; for I am constantly giddy, and so deaf that your friend Mrs. Whiteway has almost got into a consumption by bawling in my ears. I heartily congratulate with you on your triumph over your Irish enemies by a a Henry Singleton, esq., whom Dr Swift appointed one of his executors. He was afterwards lord chief-justice of the common pleas, which he resigned upon a pension, and was appointed master of the rolls in Ireland.

nemine contradicente. I leave the rest of this paper to be filled by Mrs. Whiteway; and am, with true esteem and gratitude, your most obedient and obliged servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

Pray tell my dear friend the alderman that I love him most sincerely; but my ill health and worse memory will not suffer me to write a long letter.

TO MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

August 8, 1738.

MY DEAR AND HONOURED FRIEND,—I have received yours of July 27th; and two days ago had a letter from Mr. Pope, with a dozen lines from my lord Bolingbroke, who tells me he is just going to France, and I suppose designs to continue there as long as he lives. I am very sorry he is under the necessity of selling Dawley. Pray let me know whether he be tolerably easy in his fortunes; for he has these several years lived very expensively. Is his lady still alive? and has he still a country-house and an estate of hers to live on? I should be glad to live so long as to see his "History of his Own Times;" which would be a work very worthy of his lordship, and will be a defence of that ministry and a justification of our late glorious queen against the malice, ignorance, falsehood, and stupidity of our present times and managers. I very much like Mr Pope's last poem, entitled "MDCCXXXVIII.," called Dialogue II.; but I live so obscurely and know so little of what passes in London, that I cannot know the names of persons and things by initial letters.

I am very glad to hear that the duke of Ormond lives so well at ease and in so good health, as well as with so valuable a companion. His grace has an excellent constitution at so near to fourscore. Mr. Dunkin is not in town, but I will send to him when I hear he is come. I extremely love my lord and lady Oxford; but his way of managing his fortune is not to be endured. I remember a rascally butcher, one Morley,[a] a great land-jobber and knave, who was his lordship's manager, and has been the principal cause of my lord's wrong conduct, in which you agree with me in blaming his weakness and credulity. I desire you will please, upon occasion, to present my humble service to my lord and lady Oxford and to my lord Bathurst. I just expected the character you give of young . I hated him from a boy. I wonder Mr. Ford is alive; perhaps walking preserves him.

I very much lament your asthma. I believe temperance and exercise have preserved me from it.

I seldom walk less than four miles, sometimes six, eight, ten, or more, never beyond my own limits; or, if it rains, I walk as much through the house, up and down stairs; and if it were not for the cruel deafness I would ride through the kingdom and half through England; pox on the modern phrase Great Britain, which is only to distinguish it from Little Britain, where old clothes and old books are to be bought and sold! However, I will put Dr. Sheridan (the best scholar in both kingdoms) upon taking your receipt for a terrible asthma. I wish you were rich enough to buy and keep a horse, and ride every tolerable day twenty miles.

Mr. Richardson is I think still in London. I assure you he is very grateful to me, and is too wise and discreet to give any just occasion of complaint, by which he must be a great loser in reputation, and a greater in his fortune.

I have not written as much this many a day. I have tired myself much; but, in revenge, I will tire you. I am, dear Mr. Alderman, with very great esteem, your most obedient and most humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] This is the "Mild Morley" of Prior's ballad of "Down-hall"

TO MR. POPE AND LORD BOLINGBROKE.

Dublin, August 8, 1738.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—I have yours of July 25, and first I desire you will look upon me as a man worn with years, and sunk by public as well as personal vexations. I have entirely lost my memory, uncapable of conversation by a cruel deafness, which has lasted almost a year, and I despair of any cure. I say not this to increase your compassion (of which you have already too great a part), but as an excuse for my not being regular in my letters to you and some few other friends. I have an ill name in the post-office of both kingdoms,[a] which makes the letters addressed to me not seldom miscarry, or be opened and read, and then sealed in a bungling manner before they come to my hands. Our friend Mrs. Blount is very often in my thoughts, and high in my esteem; I desire you will be the messenger of my humble thanks and service to her. That superior universal genius you describe, whose handwriting I know towards the end of your letter, has made me both proud and happy; but by what he writes I fear he will be too soon gone to his forest abroad. He began in the queen's time to be my patron, and then descended to my friend.

It is a great favour of Heaven that your health grows better by the addition of years. I have absolutely done with poetry for several years past, and even at my best times I could produce nothing but trifles: I therefore reject your compliments on that score, and it is no compliment in me; for I take your second dialogue that you lately sent me to equal almost anything you ever writ; although I live so much out of the world that I am ignorant of the facts and persons, which I presume are very well known from Temple-bar to St. James's; I mean the court exclusive.

I can faithfully assure you that every letter you have honoured me with these twenty years and more are sealed up in bundles and delivered to Mrs. Whiteway, a very worthy, rational, and judicious cousin of mine, and the only relation whose visits I can suffer. All these letters she is directed to send safely to you upon my decease.

My lord Orrery is gone with his lady to a part of her estate in the north; she is a person of very good understanding as any I know of her sex. Give me leave to write here a short answer to my lord B.'s letter in the last page of yours.

MY DEAR LORD,—I am infinitely obliged to your lordship for the honour of your letter and kind remembrance of me. I do here confess that I have more obligations to your lordship than to all the world beside. You never deceived me, even when you were a great minister of state; and yet I love you still more for your condescending to write to me when you had the honour to be an exile. I can hardly hope to live till you publish your history, and am vain enough to wish that my name should be squeezed in among the few subalterns, quorum pars parva fui: if not I will be revenged, and contrive some way to be known to futurity, that I had the honour to have your lordship for my best patron; and I will live and die, with the highest veneration and gratitude, your most obedient, &c.

P.S. I will here in a postscript correct (if it be possible) the blunders I have made in my letter. I have showed my cousin the above letter, and she assures me that a great collection of your/my letters to me/you[a] are put up and sealed, and in some very safe hand. I am, my most dear and honoured friend, entirely yours, JONATHAN SWIFT.

It is now August 24, 1738.

TO MR. FAULKNER.

August 31, 1738.

SIR,—I believe you know that I had a treatise called "Advice to Servants," in two volumes. The first was lost, but this moment Mrs. Ridgeway brought it to me, having found it in some papers in her room; and truly, when I went to look for the second I could not tell where to find: it if you happen to have it I shall be glad, if not, the messenger shall go to Mrs. Whiteway. I am, your humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY TO MR. RICHARDSON.

September 16, 1738.

SIR,—I have much pleasure in thinking I have executed your commands and alderman Barber's to both your satisfactions; and was greatly pleased yesterday to find the dean in spirits enough to be able to write you a few lines, because I know it was what you wished for. I declare it has not been by any omission of mine that it was not done long ago. Beside his usual attendants, giddiness and deafness, I can with great truth say the miseries of this poor kingdom have shortened his days and sunk him even below the wishes of his enemies; and as he has lived the patriot of Ireland, like the second Cato, he will resign life when it can be no longer serviceable to his country.

As sir Robert Walpole has your best wishes, I am so far glad of his recovery.

My daughter is now very well, and most highly obliged to you for what you say about her. I was so little myself when I wrote to you last, with her illness, that I forgot to entreat the favour of your commands to Miss Richardson to take the opportunity of the summer season to come to this town; but the week after I wrote to her and insisted on her company immediately; but, by directing my letter to Summerseat instead of Colrane, I had not an answer till yesterday, and then one that did not satisfy me; for it is written with such deference and fear of doing anything without your positive orders, that I have very little to hope for from her. I shall for ever tax you with want of truth, sincerity, and breach of faith, if you do not command her to come immediately to town.

I showed Mr. Dunkin the paragraph in your letter that concerned him; for which and many other obligations he is under to you he owns himself most gratefully your obedient, &c. &c. Mr. Faulkner will send the books by the first that goes to England.

How could you be so unpolite as to tell a woman you supposed her not to entertained with scandal? You will not allow us to be learned; books turn our brain; housewifery is below a genteel education; and work spoils our eyes: and will you not permit us to be proficients in gaming, visiting, and scandal? To convince you I am so in the last article, the poem pleased me mightily, and I had a secret pleasure to see the gentleman I showed it to liked it as well as I did; so I find your sex are not without a tincture of that female quality.

You have pressed me so much in every letter to find you employment, that to be rid of you I will now do it; for, without mentioning the words, entreat, favours, vast obligations, trouble, and a long &c., will you buy for me twenty yards of a pink-coloured English damask? The colour we admire here is called a blue-pink. The woman will tell you what I mean. If you will be pleased, by the return of the post, to tell what will be the expense, I will pay the money immediately into Henry's bank.

I own I am surprised at what you tell me of Mr. Philips; but envy you know is the tax on virtue, for no other reason could make him your enemy; and I most heartily wish whosoever is so may meet with the fate they deserve. I have just read so far of this letter, and am so much ashamed of the liberty I have taken to give you so much trouble, that, if I have truth in me, were it not for the dean's letter it should never go to you. If you can pardon me this, I promise for the future never to give you the like occasion of exerting your good nature to her who is with the greatest respect, sir, your most obliged and most obedient humble servant, M. WHITEWAY.

You forgot to date your letter.

FROM DR. SYNGE, BISHOP OF FERNS.

September 18, 1738.

SIR,—A message which I had just received from you by Mr. Hughes gives me some hopes of being restored to my old place. Formerly I was your minister in musicis; but when I grew a great man (and by the by you helped to make me so) you turned me off. If you are pleased again to employ me I shall be as faithful and observant as ever.

I have heard Mr. Hughes sing often at Percival's,[a] and have a good opinion of his judgment; so has Percival, who in these affairs is infallible. His voice is not excellent, but will do: and if I mistake not, he has one good quality, not very common with the musical gentlemen, i. e., he is desirous to improve himself. If Mason and Lamb were of his temper, they would be as fine fellows as they think themselves. I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

EDWARD FERNS.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

MR. SWIFT'S gimcracks of cups and balls,[b] in order to my convenient shaving with ease and despatch, together with the prescription on half a sheet of paper, was exactly followed, but some inconveniencies attended; for I cut my face once or twice, was just twice as long in the performance, and left twice as much hair behind, as I have done this twelvemonth past. I return him, therefore, all his implements and my own compliments with abundance of thanks, because he hath fixed me during life in my old humdrum way. Give me a full and true account of all your healths, and so adieu. I am ever, &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

October 3rd or 4th, or rather, as the butler says, the 2nd, on Tuesday, 1738.

My service to all your litter; I mean Mrs. Harrison, &c., but you will call this high treason. I am still very lame of that left foot. I expect to see as many of you as you please.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY TO MR. POPE.

Marston, October 4, 1738.

SIR,—I am more and more convinced that your letters are neither lost nor burnt; but who the dean

[a] It is written just thus in the original. The correspondence in the present volume seems to be part of the collection here spoken of, as it contains not only the letters of Mr. Pope, but of Dr. Swift, both to him and Mr. Gay, which were returned to Mr. Pope after Mr. Gay's death; though any mention made by Mr. Pope of the return or exchange of letters has been industriously suppressed in the publication, and only appears by some of the answers.

means by a safe hand in Ireland is beyond my power of guessing, though I am particularly acquainted with most, if not all of his friends. As I know you had the recovery of those letters at heart, I took more than ordinary pains to find out where they were, but my inquiries were to no purpose; and I fear whoever has them is too tenacious of them to discover where they lie. "Mrs. Whiteway did assure me she had not one of them, and seemed to be under great uneasiness that you should imagine they were left with her. She likewise told me she had stopped the dean's letter which gave you that information, but believed he would write such another; and therefore desired me to assure you, from her, that she was totally ignorant where they were."

You may say what you please, either to the dean or any other person, of what I have told you. I am ready to testify it, and I think it ought to be known, "that the dean says they are delivered into a safe hand, and Mrs. Whiteway[a] declares she has them not. The consequence of their being hereafter published may give uneasiness to some of your friends, and of course to you; so I would do all in my power to make you entirely easy in that point."

This is the first time that I have put pen to paper since my late misfortune; and I should say (as an excuse for this letter) that it has cost me some pain, did it not allow me an opportunity to assure you that I am, dear sir, with the truest esteem, your very faithful and obedient servant, ORRERY.

FROM MR. POPE.

Twickenham, October 12, 1738.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—I could gladly tell you every week the many things that pass in my heart and revive the memory of all your friendship to me; but I am not so willing to put you to the trouble of showing it (though I know you have it as warm as ever) upon little or trivial occasions. Yet this once I am unable to refuse the request of a very particular and very deserving friend; one of those whom his own merit has forced me to contract an intimacy with, after I had sworn never to love a man more, since the sorrow it cost me to have loved so many now dead, banished, or unfortunate. I mean Mr. Lyttleton, one of the worthiest of the rising generation. His nurse has a son, whom I would beg you to promote to the next vacancy in your choir. I loved my own nurse, and so does Lyttleton; he loves and is loved through the whole chain of relations, dependents, and acquaintance. He is one who would apply to any person to please me, or to serve mine: I owe it to him to apply to you for this man, whose name is William Lamb; and he is the bearer of this letter. I presume he is qualified for that which he desires; and I doubt not, if it be consistent with justice, you will gratify me in him.

Let this however be an opportunity of telling you, —What?—what I can tell; the kindness I bear you, the affection I feel for you, the hearty wishes I form for you, my prayers for your health of body and mind, or (the best softenings of the want of either) quiet and resignation. You lose little by not hearing such things as this idle and base generation has to tell you: you lose not much by forgetting most of what now passes in it. Perhaps to have a memory that retains the past scenes of our country and forgets the present is the means to be happier and better contented. But if the evil of the day be not intolerable (though sufficient, God knows, at any period of life) we may, at least we should, nay, we must (whether patiently or impatiently), bear it, and make the best of what we cannot make better but may make worse. To hear that this is your situation and your temper, and that peace attends you at home, and one or two true friends who are tender about you, would be a great ease to me to know, and know from yourself. Tell me who those are whom you now love or esteem, that I may love and esteem them too; and if ever they come into England let them be my friends. If by anything I can here do I can serve you or please you, be certain it will mend my happiness; and that no satisfaction anything gives me here will be superior, if equal to it.

My dear dean, whom I never will forget or think of with coolness, many are yet living here who frequently mention you with affection and respect. Lord Orrery, lord Bathurst, lord Bolingbroke, lord Oxford, lord Masham, Lewis, Mrs. P. Blount;—allow one woman to the list, for she is as constant to old friendships as any man. And many young men there are, nay, all that are any credit to this age, who love you unknown, who kindle at your fire, and learn by your genius. Nothing of you can die, nothing of you can decay, nothing of you can suffer, nothing of you can be obscured or locked up from esteem and admiration, except what is at the deanery—just as much of you only as God made mortal. May the rest of you (which is all) be as happy hereafter as honest men may expect, and need not doubt, while (knowing nothing more) they know that their Maker is merciful! Adieu. Yours ever,

ALEXANDER POPE.

FROM MR. POPE TO THE EARL OF ORRERY.

Twickenham, November 7, 1738.

WHEN you get to Dublin (whither I direct this, supposing you will see our dear friend as soon as possible) pray put the dean in mind of me, and tell him I hope he received my last. Tell him how dearly I love him and how greatly I honour him; how greatly I reflect on every testimony of his friendship; how much I resolved to give the best I can of my esteem for him to posterity; and assure him the world has nothing in it I admire so much, nothing the loss of which I should regret so much, as his genius and his virtues.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

November 27, 1738.

I NEVER liked a letter from you on your usual days of coming here, for it always brings me bad news. I am heartily sorry for your son's continuing his illness, and that you have now two patients in your house. In the mean time, pray take care of your health, chiefly your wicked colic, and Mrs. Harrison's disposition to a fever. I hope at least things will be better on Thursday, else I shall be full of the spleen, because it is a day you seem to regard although I detest it, and I read the third chapter of Job that morning.[b] I am deafer than when you saw me last, and indeed am quite cast down. My hearty love and service to Mrs. Harrison. I thoroughly pity you in your present circumstances. I am ever yours entirely. God support you. JONATHAN SWIFT.

---

[a] This lady afterwards gave Mr. Pope the strongest assurances that she had used her utmost endeavours to prevent the publication; nay, went so far as to secrete the book till it was commanded from her and delivered to the Dublin printer; whereupon her son-in-law, Deane Swift, esq., insisted upon writing a preface to justify Mr. Pope from having any knowledge of it, and to lay it on the corrupt practices of the printers in London; but this Mr. Pope would not agree to, as not knowing the truth of the fact.

FROM MISS RICHARDSON TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Belturbet, November 29, 1739.

Dear Madam,—It was a very unequal match that the dean and you should join in a plot against my uncle and me: you could not fail of carrying your point. Anything the dean hath a hand in is done in the most genteel and surprising manner. I fairly own I am caught: I would be glad to know what my uncle will think of himself when he hears the part he acted in it: I have been so well accustomed to receive presents of value from him, that I thought it had been a piece of edging, or some light thing, which he had committed to your care to be forwarded to me. Never was I so surprised as I was when I read your letter, to think that I had received a present from so great a person as the dean; but, when I looked upon it, and knew the expense it must be to him, I was quite confounded: it was too great an honour for me, who can never deserve the least favour from him? it is a most beautiful diamond. I own I am proud of finery now, which I never was in my life before. I am highly obliged to you for your improvement of the ring: the dean's hair and name have made it a treasure to me, and I really believe it will be thought so a thousand years hence, if it can be kept so long. I am sure it shall by me, as long as I live, with as much care as I keep my eyes, while I have them to look upon it.

My sister, who had the honour of waiting upon you in town, and brought me the ring very safe, is full of acknowledgments for your civilities to her, and returns you her most sincere thanks, with her humble service. Pray give mine most affectionately to Miss Harrison. I am, dear madam, your most obliged and most humble servant,

Kath. Richardson.

FROM MR. RICHARDSON.

London, January 2, 1739.

Sir,—I am called upon by many provocations to prefer a bill of indictment against you and a female accomplice of yours [Mrs. Whiteway]; for that, by the use of means very uncommon, which were in your power only, you have turned the head of a well-meaning country girl of plain sense, who had been very useful to me, and esteemed by her acquaintance. I have seen of late many symptoms of her disorder: it is true that the fascination of your works had before operated strongly upon her; for scarce any opportunity occurred but she poured forth her admiration of the author, and can repeat without book all your poems better than her catechism; however, she could attend to domestic affairs, and give proper directions about matters in the kitchen and larder, &c., and when she did not pore upon your writings, or some other books (I cannot say of the like kind), she was at work, or seeing that things in her province were as they should be: but now truly it appears she apprehends that heretofore she had not discovered her own value and importance. To be taken notice of by a person she has long thought to be the greatest genius any age has produced, and whom she worships with an adoration that to any mortal rises almost to idolatry, has, it is much to be feared, transported her with conceit and vanity, and where it will end I know not. What you have done proceeded no doubt from a malicious intention towards me as well as the poor girl; and I resent it accordingly, as I hope she will do when she returns to her senses.

I was greatly rejoiced, dear sir, to learn from the prime-serjeant Singleton that he found you extremely well in every respect, except your hearing; and in that he said you were much better than he expected. That man, who has as true a heart as I ever met with, most entirely loves as well as admires you.

This place affords no news at present. I am detained by affairs of importance that relate to my friends, and cannot yet say when they will allow me to return. I pass my time now and then with some of Mr. Pope's most intimate friends; and although I would have a great pleasure in being known to him, that of the present age comes next to you in fame, I shall not be introduced to him, unless I shall have the honour not to be thought wholly unworthy to deliver him a letter from the dean of St. Patrick's.

Alderman Barber got a fall in his parlour on his hip, by his foot getting into a hole of the carpet; it brought a fit of the gout upon him, and he is still somewhat lame in his hip, but otherwise in very good health and spirits.

Doctor Squire holds out surprisingly: as soon as the vacancy shall happen I shall have notice, and there is no doubt but Mr. Dunkin will succeed him.

I am ever, dear sir, with the highest esteem and respect, your most obliged and most affectionate humble servant,

William Richardson.

FROM DR. KING.

St. Mary-hall, Oxford, January 5, 1739.

Sir,—At length I have put Rochefoucault to the press, and about ten or twelve days hence it will be published. But I am in great fear lest you should dislike the liberties I have taken. Although I have done nothing without the advice and approbation of those among your friends in this country who love and esteem you most, and zealously interest themselves in everything that concerns your character. As they are much better judges of mankind than I am, I very readily submit to their opinion; however, if, after having received the printed copies, which I will send you next week, you shall still resolve to have the poem published as entire as you put it into my hands, I will certainly obey your commands, if I can find a proper person to undertake the work. I shall go to London the latter end of the next week, when I will write to you by a private hand more fully than I can venture to do by the post.

I was at Twickenham in the Christmas week. Mr. Pope had just then received a letter from you, and I had the pleasure of hearing you were well and in good spirits. May those good spirits continue with you to the last hour!

Believe me to be with the greatest truth, sir, your most obedient, and most faithful servant,

William King.

Pray do me the honour to present my most humble service to Mrs. Whiteway.

FROM MR. DEANE SWIFT.

January 12, 1739.

Sir,—I had so great an honour conferred upon me yesterday that I know not how to express the obligations I lie under for it, unless by endeavouring to make myself worthy of your present. I can demonstrate to the world that I daily improve in wisdom and knowledge, by studying in those books which, since the beginning of my life, I have ever esteemed to be a complete library of taste, wit, poetry, and politics; yes, and in spite of dulness and prejudice, I will venture to say of religion also. This I am sure of, that so great a present from so great a person, and in a manner so handsome and extraordinary, it is absolutely impossible I should ever be honoured with again. I always thought I added to my own reputation whenever I pointed out some of those excellencies which shine through every page of them

But to be thought worthy of receiving them from your hands was infinitely beyond even what my vanity could hope for. I have flattered myself for many years that to the best of my power I have continually fought under the banners of liberty, and that I have been ready at a moment's call either to lay down my life in the defence of it, or, whenever there should appear any probability of success, to vindicate and assert that claim which every man in every country has by nature a right to insist upon; but, whatever principles have guided my actions hitherto, I shall from this moment enlist myself under the conduct of liberty's general; and whenever I desert her ensigns to fight under those of tyranny and oppression, then, and not till then, will I part with those books which you have so highly honoured me with, and cast them into the flames, that I may never afterwards be reproached either by the sight of them or the remembrance of the donor. I am, sir, with the highest esteem, your most obliged and most obedient humble servant, DEANE SWIFT.

FROM DR. KING.

London, January 23, 1739.

SIR,—I hope you received a letter I wrote to you from Oxford about the 30th of last month, in which I acquainted you with the publication of Rochefoucault; and as I interest myself most heartily in everything that concerns your character as an author, so I take great pleasure in telling you that none of your works have been better received by the public than this poem. I observe this with more than ordinary satisfaction, because I may urge the approbation of the public as some kind of apology for myself, if I shall find you are dissatisfied with the form in which this poem now appears. But if that should happen, all the rest of your friends on this side of the water must share the blame with me; for I have absolutely conformed myself to their advice and opinion as to the manner of the publication. There are some lines, indeed, which I omitted with a very ill will, and for no other reason but because I durst not insert them—I mean the story of the medals: however, that incident is pretty well known, and care has been taken that almost every reader may be able to supply the blanks. That part of the poem which mentions the death of queen Anne, and so well describes the designs of the ministry which succeeded upon the accession of the late king, I would likewise willingly have published, if I could have done it with safety; but I do not know whether the present worthy set of ministers would not have construed this passage into high treason, by aid of the new doctrine of innuendoes: at least a lawyer whom I consulted on this occasion gave me some reason to imagine this might be the case. I am in truth more cautious than I used to be, well knowing that my superiors look on me at present with a very evil eye, as I am the reputed author of the Latin poem I have sent you by the same gentleman who does me the favour to deliver you this letter; for although that piece has escaped the state inquisition, by being written in a language that is not at present very well understood at court, and might perhaps puzzle the attorney-general to explain, yet, the scope of the poem and principal characters being well understood, the author must hereafter expect no mercy if he gives his enemies any grounds or colour to attack him. But notwithstanding all my caution, if I perceive you dislike this manner and form of the poem, I will some way or other contrive that it may be published as you shall direct.

I send you my best wishes, and I hope you will yet live many years in a perfect state, for the sake of your friends, for the benefit of your country, and for the honour of mankind; and I beg you to believe that I am, with the greatest truth, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant, WILLIAM KING.

FROM DR. KING TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

January 30, 1739.

MADAM,—A very kind letter, which I have just received from you, has put me into great confusion. I beg of you to be assured that I think myself under the highest obligations to you, and that I set a true value on the friendship with which you have honoured me, and shall endeavour to preserve it as long as I live. If our correspondence has been interrupted, it has been wholly owing to the ill treatment I received from the post-office; for some time I did not receive a letter that had not been opened, and very often my letters were delivered to me with the seals torn off. Whether these post-officers really thought me, what I never thought myself, a man of importance, or whether they imagined my letters were a cover for some great name, I do not know; but for my part I grew peevish to find my friendships and all my little chit-chat must constantly be exposed to the view of every dirty fellow that had leisure or curiosity enough to examine my letters. However, for some little time past I have not had the same cause of complaint. Your letter was delivered to me in good condition: I begin to think my superiors no longer suspect me of holding any unwarrantable correspondence, especially since I find I may now venture to write to the dean, even by the Oxford post. Notwithstanding what you say, I am in some pain about Rochefoucault, and doubt much whether he will be satisfied with the manner in which he finds it published: to which I consented in deference to Mr. Pope's judgment, and the opinion of others of the dean's friends in this country, who, I am sure, love and honour him, and kindly concern themselves in everything that may affect him. The town has received this piece so well, that in all parts and in all companies I hear it extremely commended; and not only the dean's friends, but his greatest enemies, acknowledge that he has not lost any part of his fire, and of that inimitable turn of wit and humour so peculiar to himself. For my part I never read any of his works, either in prose or verse, that I do not call to mind that short character which cardinal Polignac gave him in speaking to me, Il a l'esprit créateur, which I mentioned to you in a former letter, if I remember rightly. It may not be amiss to tell you that one Gally, or Gaillie, since this poem was printed, offered it to sale to a bookseller at Temple-bar; and I am now told that there are two or three copies more in London. Gaillie pretends that he is just come from Ireland, and that he had directions to publish the poem here; so that perhaps the whole may at last appear whether he will or not.

I am glad to hear that my friend Mr. Swift is well. When are we to see him again in Oxford? Since you appeal to him for a voucher, although you need none with me, let him likewise do me the justice to tell you that he never heard me mention your name but with the greatest esteem and respect; with which I shall ever be, madam, your most obedient and most faithful servant, WILLIAM KING.

I sent the dean a packet by the gentleman under whose cover I send you this.

TO MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

Dublin, February 16, 1739.

MY DEAR GOOD OLD FRIEND,—The young gentleman [William Swift, esq.] who delivers you this lies under one great disadvantage, that he is one of my relations, and those are of all mortals what I despise and hate, except one Mrs. Whiteway and her daughter. You must understand that the mother has the insolence to say that you have heard of her and know her character. She is a perfect Irish Teague, born in Cheshire, and lived, as I remember, at Warrington. The young gentleman who waits upon you has a very good countenance, has been entered three years at the Temple, (as it is the usual custom,) but I think was never yet in England, nor does he know any one person there. However, as it is easy to find you, who are so well known and so much esteemed, he will attend you with this letter, and you will please to instruct him in the usual methods of entering himself in the Temple. He is a younger brother, but has an estate of 100*l.* a-year, which will make shift to support him in a frugal way. He is also a very good person of a man, and Mrs. Whiteway says he has a virtuous disposition. My disorders of deafness, forgetfulness, and other ailments, added to a dead weight of seventy years, make me weary of life. But my comfort is, that in you I find your vigour and health increase. Pray God continue both to you. I am, my dear friend, with very great esteem and affection, your most obedient and most humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

Do you ever see any of our old friends? If you visit Mr. Lewis I must charge you to present him with my kind and hearty service; and how or where is my lord Bolingbroke and Mr. Pope?

I am very much obliged to you for the favour you have shown to Mr. Richardson. He is a very prudent good gentleman: if you see him, pray make him my compliments. So, my dear friend, once more adieu.'

FROM DR. KING TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

London, March 6, 1739.

MADAM,—I do not remember anything published in my time that hath been so universally well received as the dean's last poem. Two editions have been already sold off, though two thousand were printed at first. In short, all people read it, all agree to commend it; and I have been well assured the greatest enemies the dean has in this country allow it to be a just and beautiful satire. As I am very sincerely and sensibly affected by everything that may raise the dean's character as a writer, (if anything can raise it higher,) so you may believe I have had the greatest pleasure in observing the success and general approbation which this poem has met with; wherefore I was not a little mortified yesterday when the bookseller brought me the Dublin edition, and at the same time put into my hands a letter he had received from Faulkner, by which I perceive the dean is much dissatisfied with our manner of publication, and that so many lines have been omitted, if Faulkner speaks truth and knows as much of the dean's mind as he pretends to know. Faulkner has sent over several other copies to other booksellers; so that I take it for granted this poem will soon be reprinted here from the Dublin edition; and then it may be perceived how much the dean's friends have been mistaken in their judgment, however good their intentions have been. In the mean time I will write to you on this occasion without any reserve; for I know you love the dean, and kindly and zealously interest yourself in everything that concerns his character; and if you will believe the same of me, you will do me great justice.

The doctor's friends whom I consulted on this occasion were of opinion that the latter part of the poem might be thought by the public a little vain, if so much were said by himself of himself. They were unwilling that any imputation of this kind should lie against this poem, considering there is not the least tincture of vanity appearing in any of his former writings, and that it is well known there is no man living more free from that fault than he is.

They were of opinion that these lines,

"He lash'd the vice, but spared the name;
No individual could resent,
Where thousands equally were meant," might be liable to some objection, and were not, strictly speaking, a just part of his character; because several persons have been lashed by name,—a Bettesworth, and, in this poem, Chartres and Whitshed; and for my part, I do not think, or ever shall think, that it is an imputation on a satirist to lash an infamous fellow by name. The lines which begin,

"Here's Wolston's Tracts, the twelfth edition," are plainly a mistake; and were omitted for that reason only; for Wolston never had a pension: on the contrary, he was prosecuted for his blasphemous writings; his books were burnt by the hands of the common hangman; he himself was imprisoned, and died in prison. Woolaston, the author of a book called "The Religion of Nature Delineated," was indeed much admired at court, his book universally read, his busto set up by the late queen in her grotto at Richmond with Clarke's and Locke's; but this Woolaston was not a clergyman.

The two last lines—

"That kingdom he hath left his debtor,
I wish it soon may have a better"—

I omitted because I did not well understand them; a better what?——There seems to be what the grammarians call an antecedent wanting for that word; for neither kingdom or debtor will do, so as to make it sense, and there is no other antecedent. The dean is, I think, without exception, the best and most correct writer of English that has ever yet appeared as an author; I was therefore unwilling anything should be caviled at as ungrammatical: he is besides the most patient of criticism of all I ever knew; which perhaps is not the least sign of a great genius. I have therefore ventured to make these objections to you; in which however, for the most part, I submitted my own opinion to the judgment of others. I had something to add concerning the notes, but I have not room in this paper; but I will give you the trouble of reading another letter. Believe me, madam, your most obedient and most humble servant, WILLIAM KING.

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY TO MR. RICHARDSON.

March 28, 1739.

SIR,—Two days ago I had the very great pleasure to hear from Mr. Swift you were well. The acknowledgments he professes in his letters to the dean and me of your extraordinary civilities to him make me perfectly ashamed to think how ill I shall acquit myself by only being able to say I most sincerely thank you. What an opportunity have you laid in my way of saying a thousand fine things on this subject; and yet I can only tell you (what you already know to be a great truth) that you have acted in this as you do in everything, friendly, politely, and genteelly. All the returns I can make is to give you further room to exercise a virtue which great minds only feel, that of doing good to an ingenuous, worthy, honest gentleman. The person I mean is counsellor M'Aulay; one of those who stand candidates for member of parliament to represent the university of Dublin, in the place of Dr. Coghill deceased. The dean of St. Patrick's appears openly for him; and I have his leave and command to tell you, if you can do Mr. M'Aulay a piece of friendship on this occasion with any person of distinction in England, he will receive the favour as done to himself.

After I have mentioned the dean, how trifling will it be to speak of myself! and yet I most earnestly entreat your interest in this affair; and for this reason, because it will never lie in my way to make you any return; so that only true generosity can inspire you to do anything at my request. After all, I am not so very unreasonable as to desire a favour of this nature if it be irksome to you. Tell me, sir, can you do anything in this matter? and will you undertake it? for your word I know can be depended upon. There is one hint that perhaps I am impertinent in offering, that all great bodies of men, (or who at least think themselves so,) let their inclinations be ever so much in prejudice of one person, (as I take it to be the case of Mr. M'Aulay,) yet wait for the interfering of the higher powers; so that, if by your good offices the lord-lieutenant can be prevailed on to recommend him to the provost and fellows of the university, his interest would be certainly fixed; but this, and the manner of doing it, I submit to your superior judgment.

The dean of St. Patrick's presents you his most affectionate love and service;—these were his own words. He is better both in health and hearing than I have known him these twelve months; but so indolent in writing that he will scarce put his name to a receipt for money. This he has likewise ordered me to tell you as an apology for not writing to you himself, and not want of the highest esteem for you.

Do you, sir, ever intend to see this kingdom again? What time may we expect it? When may I hope you will perform your promise to let Miss Richardson spend some months with me; and do you ever intend to write again to your friends in Dublin? I am, sir, with the highest esteem and respect, your most humble and most obedient servant, MARTHA WHITEWAY.

FROM MR. RICHARDSON TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

London, April 5, 1739.

DEAR MADAM,—I am indeed much ashamed that I have so many favours from you to acknowledge at one time. You may believe me when I assure you that my silence has not proceeded from want of respect and esteem for you. I would not put on the affectation of much business as an excuse to anybody, much less to you; although the truth is, that I am hurried almost out of my life with the attendance and writing about things I have undertaken for some friends.

The dean's recommendation and yours, without any other consideration whatever, would induce me to do my utmost to serve Mr. M'Aulay, as I have told him by this post, when I thought I should not trouble you with a few lines. He will acquaint you with what I have done, by which you will see that I lost no time; and I have hopes to obtain the lord-lieutenant's countenance for him.

I will endeavour to introduce Mr. Swift[a] to the acquaintance of some persons before I leave this; whose countenance and friendship will at least give a young gentleman a good air: his own merit entitles him to the esteem and regard of such as shall have the happiness to be acquainted with him: I am much obliged to you for introducing me to him. I have only time to add my most hearty thanks for the same, and to assure you that any opportunity of expressing the esteem I have for the dean, which is the highest, and for you, will ever give me the greatest pleasure. I am, madam, your most obliged and most truly faithful servant, WILLIAM RICHARDSON.

FROM MR. RICHARDSON.

London, April 10, 1739.

DEAR SIR,—It is an age since I had the honour of a line from you. Your friend Mr. alderman Barber, whose veneration for you prompts him to do anything he can think of that can shew his respect and affection, made a present to the university of Oxford of the original picture done for you by Jervas, to do honour to the university by your being placed in the gallery among the most renowned and distinguished personages this island has produced; but first had a copy taken, and then had the original set in a fine rich frame, and sent it to Oxford, after concerting with lord Bolingbroke, the vice-chancellor, and Mr. Pope, as I remember, the inscription to be under the picture, a copy whereof is enclosed. The alderman had a very handsome compliment from the vice-chancellor in the name of all the heads of houses there, and by their direction: wherein there is most honourable mention of the dean of St. Patrick's on that occasion.

Seeing an article in the "London Evening Post" upon your picture, which was drawn at the request and expense of the chapter of your cathedral, being put up in the deanery, alderman Barber took the hint, and caused what you see in the "London Evening Post" of this day to be printed therein. He knows nothing of my writing to you at this time; but I thought it right that you should be acquainted how intent he is, all manner of ways, to show the effects of the highest friendship, kindled to a flame by the warmest sense of gratitude and the most exalted esteem and veneration.

Mrs. Whiteway and Mr. M'Aulay can inform you how absolute your commands are with me. Since you recommended him he is sure of the utmost I can do for him.

Sir, if I have not a few words from you I shall conclude that you think me troublesome, and are resolved to get rid of my impertinence. It will be two or three months before I can get from hence, although I am impatient to be at home; but wherever I am, or however engaged, I am always, dear sir, your most obliged and most truly faithful servant,

WILLIAM RICHARDSON.

My best respects wait upon Mrs. Whiteway.

TO THE REVEREND MR. KING.

Monday morning.

SIR,—I have often desired to talk with you about the Wednesday dinner, but could never see you. Mrs. Sican is to buy the dinner, for which I advanced a moidore and a double pistole. I hoped you would have written to Dr. Wilson, and taken some care about the wine, for I have none to spare. Pray let me know whether you are content to take your usual trouble on these occasions. I am your obedient humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM DEAN SWIFT AND MRS. WHITEWAY TO MR. RICHARDSON.

April 17, 1739.

MY VERY GOOD FRIEND,—I find that Mrs. Whiteway pretends to have been long acquainted with you; but upon a strict examination I discovered that all the acquaintance was only at the deanery-house, where she had the good fortune to see you once or twice at most. I am extremely obliged to you for your favours to Mr. M'Aulay, for whose good sense and virtues of every kind I have highly esteemed him ever since I had the happiness of knowing him. If he succeeds in his election it will be chiefly by your good offices; and you have my hearty thanks for what you have already done. I know you often see my honest hearty friend alderman Barber; and pray let him know that I command him to continue his friendship to you, although he is your absolute governor. I am very much obliged to the alderman and you for your civilities to young Swift. Mrs. Whiteway says he is my cousin; which will not be to his advantage, for I hate all relations; and I——Sir, I have snatched the pen out of the dean's hand, who seems, by his countenance, to incline to finish his letter with my faults as he began it. Where there is so large a scope and such a writer, you may believe I should not like to have my character drawn by him. However, I think for once he is mistaken; I mean in the article of what he calls vanity, and which I term a laudable ambition, the honour of being known to you, and bragging of it as some merit to myself to be distinguished by you. Have I not reason to boast when you tell me my recommendation will have weight with you? and how great must be the obligation that words cannot express! Gratitude, like grief, dwells only in the mind, and can best be guessed at when it is too great to be told, and most certainly lessens when we are capable of declaring it. I never doubted Mr. M'Aulay's success if you undertook his cause, nor your indefatigable friendship for those who have the good fortune to gain your esteem. Mr. Swift I wish may be in the number. This I am sure of, that his virtue and honour will never give me reason to repent that I introduced him to you, which is the only favour I hoped for him; but you, sir, never do things by halves.

I know you are hurried on many occasions; therefore I do not expect a letter unless you are perfectly disengaged. Sometimes we are in such a state of indolence that half an hour is trifled away in doing nothing. When you find yourself in this situation tell me in two or three lines you are well, and command Miss Richardson to come to me. My daughter most earnestly joins with me in this request, and entreats you to believe that she is, with as great respect as I am, sir, your most humble and most obedient servant, MARTHA WHITEWAY.

FROM MR. RICHARDSON.

London, April 17, 1739.

DEAR SIR,—I wrote this morning to Mrs. Whiteway a few lines in much hurry, and I write this to you in Guildhall, by alderman Barber's direction. Besides a letter from you to the society, whose address is in Mrs. Whiteway's letter, he thinks a memorial or petition from Mr. Dunkin to the society will be of use; and if you write to Mr. Pope the alderman thinks he will get one vote, which he can fix no way of obtaining but through Pope. I am ever, dear sir, your most obliged and most affectionate humble servant,

WILLIAM RICHARDSON.

I should think it would be right in Mr. Dunkin to come over the moment he hears of Squire's death. I wrote by this post to a nephew to let you know the moment he dies, if the life should be in him when my letter goes to him.

TO THE HONOURABLE THE SOCIETY OF THE GOVERNOR AND ASSISTANTS, LONDON, FOR THE NEW PLANTATION IN ULSTER, WITHIN THE REALM OF IRELAND, AT THE CHAMBER IN GUILDHALL, LONDON.

April 19, 1739.

WORTHY GENTLEMEN,—I heartily recommend to your very worshipful society the reverend Mr. William Dunkin for the living of Colrane, vacant by the death of Dr. Squire. Mr. Dunkin is a gentleman of great learning and wit, true religion, and excellent morals. It is only for these qualifications that I recommend him to your patronage; and I am confident that you will never repent the choice of such a man, who will be ready at any time to obey your commands. You have my best wishes and all my endeavours for your prosperity; and I shall, during my life, continue to be, with the truest respect and highest esteem, worthy sirs, your most obedient and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY TO MR. RICHARDSON.

April 19, 1739.

SIR,—I now give you an opportunity of adding a new petition in your prayers,—From female impertinence, good Lord, deliver me. Yet this trouble you brought on yourself; and therefore I will make no apology for it. Mr. Dunkin's case comes now under your care. You were the first promoter of it; and to you only are his obligations due. Mr. Squire died the 14th of this month; and by this post the dean has writ to alderman Barber in Mr. Dunkin's favour. He has commanded me to entreat your friendship for him with the alderman and the society: and says he knows you will pardon him that he does not write to you himself on the occasion; for his head is very much out of order to-day. There is one article in the dean's letter he has left out, and another inserted, much against my inclination. The first is, that he omitted mentioning Mr. Dunkin as a worthy good man, which, in my opinion, is more material than being a poet or a scholar, although, when joined with these, make a most amiable character: the other is, troubling the alderman to know there is such an insignificant person in the world as Mrs. Whiteway; but the tyrant dean will say and do just as he pleases. The enclosed was sent me by Mr. Dunkin, not knowing how to direct to you. I now promise you, sir, to teaze you no more with my letters, unless you command me to pay you my most humble respects; and then you shall be obeyed with pleasure by, sir, your most obliged and most obedient servant,

MARTHA WHITEWAY.

TO MR. ALDERMAN BARBER.

Dublin, April 19, 1739.

MY DEAR OLD FRIEND—At last Dr. Squire is actually dead; he died upon the 14th day of this month, and now you have the opportunity of obliging me in giving Squire's living in Colrane to Mr. William Dunkin, who is an excellent scholar, and keeps a school in my neighbourhood; besides he is a very fine poet. My friend Mr. Richardson can give you a better account of him. It is true Mr. Dunkin is a married man; however, that is of no great moment; and in the northern country of Ireland, although it be the best inhabited part of the kingdom, a wife will be convenient. Yet we two old bachelors (I own I am your senior) could never consent to take so good example, by endeavouring to multiply the world. I heartily thank you for your civilities to young Swift. It seems he is a relation of mine. And there is one Mrs. Whiteway, a widow, the only cousin of my family for whom I have any sort of friendship; it was she prevailed with me to introduce the young man to you. He is a younger brother, and his portion is only 100*l.* a-year English. You will oblige me if you can bear seeing him once a-quarter at his lodging near the Temple, where he designs to study the law; and so I have done without ever troubling you, my dear friend. Where is Mr. Lewis? Some months ago he wrote to me with many complaints of his ill health and the effect of old age, in both which I can overmatch you and him, beside my giddy head, deafness, and forgetfulness into the bargain. I hear our friend lord Bolingbroke has sold Dawley; I wish you could tell me in what condition he is, both as to health and fortune; and where his lady lives, and how they agree. If you visit my lord and lady Oxford and their daughter, who is now, as I hear, a duchess, or any other friend of ours, let them have the offers of my humble service. May you, my most dear friend, preserve your health and live as long as you desire! I am ever, with the greatest truth and esteem, your most obedient humble servant and entire friend, JONATHAN SWIFT.

I desire you will give my most hearty service to Mr. Pope; and let him know that I have provided for Mr. Lamb, whom he recommended to me, with a full vicar-choralship in my choir. And pray let me know the state of Mr. Pope's health.

DR. DUNKIN TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

April 25, 1737.

MADAM,—As it was through your countenance I had the honour of being first introduced to the most worthy dean of St. Patrick, I must have thought myself under the highest obligation to you; but the continuance of your friendship, through so many repeated acts of generosity, and the course of his gracious endeavours to raise my reputation and fortune, are such things as I must ever remember and express with a very deep sense of gratitude.

The fatigue of writing so many letters lately in my favour was indeed what I could not in reason expect even from his humanity, were I worthy of them; and I can only say the dean of St. Patrick is unwearied in doing good, and that he who could rise to preserve a nation will descend to relieve an individual.

The sense of my own demerit, and the just awe in which I stand before so great and good a man, will not allow me either that freedom of speech or writing which is requisite to let him understand with what love, veneration, and respect of his person I reflect upon the many instances of his tender concern and uncommon zeal for my welfare. This is a duty I most earnestly wish, but am altogether unable to perform, and such as I entreat you, dear madam, to undertake for me; your compliance in which will be yet another among the many and weighty obligations laid upon your most dutiful, obedient, devoted servant, WILLIAM DUNKIN.

TO MR. POPE.

Dublin, April 28, 1739.

DEAR SIR,—The gentleman who will have the honour to deliver you this, although he be one related to me, which is by no means any sort of recommendation; for I am utterly void of what the world calls natural affection, and with good reason, because they are a numerous race degenerating from their ancestors, who were of good esteem for their loyalty and sufferings in the rebellion against king Charles I. This cousin of mine, who is so desirous to wait on you, is named Deane Swift, because his great-grandfather by the grandmother's side was admiral Deane, who, having been one of the regicides, had the good fortune to save his neck by dying a year or two before the Restoration.

I have a great esteem for Mr. Deane Swift, who is much the most valuable of any of his family: he was first a student in this university, and finished his studies in Oxford, where Dr. King, principal of St. Mary Hall, assured me that Mr. Swift behaved himself with good reputation and credit; he hath a very good taste for wit, writes agreeable and entertaining verses, and is a perfect master equally skilled in the best Greek and Roman authors. He has a true spirit for liberty, and with all these advantages is extremely decent and modest. Mr. Swift is heir to the little paternal estate of our family at Goodrich in Herefordshire. My grandfather was so persecuted and plundered two and fifty times by the barbarity of Cromwell's hellish crew, of which I find an account in a book called "Mercurius Rusticus," that the poor old gentleman was forced to sell the better half of his estate to support his family. However, three of his sons had better fortune; for, coming over to this kingdom, and taking to the law, they all purchased good estates, of which Mr. Deane Swift has a good share, but with some incumbrance.

I had a mind that this young gentleman should have the honour of being known to you; which is all the favour I ask for him; and that, if he stays any time longer in London than he now intends, you will permit him to wait on you sometimes. I am, my dearest friend, your most obedient and mos humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. POPE.

May 10, 1739.

You are to suppose, for the little time I shall live, that my memory is entirely gone, and especially of anything that was told me last night or this morning. I have one favour to entreat from you. I know the high esteem and friendship you bear to your friend Mr. Lyttleton, whom you call "the rising genius of this age." His fame, his virtue, honour, and courage, have been early spread, even among us. I find he is secretary to the prince of Wales; and his royal highness has been for several years chancellor of the university in Dublin. All this is a prelude to a request I am going to make to you. There is in this city one Alexander M'Aulay, a lawyer of great distinction for skill and honesty, zealous for the liberty of the subject, and loyal to the house of Hanover; and particularly to the prince of Wales, for his highness's love to both kingdoms.

Mr. M'Aulay is now soliciting for a seat in parliament here, vacant by the death of Dr. Coghill, a civilian, who was one of the persons chosen for this university: and as his royal highness continues still chancellor of it, there is no person so proper to nominate the representative as himself. If this favour can be procured by your good-will and Mr. Lyttleton's interest, it will be a particular obligation to me, and grateful to the people of Ireland, in giving them one of their own nation to represent this university.

There is a man in my choir, one Mr. Lamb; he has at present but half a vicarship; the value of it is not quite 50*l.* per annum. You wrote to me in his favour some months ago; and if I outlive any one vicar-choral, Mr. Lamb shall certainly have a full place, because he very well deserves it; and I am obliged to you very much for recommending him.

FROM MR. SECRETARY LYTTLETON.

London, May 16, 1739.

SIR,—I cannot let Mr. Swift return to Ireland without my acknowledgments to you for the favour you have done Mr. Lamb. I know that I ought to ascribe it wholly to Mr. Pope's recommendation, as I have not the happiness to be known to you myself; but give me leave to take this occasion of assuring you how much I wish to be in the number of your friends. I think I can be so even at this distance, and though we should never come to a nearer acquaintance; for the reputation of some men is amiable, and one can love their characters without knowing their persons.

If it could ever be in my power to do you any service in this country, the employing me in it would be a new favour to, sir your obliged humble servant,

G. Lyttleton.

FROM MR. POPE.[a]

May 17, 1739.

Dearest Sir,—Every time I see your hand, it is the greatest satisfaction that any writing can give me; and I am in proportion grieved to find, that several of my letters to testify it to you miscarry; and you ask me the same question again which I prolixly have answered before. Your last, which was delivered me by Mr. Swift, inquires, where and how is lord Bolingbroke? who, in a paragraph in my last, under his own hand, gave you an account of himself; and I employed almost a whole letter on his affairs afterward. He has sold Dawley for 26,000*l.* much to his own satisfaction. His plan of life is now a very agreeable one, in the finest country in France, divided between study and exercise; for he still reads or writes five or six hours a-day, and generally hunts twice a-week. He has the whole forest of Fontainbleau at his command, with the king's stables, dogs, &c., his lady's son-in-law being governor of that place. She resides most part of the year with my lord, at a large house they have hired; and the rest with her daughter, who is abbess of a royal convent in the neighbourhood.

I never saw him in stronger health or in better humour with his friends, or more indifferent and dispassionate to his enemies. He is seriously set upon writing some parts of the history of his times, which he has begun by a noble introduction, presenting a view of the whole state of Europe, from the Pyrenean treaty. He has hence deduced a summary sketch of the natural and incidental interests of each kingdom; and how they have varied from, or approached to, the true polities of each, in the several administrations to this time. The history itself will be particular only on such facts and anecdotes as he personally knew, or produces vouchers for, both from home and abroad. This puts into my mind to tell you a fear he expressed lately to me, that some facts in your "History of the Queen's Last Years" (which he read here with me in 1727) are not exactly stated, and that he may be obliged to vary from them, in relation, I believe, to the conduct of the earl of Oxford, of which great care surely should be taken. And he told me that, when he saw you in 1727, he made you observe them; and that you promised you would take care.

We very often commemorated you during the five months we lived together at Twickenham; at which place could I see you again, as I may hope to see him, I would envy no country in the world; and think, not Dublin only, but France and Italy, not worth the visiting once more in my life. The mention of travelling introduces your old acquaintance Mr. Jervas, who went to Rome and Naples purely in search of health. An asthma has reduced his body, but his spirit retains all its vigour; and he is returned, declaring life itself not worth a day's journey at the expense of parting from one's friends.

Mr. Lewis every day remembers you. I lie at his house in town. Dr. Arbuthnot's daughter does not degenerate from the humour and goodness of her father. I love her much. She is like Gay, very idle, very ingenious, and inflexibly honest. Mrs. Patty Blount is one of the most considerate and mindful women in the world towards others,—the least so in regard to herself; she speaks of you constantly. I scarcely know two more women worth naming to you; the rest are ladies,—run after music, and play at cards.

I always make your compliments to lord Oxford and lord Masham when I see them. I see John Barber seldom; but always find him proud of some letter from you. I did my best with him in behalf of one of your friends; and spoke to Mr. Lyttleton for the other, who was more prompt to catch than I to give fire, and flew to the prince that instant, who was as pleased to please you.

You ask me, how I am at court. I keep my old walk, and deviate from it to no court. The prince shows me a distinction beyond any merit or pretence on my part; and I have received a present from him of some marble heads of poets for my library, and some urns for my garden. The ministerial writers rail at me; yet I have no quarrel with their masters, nor think it of weight enough to complain of them. I am very well with the courtiers I ever was or would be acquainted with: at least, they are civil to me, which is all I ask from courtiers, and all a wise man will expect from them. The duchess of Marlborough makes great court to me; but I am too old for her mind and body; yet I cultivate some young people's friendship, because they may be honest men; whereas the old ones experience too often proves not to be so, I having dropped ten where I have taken up one, and I hope to play the better with fewer in my hand. There is a lord Cornbury, a lord Polwarth, a Mr. Murray,[a] and one or two more, with whom I would never fear to hold out against all the corruption in the world.

You compliment me in vain upon retaining my poetical spirit: I am sinking fast in prose; and if I ever write more, it ought (at these years and in these times) to be something, the matter of which will give a value to the work, not merely the manner.

Since my protest (for so I call my dialogue[b] of 1738) I have written but ten lines, which I will send you. They are an insertion for the next new edition of the "Dunciad," which generally is reprinted once in two years. In the second canto, among the authors who dive in Fleet-ditch, immediately after Arnal, verse 300, add these:—

> Next plung'd a feeble but a desp'rate pack,
> With each a sickly brother at his back;[c]
> Sons of a day! just buoyant on the flood,
> Then number'd with the puppies in the mud.
> Ask ye their names? I could as soon disclose
> The names of these blind puppies as of those.
> Fast by, like Niobe, her children gone,
> Sits mother Osborne,[d] stupified to stone;
> And rueful Paxton[e] tells the world with tears,
> These are—ah! no; these were my Gazetteers.

Having nothing to tell you of my poetry, I come to what is now my chief care, my health and amusement: the first is better as to headaches; worse as to weakness and nerves. The changes of weather affect me much; otherwise I want not spirits, except when indigestions prevail. The mornings are my life; in the evenings I am not dead indeed, but sleep and am stupid enough. I love reading still better than conversation: but my eyes fail, and at the hours when most people indulge in company, I am tired and find the labour of the past day sufficient to weigh me down. So I hide myself in bed, as a bird in his nest, much about the same time, and raise and chirp the earlier in the morning. I often vary the scene (indeed at every friend's call) from London to Twickenham; or the contrary, to receive them, or be received by them.

Lord Bathurst is still my constant friend and yours; but his country-seat is now always in Gloucestershire, not in this neighbourhood. Mr. Pulteney has no country-seat; and in town I see him seldom; but he always asks after you. In the summer I generally ramble for a month to lord Cobham's, the Bath, or elsewhere. In all these rambles my mind is full of you and poor Gay, with whom I travelled so delightfully two summers. Why cannot I cross the sea? The unhappiest malady I have to complain of, the unhappiest accident of my whole life is that weakness of the breast, which make the physicians of opinion that a strong vomit would kill me. I have never taken one, nor had a natural motion that way in fifteen years. I went some years ago, with lord Peterborough, about ten leagues at sea, purely to try if I could sail without sea-sickness, and with no other view than to make yourself and lord Bolingbroke a visit before I died.

But the experiment, though almost all the way near the coast, had almost ended all my views at once. Well, then, I must submit to live at the distance which fortune has set us at: but my memory, my affections, my esteem, are inseparable from you, and will, my dear friend, be for ever yours.

P.S.—May 19. This I end at lord Orrery's in company with Dr. King. Wherever I can find two or three that are yours, I adhere to them naturally, and by that title they become mine. I thank you for sending Mr. Swift to me: he can tell you more of me.

A SECOND POSTSCRIPT.

One of my new friends, Mr. Lyttleton, was to the last degree glad to have any request from you to make to his master. The moment I showed him yours concerning Mr. M'Aulay, he went to him, and it was granted. He is extremely obliged for the promotion of Lamb. I will make you no particular speeches from him; but you and he have a mutual right to each other. Sint tales animæ concordes. He loves you, though he sees you not; as all posterity will love you, who will not see you, but reverence and admire you.

TO MR. LYTTLETON.

June 5, 1739.

Sir,—You treat me very hard by beginning your letter with owning an obligation to me on account of Mr. Lamb; which deserves mine and my chapter's thanks for recommending so useful a person to my choir. It is true I gave Mr. dean Swift a letter to my dear friend Mr. Pope, that he might have the happiness to see and know so great a genius in poetry, and so agreeable in all other good qualities; but the young man (several years older than you) was much surprised to see his junior in so high a station as secretary to his royal highness the prince of Wales, and to find himself treated by you in so kind a manner. In one article you are greatly mistaken; for however ignorant we may be in the affairs of England, your character is as well known among us in every particular as it is in the prince your master's court, and indeed all over this poor kingdom.

You will find that I have not altogether forgotten my old court politics; for in a letter I wrote to Mr. Pope, I desired him to recommend Mr. M'Aulay to your favour and protection as a most worthy, honest, and deserving gentleman; and I perceive you have effectually interceded with the prince, to prevail with the university to choose him for a member to represent that learned body in parliament in the room of Dr. Coghill, deceased.

I have been just now informed, that some of the fellows have sent over an apology, or rather a remonstrance, to the prince of Wales, pretending they were under a prior engagement to one Mr. Tisdal; and therefore have desired his royal highness to withdraw his recommendation. A modest request, indeed, to demand from their chancellor what they think is dishonourable in themselves, to give up an engagement! Their whole proceeding on this occasion against their chancellor, heir of the crown, is universally condemned here; and seems to be the last effort of such men, who, without duly considering, make rash promises not consistent with the prudence expected from them.

I can hardly venture the boldness to desire that his royal highness may know from you the profound respect, honour, esteem, and veneration I bear toward his princely virtues. All my friends on your side the water represent him to me in the most amiable light; and the people infallibly reckon upon a golden age in both kingdoms, when it shall please God to make him the restorer of the liberties of his people.

I ought to accuse you highly for your ill-treatment of me, by wishing yourself in the number of my friends: but you shall be pardoned if you please to be one of my protectors; and your protection cannot be long. You shall therefore make it up, in thinking favourably of me. Years have made me lose my memory in everything but friendship and gratitude: and you, whom I have never seen, will never be forgotten by me until I am dead. I am, honourable sir, with the highest respect, your most obedient and obliged humble servant.

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY TO MR. RICHARDSON.

July 20, 1739.

Sir,—A fortnight ago I went out of town with the new married couple, my son and daughter; and the day before I had the honour to receive your letter. With great truth I do assure you, I am much more concerned at the trouble and disappointment you met with in Mr. Dunkin's affair than for him, having but a short acquaintance and knowledge, otherwise than knowing him to be a man of sense, virtue, and religion, who would be an ornament to the church, and a credit to those who appeared for him. These were my reasons to wish him well.

One part of your letter, sir, I can only take notice of with amazement; and do entreat you will indulge me so far as to believe this will be all the answer I can, or ever will, make to it: and yet I am not insensible you have been pleased in some measure to honour me with your esteem. I will not therefore fear the loss of your friendship, because it shall be my study to merit your good opinion: and, unprovoked, I know you to have too much good nature to withdraw it. I never saw a more beautiful silk than was bought for my daughter. If you did not choose it, at least you showed your judgment in the person that was employed. She desires me to say this, that you have forced her to do what she never did in her life, wear anything that was not paid for; and if hereafter she should run her husband in debt, she will lay all her fault at your door. Mr. Swift presents you his most obedient respects, and will oblige you to know him by his assiduity in courting the honour of your acquaintance. I have asked you so many favours, that no one but myself would presume perpetually to dun you thus; and yet I will never leave off until you grant this my request, to command Miss Richardson to town immediately. I now attack you on the foot of charity; an argument you can never resist. Consider my daughter has quitted me; that I am all alone; and her agreeable company will make Molly and her husband spend all their time with me. In short, sir, if you hesitate one moment longer, I will lay you open to the world, and let them see how much they were mistaken in Mr. Richardson, who once in his life broke his word. I have now before me, under your hand, that all my commands should be obeyed I insist on your promise; and Miss Richardson is my demand, and that immediately. You see how careful and sparing you gentlemen ought to be in compliments to women, who always keep you to your promise while it makes to their interest; and as well know how to evade their own when it is contrary to their inclination. I had the favour of a letter from alderman Barber in answer to one I wrote him. He does not perhaps know the inconveniency he has brought on himself, which is another from me; and yet you may tell him when I have once more paid my respects to him, I am not so unreasonable as to impose or expect any further notice of Irish impertinence.

I left this paragraph to finish at the deanery, that from his own mouth I might assure you of his love and esteem. He sends his most affectionate service to his dear old friend alderman Barber. Mr. Dunkin likewise presents you his most obedient respects, and hopes you received his letter that he sent some days ago. There is no person a more obedient, humbler servant to you than my daughter, excepting, dear sir, your most obedient and most obliged, faithful, humble servant, MARTHA WHITEWAY.

The chief circumstance that you would choose to know I had like to have forgot; which is, that the dean is in good health, and ever will remember the pains you and the alderman have been at, on his account, for Mr. Dunkin.

FROM DR. SCOTT

London, September 7, 1739.

REV. SIR,—Although I do not imagine that you have any remembrance of a person so little known to you as I am, yet I have taken the liberty to draw a kind of bill of friendship upon you, which I am inclined to believe you will answer, because it is in favour of that kingdom to which you have always stood a sincere and firm friend. We have had here, for some time past, a number of anatomical figures prepared in wax, which perfectly exhibit all the parts of a human body. They are the work of a French surgeon,[a] who spent above forty years in preparing them, and who, to bring them to perfection, was at the trouble and expense of dissecting some hundreds of bodies. The present proprietor of them is my friend, and it was by my persuasion that he was prevailed on to send them into Ireland for the instruction of the curious. I presume you have seen them in London, and therefore I am inclined to think you will be of opinion, that a person may gain more perfect knowledge in anatomy, by viewing these preparations only a few times, than he would by attending many dissections. Your encouraging such of your acquaintance as are curious to see these figures would greatly excite the curiosity of others. This is the favour I have taken the liberty to desire of you, and which I believe you will be the more readily inclined to grant, when I have assured you, that the person who has the care of the figures, has it in his instructions to return the money that may be got by exposing them to view, in Irish linen, so that the kingdom will be no way impoverished by the small expense which gentlemen may be at in procuring useful instruction, or gratifying their curiosity. If the request I have made be such as you cannot favour, my next is, that you will grant me your pardon for having made it.

I intend, God willing, to go into Ireland next spring, after the publication of a work which I have been engaged in for some years past, for the silencing of all infidels, heretics, schismatics of all kinds, and enthusiasts. I thought it necessary, because in the way that the controversy has been hitherto managed against such people, the truth has been rather puzzled and perplexed than cleared, Christianity has been betrayed, and all true religion lost in the world. I have advanced no one new opinion of my own: what I have set forth is what was clearly set forth in the Scriptures from the beginning. I mean in the original Scriptures of the Old Testament, so interpreted as to make them everywhere consistent with themselves; and to show that the interpretations I have given are not only the true interpretations, but that the Scriptures so interpreted are the revealed word of God. I have demonstrated the truth of them by natural evidence, or by the works of God, and that the works bear evidence to nothing but the truth; that these revealed truths so demonstrated are unquestionable and undeniable; and that they are the only powerful motives by which men are not only moved but enlightened, and enabled to mortify all their lusts, which blind and deceive them here, and will be their everlasting tormentors hereafter, but to work the works of charity, and of that perfect righteousness which is of faith: so that the whole of all true religion, which has been one and the same in all ages, will appear to consist in the mortifications of our bodily and spiritual lusts, which withhold men from the works of righteousness; and in the belief of those demonstrative truths, by which alone we are enlightened, enabled, and moved to subdue them; and in observing those natural memorials which God has set before us, and in partaking of those reverential ordinances which he has instituted to put us in mind of what we ought to do, in order to eternal life and the motives for so doing. I ask pardon for this digression: and if you have any commands that I am capable of executing here, if you will let me have the honour of receiving them, I shall take great pleasure in obeying you; for I am, with the greatest respect and truth, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant, JOHN SCOTT.

TO THE EARL OF ARRAN.

1739.

MY LORD,—I am earnestly desired by some worthy friends of mine to write to your lordship in favour of the bearer, Mr. Moore, minister of Clonmel, who will have the honour to present this letter to your lordship. Those rectorial tithes of Clonmel were granted to the church by letters-patent from king Charles II., with the perfect knowledge and full approbation of your great ancestor, the first duke of Ormond, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Notwithstanding which, some of the former agents to your lordship's family have greatly distressed the incumbent ministers of Clonmel, which is generally believed to be without the knowledge of his present grace the duke your brother, whom God long preserve. But your lordship's present agent being extremely vigilant of all your lordship's interests, has lately renewed the claim of the Ormond family to those tithes, and was, at the last assizes, after a long hearing of six hours, nonsuited. The living of Clonmel is one of the largest, and yet the poorest, parishes in this kingdom; being, upon the whole, (including the valuation of the houses,) scarce worth 100*l*. a-year; out of which a curate-assistant being absolutely necessary on account of its extent, a salary of 40*l*. must be paid.

My lord, your lordship's family has been always distinguished for their favour and protection to the established church under her greatest persecutions; nor have you in the universal opinion ever degenerated from them. Those tithes in and about Clonmel are very inconsiderable, having never been let for above 24*l*. a-year, made up of very small pittances collected from a great number of the poorest people; so that the recovery of them by an expensive lawsuit, if it could be effected, would not be worth attempting.

Mr. Moore is recommended to me by several persons of great worth, (as I have already observed,) and I hope I have not hitherto forfeited the credit I had with you.

My humble request, therefore, to your lordship is, that the minister of Clonmel may, without disturbance, enjoy that small addition to his support which the king and your grandfather intended for him.

I have always understood and believed that the duke your brother's retiring has not lessened your fortune, but increased it; and as to his grace, unless all our intelligence be false, he is as easy as he desires to be. I heard of several persons who have ventured to wait on him abroad, and it is agreed that his grace is perfectly easy in his mind and fortune.

Upon the whole, I do earnestly desire your lordship to resign those poor scraps of tithes in and about Clonmel to Mr. Moore and his successors, in a legal form, for ever. Your loss will be at most but 21*l*. a-year, and that with a thousand difficulties infinitely below your generosity and quality. I am &c.

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MR. FAULKNER.

December 4, 1739.

SIR,—I cannot find a manuscript I wrote, called "Directions for Servants," which I thought was very useful as well as humorous. I believe you have both seen and read it. I wish you could give me some intelligence of it, because my memory is quite gone; therefore let me know all you can conjecture about it. I am, sir, your very humble servant, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE REV. MR. THROP.

December 10, 1739.

REVEREND SIR,—The many professions of kindness you have made, and friendships you have shown, to my mother and her family, particularly in declaring your abhorrence and detestation of the cruel and inhuman behaviour of that monster —— to my unfortunate and innocent brother, induced my mother to trouble you with a few of the narratives of that case, to disperse among such members of the house of commons as were of your acquaintance. The reason of our troubling you to do this is, because we intend presenting a petition to the members of the house of commons, this session, to oblige —— to waive his privilege, every other attempt we have tried since my brother's death proving fruitless.

Your appearing, sir, in this affair, will not only make parliament the more ready to do justice, but prevent others from supporting him in his villanies, which will be of infinite service to my mother and her family.

The bearer carries you a dozen of cases; and if you should have occasion for any more, they shall be sent you by, reverend sir, your most obliged and obedient humble servant, ROBERT THROP.

I have written the names of several persons mentioned in the narrative at length upon the back of the title-page.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

December 31, 1739.

MADAM—It is impossible to have health in such desperate weather: but you are worse used than others. Every creature of either sex are uneasy; for our kingdom is turned to be a Muscovy, or worse. Even I cannot do any good by walking: is not warmth good against rheumatic pains? I hope dean Swift will be able to assist you both. I wish for a happy turn in the weather. I am doubly desolate, and wish I could sleep until the sun would comfort us. Would neither your son nor daughter save you the pains of writing on your back? You are much more friendly to me than a thousand of them. Adieu. I am ever yours,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

DEAR MADAM,—I am truly and heartily glad that you are a little mended, and can lie on your belly or side, not altogether on your back. You are much in the right not to stir, and so was Croker[a] not to suffer you. I am not yet worse for the cold weather, but am angry at it. I am heartily sorry for yourself and daughter; but Mr. Swift dares not be sick, for his chief business is to look after you and your daughter. I walk only my bedchamber and closet, which has also a fire. I am ever yours, JONATHAN SWIFT.

New-Year's-day, 1740.

I wish you may have many, and all healthy ones.

CERTIFICATE TO A DISCARDED SERVANT.[b]

Deanery-house, January 9, 1740.

WHEREAS the bearer served me the space of one year, during which time he was an idler and a drunkard, I then discharged him as such; but how far his having [a] An eminent apothecary of great humanity and skill.

[b] The history of this singular certificate is thus related in the third volume of Mrs Pilkington's Memoirs. "Dean Swift discharged a servant only for rejecting the petition of a poor old woman; she was very ancient, and on a cold morning sat at the deanery steps a considerable time, during which the dean saw her through a window, and no doubt commiserated her desolate condition. His footman happened to come to the door; and the poor creature besought him in a piteous tone, to give that paper to his reverence. The servant read it, and told her with infinite scorn, 'his master had something else to mind than her petition.'—'What is that you say, fellow?' said the dean, looking out of the window. 'Come up here.' The man tremblingly obeyed him. He also desired the poor woman to come before him; made her sit down, and ordered her some bread and wine. After which he turned to the man and said, 'At what time, sir, did I order you to open a paper directed to me, or to refuse a letter from any one? Hark ye, sirrah, you have been admonished by me for drunkenness, idling, and other faults; but since I have discovered your inhuman disposition, I must dismiss you from my service; so pull off my clothes, take your wages, and let me hear no more of you!' The fellow did so; and, having vainly solicited a discharge, was compelled to go to sea, where he continued five years; at the end of which time, finding that life far different from the ease and luxury of his former occupation, he returned, and humbly confessing in a petition to the dean his former manifold crimes, assured him of his sincere reformation, which the dangers he had undergone at sea had happily wrought; and begged the dean would give him some sort of discharge, since the honour of having lived with him would certainly procure him a place. Accordingly the dean called for pen, ink, and paper; and gave him a dismission, with which, and no other fortune, he set out for London. Among others he applied to me who had known him at his late master's, and produced his certificate; which, for its singularity, I transcribed. I advised him to go to Mr. Pope, who on seeing the dean's hand-writing, which he well knew, told the man, 'If he could produce any credible person who could attest that he was the servant the dean meant, he would hire him.' On this occasion he applied to me; and I gave him a letter to Mr. Pope, assuring him that I knew the man to have been footman to the dean. Upon this, Mr. Pope took him into his service, in which he continued till the death of his master."

been five years at sea may have mended his manners, I leave to the penetration of those who may hereafter choose to employ him. JONATHAN SWIFT.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

January 18, 1740.

DEAR MADAM,—I have been many days heartily concerned for your ill health; it is now twenty-five days since we have found nothing but frost and misery, and they may continue for as many more. This day is yet the coldest of them all. Dr. Wilson and I are both very uneasy to find no better message from you. I received, as I was going to dinner, the enclosed letter from your beloved of ——, which I shall make you happy with. It will show you the goodness, the wisdom, the gratitude, the truth, the civility, of that excellent divine, adorned with an orthography (spelling) fit for himself. Pray read it a hundred times, but return it after you have read it a hundred times. My love and service to your son and daughter; let them both read the enclosed.

I would not lose your lover's letter for 100*l*. It must be sent back by the bearer. Let me know the exact number of lies that are in it; but I fear that that will take up your time too much. I am ever yours,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM LORD CASTLEDURROW.

Dublin, February 2, 1740.

SIR,—Since I am forbidden your presence, I think I should be more explicit in my reason of thanks to you for Dr. Delany's obliging present than I can be in a verbal, crude, ill-delivered message by a servant. As I am not acquainted with the doctor, I at first imagined his boundless generosity distributed his book among the lords, and that it was sent me as a member, though an unworthy one, of that august body. I soon found myself mistaken; and as all presents are enhanced in value proportionable to their manner of distribution, I thought it incumbent on me to thank him by letter for having so obligingly distinguished me. He has honoured me with an answer to it, which highly elates me; for weak minds are easily made vain; but whose would not be so on the compliment he makes me on having read some of my letters to you? They were written (as most of mine are) in the wantonness of fancy, without aiming at pomp of expression, or dress of words, lucky methods of gilding nonsense; yet that he should approve I will not wonder when I consider the benignity of your friendship. Oh! is it not sometimes too strong bias even for your judgment that prompted you to think them worth his perusal? What am I now to do? I ought not to be silent; yet must I risk depreciating a favourable opinion he has conceived of me, by making myself further known to him? Why, in prudence, no; in civility, yes. Under this dilemma give me your advice, as you are the origin of this favour. Or will you yield to what I suggest may not be improper? Take me under your protection (as soon as the weather will permit) in a warm hackney-coach, which I shall take care to provide. Let us jumble together to his little paradise, which I long much to see, as well as to pay my debt due to his benevolence.

I am already alarmed with your excuse of deafness and dizziness. Yielding to such a complaint always strengthens it; exerting against it generally lessens it. Do not immerge in the sole enjoyment of yourself. Is not a friend the medicine of life? I am sure it is the comfort of it. And I hope you still admit such companions as are capable of administering it. In that number I know I am unworthy of rank: however, my best wishes shall attend you.

I have enclosed some verses. The Latin I believe will please you; one of the translations may have the same fortune, the other cannot. The verses written in the lady's book is, "A Lamentable Hymn to Death," from a lover, inscribed to his mistress. I have made the author of it vain (who I am sure had never read Pope's "Heloise to Abelard") in telling him his six last lines seem a parody on six of Pope's. They are on the other side, that you may not be at a loss.

Then, too, when fate shall thy fair frame destroy,
That cause of all my guilt, and all my joy,
In trance ecstatic may the pangs be drown'd,
Bright clouds descend, and angels watch thee round:
From opening skies may streaming glories shine,
And saints embrace thee with a love like mine.

I think the whole letter the most passionate I ever read, except Heloise's own, on the subject of love. I am equally struck with Cadenus to Vanessa. I have often soothed my love with both when I have been in a fit.

I will conclude with the above wish, and assuring you I am, with great sincerity, as well as esteem, sir, your most faithful, affectionate, humble servant,

CASTLEDURROW.

My boy sends you his respects, and would fain pay them in person to you.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

February 3, 1740.

THE bad account I had of your health for many days, or rather weeks, has made me continually uneasy to the last degree; and Mr. Swift, who was with me so long yesterday, could not in conscience give me any comfort: but your kind letter has raised my spirits in some measure. I hope we have almost done with this cursed weather, yet still my garden is all in white. I read your letter to Dr. Wilson, who is somewhat better, and he resolves to apply your medicine, I mean your improvements of what you prescribe to add to his surgeon's method. I am ever, dear madam, entirely yours, JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM MRS WHITEWAY TO MR RICHARDSON.

March 20, 1740.

DEAR SIR,—Once I thought I could never receive a letter from or answer one to you, without pleasure; and yet both has happened to me very lately. This is the third day I sat down to write to you, and as often tore up my paper. I endeavoured to say something to alleviate your grief;—that would not do: then I resolved to be silent on the occasion; but, alas! that was impossible for a friend. I will therefore, for a moment, rather renew your grief by joining with you in it. Your trials have been most severe: the loss of two such valuable persons as Miss Richardson and sir Joseph Eyles are irreparable; for, in a middle state of life, we have not time enough before us to make us new friendships, were it possible to meet their equals. This is an unusual way of comforting a friend in trouble: ought I not rather to persuade you to forget them, and call in Christianity to your aid? But I believe those expounders of it are mistaken in their notions who would have us imagine this to be religion; for I am sure a just God will expect no more from us than to submit without repining. I am too much a fellow-sufferer in misfortunes of this nature not to feel for you. In a short time I lost a beloved husband and friend, an ingenious, a worthy son, and, what the world value as their chief happiness, some trifling conveniences. All these I have outlived, and am an instance that time will erase the blackest melancholy. I most sincerely wish, dear sir, this may be your case, and that it may be the last struggle of mind or tedious illness you will ever have to battle against.

You have conjured me by such a tie as the last request of dear Miss Richardson, that as well as I am able I will tell you what I guess the dean may like. I know his candlesticks are the most indifferent of any of his plate, and therefore mention a pair of those: his snuffers are good.

Surely I was not such a beast as to forget mentioning the receipt of the papers you were so careful and obliging to send me: they came very safe. I entreat you to accept of my most humble thanks for this and all your other most extraordinary favours.

The dean of St. Patrick's presents you his most affectionate love and service; and commanded me to tell you he would have writ to you upon this late occasion, if he had not been too deeply affected with your grief.

Surely the two long months you have so often fixed for your return will be at an end; and then I shall have the opportunity of telling you from my mouth what I now give under my hand, that I am, with the highest respect and esteem, dear sir, your most obliged and most obedient humble servant,

MARTHA WHITEWAY.

My most obedient respects to alderman Barber. Mr. Swift and his wife beg you will accept of theirs.

MR. NUGENT[a] TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Bath, April 2, 1740.

MADAM,—I had not until very lately an opportunity of letting Mr. Pope know his obligations to you; of which he is very sensible, and has desired me to beg that you will remit to me, by a safe hand, whatever letters of his are now in your possession. I shall be in town next week; so that you may be pleased to direct to me, by the first convenient opportunity, at my house in Dover-street, London. I am, madam, with great esteem, your most humble and obedient servant,

R. N.

My compliments to Mr. and Mrs. Swift. I shall say nothing of the picture,[b] because I am sure you remember it. I must beg that you will let Mr. Bindon[c] know I would have the picture no more than a head upon a three-quarter cloth, to match one which I now have of Mr. Pope.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

April 29, 1740.

DEAR MADAM,—I find that you and I are fellow-sufferers almost equally in our healths, although I am more than twenty years older. But I am and have been these two days in so miserable a way, and so cruelly tortured that can hardly be conceived. The whole last night I was equally struck as if I had been in Phalaris's brazen bull, and roared as loud for eight or nine hours. I am at this instant unable to move without excessive pain, although not the one thousandth part of what I suffered all last night and this morning. This you will new style the gout. I continue still very deaf. Dr. Wilson's left eye is still disordered, and very uneasy. You have now your family at home: I desire to present them with my kind and hearty service I am ever entirely yours, &c. JONATHAN SWIFT.

MRS. WHITEWAY TO MR. RICHARDSON.

May 13, 1740.

DEAR SIR,—By the time this kisses your hand, I believe Mrs. Richardson will not blush to be wished joy by a person you have done the honour to call a friend, and whose ambition it is to deserve some place in her esteem; and now that all insinuations in your favour are as needless as the formal ceremony between lovers, I shall take the liberty to tell her it will be her own fault if she is not one of the happiest women in the world. This is an unusual way of recommending myself to a bride; nor should I do it to any but yours: yet surely when a lady is married to a gentleman with an easy fortune, good nature, and a man of honour, how little is required of her side toward mutual felicity, which can be comprised in two words, love and obey?

About a fortnight ago I dined at the dean of St. Patrick's in a mixed company; where one of the gentlemen told him you were married, or just going to be so, to a lady of fifteen, with 100,000*l.* fortune, and a perfect beauty. I asked the person whether he had not that account from a woman? He said he had. The dean inquired if I knew anything of the affair. I answered yes; only with this difference, that she was at least fifty, and a most ungenteel, disagreeable woman. The whole company looked upon me with contempt; and their countenances expressed they thought I drew my own picture whilst I enviously endeavoured to paint the lady's. The dean only understood me; and, smiling, said he believed I was in the right. When we were alone, I let him know that you had commanded me to acquaint him with the affair; and I hoped, when I wrote to you next, he would add a postscript in my letter. He promised me to do it; and this day I intend to put him in mind of it.

I waited on Mr. Hamilton yesterday to consult with him if it would not be proper to allow the servants board-wages from this time; and it was diverting enough to see us both keeping our distance about a secret the whole town has known these two months. However, at last we understood each other; and have agreed to give the coachman 4*s.* a-week, and the maid 3*s.*, until they go a shipboard.

There would have been no occasion to be so formal with a friend as to desire Mr. Hamilton to give the servants money when you might have ordered me to do it, although I had not been in your debt; which, to my shame be it spoken, would be scandalous so long a time, if the fault were entirely mine. My son and daughter Swift present you and your lady their most obedient respects, and sincerest wishes. I am at a loss to express my obligations to her for the compliment she was pleased to remit to me; and, I believe, when we meet, she will not be jealous that I dare give it under my hand to her, that I honour and esteem you more than any woman does except herself. I am, dear sir, your most humble and most obedient servant,

MARTHA WHITEWAY.

TO MR. RICHARDSON.

May 13, 1740.

DEAR SIR,—I could never believe Mrs. Whiteway's gasconades in telling me of her acquaintance with you. But my age and perpetual disorders, and chiefly my vexatious deafness, with other infirmities, have completed the utter loss of my memory; so that I cannot recollect the names of those friends who come to see me twice or oftener every week. However, I remember to wish you a long lasting joy of being no longer a bachelor, especially because the teaser at my elbow assures me that the lady is altogether worthy to be your wife. I therefore command you both (if I live so long) to attend me at the deanery the day after you land; where Mrs. Precipitate, alias Whiteway, says I will give you a scandalous dinner. I suppose you will see your governor, my old friend John Barber, whom I heartily love; and so you are to tell him. I am, dear sir, your most obedient and obliged servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

[a] Afterwards Lord Clare

FROM MRS. WHITEWAY TO MR. POPE.

May 16, 1740.

Sir,—Should I make an apology for writing to you, I might be asked why I did so? If I have erred, my design at least is good, both to you and the dean of St. Patrick's; for I write in relation to my friend, and I write to his friend, which I hope will plead my excuse. As I saw a letter of yours to him, wherein I had the honour to be named, I take the liberty to tell you (with grief of heart) his memory is so much impaired that in a few hours he forgot it; nor is his judgment sound enough, had he many tracts by him to finish or correct them, as you have desired. His health is as good as can be expected, free from all the tortures of old age; and his deafness, lately returned, is all the bodily uneasiness he has to complain of. A few years ago he burnt most of his writings unprinted,[a] except a few loose papers, which are in my possession and which I promise you (if I outlive him) shall never be made public without your approbation. There one treatise in his own keeping, called "Advice to Servants," very unfinished and incorrect, yet what is done of it has so much humour that it may appear as a posthumous work. The "History of the Four last Years of Queen Anne's Reign," I suppose you have seen with Dr. King, to whom he sent it some time ago, and, if I am rightly informed, is the only piece of his (excepting "Gulliver") which he ever proposed making money by, and was given to Dr. King with that design, if it might be printed. I mention this to you lest the Doctor should die, and his heirs imagine they had a right to dispose of it. I entreat, sir, you will not take notice to any person of the hints I have given you in this letter; they are only designed for yourself: to the dean's friends in England they can only give trouble, and to his enemies and starving wits, cause of triumph. I enclose this to alderman Barber, who, I am sure, will deliver it safe, yet knows nothing more than its being a paper that belongs to you.

The ceremony of answering women's letters may perhaps make you think it necessary to answer mine; but I do not expect it, because your time either is or ought to be better employed, unless it be in my power to serve you in buying Irish linen, or any other command you are pleased to lay on me, which I shall execute to the best of my capacity, with the greatest readiness, integrity, and secrecy; for, whether it be my years, or a less degree of vanity in my composition than in some of my sex, I can receive such an honour from you without mentioning it. I should some time past have writ to you on this subject, had I not fancied that it glanced at the ambition of being thought a person of consequence, by interfering between you and the dean; a character of all others which I dislike.

I have several of your letters to the dean, which I will send by the first safe hand that I can get to deliver them to yourself: I believe it may be Mr. M'Aulay, the gentleman the dean recommended, through your friendship, to the prince of Wales.

I believe this may be the only letter which you ever received without asking a favour, a compliment extolling your genius, running in raptures on your poetry, or admiring your distinguishable virtue. I am, sir, with very high respect, your most obedient and most humble servant, Martha Whiteway.

Mr. Swift, who waited on you last summer, is, since that, married to my daughter: he desires me to present you his most obedient respects and humble thanks for the particular honour conferred upon him in permitting him to spend a day with you at Twickenham; a favour he will always remember with gratitude.

FROM MR. PULTENEY.

London, June 3, 1740.

Sir,—I had some time ago a letter from Mr. Stopford, who told me that you enjoyed a better state of health last year than you had done for some time past. No one wishes you more sincerely than I do the continuance of it; and, since the gout has been your physic, I heartily hope you may have one good fit regularly every year, and all the rest of it perfect health and spirits.

I am persuaded you will do me the justice to believe that, if I have not writ to you for some time, it has proceeded from an unwillingness alone of engaging you in a very useless correspondence, and not from any want of a real regard and true esteem. Mr. Pope can be my witness how constantly I inquire after you, and how pleased and happy I am when he tells me that you have the goodness frequently to mention me in your letters to him.

I fear you have but little desire to come among us again. England has few things inviting in it at present. Three camps, near forty thousand troops, and sixteen kings,[a] and most of them such as are really fit to be kings in any part of the world. Four millions of money have been raised on the people this year, and in all probability nothing will be done. I have not the least notion that even our expedition under lord Cathcart[b] is intended to be sent anywhere; and yet every minister we have (except sir Robert) very gravely affirms it will go,—nay, and I am afraid believes it too. But our situation is very extraordinary; sir Robert will have an army, will not have a war, and cannot have a peace; that is, the people are so averse to it that he dares not make one. But in one year more, when, by the influence of this army and our money, he has got a new parliament to his liking, then he will make peace, and get it approved, too, be it as it will. After which I am afraid we shall all grow tired of struggling any longer, and give up the game.

But I will trouble you with no more politics; and if I can hear from you in two lines that you are well, I promise you not to reply to it too soon. You must give me leave to add to my letter a copy of verses at the end of a declamation made by a boy at Westminster School on this theme:—

Ridentem dicere verum,
Quid vetat?

Dulce decane, decus, flos optime gentis Hibernæ
Nomine quique audis, ingenioque celer;
Dum lepido indulges risu, et mutaris in horas,
Quô nova vis animi, materiesque rapit:
Nunc gravis astrologus, cœlo dominaris et astris,
Filaque pro libitu Patrigiana secas
Nunc populo speciosa hospes miracula promis,
Gentesque æquoreas, aeriasque creas.
Seu plausum captat queruli persona draperi,
Seu levis a vacuo fabula sumpta cado.
Mores egregius mira exprimis arte magister,
Et vitam atque hominis pagina quæque sapit.
Socraticæ minor est vis et sapientia chartæ,
Nec tantum potuit grande Platonis opus.

Mrs. Pulteney, knowing that I am writing to you, charges me to present her services, when I assure you that I am, most faithfully and sincerely, your obedient humble servant, W. Pulteney.

MR. POPE TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

Twickenham, June 18, 1740.

I am extremely sensible of the favour of your letter, and very well see the kindness, as well as honour,

[a] In resentment to the house of commons of Ireland, which sent Faulkner to Newgate for printing the Satire on Quadrille.

[a] Sixteen lords of the regency, the king being abroad.

which moved you to it. I have no merit for the one, but being (like yourself) a sincere friend to the dean, though a much less useful one; for all my friendship can only operate in wishes, yours in good works. He has had the happiness to meet with such in all the stages of his life, and I hope in God, and in you, that he will not want one in the last. Never imagine, madam, that I can do otherwise than esteem that sex which has furnished me with the best friends.

The favour you offer me I accept with the utmost thankfulness; and I think no person more fit to convey it to my hands than Mr. M'Aulay, of whom I know you have so good an opinion. Indeed, any one whom you think worthy your trust, I shall think deserves mine in a point I am ever so tender of.

I wish the very small opportunity I had of showing Mr. Swift, your son, my regards for him, had been greater; and I wish it now more, since he is become so near to you, for whom my respect runs hand in hand with my affection for the dean; and I cannot wish well for the one without doing so for the other.

I turn my mind, all I can from the melancholy subject of your letter. May God Almighty alleviate your concern, and his complaints, as much as possible in this state of infirmities, while he lives; and may your tenderness, madam, prevent anything after his death which may anywise depreciate his memory. I dare say nothing of ill consequence can happen from the commission given to Dr. King.

You see, madam, I write you with absolute freedom, as becomes me to the friend of my friend, and to a woman of sense and spirit. I will say no more, that you may find I treat you with the same delicacy that you do me, (and for which I thank you,) without the least compliment; and it is none when I add, that I am, with esteem, madam, your most obliged and most obedient servant, ALEXANDER POPE.

FROM MR. POPE TO MR. ALLEN.

My vexation about dean Swift's proceeding has fretted and employed me a great deal in writing to Ireland, and trying all the means possible to retard it; for it is put past preventing, by his having (without my consent or so much as letting me see the book) printed most of it. They at last promise me to send me the copy, and that I may correct and expunge what I will. This last would be of some use; but I dare not even do this, for they would say I revised it. And the bookseller writes that he has been at great charge, &c. However, the dean, upon all I have said and written about it, has ordered him to submit to any expunction I insist upon: this is all I can obtain, and I know not whether to make any use of it or not. But as to your apprehension, that any suspicion may arise of my being anywise consenting or concerned in it, I have the pleasure to tell you, the whole thing is so circumstanced and so plain, that it can never be the case. I shall be very desirous to see what the letters are at all events; and I think that must determine my future measures; for till then I can judge nothing. The excessive earnestness the dean has been in for publishing them, makes me hope they are castigated in some degree, or he must be totally deprived of his understanding. They now offer to send me the orginals (which have been so long detained); and I will accept of them (though they have done their job), that they may not have them to produce against me, in case there be any offensive passages in them. If you can give me any advice, do. I wish I could show you what the dean's people, the women, and the bookseller, have done and writ, on my sending an absolute negative, and on the agency I have employed of some gentlemen to stop it, as well as threats of law, &c. The whole thing is too manifest to admit of any doubt in any man: how long this thing has been working; how many tricks have been played with the dean's papers; how they were secreted from him from time to time, while they feared his not complying with such a measure; and how, finding his weakness increase, they have at last made him the instrument himself for their private profit; whereas, I believe before, they only intended to do this after his death.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

I HAVE been very miserable all night, and to-day extremely deaf and full of pain. I am so stupid and confounded that I cannot express the mortification I am under both in body and mind. All I can say is, that I am not in torture; but I daily and hourly expect it. Pray let me know how your health is and your family: I hardly understand one word I write. I am sure my days will be very few; few and miserable they must be. I am, for those few days, yours entirely,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

If I do not blunder it is Saturday,
July 26, 1740.

If I live till Monday I shall hope to see you, perhaps for the last time.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY.

Caledon, December 17, 1740.

DEAR SIR,—Great men like you must expect numberless petitions, which, like Jupiter, you put to various uses; but wonder not, when there is a place vacant in your family, that everybody is striving for the post. I mean your cathedral family; for we are told there is a vacancy in the choir. I am desired to recommend to you one James Colgan,[a] aged 25. His voice excellent, his behaviour good, his person indifferent, his recommendation to me irresistible. I beseech you let Faulkner give me an answer; for neither he nor I, nor the choir of lords, doctors, commons, &c., are worth your while to give yourself one moment's uneasiness about, if you are not well, and I am more than afraid you are not; only I must be enabled to say I have mentioned him to you. My frozen fingers will only serve me to present lady Orrery's most humble service to you, and the best wishes, prayers, and acknowledgments of all this family. I am, dear sir, your ever obliged and obedient humble servant, ORRERY.

TO MRS. WHITEWAY.

January 13, 1741.

DEAR MADAM,—Your son,[b] who was with me yesterday, and stayed the whole afternoon till near ten o'clock, gave me a very melancholy account of your ill health, extremely to my grief. I send a servant with this letter, and you will please to employ Mr. Swift to answer it, because I am in very great pain about you; for the weather is so extremely sharp that it must needs add to your disorders. Pray let your son or daughter write a few lines to give me some sort of comfort. My cold is now attended with a cough this bitter cold weather; but I am impatient until your son or daughter gives me some hopes. I am ever your assured friend, and most humble servant,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY.

Duke-street, Westminster, July 7, 1741.

THANKS to you, dear sir, for your frequent remembrance of me by my great friend and patron, Master George Faulkner: thanks to you for the honours you have showed my wife: but above all, thanks to you for using exercise and taking care of your health. It is the strongest instance of affection your friends either desire or deserve. In mentioning your friends I must particularize Mr. Pope: he obeys your commands, and flings away much time upon me: Nec deficit alter aureus; Dr. King does the same. Thus deities condescend to visit and converse with mortals.

[a] One of the vicars-choral of Christ-church and St. Patrick's cathedrals, remarkable for his fine manner of singing.
[b] Mr. Deane Swift.

Poor lord Oxford is gone to those regions from whence travellers never return unless in an airy visit to faithless lovers, as Margaret to William; or to cities devoted to destruction, as Hector amidst the flames of Troy. The deceased earl has left behind him many books, many manuscripts, and no money his lady brought him 500,000*l.*, 400,000*l.* of which have been sacrificed to indolence, good-nature, and want of worldly wisdom: and there will still remain, after proper sales, and right management, 5000*l.* a-year for his widow.

Mr. Cæsar died about two months ago. Mrs. Cæsar is still all tears and lamentations, although she certainly may be numbered inter felices, sua si bona norint.

Lord Bathurst is at Cirencester, erecting pillars and statues to queen Anne. Lord Bolingbroke lives in France: posterity, it is to be hoped, may be the better for his retirement. The duke of Argyll reigns, or ought to reign, in Scotland. Such is the state of Europe; but our disappointment in America has cast a gloomy face over London and Westminster. The citizens have recourse to mum and tobacco, by which means they puff away care, and keep dismay at a proper distance. In the mean time my friends, the ducks and geese in the Park, cackle on, and join in chorus to the sounds of victory that are daily drummed forth on the parade, but reach no further than the atmosphere of Whitehall.—— What news next? The weather—but you certainly know it is hot; for in truth, notwithstanding this letter comes from my heart, and is written in the pleasure of thinking of you, yet I sweat to assure you how much I am, dear sir, your ever obliged and obedient humble servant, ORRERY.

FROM THE EARL OF ORRERY TO DEANE SWIFT, ESQ.

Marston, December 4, 1742.

Sir,—I am much obliged to you for the full, though melancholy, account you have sent me of my ever honoured friend. It is the more melancholy to me as I have heard him often lament the particular misfortune incident to human nature, of an utter deprivation of senses many years before a deprivation of life. I have heard him describe persons in that condition, with a liveliness and a horror, that on this late occasion have recalled to me his very words. Our Litany, methinks, should have an addition of a particular prayer against this most dreadful misfortune. I am sure mine shall. The bite of a mad dog (a most tremendous evil) ends soon in death; but the effects of his loss of memory may last even to the longest age of man; therefore I own my frendship for him has now changed my thoughts and wishes into the very reverse of what they were; I rejoice to hear he grows lean. I am sorry to hear his appetite is good. I was glad when there seemed an approaching mortification in his eyelid. In one word, the man I wished to live the longest I wish the soonest dead. It is the only blessing that can now befall him. His reason will never return; or, if it should, it will only be to show him the misery of having lost it. I am impatient for his going where imperfection ceases, and where perfection begins; where Wilsons cannot break in and steal, and where envy, hatred, and malice have no influence or power. While he continues to breathe, he is an example stronger and more piercing than he or any other divine could preach, against pride, conceit, and vain glory. Good God! doctor Swift beaten and marked with stripes by a beast in human shape, one Wilson.[a] But he is not only an example against presumption and haughtiness, but in reality an incitement to marriage. Men in years ought always to secure a friend, to take care of declining life, and watch narrowly as they fall, the last minute particles of the hour-glass. A bachelor will seldom find, among all his kindred, so true a nurse, so faithful a friend, so disinterested a companion, as one tied to him by the double chain of duty and affection. A wife could not be banished from his chamber, or his unhappy hours of retirement; nor had the dean felt a blow, or wanted a companion, had he been married, or, in other words, had Stella lived. All that a friend could do has been done by Mrs. Whiteway; all that a companion could persuade, has been attempted by Mrs. Ridgeway. The rest—but I shall run on for ever, and I set out at first only with an intention of thanking you for your letter, and assuring you that I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant, ORRERY.

P.S. I beg to hear from you from time to time, if any new occurrence happens in the dean's unhappy state.

MR. FAULKNER TO MR. BOWYER.

Dublin, October 1, 1745.

DEAR SIR,—The bank note for one hundred guineas came safe to hand. Enclosed you have part of the "Address to Servants." I wish I could get franks to send it in. Fix your day of publication, and I will wait until you are ready, that we may both come out the same day. I think the middle of November will do very well, as your city, as well as Dublin, will be full at that time. I shall finish the volume with a cantata of the dean's, set to music, which, in my opinion, will have a greater run with the lovers of harmony than any of the Corelli's, Vivaldi's, Purcell's, or Handel's pieces. When Arne, the famous composer, was last in Ireland, he made application to me for this cantata (which I could not then procure), to set it to music: perhaps he may do it now, and bring it on the stage; which, if he does, will run more than the "Beggars' Opera;" and therefore I would have you get it engraved in folio, with scores for bass, &c. which will make it sell very well. I believe you might get something handsome for it from Rich, or the managers of Drury-lane, for which I shall send you the original MS. I am thus particular that you may have the profit to yourself, as you will have the trouble. I was in daily expectation, for six weeks, of going to London, but was prevented by many accidents—I cannot

[a] Dr. Francis Wilson was prebendary of Kilmactolway, and rector of Clondalkin, in the diocese of Dublin, the great tithes of which belong to the deanery of St. Patrick's. Dr. Wilson, who lived in the centre of this prebend and parish, and was well acquainted with the country, farmed these tithes of Dr. Swift on very reasonable terms, greatly to his own advantage. When the dean was much in the decline of life, he invited Dr. Wilson to accept of apartments for himself and his wife in the deanery-house at Dublin; where they had very good lodgings, with the benefit of his servants and stables. Dr. Swift's memory failing him greatly at this time, Wilson took the advantage of carrying him to his house at Newland, within four miles of Dublin, and endeavoured to intoxicate him with liquor, which he could not accomplish: and on their return to Dublin solicited Dr. Swift to make him sub-dean of St. Patrick's, and turn out Dr. Wynne, a very worthy and hospitable gentleman, which Dr. Swift refused; on which Dr. Wilson, in a most outrageous manner, insulted the dean, beat him severely, took him by the throat, and would have choked him had it not been for the dean's footman and coachman, who rescued him out of the hands of Wilson. This affair made a great noise; Wilson was forbidden the dean's house, and died soon after. To this same "beast in human shape," as lord Orrery justly calls him, Dr. Swift had bequeathed "the works of Plato in three folio volumes, the earl of Clarendon's History in three folio volumes, and my best Bible, together with thirteen small Persian pictures in the drawing-room, and the small silver tankard given to me by the contribution of some friends, whose names are engraved at the bottom of the said tankard."

say business, for I never had less, as Mr. Hitch well knows, having had no order from me for two months past. The "Advice to Servants" was never finished by the dean, and is consequently very incorrect; I believe you may see some Irishisms in it; if so, pray correct them. The dean's friends do not know the manner of an assignment, and desire you will send over the form. The story of the "Injured Lady" does not make above a sheet, and will vex your northern hardy neighbours more than the "Public Spirit of the Whigs," of which they complained to queen Anne. As you are famous for writing prefaces, pray help me to one for "Advice to Servants," for which I have not yet printed the title. My best compliments to our friends, and should be obliged to Mr. Dodsley for the two letters, which you may send, under cover, to Samuel Bindon, esq., at my house. I am whimsical, and send you the beginning of "Advice," &c., and the remainder to Mr. Hitch, that you may print it immediately. I think it might be printed without the "Injured Lady," as your volume will make the better figure with original pieces; but this I submit to your better judgment.

I long much to see London, although I have no other business than to visit my friends, and do them any service in my power; and if I can be useful to you in England or Ireland, pray let me know, and I will do it. I would not have you advertise until two or three days before you publish, in which I wish you all imaginable success; and am, dear sir, your faithful friend, and obliged humble servant,

GEORGE FAULKNER.

AN ACCOUNT OF A MONUMENT ERECTED TO THE MEMORY OF DR. SWIFT, IN IRELAND.

TO MR. GEORGE FAULKNER.[a]

Neale, February 14, 1750.

SIR,—I have at last finished what you have often heard me wish I might be able to do, a monument for the greatest genius of our age, the late dean of St. Patrick's. The thing in itself is but a trifle; but it is more than I should ever have attempted had I not, with indignation, seen a country (so honoured by the birth of so great a man, and so faithfully served by him all his life) so long and so shamefully negligent in erecting some monument of gratitude to his memory. Countries are not wise in such neglect, for they hurt themselves. Men of genius are encouraged to apply their talents to the service of their country when they see in it gratitude to the memory of those who have deserved well of them. The ingenious Père Castle told me at Paris, that he reckoned it the greatest misfortune to him that he was not born an Englishman; and when he explained himself, it was only for this, that, after two hundred years, they had erected a monument to Shakspeare; and another to a modern, but to the greatest of them, sir Isaac Newton. Great souls are very disinterested in the affairs of life; they look for fame and immortality, scorning the mean paths of interest and lucre: and surely in an age so mercenary as ours, men should not be so sparing to give public marks of their gratitude to men of such virtue, dead, however they may treat them living; since in so doing they bespeak, and almost insure to themselves a succession of such persons in society. It was with this view that I have determined to throw in my mite.

In a fine lawn below my house I have planted a hippodrome. It is a circular plantation, consisting of five walks; the central of which is a horse-course, and three rounds make exactly a mile. All the lines are so laid out that, from the centre, the six rows of trees appear but one, and form 100 arches round the field; in the centre of which I have erected a mount, and placed a marble column on its proper pedestal, with all the decorations of the order; on the summit of which I have placed a Pegasus, just seeming to take flight to the Heavens; and on the die of the pedestal I have engraved the following inscription, written by an ingenious friend:—

AONIDVM FONTES APERIS, DIVINE POETA,
ARTE NOVA: ÆTHEREAS PROPRIIS, UT PEGASVS, ALIS

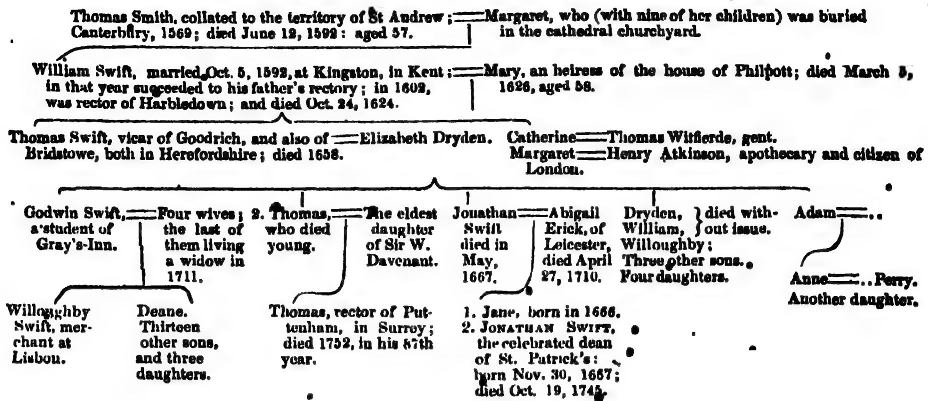
MDCCL.

I have also appointed a small fund for annual premiums to be distributed in the celebration of games at the monument yearly. The ceremony is to last three days, beginning the 1st of May yearly. On this day young maids and men in the neighbourhood are to assemble in the hippodrome, with their garlands and chaplets of flowers, and to dance round the monument, singing the praises of this ingenious patriot, and strewing with flowers all the place: after which they are to dance for a prize; the best dancer among the maids is to be presented with a cap and ribbons; and, after the dance, the young men are to run for a hat and gloves.

The second day, there is to be a large market upon the ground: and the girl who produces the finest hank of yarn, and the most regular reel and count, is to have a guinea premium; and the person who buys the greatest quantity of yarn is to have a premium of two guineas.



The third day, the farmer who produces the best yearling calf of his own breed is to have two guineas premium; and he that produces the fairest colt or filly, of his own breed likewise, not over two years old, shall receive a premium of two guineas also. Thus the whole will not exceed 10*l.*; and all these useful branches of our growth and manufacture will be encouraged, in remembering the patron who with so much care and tenderness recommended them to others, and cherished them himself. I am, dear sir, your humble servant,

J. B.

DR. SWIFT'S WILL, AND HIS DIRECTIONS TO MRS. MARTHA WHITEWAY.

As soon as you are assured of my death, whether it shall happen to be in town or the country, I desire you will go immediately to the deanery; and if I die in the country, I desire you will send down a strong coffin, to have my body brought to town, and deposited in any dry part of St. Patrick's cathedral. Then you are to take my keys, and find my will, and send for as many of my executors as are in town, and in presence of three of them have my will read; and what you see therein that relates to yourself, and is to take place after my death, you are to do in their presence, first delivering my keys to my executors, and then demanding those keys to search where my ready money lies, and take it for your own use, as my will empowers you. But upon their notes you are to lend the money to them, for the charges of my funeral, as directed in my will. Then you are to see that one or more of my said executors shall order my plate and household goods, and other things of value, and what are locked up in my scrutoires, cabinets, &c., to be entered in a list, and secured in their several places, for my executors to dispose of them as my will provides.

You are likewise to deliver the keys of all the rooms and cellars to my said executors, and often to entreat them to come to the deanery, and pursue the directions in my will.

You are also to deliver to my executors all the bonds, mortgages, and papers relating to money, &c., when they shall have agreed where to deposit them with security, taking their receipts. JONATHAN SWIFT.

Deanery-house, March 25, 1737.

As soon as Mrs. Martha Whiteway hears of my decease, she is to come immediately to the deanery, and first take all the keys of my cabinets, and seal them up in a place, in the presence of Mrs. Anne Ridgeway, Roger Kenrick, my verger, and Henry Laird, if any of them be then alive, and in the neighbourhood. Then Mrs. Martha Whiteway is to send for as many of my executors as are in town; and, opening my scrutoires, deliver them my will, and let one of the said executors read my will and codicils: there should be three of my executors present at least; they are all in number nine. Then, Mrs. Martha Whiteway is to take all the ready money she can find, if there be 200*l.*, but no more, which likewise she may lend to the said executors upon their notes. In case I should happen to have not cash enough, or bankers' bills, to pay the charges of transporting my body to Holyhead, and for my burial in the church of that town, as directed in my will, then she is to assist my executors in sending my plate to some banker, together with my valuable curiosities, which she knows where to find, many of which are bequeathed to John Whiteway, younger son to Mrs. Martha Whiteway, and sent to the said Martha to be kept for the use of her said son, except some books bequeathed in my said will or codicils.

I have written the names of my executors in the page on the right hand of this paper.

Mrs. Martha Whiteway is to secure the broad paper-book, in quarto, wherein the debts due to me, and debts I owe, entered to this present month of April, 1737—seven, together with the whole state of my fortune, as debts, mortgages, &c., and plate, and valuable curiosities, household goods, arrears of tithes, and interest, &c., which my executors are to have a copy of; and Mrs. Martha Whiteway knows where to find all my mortgages, bonds, &c., which she is to give to my said executors, taking their receipt, in order to receive the several interests or principals to purchase lands, as declared in my last will, which when my said executors have entered in form in the proper courts, they are humbly desired to fulfil as soon as they conveniently can.

Signed and sealed, April 22nd, 1737—seven,

JONATHAN SWIFT.

For Mrs. Martha Whiteway to read, and keep when finished.—Codicils.

April 19, 1737.

In the name of God, Amen. I, Jonathan Swift, doctor in divinity, and dean of the cathedral church of St. Patrick, Dublin, being at this present of sound mind, although weak in body, do here make my last will and testament, hereby revoking all my former wills.

Imprimis, I bequeath my soul to God, (in humble hopes of his mercy through Jesus Christ,) and my body to the earth. And I desire that my body may be buried in the great aisle of the said cathedral, on the south side, under the pillar next to the monument of primate Narcissus Marsh, three days after my decease, as privately as possible, and at twelve o'clock at night, and that a black marble of feet square, and seven feet from the ground, fixed to the wall, may be erected, with the following inscription in large letters, deeply cut, and strongly gilded.

Item, I give and bequeath to my executors all my worldly substance, of what nature or kind soever, (except such part thereof as is hereinafter particularly devised,) for the following uses and purposes, that is to say, to the intent that they, or the survivors or survivor of them, his executors, or administrators, as soon as conveniently may be after my death, shall turn it all into ready money, and lay out the same in purchasing lands of inheritance in fee simple, situate in any province in Ireland, except Connaught, but as near to the city of Dublin as conveniently can be found, and not incumbered with, or subject to, any leases for lives renewable, or any terms, for years longer than thirty-one; and I desire that a yearly annuity of 20*l.* sterling, out of the annual profits of such lands, when purchased, and out of the yearly income of my said fortune, devised to my executors, as aforesaid, until such purchase shall be made, shall be paid to Rebecca Dingley, of the city of Dublin, spinster, during her life, by two equal half-yearly payments, on the feast of All Saints, and St. Philip and St. Jacob, the first payment to be made on such of the said feasts as shall happen next after my death. And that the residue of the yearly profits of the said lands, when purchased, and, until such purchase be made, the residue of the yearly income and interest of my said fortune devised as aforesaid to my executors, shall be laid out in purchasing a piece of land, situate near Dr. Stevens's hospital; or, if it cannot be there had, somewhere in or near the city of Dublin, large enough for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, and in building thereon an hospital large enough for the reception of as many idiots and lunatics as the annual income of the said lands and worldly substance shall be sufficient to maintain; and I desire that the said hospital may be called St. Patrick's Hospital, and may be built in such a manner that another building may be added unto it, in case the endowment thereof shall be enlarged; so that the additional building may make the whole edifice regular and complete. And my further will and desire is, that when the said hospital shall be built, the whole yearly income of the said lands and estate shall, for ever after, be laid out in providing victuals, clothing, medicines, attendance, and all other necessaries for such idiots and lunatics as shall be received into the same; and in repairing and enlarging the building from time to time, as there may be occasion. And, if a sufficient number of idiots and lunatics cannot readily be found, I desire that incurables may be taken into the said hospital to supply such deficiency; but that no person shall be admitted into it that labours under any infectious disease; and that all such idiots, lunatics, and incurables as shall be received into the said hospital shall constantly live and reside therein, as well in the night as in the day; and that the salaries of agents, receivers, officers, servants, and attendants, to be employed in the business of the said hospital, shall not in the whole exceed one-fifth part of the clear yearly income or revenue thereof. And I further desire that my executors, the survivors or survivor of them, or the heirs of such, shall not have power to demise any part of the said lands so to be purchased as aforesaid, but with consent of the lord primate, the lord high-chancellor, the lord archbishop of Dublin, the dean of Christ-church, the dean of St. Patrick's, the physician to the state, and the surgeon-general, all for the time being, or the greater part of them, under their hands in writing; and that no leases of any part of the said lands shall ever be made other than leases for years not exceeding thirty-one, in possession, and not in reversion or remainder, and not dispunishable of waste, whereon shall be reserved the best and most improved rents that can reasonably and moderately, withou racking the tenants, be gotten for the same without fine. Provided always, and it is my will and earnest desire that no lease of any part of the said lands, so to be purchased as aforesaid, shall ever be made to, or in trust for, any person any way concerned in the execution of this trust, or to, or in trust for, any person any way related or allied, either by consanguinity or affinity, to any of the persons who shall at that time be concerned in the execution of this trust: and that, if any leases shall happen to be made contrary to my intention above expressed, the same shall be utterly void and of no effect. And I farther desire, until the charter hereinafter mentioned shall be obtained, my executors, or the survivors or survivor of them, his heirs, executors, or administrators, shall not act in the execution of this trust, but with the consent and approbation of the said seven additional trustees, or the greater part of them, under their hands in writing, and shall, with such consent and approbation as aforesaid have power, from time to time, to make rules orders, and regulations, for the government and direction of the said hospital. And I make it my request to my said executors, that they may, in convenient time, apply to his majesty for a charter to incorporate them, or such of them as shall be then living, and the said additional trustees for the better management and conduct of this charity, with a power to purchase lands; and to supply, by election, such vacancies happening in the corporation, as shall not be supplied by succession, and such other powers as may be thought expedient for the due execution of this trust, according to my intention hereinbefore expressed. And, when such charter shall be obtained, I desire that my executors, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the heirs of such survivor, may convey to the use of such corporation in fee simple, for the purposes aforesaid, all such lands and tenements as shall be purchased, in manner above mentioned. Provided always, and it is my will and intention, that my executors, until the said charter, and afterwards the corporation to be hereby incorporated, shall, out of the yearly profits of the said lands when purchased, and out of the yearly income of my said fortune devised to my executors as aforesaid, until such purchase be made, have power to reimburse themselves for all such sums of their own money as they shall necessarily expend in the execution of this trust. And that, until the said charter be obtained, all acts which shall at any time be done in the execution of this trust by the greater part of my executors then living, with the consent of the greater part of the said additional trustees, under their hands in writing, shall be as valid and effectual as if all my executors had concurred in the same.

Item, Whereas I purchased the inheritance of the tithes of the parish of Effernock, near Trim, in the county of Meath, for 260*l.* sterling: I bequeath the said tithes to the vicars of Laracor, for the time being, that is to say, so long as the present Episcopal religion shall continue to be the national established faith and profession in this kingdom: but, whenever any other form of Christian religion shall become the established faith in this kingdom, I leave the said tithes of Effernock to be bestowed, as the profits come in, to the poor of the said parish of Laracor, by a weekly proportion, and by such other officers as may then have the power of distributing charities to the poor of the said parish, while Christianity under any shape shall be tolerated among us, still excepting professed Jews, atheists, and infidels.

Item, Whereas I have some leases of certain houses in Kevin's-street, near the deanery-house, built upon the dean's ground, and one other house now inhabited by Henry Land, in deanery-lane, alias Mitre-alley, some of which leases are let for forty-one years, or forty at least, and not yet half expired, I bequeath to Mrs. Martha Whiteway, my lease or leases of the said houses; I also bequeath to the said Martha my lease of forty years of Goodman's Holding, for which I receive 10*l.* per annum; which are two houses or more lately built: I bequeath also to the said Martha the sum of 300*l.* sterling, to be paid her by my executors out of my ready money, or bank-bills, immediately after my death, as soon as the executors meet. I leave, moreover, to the said Martha, my repeating gold watch, my yellow tortoiseshell snuff-box, and her choice of four gold rings out of seven which I now possess.

Item, I bequeath to Mrs. Mary Swift, alias Harrison, daughter of the said Martha, my plain gold watch made by Quare, to whom also I give my japan writing-desk, bestowed to me by my lady Worsley, my square tortoiseshell snuff-box, richly lined and inlaid with gold, given to me by the right honourable Henrietta, now countess of Oxford, and the seal with a Pegasus, given to me by the countess of Granville.

Item, I bequeath to Mr. Ffolliot Whiteway, eldest son of the aforesaid Martha, who is bred to be an attorney, the sum of 60*l.* as also 5*l.* to be laid out in the purchase of such law-books as the honourable Mr. justice Lyndsay, Mr. Stannard, or Mr. M'Aulay shall judge proper for him.

Item, I bequeath to Mr. John Whiteway, youngest son of the said Martha, who is to be brought up a surgeon, the sum of 100*l.* in order to qualify him for a surgeon, but under the direction of his mother: which said sum of 100*l.* is to be paid to Mrs. Whiteway, in behalf of her said son John, out of the arrears which shall be due to me from my church livings, (except those of the deanery tithes, which are now let to the Rev. Dr. Wilson,) as soon as the said arrears can be paid to my executors. I also leave the said John 5*l.* to be laid out in buying such physical or chirurgical books as Doctor Grattan and Mr. Nichols shall think fit for him.

Item, I bequeath to Mrs. Anne Ridgeway, now in my family, the profits of the leases of two houses let to John Cownly for forty years, of which only eight or nine are expired, for which the said Cownly payeth me 9*l.* sterling for rent, yearly. I also bequeath to the said Anne the sum of 100*l.* sterling, to be paid her by my executors in six weeks after my decease, out of whatever money or bank-bills I may possess when I die; as also three gold rings, the remainder of the seven above mentioned, after Mrs. Whiteway hath made her choice of four: and all my small pieces of plate, not exceeding in weight one ounce and one-third part of an ounce.

Item, I bequeath to my dearest friend Alexander Pope, of Twickenham, esq., my picture in miniature, drawn by Zinck, of Robert late earl of Oxford.

Item, I leave to Edward, now earl of Oxford, my seal of Julius Cæsar, as also another seal, supposed to be a young Hercules, both very choice antiques, and set in gold; both which I choose to bestow to the said earl, because they belonged to her late most excellent majesty queen Anne, of ever glorious, immortal, and truly pious memory, the real nursing-mother of her kingdoms.

Item, I leave to the reverend Mr. James Stopford, vicar of Finglass, my picture of king Charles I., drawn by Vandyck, which was given to me by the said James; also, my large picture of birds, which was given to me by Thomas, earl of Pembroke.

Item, I bequeath to the reverend Mr. Robert Grattan, prebendary of St. Audoen's, my gold bottle-screw which he gave me, and my strong box, on condition of his giving the sole use of the said box to his brother, Dr. James Grattan, during the life of the said doctor, who hath more occasion for it, and the second-best beaver hat I shall die possessed of.

Item, I bequeath to Mr. John Grattan, prebendary of Clonmethan, my silver box in which the freedom of the city of Cork was presented to me; in which I desire the said John to keep the tobacco he usually cheweth, called pigtail.

Item, I bequeath all my horses and mares to the reverend Mr. John Jackson, vicar of Santry, together with all my horse furniture: lamenting that I had not credit enough with any chief governor (since the change of times) to get some additional church preferment for so virtuous and worthy a gentleman. I also leave him my third-best beaver hat.

[illegible] erend Dr. Francis Wilson the works of Plato in three folio volumes, the earl of Clarendon's 'History,' in three folio volumes, and my best Bible; together with thirteen small Persian pictures in the drawing-room, and the small silver tankard given to me by the contribution of some friends, whose names are engraved at the bottom of the said tankard.

Item, I bequeath to the earl of Orrery, the enamelled silver plates to distinguish bottles of wine by, given to me by his excellent lady, and the half-length picture of the late countess of Orkney in the drawing-room.

Item, I bequeath to Alexander M'Aulay, esq., the gold box in which the freedom of the city of Dublin was presented to me, as a testimony of the esteem and love I have for him on account of his great learning, fine natural parts, unaffected piety and benevolence, and his truly honourable zeal in defence of the legal rights of the clergy, in opposition to all their unprovoked oppressors.

Item, I bequeath to Deane Swift, esq., my large silver standish, consisting of a large silver plate, an ink-pot, a sand-box and bell of the same metal.

Item, I bequeath to Mrs. Mary Barber the medal of queen Anne and prince George, which she formerly gave me.

Item, I leave to the reverend Mr. John Worrall my best beaver hat.

Item, I bequeath to the reverend Dr. Patrick Delany my medal of queen Anne in silver, and on the reverse, the bishops of England kneeling before her most sacred majesty.

Item, I bequeath to the reverend Mr. James King, prebendary of Tipper, my large gilded medal of king Charles I., and on the reverse, a crown of martyrdom, with other devices. My will, nevertheless, is, that if any of the above-mentioned legatees should die before me, that then, and in that case, the respective legacies to them bequeathed, shall revert to myself, and become again subject to my disposal.

Item, Whereas I have the lease of a field in trust for me, commonly called the vineyard, let to the reverend Dr. Francis Corbet, and the trust declared by the said doctor; the said field, with some land on this side of the road, making in all about three acres, for which I pay yearly to the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's * * * *.

Whereas I have built a strong wall round the said piece of ground, eight or nine feet high, faced on the south aspect with brick, which cost me above 600*l.* sterling: and likewise, another piece of ground as aforesaid, of half an acre, adjoining the burial-place, called the cabbage-garden, now tenanted by William White, gardener: my will is, that the ground enclosed by the great wall may be sold for the remainder of the lease, at the highest price my executors can get for it, in belief and hopes that the said price will exceed 300*l.* at the lowest value; for which my successor in the deanery shall have the first refusal: and it is my earnest desire that the succeeding deans and chapters may preserve the said vineyard, and piece of land adjoining, where the said White now liveth, so as to be always in the hands of the succeeding deans during their office, by each dean lessening one-fourth of the purchase money to each succeeding dean, and for no more than the present rent.

And I appoint the honourable Robert Lindsay, one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas; Henry Singleton, esq., prime-serjeant to his majesty; the reverend Dr. Patrick Delany, chancellor of St. Patrick's; the Rev. Dr. Francis Wilson, prebendary of Kilmactolway; Eaton Stannard, esq., recorder of the city of Dublin; the Rev. Mr. Robert Grattan, prebendary of St. Audoen's; the Rev. Mr. John Grattan, prebendary of Clonmethan; the Rev. Mr. James Stopford, vicar of Finglass; the Rev. Mr. James King, prebendary of Tipper; and Alexander M'Aulay, esq., my executors.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, and published and declared this as my last will and testament, this 3rd day of May, 1740.

CODICIL.—In the name of God. Amen. I, JONATHAN SWIFT, doctor in divinity, and dean of the cathedral church of St. Patrick's, Dublin, being weak in body, but sound in mind, do make this codicil part of my last will and testament, and do appoint this writing to have the same force and effect thereof.

Whereas the right honourable Theophilus, lord Newtown, deceased, did, by his last will and testament, bequeath unto Anne Brent, a legacy of 20*l.* sterling a-year during her life, in consideration of the long and faithful service of her the said Anne: And whereas the said Anne, since the death of the said lord Newtown, did intermarry with Anthony Ridgeway, of the city of Dublin, cabinetmaker; and that the said Anthony Ridgeway, and Anne his wife, for valuable considerations, did grant and assign unto me the said Dr. Swift, the said annuity or rent charge of 20*l.* sterling per annum, to hold to me, my executors, and administrators, during the life of the said Anne, and the said Anthony Ridgeway being since dead: now I, the said Dr. Swift, do hereby devise and bequeath unto the Rev. Dr. John Wynne, chanter of St. Patrick's Dublin, the Rev. Mr. James King, curate of St. Bridget's Dublin, and the Rev. Dr. Francis Wilson, prebendary of Kilmactolway, and the survivor or survivors of them, their heirs, executors, and administrators, the said annuity or yearly rent charge of 20*l.* sterling per annum, devised by the said lord Newtown to the said Anne, to have, receive, and enjoy the same, during the life of the said Anne, to the uses, intents, and purposes hereinafter specified; that is to say, it is my will, that my said trustees, and the survivor or survivors of them, his and their heirs, executors, and administrators, shall (so soon after they shall have received the annuity, or any part thereof, as conveniently they can) pay or cause to be paid unto the said Anne Ridgeway the said annuity of 20*l.* sterling per annum, during her life. In witness whereof, I, the said Dr. Jonathan Swift, have hereunto set my hand and seal, and published this codicil, as part of my last will and testament, this 5th day of May, 1740.

WITH A VINDICATION OF THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT IN THEIR LATE RESOLVES, AND ADDRESS RELATING TO THE DEFICIENCIES OF THE DUTCH. 1712.

THE following tract, forming the third in the series, from the pen of Swift himself, "On the Conduct of the Allies." is now for the first time published in a complete edition of his works. It was obtained with some trouble from the large collection of printed tracts and pamphlets, now in course of being catalogued in the British Museum, through the able and judicious instrumentality of Mr. Panizzi, the head librarian. It is one only, but an important one, among the undoubted missing productions of the celebrated dean, now so long a desideratum; and besides the internal evidence it presents of genuine character, is expressly alluded to by the author in the "Journal to Stella," when speaking of his resolution to follow up his attacks on the Whigs. "It cost me," he says, "2s. in coach hire to dine with a printer in the City. I have sent, and caused to be sent, THREE pamphlets out in a fortnight: I will ply the rogues warm; and whenever anything of theirs makes a noise it shall have an answer."—Journal to Stella, Lett. 32, Oct. 10, 1711.

THE reception a former work of this kind has met with in the world, and the little which has been said against it as to matters of fact, must be acknowledged to be all owing to the truth, coming with an irresistible force upon the minds of men, and which always carries its own evidence along with it; when we have met with the enemy descanting upon it, we have heard them, even in the midst of a thousand curses and hard names which they cast upon the author, yet at every pause cry out, Damn the circumstance! I doubt there is too much truth in it, though I hate the design of making it public. This makes it clear which has often, and upon many other occasions, been said, that our late people had a kind of popery in their politics, viz., that much of their success consisted in keeping the people blind and ignorant in the main and most essential points of their affairs, and which it was most necessary for them to know; that they were so far from knowing what usage they had received abroad from their allies, that when they came to be a little rightly informed, they could not frame ideas of so much knavery in their heads, or think it possible that any people who called themselves allies could at the same time carry themselves in such a manner to those for whom they had made the least professions of any respect, or for whose common safety they had the least concern.

As the truth of what has been thus spoken is hereby acknowledged and confessed by the enemy, which is the best kind of evidence; so the seasonableness of making that truth public in the manner it hath been by the former tract, and as it shall or may be in this, is justified and cleared beyond all possibility of objection by the late public resolutions of the honourable house of commons, where it comes into the world with the sanction and authority of the great representative of the nation; it is true, the particulars in the votes amount to a most excessive height; and though it was known and believed by many to be very great, yet I must confess few imagined them to be so surprising, the account so large, and the particulars so many as they appear to be; also one thing is obtained by this report of the house of commons, which the credit of a single author was by no means sufficient for, viz., that the Dutch had any share in the deficiency, and in the injuries which this nation has suffered under the weight of this confederacy; many would be brought by the power of reasoning and the force of demonstrations, which are things all people are not equally furnished to resist; they would, I say, be brought to confess, that there might have been defects in general, and that those effects appeared in the affairs of the empire, the Portuguese, and such like—anything but the Dutch; but such an ascendant had the influence of the politics and the confederacy of the late administration, with the parties concerned, obtained over the people, that though anything would go down with them against other people, yet if the dear Dutch came into the dispute, nothing could be borne with, but all the rest was the pure effect of Jacobitism and the French.

How fatal this has been to us I may hereafter have leisure to examine, and every day is like to discover more and more of it to us; indeed all things were mounted to such a violent prepossession upon us in favour of the Dutch, that we began to think even our own constitution stood in need of further security from them, and politicly brought the Dutch into our national concerns; thus making ourselves beholden to them for a guarantee or safety to the succession of Hanover, that this might be a handle to our doing other things for them so exorbitant in their own nature, as that no nation, but such as depended upon them for something very weighty and significant, would ever consent to, or could upon other pretence be persuaded into; yet this was not all, for when we had brought our people to stoop to so mean a thought as that our succession, ratified by both kingdoms, and incorporated by both the parliaments of England and Scotland in the late solemn treaty of union, could receive any addition of strength from abroad more than that of the interest and alliance of so powerful a prince as his electoral highness of Hanover and his allies; that we stood in need of that incoherent article of a Dutch guarantee; when I say we had stooped so low as to level our constitution to the common notion of leagues and treaties between other and differing nations, and that it should receive a further sanction, thereby, it was not hard then to fill the heads of the poor people with a belief, that whoever made the least objection against anything hereafter, which either the Dutch might do by us or which we might do by them, acted therein against the Protestant succession. This was a point so well gained by the Dutch that, on the faith of a man, if they gained it for nothing, it was the best bargain they made during the whole war; and if our late managers granted it so also, they must either have given up their senses to the Dutch, or had most despicable thoughts of the strength of Great Britain, and our being able to support our own settlement; or, which I speak most unwillingly, there must have been some private bargain driven, of which I shall venture to say no more, but that I hope no Englishman could be found that would be guilty of it.

To waive therefore a reflection so unwelcome, let us go back to the observation before, viz., this threefold end we have seen it answer to the Dutch; what end it will ever answer to us remains a mystery, and will in all probability remain so for many years to come if not for ever; the ends which I say it answered for the Dutch were three:—

1. The barrier treaty, which, with the separate article, was joined as the advance money of a loan by way of what our people called prompt-payment, and which the Dutch had the confidence to palm upon us as a small matter, and a thing due to them for the great kindness done for us by them in taking upon them to secure our succession. I am not ignorant of that weak and foolish use which the enemies of peace made of that objection spoken of in the other forementioned tract, p. 21, viz., "That it may not be right, in point of policy or good sense, that a foreign power should be called in to confirm our succession by way of guarantee, but only to acknowledge it, otherwise we put it out of the power of our own legislature to change our succession, without the consent of that prince or state who is guarantee. However, our posterity may hereafter, by the tyranny and oppression of any succeeding princes, be reduced to the fatal necessity of breaking in upon the excellent and happy settlement now in force."

This by all means they will have as an aim taken for the pretender, as if, because we ought not to put it out of the power of our legislature to limit the succession, whatever necessity may happen, even when this race may be all in their graves, that therefore we have an immediate alteration of the succession in our view; these people who contend thus forget the mighty noise we have had from them about parliamentary limitations, a word the Whigs have made so sacred that it has been like the Magna Charta of their liberties, and with which they run down the hereditary right of their princes, as if there had been nothing at all in it but tyranny and arbitrary government, till at length it was happily discovered, that they were very well consistent together; and that they who best understood hereditary right had proved it to be agreeable to parliamentary limitation, and then all was well again. But after all this bustle, was it to be imagined that the same people could so easily give up the parliament's right of limiting the succession to a foreign nation; and by making a league of guarantee for the succession legitimate the impertinence of strangers, who may hereafter meddle with our constitution, and may tell a British parliament they have no power to alter or meddle with the settlement of the crown, for that it is already settled, and they are guarantees of it? What has been, may be; and what may be, may be supposed to be. If then any of the family of Hanover should tyrannise, or abdicate, or the same or like circumstances should happen as have happened before, the parliament would be disabled from declaring the throne vacant and filling up the same with such other of the family as they find convenient; which, according to all the Whig principles which we have so often heard of, is inseparable from the constitution, and much more sacred than anything which has been hereditary in the world. I do not incline to concern these papers with the popular disputes which have troubled the world so much and so long about the difference between hereditary and parliamentary right; how far they are the same, or which is best furnished with authorities and originals, whether of divine or civil right. It is enough to take hold here of the Whigs' own argument, and allowing all they have said on this head to be orthodox, whether it really be so or no, it must necessarily follow that this parliamentary right cannot, or ought not to be given out of our hands, and put by a treaty into the hands of foreigners; so that it shall be in their power to put their negative into our next limitation of the crown. If this be not to give away our liberties, I would be glad to know what it is to keep them; if there be any choice of tyrants, and if it weighs anything, when our privileges are given up, who is it they should be given up to? I confess myself more willing to be a slave at home than abroad, and to be tyrannised on by a prince of our own than by a foreign nation; and if there were no other reason for that than this, it would be sufficient to justify the choice, viz., that there are more ways to avoid the mischief of it, that an oppressing prince has sometimes changed his measures, or he may be restrained, or may die, and thereby a nation may be delivered; but such a convention as this, made with a foreign nation, engages that whole nation, upon all occasions, to embark itself and its whole strength in defence of the capitulation agreed on; and thus by this method the power of parliament in future limitations of the crown seems to be effectually given up. How the Whigs would have liked this doctrine if it had come from any one but themselves may be best guessed at by the warmth they showed about the league, said to be made by the late king James and the king of France, which put this whole nation into a flame; and with good reason so far as that league appeared; for what was it, or what could we imagine it to be, but a treaty of guarantee with the French, for the securing the succession of popery in England? Whereas the settling the religion and liberties of this nation was the undoubted right of the people in parliament, and so by the same rule must the succession of our princes be. The sum of all this is that by the Whigs' own arguments and their own principles, which they have always professed and adhered to, and by the same rule from which they acted in the Revolution, the accepting a guarantee for the securing the succession of the crown of this kingdom to any family, or branch of a family, race, or line whatsoever, is no less than giving up the privileges of the people, and divesting the parliament of the power of limiting the succession to the crown.

It may be remembered that in the late treaty of union with Scotland some secret overtures were made to have engaged the Dutch to be guarantees of that treaty; and though that proposal seemed to come from such hands as gave reason to believe it was rather a design to destroy than secure the said treaty, the Dutch having at that time discovered willingness enough to have prevented the conclusion of that treaty, yet those that knew anything of the resentment at that time here against that proposal, as dishonourable to England and destructive of the constitution of both kingdoms, would wonder that ever the same ministry should so far change their notions as to admit the same guarantee in so nice an affair as the succession to thei own crown, which they rejected with contempt in a treaty with the neighbouring nation.

Secondly, another end answered by this treaty of guarantee, was giving an opportunity to the Dutch to play their own game with us with respect to other treaties, quotas, proportions of payments, ships, troops, and the like; of this so much has been said already, and is yet like to be said further in public, that I shall need say the less to it here, my design being rather to justify the resentment all honest men entertain at the mean politics and submissions of our people here, and to show the necessity of taking wiser for the future, than to animate people against any of our confederates.

I am as forward as any to agree that the advantages of a strict union among the confederates are very great, and that, as her majesty expressed it, the interest of the states of Holland be looked upon as our own; and this by no means hinders us from desiring that the Dutch should use us well, should show a reciprocal kindness, and should act with a mutual concern for the general confederated interest, and that we should not be willing to see them impose upon us in any of those particulars, or be easy and submit quietly to it when they do; and this is so much justice that none can object against, and what is the best, if not the only way to cultivate and maintain that friendship and good understanding on both sides, which is so much the interest of the confederacy in general, and of the Dutch themselves in particular. They who contend that the inquiring into these things seems to show a disregard to the confederacy in general, or to the several parties concerned in particular, seem to make severer satires upon the Dutch than they are aware of. The deficiencies of the performance they cannot deny, the want of a due regard then to the confederacy must certainly lie rather in those that have been the cause of those deficiencies than those that have not; for who are most justly to be charged with slighting and disregarding the mutual interest of the confederacy, they that have failed in the performance of the conditions, or they that complain of it in order to have them performed? Britain has all along shown, by a zeal fatal to herself, her willingness to push on the war with all imaginable vigour, in order to which, when her deficient allies, having less concern for the general good, have run the venture of miscarriage to shorten their expense, Britain, as if the whole charge of the war had been her due to pay, has zealously supplied both their quotas and her own; while she was willing to do thus, her confederates daily increased their deficiencies and her expense, as they might very well do finding her so easy; and while she was willing to sit still and see herself thus used, it was very remarkable how augmentations and increase of forces was every year proposed by the confederates, as well in Flanders as in Spain, and none so forward as the emperor himself to increase the quotas of the troops and the charges of the war upon the rest of his confederates, quietly waiting for their supplying additional troops, and taking care to have very few of his own.

While we submitted to all these things the war went quietly on, but whether so successfully or no as it might have done if the allies had answered what we had reason to expect from them, is left for them to answer. At last the British court, entering into a more narrow inspection of things, have not thought fit so calmly to suffer the weight of the war to lie heavier upon one shoulder than another, and though equally willing to bear their share of the burden, yet not forward to carry that load which ought to lie upon other shoulders. They are now calling upon their confederates to consider a little the justice of their several treaties, and to look back and see what they are obliged to do, if they expect the war should be carried on any further; if they are diffident of the success of these remonstrances from their experience how fruitless the like have been before, and have therefore at the same time embraced the occasion that has offered towards putting an end to the war by an honourable peace, they will be justified in it before all the world, both now and for ever; when it shall be at the same time understood in what manner and for how many years this war has been carried on, nor can the artifices of an adverse party among us delude many in their suggesting to the world that the government here is in the interest of France, since they can have no other reason to back that suggestion than that they were not willing to carry on a war upon unequal terms, and in a confederacy with allies who would not perform their own conditions, and in which those who expected the greatest advantages from it paid the least part of the expense towards it.

Thirdly, the third end which this general complaint against a peace has been calculated to answer, and which their party has taken care to make as popular as they can, is a general notion that those who are for a peace do it with a design, by the assistance of France, to introduce the pretender; however weak and inconsistent such a consequence may be, nothing is more certain than that many innocent and well-meaning people have been prevailed upon to believe it; and though the improbabilities of the thing in its own nature, and the steady zeal of the persons who they charge with it, and who have all along in a course of many years testified their abhorrence of that interest, and taken such steps against it as have been most effectual to the cutting off all hope both from him and his party, might suffice to any reasonable people; yet this seems to be one of those difficulties that can be solved only by a little patience and time; to those who will be convinced by argument, it seems sufficient that our putting a stop to a war which we carried on at so much disadvantage, and which had in view rather utter impoverishing the nation than a timely reducing our enemies to reason, however, was not only necessary on many other accounts, but greatly our advantage on this account in especial manner, that thereby we might be left in a condition to defend our constitution, and to preserve power to maintain our succession, as our parliament had thought fit to limit it, without the help of the Dutch, and without being put to so weak, so scandalous, and so dishonourable a shift as to accept of the guarantee of foreign states to preserve our own acts of parliament.

When I look further into this scandalous thing called a guarantee for our succession, methinks it represents to me our people on their knees to the Dutch, for the mighty favour of their taking us into their high and mighty protection; and, indeed, when this is compared with the manner with which the states of Holland carried on the Geertruydenbergh treaty, wherein the making a peace for us was also left wholly to or engrossed by the states of Holland, the thing seems very much of a piece. The barrier treaty also has much of the same manner in it, which being handled at large by itself, I say no more to here. I have observed that at the time when we began to talk here of peace, and when the French articles began to appear, we were mightily amused with the Dutch making offers that they would take away the excuse from us of want of money or credit, and the Dutch would advance to us four millions sterling, to encourage us to carry on the war. That the Dutch made such an offer publicly in form is known to be a mistake, but that the Dutch might be willing to lend, or to give as much as that amounts to to have the sole direction of making the peace, that so their particular interest which they never forget, might be principally provided for, this there can be no greater question of; and the Dutch are not without cunning enough to make it so well worth their while as that such a sum of money should not be ill laid out. But those people should do well to consider two or three things which lie hid in this notion of the Dutch lending us so much money, and which by way of corollary may be of great use to us in the understanding of other parts of management on that side. (1.) That if the States of Holland for the carrying on the war could spare us so much money to encourage us that we might not make a peace without them, though that has not yet been thought of, then, however, all they thought fit to say in former times of their being impoverished and exhausted, and not in a condition to pay their quotas, must be a manifest fraud and cheat, and must be with design to put upon us the necessity of carrying it on upon unequal conditions; and this they could not have entertained a thought of without first being sensible that they had us at so much advantage as that they knew whenever they thought fit to ease their own charge they might put the hardship upon us. (2.) Since it was obtained by the acts of their other conduct that the Dutch had the sole direction of the peace, it followed then that we were under an obligation to carry on the war at their bidding, from whence it was most natural to believe that they were not dark-sighted enough not to make their other advantages. (3.) These things make it no longer a mystery why the Dutch would advance any sum of money for the encouraging us to carry on the war, because it followed that we should carry it on under the same inequalities and disadvantages which we did before; but now these things are detected, and if we should come to a necessity of carrying on the war, which God forbid, yet that it should be more than probable we may not only demand that they begin upon a new foot, and make up all their quotas for the time to come, but also may call upon them for what is past; also it is more than probable that they may then plead poverty with us, as they did before, and talk no more of the great sums they would lend us. (4.) There is yet another remark to be made upon this head, viz. of the Dutch advancing such great sums of money to us: we have never found but these sums were to be all lent upon good parliamentary security, and on the interest current in England, and we might not be thought ungrateful to the lenders, if we asked them where was the advantage of all that; was it to us or to themselves? They must not know the Dutch so well as we have reason to know them, who expect to find them ever forgetful of their own interest in any proposal they may make. It is true we have complained of our being impoverished and exhausted, and not in a condition to carry on the war, especially at the rate which it hath been carried on at, without great inconveniences, and involving, mortgaging and anticipating for us and our posterity, at a rate which neither are like to see the end of; but what is our defect? We do not want lenders but funds to borrow upon; we have usurers enough among us to devour us, we want no help from the Dutch, we are not without a sort of men among us who, having little or no interest in the freehold, have amassed infinite sums of money in cash, with which they trade upon the rest, and live upon the blood and vitals of the government; these, like the eagles where the carcase falls, gather together, and if the parliament can but find funds, though they boast of having the power of credit in themselves, and often think of making themselves formidable by threatening the government that they will lend no money, and that they can ruin the public credit by refusing to advance their money, yet they can no more forbear than a vulture can forbear his prey; the funds are the carcase they feed on; they are as hungry for them as a lion that has been hunting and found no food, and in spite of their faith often pledged to their party and friends, to run down credit and lend no money, let but the ministry find a fund, and the parliament establish a lottery, or subscription, or loan, and they are ready to trample one another to death to get in their money. So that after all that hath been said of the Dutch lending us money, we see nothing to be said to it but what was said in answer to some bantering lines in the time of king Charles II. made upon the king, which his majesty by repartee answered himself thus:—

> "Charles at this time having no need, > Thanks you as much as if he did."

It is apparent in our case we want no lenders; we have been devoured with harpies already, who think, as no doubt the Dutch would also think, and perhaps say too, that the borrower is servant to the lender. But we must acknowledge we want funds to borrow, and where to find them, such excepted as will plunge us yet further and further into a gulph, whence no less than a hundred years can redeem us, is past the skill of the best advocates for a war to find out; indeed I cannot but wonder that, in all the noise the faction have made at these things, they have not descended to one argument against the difficulty of raising funds; they have indeed told us great things, à la gasconade, that there are funds enough—that England is vastly rich—that there is money enough—that we can with ease carry on the war this seven years, and such rhodomontade that they have surfeited the people with it for some time; but we do not see one of them that offers any scheme how, and upon what destructive ruinous fund, this money may be raised, that the people may judge whether what is alleged be true, yea or no; and whether those funds they shall so propose shall not be as fatal to the general good as those that have gone before; with such fallacious ways have the people been managed till they have led them on to the brink of inevitable ruin; and now, as if it were not enough that the nation hath for so many years been oppressed by the war, through the negligence or knavery of our confederates, we are modestly desired to proceed in the war upon the same foot. I confess this among our own people is a sign of some national stupidity and blindness which one would hardly think possible; but for our neighbours, whether the states-general or others, to desire it, seems to smell of something we want a word for in our tongue, and may be better expressed in French by merveilleux surprenant, and the like. I must needs say I have not yet met with any man so weak but what begins to feel the force of this argument enter into his soul. If the allies have not performed according to their agreement, they should be reminded of it; and if we cannot prevail with them to make up former defects, we ought at least to be careful that they comply punctually for the time to come. Can any people be so besotted to a party as to expect or desire that a nation already impoverished by the unfair impositions of her allies, and not able to carry on the war on the terms she hath done for some time, should not insist upon more justice for the future, that she may be able to hold it out?

Neither is this an unnecessary argument at this time, for if we can carry on this war at the expense of three millions and a half yearly, instead of seven, then we are better able to go on two years upon the square with our allies, than one year upon the unequal foundation we have gone upon all along; so that to bring our allies to do us justice, and to exert themselves to the uttermost in carrying on the war, is the truest and best step towards the main point, viz., of carrying it on, if we are assured we shall no more be imposed upon: if we see the full quotas of troops in the field, the full numbers of ships in the Mediterranean, and all things in readiness in time, and fit for action; if anything will revive the drooping spirits of the nation it must be this; it must be that they have some hopes of not being cheated again, and that the powerful assistance of the allies will be a means of putting a happy and speedy end to the war that a safe peace may follow: and it is easy to find that nothing but this will do it; nothing else can persuade an exhausted nation to bleed anew but some assurance that they shall not be suffered by their allies to bleed to death—that there shall be some end of their sorrows and miseries, and that every hand is fairly engaged in bringing things to a happy end.

But these things seem to call for no further remark from us; they are so natural and plain in themselves that every child in these affairs may understand them; for if we must carry on the war, it must be needful that we suffer ourselves to be no more abused by our allies; if we are not to expect justice from our allies, then we must be unaccountably besotted if we carry on the war; nay, though a worse peace were to follow than her majesty hath good reason to expect from the negotiations now on foot.

But it may not be amiss to inquire here what prospect there appears of these things, and what hopes our allies do put us in, of expecting for the future better treatment; and that in pursuit of the war they will go on upon a different foot from that which they have hitherto gone upon; for if there was but some appearance of an amendment for the future, it might be some encouragement to us to think of prosecuting the ensuing campaigns with more comfort? but instead of this, all we yet see amounts to little that way, for at home all the fruit of the discovery shows only a kind of regret that it is made public, an inward fretting that the fact is too obvious, so that they cannot contradict it, and an envious warmth at the justice done their own country in it, because it touches upon the states-general, as if to touch them were fatal to us all; and perhaps it may indeed be fatal to some projects the party had set on foot here, destructive enough to the liberty of their country, and of which a little time may give us a further view. This is clear, that in all the reply we have here to the detecting the hard usage we have met with from our allies issues in exclamations at our exposing the Dutch, and falling upon the Dutch, spreading reports that we design to fall out with the Dutch, and that we are for a peace with France, and a war with the Dutch; as if we must refrain a due inspection into our own affairs for fear of the effects it will or may have upon the Hollanders; it is no less the duty of every faithful representative to inquire how other nations may impose upon the people, and waste and destroy us, than it is how we are embezzled at home, for every breach of treaty is in this kind a depredation upon the people; and it is most reasonable that when they have thus discovered the fraud, and by who, as well as by what means the nation is exhausted and worn out, they should so far expose the matters of fact, and the persons, that the people may know by what means they are impoverished; this hath been the constant method and usage of parliaments, and the members of parliament could not have discharged the trust they have committed to them by the people they represent if they had omitted it. Nor can this be called exposing the Dutch; they lay open the truth: if that exposes the Dutch, or any other persons or states, the misfortune is their own to be liable to such a charge; but let such people answer what they would have had the house of commons have done when, upon inquiry into the state of the war, they found that we had not been fairly used by the confederates; if they had held their peace, had they not been criminally silent? had they not betrayed their country? had they not been accessory to all the frauds of the like kind which should have happened for the future? And what would the language of posterity have been, when they should have seen that the house of commons knew those things, but took no notice of them, or any care to have the nation informed of them? Must it not have been a just reproach upon them, as it is now upon those who knew it before, and yet took no notice of it, or made any application to former parliaments to have it redressed? But it is evident these people who make now such loud complaints of the reflections cast upon our allies appear more concerned that the matter is made public than that it is true; and are so far from desiring any cure for the disease, that they spend all their heat and resentment at the discoveries of it; and it is to be observed from their conduct, that they make ten reflections upon the house of commons and the present ministry, for the industry and pains taken in finding out how, and by whom the nation has been abused, for one just remark upon the integrity and zeal in the war of those allies who have used us in such a manner. Whence such a spirit can proceed, and what reason can be given for it, is not so hard to find out as it is melancholy to reflect that so it should be.

I might go forward in this observation to expose the foundation from whence all this proceeds, and by which we should soon see for what uses and purposes some people are so desirous of pushing on the war; and how to do it they care not, upon what disadvantages and unequal conditions they did it; being willing to bear any part of the burthen, nay, all the burthen, so the beloved war were but to be pursued: the inquiry into this will open many scenes of private treachery not yet brought to light, and for that I purpose to do it in a tract by itself, I shall leave it to a fit occasion.

It falls next in view to interrogate the ministers at Utrecht how they proceed, and see thereby what measures the Dutch take to convince us that we shall have a better and more equal balance kept up among us in case the war is to be continued. But here you shall find measures calculated rather to compel the queen of Great Britain to carry on the war than to invite her majesty to it by assurances of performing treaties better than in the times past. This is a temper so different from what might be expected from a people who had so treated their allies, to us who complain of being so treated, that it is as before merveilleux; or, to put it plainer, a kind of throwing off the mask; as if we were obliged to submit to be cheated, after we had first discovered that it was so; and that what before was done covertly, and under the appearance of a treaty, was now to be done more effectually, openly, avowedly, and in the teeth of the rest of the allies.

This appeared upon the first conference after the French plenipotentiaries had delivered in their paper of explanation, as they called it, on the proposals of the peace which they had formerly given in. It came then to the turn of the allies to consider in what manner to deliver in their answer to the French proposals: this it was resolved should be by the confederate ministers delivering in their demands, or the several pretensions of their respective principals, without taking any notice of the project contained in the paper given in by the ministers of France. It should have been noted here in the first place, that after all the Dutch had said, and after all that had been said to them, in order to come to this treaty, prepared to preserve a good understanding among the allies, and to bring the treaty to the desired conclusion, viz., a good peace the Dutch ministers appeared there without any character, having neither powers as plenipotentiaries, nor as ambassadors, nor anything more than mere commissioners, empowered only to hear what was said, make report to their masters the States, and give back their answers, which one of the queen's common messengers may as well do on our side. Nor were the persons, the equipages, or the salaries allowed to their said commissioners any more than what was suitable to common messengers, whose business it was to carry a message and return with an answer; so that in the conferences, either general or particular, there was no debating things with them, only just giving in what any one had to say, and all the answer these men could give was, that they would report it to their high mightinesses the States-general, and would bring their answer. The French plenipotentiaries presently objected against these powers, as not sufficient to admit the Dutch ministers into the conferences. The British plenipotentiaries, though they were sensible of the affront offered in it to their royal mistress, after such assurances on her majesty's part of her sincere intention to make the interest of all her allies to be as her own, yet willing to waive everything that might give an obstruction to the happy issue of the peace, did not insist on this; though they could not but complain that it greatly obstructed that happy concert of measures which they hoped might have been the constant fruit of the private conferences of the confederate ministers, which the Dutch, having no powers that extended any further than barely to hear and report, and bring back a resolution, was, for want of those powers, quite disappointed; so that the Dutch ministers might as justly be deemed and termed porters, as plenipotentiaries. Well, notwithstanding all this, the British plenipotentiaries, willing to promote the great end for which they assembled, which, as the lord bishop of Bristol expressed it, was, in the name of God, to bring the wars to a happy conclusion, in an equitable and honourable peace, all these obstructions were passed over on their side, and they laboured to have the powers of the Dutch ministers accepted, as at last they were with some difficulty; and thus they proceed to the affair of the demands, as above, which were to be delivered in as the 5th of March. The Dutch ministers, concealing the resolution taken at the Hague, to give in no demands, but the very immediate copy of the preliminaries last treated on, insisted that all the confederates' demands should be formed into one instrument, and be given in jointly by all the plenipotentiaries, as the general demands of the whole alliance. This, though something surprising in itself, yet was the less so, when it was more known that this was in order to execute the measures above noted, viz., of bringing in the preliminaries of Geertruydenbergh as the summary demands of the allies. But the British plenipotentiaries taking notice of it, insisted that this seemed to be destructive of the treaty itself,—that France had twice ventured to carry on the war rather than agree to these preliminaries,—that they had been declared impracticable, and could not be treated on here; and to insist on the very literal form of those preliminaries now, and prescribe the plenipotentiaries to treat on them, was to declare against a treaty at all. That this meeting was understood by all parties to be not a treaty of preliminaries in order to a treaty of peace, but a general treaty of peace itself, wherein the specific demands of every ally were to be heard, debated, and finally discussed, adjusted and answered to their satisfaction, which could by no means be done by preliminary articles which had in them several references to a further treaty, and some suggested demands left to be further discussed at another time; whereas they were now met to make a final and general conclusion of all demands and pretensions whatsoever, that there might be no more blood shed in the Christian world, that an end might be put to the miseries of Europe. It was also alleged that the said preliminaries had not been concerted with a due regard to the interest of all the allies: in especial manner it was asked what article there was to be found in them which regarded the interest of her Britannic majesty, further than what merely respected her title to the crown, and the banishment of the pretender; whereas there seemed a great deal of reason for admitting further demands for the security, and enlarging the commerce and possessions of her majesty and her subjects; for this reason, as well as in behalf of the rest of the confederates, the said British plenipotentiaries insisted upon giving in the instrument of their demands in particular, every ally by themselves.

It must be something astonishing to such true lovers of their country, who can look back on these things with unprejudiced judgments, to reflect on the temper reigning in this part of Europe at the time of the treaty aforesaid, when in all the numerous articles adjusted at the Hague, and afterwards debated again at Geertruydenbergh by the Dutch and French, the former left out nothing which concerned their own interest, security, or advantage; nay, engaged the British court to concern and engage themselves for their particular security and advantages; but not one word, clause, article, or debate, was ever thought of for the English, either as to the security of their commerce as it then stood, or the increase of it for the future. On the other hand, all the stress on the British side, and for which we were to think ourselves infinitely obliged to the Dutch, was to engage their assistance to keep out the pretender, and secure the succession of the crown of Great Britain to his electoral highness of Hanover; a thing which is so the universal resolution of all the people and parties in Britain, and to which they think all the opposition that can be made, from either French or any else, is so trifling and insignificant, that they cannot be sensible of the exceeding obligation on that behalf to their confederates, or of the great danger which they were in of the pretender, although no foreign assistance had been engaged on that behalf, esteeming the favourers of the pretender in Britain, notwithstanding their great clamours of a party among us, to be so few and so inconsiderable as that there is nothing to be feared from them: but supposing there had been more danger of the clause, viz., the succession, than we are willing to hope there is ground to apprehend, it cannot but be reminded that it is as much the interest of the States-general to secure that succession in the illustrious house of Hanover as it is even of Great Britain itself, and much more than it can be supposed to be to Britain to secure to them the barrier of Flanders; for should the dominions of her Britannic majesty ever fall into the hands of a popish or French interest, or into the hands of a prince who is, or may be in the interest of France, the territories of the States-general being stript of the powerful assistance of the British troops by land and fleets by sea, must inevitably be exposed to the powerful invasion of French and British fleets united, and their trade in particular eaten up and destroyed, as was verified by woful experience to the said States in the year 1672, when, if the English court had not broken off from the said French alliance, the States-general had inevitably sunk under the power of France, and their government been dissolved and destroyed. So that upon the whole it is manifest there was no need on our part to engage the Dutch to appear for the security of our succession to the house of Hanover; for that the sovereign law of their own preservation will always put them under a necessity of doing it, the contrary being most sure to be a great step in their injury, if not their evident destruction: it may be argued, that in rules of government we are not to depend upon this or that state being obliged by their own interest to assist us, but we are to regard what necessity, either for security of trade, common safety of government, or other political interests we are in, or may be in, of the assistance of the powers we are treating with, and if that necessity appears, it is a sufficient reason for us to secure that assistance. And this we have frequent examples of, as of the Dutch themselves treating with us in 1676, when notwithstanding it was the undoubted interest of England not to let Holland, upon any terms whatever, fall into the hands of France; and if ever the French do again make that attempt, we ought to assist the Dutch with all our troops and power; and that not so much from any care and kindness to them as a nation, but for our own interest and preservation; yet the Dutch, knowing the eyes of a nation are not always open to their own interest, thought fit to tie us to assist them in that case, and even articled with us for the proportion, viz., the number of ten thousand men. This is brought for a reason why, notwithstanding its being so much the interest of the States of Holland to preserve the succession of the house of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, we ought also to bind them to it by treaty: but though we were to grant all this, it will not follow that this treaty should have such a price put upon it that the Dutch should demand of us all they want for this little equivalent; and the reasons above, though they should not be allowed to subsist against the treaty of guarantee itself, will certainly take off much of that high price which the Dutch have put upon it, as if we were under such infinite obligations to them to secure it for us, as that we were quite out of condition to defend it ourselves, or as if they had no concern, or were to receive no security, benefit, or advantage at all by it to themselves. Again, it might pass for some argument in this case, that if any power in Europe ought to have sought this guarantee from the States-general, it should have been the Elector himself, who on his part might probably have some more occasion to secure his passage over to England, and the march of any troops which his highness might find necessary to bring with him, to assist his faithful people of Britain to place him on the throne, in case a French or popish interest should make opposition. Here indeed the States-general might be very useful allies, and his electoral highness would have thought very well of such a guarantee of the States; but it cannot be conceived that Britain can be under like necessity of such a security—the succession, which is their own act and deed, being universally approved by the whole nation, a few people excepted, who are contemptible either for their number or interest, so that on all these accounts it seems however a treaty of guarantee may be useful enough for our succession, and no harm in it; yet it cannot be a thing of that weight as to have so great a value set upon it, and that Britain should suffer herself so much to be imposed upon for it as it is apparent to all the world she has been on that account.

We return now to the manner of the carrying on of the treaty of peace at Utrecht: the British plenipotentiaries having, as I said above, insisted upon the giving in the demands of the allies in a separate manner, have by this means an occasion of securing for the subjects of her majesty some other advantages than by the former treaty was thought of, and the people of Britain may now see, not only on what disadvantage for us the former treaty was negotiated, when we were to have our markets made for us by our Dutch neighbours; but they may see that all the noise that hath been made of the present ministry and of the present managers being in the interest of France, amounts only to this, that whereas the other gave up all our interest to the Dutch and the emperor, these men are careful that Britain may reap some advantages by the treaty, as well as the rest of the confederates.

Indeed it has been something wonderful in the common discourse of the people on these subjects, to find the generality poisoned by these self-denying notions, viz., that all which can be obtained from France must be given to the emperor and the Dutch, and the king of Portugal, but nothing to the queen of Great Britain; as if our strength were no acquisition, or our power any safety to the alliance; nay, rather, as if it were dangerous to the confederacy to entrust any part of that we have fought so long for, and bought so dear, to the queen of Great Britain. One would think the Dutch themselves went on that notion, when, as was apparent, they appeared uneasy and jealous at the preparations made by her majesty to send a fleet and forces to Canada: while not knowing the design, they apprehended it to be for the taking possession of some place or other in the Spanish America; although by the —th article of the grand alliance it was agreed that her majesty might lawfully have done so if she had thought fit. These things, however of no other consequence, yet serve to let us see how different, as respecting us, the manner of the allies hath been in all the transactions of this war, and how different their views have been in all their steps towards a peace, from our constant behaviour, in the same heads as they respected them; and that in all these occasions it has been the constant maxim of our confederates, that we were to have no share in anything, but that the Dutch, under a notion of a barrier and security to their frontiers, should make large acquisitions, both to their territory and their commerce, both which have been consented to from hence; whether it be to the honour or to the infamy of those who have given in to these measures is left to the impartial part of mankind to determine: it is evident that at length the just representations of the British ministers took place, and the Dutch, after much difficulty, have yielded that the demands of the allies be given into the French, although in one and the same instrument, yet in separate heads; and the British plenipotentiaries agree and propose to add at the end of every head this general one in satisfaction of all the rest of the allies, a clause sufficient to remove the scandal and reproach early cast upon the present management, viz., that they designed to make a separate peace, and had actually concluded the conditions thereof with France before the congress was to begin. I must crave pardon if I make these several instances of the usage her majesty hath met with from her allies rank in with their other conduct relating to forces and quotas which have already been made public, and altogether to come under the title of deficiencies; for if there had been a more disinterested conjunction of counsel and assistance, or measures in the proceedings of the allies to and with her Britannic majesty and her ministers, no question this treaty had been with more ease brought on, with more mutual assistance to, and confidence in one another entered into, and perhaps the success might have been more promising also.

There seems to be no occasion here of entering into the clauses which the Dutch have obtained in any of their treaties and agreements with us, by which they have gained advantages in commerce particularly to our prejudice, because even the Dutch themselves acknowledge them in their late letter to her majesty; only declaring that they do not design to take the advantage of those articles.

I am very willing to believe the States-general, especially while a good understanding among the allies, and particularly between them and us, is so necessary to them, would not make use of the advantages which were given them by that treaty; but this does by no means deny, nay, it not tacitly only, but even explicitly, as it seems to indifferent judgments, grants that such advantages are given to the Dutch by that treaty.

See the declaration of the Dutch on this head more particularly, as follows:—

"For having learned that the principal exceptions taken to the said treaty were, that it might prove prejudicial to the commerce of her majesty's subjects in the Spanish Netherlands; and that some had entertained an ill-grounded and erroneous opinion, that the States might design to take advantage by it to make themselves masters of the said Spanish Netherlands, their high mightinesses did declare positively, and by this letter do voluntarily repeat it, that it never was their intention, nor ever will be, to make use of the said treaty, or of their garrisons in the fortified places of the country, to prejudice in any manner the commerce of her majesty's subjects; but that their opinion is, that whatever relates to navigation and commerce, there ought to be settled on an entire equality, that so her majesty's subjects may not be charged with higher duties of importation or exportation than theirs, to the end commerce may be carried on there by both nations on an equal foot."

Here the States-general acknowledge, that whatever relates to navigation and commerce in the Spanish Netherlands, ought to be settled on an entire equality: this is owning what her majesty has since claimed to be just, and yet that it has not been so is apparent also; and in the same letter they acknowledge it again by adding, "that if there be some articles of the said treaty which, without affecting the essentials of it, may be thought to want explanation, her majesty shall find them ready and willing to treat thereupon, with all the facility and condescension that can reasonably be required of them."

Now, however satisfactory such an offer is from the Dutch, who indeed cannot be supposed to be ignorant of the justice of her majesty's demands in this case, as not to come to a further explanation on these heads, yet all this adds to and confirms the complaint against the conduct, at least of those employed from hence, who in behalf of their own country could pass such a treaty and sign such a convention, by which it appears, were not the Dutch willing to explain themselves upon it, there was effectually given up to them both the sovereignty and the commerce of the Spanish Netherlands, the last being exclusive of the English. There is no doubt to me that this was evident at that time, and therefore it is that I cannot place it to the account of ignorance or inadvertency; for the duke of Marlborough saw into it, and therefore how willing soever in other cases to oblige the Dutch, he had not so little concern for his own safety as not to know a British parliament would certainly one time or other call a treaty so dishonourable and prejudicial to Britain in question, and therefore, no doubt, whatever other reasons his grace might have also, he thought fit not to be drawn in to set his hand to it, but refused to be a party to it, though at that time a plenipotentiary from hence: but another hand and other management effected it; and now the Dutch are willing to explain these things to our satisfaction, which would admit of many remarks as to the former part of it which I omit, because satisfaction will be now obtained: only this cannot, in justice to the present ministry and parliament, be omitted, viz., that if this inquiry into these things had not been begun, those explanations had never been obtained, and the Dutch had been left in a capacity, when they thought fit, to exclude the subjects of Britain from all trade and commerce in the Spanish Netherlands; and had been enabled, whenever their occasions made it for their purpose, to have seized upon the Spanish Netherlands, and have made themselves entire masters thereof; so that the preventing these things seems wholly owing to the vigilance of the present ministry, and to the vigorous resolutions of the present parliament.

There seems indeed one clause in the said letter, which some people are very forward here to take hold of; insinuating that the Dutch complain of being tricked in England into a consent to a negotiation of peace, by being put in hopes that after they should do so, the other affair of the barrier should be adjusted to their satisfaction; the words are these, "that however, having not long since been informed, that in England some were of opinion that the said treaty in some articles might be prejudicial to her majesty's subjects, they commissioned M. Buys, their envoy extraordinary, then going to England, to inquire what those points were that might be thought grievances, and authorized to treat about them with her majesty's ministers, and to remove, if possible, the difficulties by all the explanations that should appear necessary; which they were put in hopes would not be very hard to do, when once they should have consented to concur with her majesty as they did to procure a congress for the negotiation of a general peace. But that the misfortune was, that the said M. Buys, during his residence in England, was not able to finish that affair to reciprocal satisfaction; and that it having been remitted to the Hague, no way has hitherto been found to terminate it there neither; though their high mightinesses think they have shown all the readiness to comply with any just expedient that could reasonably be expected from them."

This seems to be very ill turned by a party among themselves, and implies, as they pretend, as if the British court had made light of the matter, and promised to adjust it if the Dutch would do so and so; but that after the Dutch had complied and concurred with her majesty to procure a congress for the negotiation of a general peace, they could never obtain the promised condition, although they had shown "all the readiness to comply with any just expedient that could reasonably be expected from them."

This is a black charge, and had not the Dutch with much more integrity than these people anticipated this calumny, and given the true reason for their said concurring with her majesty, to be their disposition and persuasion of the absolute necessity there was in the present conjuncture for the cultivating and maintaining a good friendship, perfect confidence and union between their said states and her majesty, which, for the better authority, I give you also from their own letter, "that during the whole course of her majesty's glorious reign, they have had nothing more at heart than to cultivate and maintain with her a good friendship, perfect confidence and union, and to corroborate them the most they possibly could; having always judged them absolutely necessary, and especially in the present conjuncture. That they likewise judged they could not give a better proof of this their disposition and persuasion than that which they lately gave in agreeing to the proposition which her majesty had caused to be made to them, to begin the negotiation of a general peace with the enemy, and in concurring with her majesty to facilitate the bringing together of the ministers of all the high allies to the congress at Utrecht."

This effectually contradicts what before is suggested, viz., that they were induced "to concur with her majesty as they did, to procure a congress for the negotiation of a general peace." Upon their being put in hopes that it would not be very hard to do, after they had consented so to concur with her majesty; I say, this is so contradicted by what is said before, that I was tempted to doubt both the said paragraphs could not be in one and the same letter; and indeed it seems shocking to any reader, that their high mightinesses should say in one part of their letter that they concurred with her majesty, to give the best proof of their disposition to cultivate a good friendship, perfect confidence and union with her majesty: and in another part of the same letter to say that they concurred "with her majesty as they did to procure a congress for the negotiation of a general peace."

These considerations being too hard for my understanding, are left to the logical discussion of the party here, whose talent so eminently lies in equivocation and insignificant raillery; who, when they have chewed it and mumbled it, like an ass upon thistles, will bring it out the same thorny, crabbed inconsistency that they found it.

But while we are leaving them to this difficult work it may be needful to look further, for we have yet much more work cut out from Holland than in the foregoing piece; the States-general having received a new brush from the British parliament, are very solicitous to wash their negro skin as clean as they can from the imputations which have lain so plainly against them, but now they find it more difficult than they did before; for till now they had only pamphlets and general clamours to answer, such as the suspicions of the people, and the information of a few had made loud; and which began to make them uneasy, these were treated with some contempt by the states; and more by their friends here.

But the parliament, finding more truth in these things than perhaps they expected, and much more than the faction pretended, thought it required an extraordinary sanction to make them less disputed; and thought it just to make them public with an undisputed authority that the people ought to be undeceived, and that the quarrels about the truth of fact ought to cease among the people: for this reason, having caused all the particulars to be exactly and faithfully laid before them, by the report of the commissioners of the Admiralty, and other proper officers, and those particulars to be critically examined, they deduced from thence the matters of fact as they really were, and making all the cases plain in which the government had been imposed upon by their allies, and the Dutch deficient among others, they came to several resolves about the same, and drawing those resolves up into general heads, referring to the particulars for their demonstration, they humbly represented all in an address to her majesty, and caused both the said resolves and the address to be printed for the conviction of all her majesty's good subjects; and to confute and silence a party who, as above said, had made it their business to ridicule all that had been said of these matters as false and empty notions infused into people's heads to raise ill blood and create prejudices against the Dutch. If these things, coming forth with such an undisputed authority, did a little surprise the world, and consequently open the eyes of the people, much more would they surprise the States-general, whose interest it had so long been to have the people of Britain kept as ignorant as possible of these matters; and finding it absolutely necessary that something should be said to puzzle the cause a little, and to furnish their friends with arguments for their defence, they issue a paper, entituled as follows:—"A Memorial, serving to prove that the States-general of the United Netherlands are unjustly charged by the resolutions or votes of the house of commons of the Parliament of Great Britain, and by the subsequent address of the said house of commons thereupon, presented to her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, with having been deficient in divers respects during the present War, in furnishing what, according to their quota or contingent they stood engaged for, towards carrying on the said War."

This is the paper which I come now to examine, and in which if I should discover that the States-general have really been so far from clearing themselves of the charge so positively laid upon them in parliament, that in every part they either directly or tacitly acknowledge it, then there will remain little force in the rest of their paper.

In considering this new and great affair of the Dutch memorial, it seems very proper to make as few circumlocutions as possible, and come directly to the point. Our introduction, therefore, shall consist rather of laying down a list of the particulars which we shall leave out than of what we shall put into the following tract; what shall be dropped as foreign to the case in hand, and not worth either the author's while to note, or the reader's to be concerned about. As first, it shall take up little of our time to animadvert on the insolence unparalleled of a scandalous mercenary who, in defiance of a British parliament, and while that parliament was actually sitting, should have the face to publish the answer or defence of a foreign nation against his own country.

If a man have received an affront from another, and meets one of his servants and says to him, "You, Jack, or you, Thomas, pray tell your master I say he is a villain and a rascal;" will not the servant, if he have any manners or sense of his duty, say to him, "Sir, let him be what he will, he is my master, and it is not fit for me to tell him so; pray employ somebody else." On the other hand, if the ignorant fellow should have so little wit or manners as to carry this message to his master, would not the master say to him, "let the man be what he will, you are an unmannerly rascal for bringing me such a message, since you were my servant and not his?" And would he not very justly cane him, and turn him out of his service for his impudence?

This case, as it is unprecedented, unless in the same person who did the like once before, so it will be doubly unprecedented in the public justice, if he is uncorrected for it. Nay, by how much more the party glory in and boast of having insulted the parliament and the government in this publication, by so much the more necessity they bring upon the said parliament to vindicate themselves, and punish the persons with their utmost vigour: but this is humbly left and submitted to the parliament, who no doubt will do themselves and their defender justice in this case.

Next it shall take up no part of this discourse to inquire whether the Dutch have ordered these sheets to be thus published in England or no. We are not ignorant how many ways of late the foreign powers concerned in this war have privately endeavoured to make themselves and their actings with her majesty popular here, appealing, as it were, from her majesty to her subjects; but we shall not suppose, however, that they are yet arrived at such contempt of their alliances with her Britannic majesty as to appear in an action which derogates so much from the usual civilities due from one ally to another, as that they should openly and avowedly make an attempt of this nature.

This leads us to consider how prudently the parliament of Britain has acted in this case, in which perhaps the Dutch, as subtle a nation as they are, and how good soever their politics have been in other cases, will be put to it how to behave themselves between the two extremes of owning or disavowing this publication of their memorial.

The parliament have first stigmatised the paper itself as a false and scandalous libel, but in this censure they do not call it the memorial of the States-general, but a pretended memorial; now as the lie is here given by the whole British nation, and that most justly also, it remains for the Dutch to show us how they please to take it; if they own the paper and the publication of it here, they take the lie aforesaid to themselves, and are obliged to fall under the charge, hush it up, and thereby own it just or resent it, which we suppose they will consider of before they go about it. On the other side, if they take upon them to mention, answer or vindicate this paper, they own not the paper only, but the mean step of causing it to be published in England in especial insult to her majesty and to the parliament of Britain then sitting, and what evil consequences may follow such a thing must lie at their doors." It is true that, as the parliament has not thought fit to take it but as a spurious and pretended paper, we might very well do so also; but as we see it published in all parts of Europe, and allowed in those prints in Holland, who are said to write cum privilegio; and as it is in these countries styled, "The Answer of the States, &c.," we cannot but treat it as such, or at least as an answer for the States, if not the answer of the States. And that this may be justified by good evidence, the reader may observe that our prints, after the resentment of the parliament of Britain had made it too dangerous for our newsmen to go on with the printing it, gave this account, April 4th:—

Hague, April 17th. All our public prints, published by authority, have been and continue full of the States' reply to the resolution of the commons of Britain, in vindication of their conduct.

This we cannot but think gives sufficient authority to a writer, whether the States-general are concerned in the publication at London or no, to suppose them to be the real authors of the paper itself, and that it is really the States' reply, as above, and as such we shall therefore consider it.

The first thing meet for observation in it is, what we ought not by any means to pass over, viz., that the States-general confess the charge, acknowledging the fact directly, viz., that the quotas for sea-service were not supplied, or, as the resolution of the house of commons express it, viz., That the States-general have been deficient in their quotas for sea-service in proportion to the number of ships provided by her majesty, &c.

To this the States in their memorial, after a very long introduction, answer two things; first, that the quota the British court proposed to fit out, particularly in the years 1704 and 1705, were too many, or more than was needful for the service, viz., more than was needed to make the confederates superior to the French in the Mediterranean, and that therefore they, the States, did not think themselves obliged to furnish so many. That whereas we should have seventy-four ships the year 1704, and seventy-nine the year 1705, they thought the rate of twenty-four ships of their State a proportion against sixty of her majesty's, and that they concerted it so with admiral Mitchel. So that it is plain here, from this very memorial, that the States do no manner of way deny the deficiency itself, but evade the force of the charge by disputing the proportions; and explaining what they understood by the two-fifths to three-fifths so insisted on by the parliament, and how they ought to be understood by others. Again, they would patch up the deficiency aforesaid, by bringing in the number of their men-of-war employed in the north seas to make up their quota, and they express this very subtilely, as a thing which they think ought to be set against the number of ships employed by the British in the narrow seas; this may be considered immediately in their own terms; but first it is fit to note that both these arguments confess the charge in fact, only offer these explanations or extenuations: so that the truth of what the parliament has published in their representation and address stands fast, is acknowledged and confessed by the States, and needs no further defence. But it comes next of course to see what force this allegation of the Dutch as to their ships in the north seas ought to have in this argument; and if it appears that these are not and ought not to be reckoned in the proportion above, and that they were not reckoned in the first proportion stated and agreed with the States-general, then all the consequences drawn from those proportions will stand the States in no stead, as to any defence to be made by them against the charge. In the examination of this, we meet with this clause in the state of proportions laid before the house, by the lords of the Admiralty, which stands diametrically opposite to what the States allege in their memorial in these words, viz., that, by the treaties between the queen of Great Britain and the States-general, their proportion of the ships of the line of battle, to act in conjunction with those of this kingdom in the Channel, and in and about the Mediterranean, ought to be three to five.

The first observation meet to be made here is, that the treaties between the queen of Great Britain and the States have expressly settled their respective proportions, which indeed the memorial seems to evade, by alleging that, in the grand alliance, the respective parties were to assist with all their forces; then complimenting Britain (I do not say flattering) with being more powerful than the States, they thence deduce the reasonableness of the forces of one being more than the other. But the States-general would think themselves but ill answered if this way of argument was made use of with them, for what is all this to the equality of proportions? Have not the Dutch always, as the memorial acknowledges, treated every year with the queen upon the just proportion of every year's service? And has not the queen sent admiral Mitchel always to settle that point? Now the present question is not whether our nation is most powerful, or whether we are to send more troops than the States-general, or more ships; but whether the proportions being settled annually by agreement, the States-general have supplied the numbers agreed on by those treaties, and sent as many as they agreed to send or no? if they have done this, then it is true the first settled proportions are of no weight. On the other hand, if they have not, the general treaty of employing all their forces on any other are equally of no force.

Now it is apparent that the States-general have not supplied their quota of ships for the services for which they agreed to supply them, and therefore we on our side justly complain; and the account as it was laid before the house by the lords commissioners of the Admiralty, and by her majesty's command, is very plain in the case, admitting of no dispute; wherefore we have for a further and more effectual convincing the advocates for the States-general in this case, caused it to be annexed at large, and is as follows:—

By the lords commissioners for executing the office of lord high-admiral of Great Britain, Ireland, &c. of all her majesty's plantations.

Her majesty's pleasure having been signified to us by Mr. secretary St. John, that we should (in pursuance of an address from the house of commons) prepare an account of the quotas of her majesty's ships and those of her allies during this present war, and what agreements and conventions have been made for the said quotas, and how the same have been observed, we do in obedience to her majesty's command, humbly report:

That by the treaties between the queen of Great Britain and the States-general, their proportion of the line of battle, to act in conjunction with those of this kingdom in the Channel and in and about the Mediterranean, ought to be three to our five.

That since the commencement of this war, not only sir David Mitchel, but sir James Wishart have been appointed by her majesty's command to go to Holland and adjust with the States-general or their deputies, the quotas of their ships of war to act in conjunction with those of her majesty as aforesaid, and what was done in pursuance of those treaties was sent to her majesty's principal secretary-of-state, to which we humbly refer.

And as to the number of ships in the line of battle, which the States-general each year during the war have joined to her majesty's on the forementioned services, the same will appear by the following account, which hath been computed with as much exactness as the nature of the things will bear, viz.: in the year 1702 her majesty had forty-four ships employed in the Channel and Soundings of the line of battle, and thirty in and about the Mediterranean, making in the whole seventy-four, and they were joined with no more than thirty-three of the States-general, whereas there should have been forty-four.

1703. Seventy-nine of her majesty's ships were employed in the aforesaid services, and but twenty-two of the States-general, which should have been forty-seven.

1704. There were seventy-four of the queen's ships and eighteen Dutch, which should have been forty-four.

1705. Seventy-nine of her majesty's ships and twenty-eight Dutch, which should have been forty-seven.

1706. There were but fifteen ships of the Dutch acted in conjunction with seventy-eight of the queen's ships, whereas there should have been forty-six.

1707. To seventy-two of her majesty's there were no more than twenty-seven of the States-general, instead of forty-three.

1708. The States-general joined twenty-five ships of the line to sixty-nine of her majesty's, instead of forty-two.

1709. No more than eleven ships of the States were joined to sixty-seven of the queen's, instead of forty-three.

1710. Her majesty had sixty-two employed in the aforesaid service, and the States-general appointed no more than thirteen to act in conjunction with them, instead of thirty-seven.

1711. There were no more than twelve Dutch ships instead of thirty-five, appointed to act with fifty-nine of the queen's ships, which, as well as those in the preceding year, were employed in the Mediterranean, and not so much as one allotted by the States-general to act in concert with those of her majesty against the enemies' ships at Dunkirk and in the Channel.

Here seemeth a most convincing proof of the matter of fact. Now let us see what Dutch cunning will bring them off of this, for it is a home charge, and they will not easily parry the thrust. The memorial in truth does not attempt it, and therefore the matter of fact, as I said before, stands granted. But they plead then that we have not treated them fairly; for, say they, "secondly, it must be observed in the aforesaid account, notice is taken only of the ships of this State, which in conjunction with those of her majesty were employed in the Mediterranean and the Channel, and that in the north sea, which this State during the war has generally had the care of, is wholly omitted: which mention of those ships only of this State which have acted in conjunction with those of her majesty, and the omission of the north sea, make so great a difference between the number of ships reckoned by the aforesaid account to have been furnished by Great Britain, and that said in the same account to be furnished by this State, that probably this difference gave occasion to the forming the foresaid prejudicial resolution or vote of the lower house, which possibly would not have been formed might this State have first been heard upon it."

This plea needs no further examination than to look back to the second paragraph of the Admiralty's report above, where it is affirmed, "That by the treaties between the queen of Great Britain and the States-general, their proportion of ships of the line of battle to act in conjunction with those of this kingdom, in the Channel and in and about the Mediterranean, ought to be three to our five."

It must be surprising to all that read the memorial of the States, to hear them insist with so many introductory paragraphs, and lay so much stress upon their employing ships in the north seas, when it is thus proved that the north seas are quite left out of the question, and the treaties they had made were only for ships to be employed in the Channel and in and about the Mediterranean. Now if they have furnished their quota as agreed upon with us for the Channel and the Mediterranean, though they had sent no ships to the north seas, we conceive the commons had made no representation; nor had they any reason, for there was no mention of it in the agreements of treaties aforesaid; but if they have not furnished their quotas for the Channel, although they had sent a hundred sail to the north seas, it had been nothing to the case any more than their sending ships to Batavia, for the same reason as above; the north-sea guard being not mentioned in the said treaties and annual agreements. To what purpose then is all the long description of the necessity of the sending ships to the north seas? And what can be more surprising than to find their high mightinesses arguing what is and was at that very time concerted and adjusted by them, with the persons actually sent over by the queen of Great Britain for that purpose; and which in the very same paragraph they acknowledge was so concerted and adjusted? For the more ready assisting the reader to make a full and free judgment hereof, the long pretended defence on that head is here copied out of the said memorial, and is as follows, viz.:—"It must be observed that, by the seventh article of the treaty of the 9th of June, 1703, by which that agreement was renewed, it is provided that the number of ships of war to be furnished by each for their whole quota according to the said agreement should be regulated every year, and that the rendezvous, as well as the places where the ships should be employed, should likewise be agreed upon every year; accordingly this has been concerted yearly, her majesty having to that purpose for several years sent over one of her admirals, at which times two things principally were taken into deliberation, namely, the number of shipping and the places where they should be employed; upon which the projects on the part of her majesty proposed commonly the employing a greater number than was proposed by this State, and also more regard was had to the Channel than to the north sea, of which north sea not the least mention is made in the aforesaid account of the lords commissioners of the Admiralty, from which omission it partly comes that they reckon so low what this State has furnished to the sea service. The sentiment of this State upon this subject has always been, that the number of ships to be sent yearly to sea ought to be regulated according to the force which it might reasonably be judged the enemy could yearly bring into the Mediterranean, the Channel, and the north sea, so that men might be morally sure that the fleets and squadrons which on the part of Great Britain and this State should act in conjunction or separately, would be superior to those of the enemy. The term in conjunction or separately was used because it was ever the opinion of this State that her majesty's ships and those of this State sent to Portugal and the Mediterranean ought to act in conjunction; and that the security of the Channel ought to be left to the care of her majesty, and that of the north sea to the care of this State, because the Channel is best situated for Great Britain with respect to its countries, harbours, and commerce, and the north sea for this State with respect to its countries, harbours, and commerce; yet so, that if unexpectedly the enemy should bring any fleet or considerable squadrons into the Channel, or into the north sea, then the squadrons on both sides, in whole or in part, according to the circumstances of affairs, might join each other."

It is observed here, the States-general first acknowledge in this paragraph of their memorial, that both the number of ships to be furnished by each party, and the places where those ships should be employed was concerted yearly, her majesty having for that purpose for several years sent over one of her admirals: nay, they repeat it again, viz., at which times two things principally were taken into deliberation, viz., the number of shipping, and the places where they should be employed. We can have no occasion to make answer to this in any other manner than by appeal to the States-general themselves, and inquiring them whether in the quotas of ships, at those times agreed on, and the place where they should be employed, any place but the Channel and in and about the Mediterranean was ever included or inserted. If it were, then we must give it against the representation of the house of commons, and acquit the States-general; but if not, what means all the preamble and circumlocution of this long memorial? and to what purpose is it said this or that were the sentiments of the States-general? The representation and address of the commons, and the report of the British admiralty can say nothing to what was or was not the sentiments of the States-general. But to what was their agreement, and what was concerted yearly between the queen of Great Britain and the States, that they may inquire about, and that they do represent fairly and faithfully, viz., that the Dutch have not furnished the quotas which they were obliged by treaty to do for the service of the confederates in the Channel, and in or about the Mediterranean; what they did in the north seas, as being no part of the said agreement, the said representation has no ground to meddle with it, nor does it take the least notice of it, as is supposed, for that reason.

It may not be foreign to this case to inquire a little here into the reason and equity also of this argument about the north-seas' service; in doing whereof, if it shall be found that this service ought not to be thought of in establishing the said quotas of ships, as being wholly and solely a work of interest, protecting their own commerce, fishing, &c., in which the allies have no concern, and that the English had, at the same time, several squadrons in those seas, which were never esteemed part of the said quota on the British side, and therefore that the like ought not to be insisted on on the part of the States-general, then all the arguments drawn from these things will fall to the ground, and the impressions which those resolutions of the house of commons have made on the people must necessarily remain.

It is not questioned at all, nor does it seem material to this case, but that in the several alliances made between England and the States-general, they were mutually obliged to assist each other with all their forces. But this is so far from taking off the edge of the complaint, that it rather fixes and confirms the same; for that we allege that the Dutch have not assisted with all their forces, and to determine the signification of the same term, and how the same is to be understood, we are to observe that, lest it should create hereafter any misunderstanding among the allies, the several quotas or proportions of the allies were settled between every the particular nations annually. Now the parliament's complaint is clear in this, nor does the memorial of the States offer one word of answer to it; they do not complain in general that the States have not supplied their whole forces, but that they have not supplied those several proportions by which their whole forces were by virtue of their subsequent agreement to be understood; and this appears from the very memorial itself, where their high mightinesses acknowledge it, and better proof cannot be desired. See their own words:—

"By the seventh article of the treaty of the 9th of June, 1703, by which that agreement was renewed, it is provided that the number of ships of war to be furnished by each for their whole quota, according to the said agreement, should be regulated every year, and that the rendezvous, as well as the places where the ships should be employed, should likewise be agreed upon every year; accordingly this has been concerted yearly, her majesty having for that purpose for several years sent over one of her admirals, at which times two things principally were taken into deliberation, viz., the number of shipping and the places where they should be employed."

Here it is acknowledged by the States that the quotas were adjusted between us and them, both as to number of ships and where to be employed.

There are but two objections which the memorial pretends to make after this; the first is, whether the ships which the States furnished for the guard of the north seas should not be esteemed part of their quota? and secondly, whether the number of ships mentioned to be employed by her majesty in the Channel and in the Mediterranean were necessary? these are also their own words, to which may be briefly answered, first, that after they had acknowledged as above is said, that the number of ships and places where the same should be employed were every year concerted, it can no more be asked whether they were necessary; the question rather lies fairly, whether the numbers concerted were respectively supplied, if there had appeared any subsequent alteration in the face of the war? So that if it had seemed to the States less necessary to send so large a number of ships as was agreed, it must have been reasonable that a new concert between the allies should have been made, and some mutual agreement offered for lessening the said number on both sides. But to agree first, that such a number on both sides should be supplied, and then shortening that number on their side, without signifying to the British court that they thought fewer ships enough, so that the British should be left to send their full quota as agreed, and the States only make an abatement, this can be no fair treatment of the British, nor is it esteemed fair dealing in our country, whatever it may be in Holland; therefore the complaint of the commons in this case seems very just, and is not at all answered by this memorial, for that the States-general did not supply the number of ships which by their annual agreement was concerted between them and her majesty; secondly, but say the States, we did supply a great squadron in the north seas, which ought to be esteemed a part of our proportion; and all the reasons given for this way of acting are, that such were the sentiments of the States-general; yet in another part of the said memorial it is owned, and in the report of the commissioners of the Admiralty it is expressly said, those quotas were settled only for such ships as were to act conjunctly or separately in the Channel and the Mediterranean. But because this argument is of too much value to have it depend upon the dubious construction of terms, it may be observed, first, that there is no parity or equality in this argument, for that the concert of proportions of ships to be supplied by us and the States respected only the particular seas in which the power of the French was particularly formidable, and where their main fleets were to be expected, as in the Straits and the Channel, or on the coasts of Portugal and Spain. And that the British nation have kept great squadrons and fleets out in sundry other parts of the world, as the Dutch have done in the north sea, without reckoning any such ships into the quota or proportions of the fleets to be furnished as before, for the carrying on the war, such have been the fleets and ships constantly sent to the West Indies, to St. Helena, to the Canaries, &c.; by which it appears that, whatever the sentiments of the States of Holland have been, as above, the sentiments of the British court have always been, that each ally ought to have supplied their full quota of such ships as were concerted for the service of the war in the Channel and in the Mediterranean, without esteeming such ships as part thereof which they respectively were obliged to furnish for the protection of their commerce in any other part of the world; and that this was the real sentiments of the States-general as well as of her majesty, appears for that in all the ships sent by either of the powers into other parts of the world, as into the north seas, the Baltic, the West Indies, St. Helena, and the like, they very seldom acted in conjunction, but sent their respective squadrons separately as the necessity of their affairs required. Nor did those ships act in conjunction on any occasion, save only as they found it necessary to take the ships of each other nation under convoy, or in their protection, and made use of the harbours of each confederate as there might be occasion. This is manifest in that, notwithstanding the great fleets which the States-general have upon all occasions sent to the north seas, as is alleged, the British court have been obliged also to send annual squadrons to those seas for the safety of their trade, as well to Russia as to the east country, the Elbe and the Weser, as also for the defence of the coast of Scotland and Ireland; which ships, though equal, if not superior to the numbers sent into those seas by the States-general, have not been accounted by her majesty as any part of the proportion of ships concerted as above said with the States.

This therefore can never be the reason of the report of the commissioners of the Admiralty; and it is surprising to all those who know the state of these things, to hear the memorial say, the States-general had the care of the north seas, as they do when they sum up that part of their case, as follows, viz.: "It must be observed that, in the aforesaid account, notice is taken only of the ships of this State, which in conjunction with those of her majesty were employed in the Mediterranean and the Channel; and that the north sea, which this State during the war has generally had the care of, is wholly omitted: which two things, viz., the mention of those ships only of this state which have acted in conjunction with those of her majesty, and the omission of the north sea, make so great difference between the number of ships reckoned by the foresaid account to have been furnished by this State, that probably this difference gave occasion to the forming the foresaid prejudicial resolution or vote of the lower house, which possibly would not have been formed might this State have first been heard upon it."

It should seem needful here to enter into an inquiry what number of ships her majesty has from time to time sent into the north seas, and how the States-general may be said to have had the care of the north seas, when it is well known the British trade, nay, and even often the Dutch to Archangel, have been convoyed out and home by her majesty's ships; and the coast of Scotland, the mouth of the Baltic, and the Elbe, have been constantly guarded by the British ships.

Thus by the plainest reasoning in the world the memorial is fallacious, for that the deficiencies complained of remain confessed by the States themselves, the reasons pretended to justify themselves are directly contrary to the concerted proportions and treaties made between the said States-general and the queen's majesty; and this is exactly agreeable to the report of the commissioners of the Admiralty and the resolutions of the house of commons.

The like fallacious way of arguing appears in the case of the land-forces or troops, in which still their high mightinesses do not deny the matter of fact alleged in the said address, but excuse and extenuate the same by their efforts otherwise, as particularly they allege an article of their raising troops before us, and this they say deserves some compensation; that is, that they having raised fifty thousand men before us, they should be therefore allowed to maintain fewer than they agreed for afterwards; or, to speak plainly, that because they were obliged to a quicker armament than the British, therefore they were to have leave to break in upon future concert, and fail in the numbers they were to bring in afterwards. This seems no unfair construction of the first clause of the memorial relating to the troops, which is as follows:—

"In the first place, it must not be omitted to observe on the said estimate, that in the general charge for the year 1701, the 11,992 men which the United Netherlands kept up after the peace of Ryswick, are mixed up with the 31,866 men which were taken into service immediately after the death of Charles II. king of Spain; and that for the year 1702, not only the troops which this State took into service that year, but those hired the beginning of the foregoing year, are reckoned all together; which, if put down more distinctly, would have shown that this State had reinforced their troops with above 50,000 men a considerable time before Great Britain came to make any particular augmentation; which earlier arming, to the excessive expense of this State, well deserved to be allowed for by some kind of compensation."

What can the words "deserve some compensation" be supposed to signify, but that the States-general concluded from thence that their future deficiency was to be allowed because of their more arming than the English? which any one that remembers the occasion may find other reasons to give for, and which the States-general themselves seem to acknowledge, or at least to hint at, which was in short, that the parliament and people of England did not come into the measures of the last war, or perhaps believe it so necessary at first as the States did, and therefore did not vote such large sums for their proportion as the States-general required, and this they now allege should be made up afterwards. This is gathered from the following words in the memorial:—

This State was obliged to be content with Great Britain's furnishing in the beginning of the war no more than 40,000 men in the Netherlands, in so great a disproportion with respect to this State; not because there was any convention or agreement made about it, or that it was at all reasonable, but because no more was consented to by the parliament; the reasons of which are probably fresh in the remembrance of many; and that at that time the only course this State could take was to burden itself with so great a disproportion, and to wait till, in the continuance of the war, it should be made good to them."

This may imply that the States-general desired to have this disproportion made good to them afterwards by the English, but does not prove that it ought to have been made good, or that the queen of Great Britain had agreed to make it good, much less did it signify that they were thereby entitled to make it good themselves by a deficiency in such quotas and proportions as they should agree afterwards to send into the field.

Upon the whole, then, it seems the sum of the case is this, that the Dutch have really been deficient in the said quotas; but that, according to their own sentiments, they might lawfully be so, notwithstanding express treaties and conventions to the contrary; and that these sentiments arise from their thinking fit to make reprisal or stoppage upon England for the Dutch coming into the war a year before us; and because we did not think fit to come into the alliance sooner, they are making us pay for our standing out.

More or less than this cannot be made of their long memorial, and as to the justice and equity of this, the world is left to judge of that affair.

The author of this had resolved to add here some remarks about the pretence of carrying on the war with all their forces; and the States saying that Britain is more powerful, and therefore must bring in more forces, making themselves judges of who is or is not most powerful; but her majesty's answer to the States, since published, has made this so clear, and pressed it so close upon the Dutch, that it seems needless to say any more to that point.

FROM THE INTELLIGENCER, 1730.

No. VI.

O patria! O divum domus!

When I travel through any part of this unhappy kingdom, and I have now, by several excursions made from Dublin, gone through most counties of it, it raises two passions in my breast of a different kind; an indignation against those vile betrayers and insulters of it, who insinuate themselves into favour by saying it is a rich nation; and a sincere passion for the natives, who are sunk to the lowest degree of misery and poverty, whose houses are dunghills, whose victuals are the blood of their cattle, or the herbs in the field; and whose clothing, to the dishonour of God and man, is nakedness. Yet notwithstanding all the dismal appearances, it is the common phrase of an upstart race of people, who have suddenly sprung up like the dragon's teeth among us, that Ireland was never known to be so rich as it is now; by which, as I apprehend, they can only mean themselves, for they have skipped over the Channel from the vantage ground of a dunghill upon no other merit, either visible or divinable, than that of not having been born among us.

This is the modern way of planting colonies—et ubi solitudinem faciunt, id imperium vocant. When those who are so unfortunate to be born here are excluded from the meanest preferments, and deemed incapable of being entertained even as common soldiers, whose poor stipend is but 4d. a-day: no trade, no emoluments, no encouragement for learning among the natives, who yet by a perverse consequence are divided into factions with as much violence and rancour as if they had the wealth of the Indies to contend for, it puts me in mind of a fable which I read in a monkish author. He quotes for it one of the Greek mythologists, that once upon a time a colony of large dogs (called the Molossi) transplanted themselves from Epirus to Atalia, where they seized those parts of the countries most fertile in flesh of all kinds, obliging the native dogs to retire from their best kennels, to live under ditches and bushes; but to preserve good neighbourhood and peace, and finding likewise that the Atalian dogs might be of some use in the low offices of life, they passed a decree, that the natives should be entitled to the short ribs, tips of tails, knuckle-bones, and guts of all the game, which they were obliged by their masters to run down. This condition was accepted; and what was a little singular, while the Molossian dogs kept a good understanding among themselves, living in peace and luxury, these Atalian curs were perpetually snarling, growling, barking and tearing out each other's throats: nay, sometimes those of the best quality among them were seen to quarrel with as much rancour for a rotten gut as if it had been a fat haunch of venison. But what need we wonder at this in dogs when the same is every day practised by men?

Last year I travelled from Dublin to Dundalk, through a country esteemed the most fruitful part of this kingdom, and so nature intended it. But no ornaments and improvements of such a scene were visible—no habitations fit for gentlemen, no farmers' houses, few fields of corn, and almost a bare face of nature, without new plantations of any kind, only a few miserable cottages at three or four miles' distance, and one church in the centre between this city and Drogheda. When I arrived at this last town, the first mortifying sight was the ruins of several churches, battered down by that usurper Cromwell, whose fanatic zeal made more desolation in a few days than the piety of succeeding prelates or the wealth of the town have in more than sixty years attempted to repair.

Perhaps the inhabitants, through a high strain of virtue, have, in imitation of the Athenians, made a solemn resolution never to rebuild those sacred edifices, but rather leave them in ruins, as monuments to perpetuate the detestable memory of that hellish instrument of rebellion, desolation and murder. For the Athenians, when Mardonius had ravaged a great part of Greece, took a formal oath at the isthmus to lose their lives rather than their liberty—to stand by their leaders to the last—to spare the cities of such barbarians as they conquered: and, what crowned all, the conclusion of their oath was, We will never repair any of the temples which they have burned and destroyed, that they may appear to posterity as so many monuments of these wicked barbarians. This was a glorious resolution; and I am sorry to think that the poverty of my countrymen will not let the world suppose they have acted upon such a generous principle; yet upon this occasion I cannot but observe that there is a fatality in some nations to be fond of those who have treated them with the least humanity. Thus I have often heard the memory of Cromwell, who has depopulated, and almost wholly destroyed, this miserable country, celebrated like that of a saint, and at the same time the sufferings of the royal martyr turned into ridicule, and his murder justified even from the pulpit, and all this done with an intent to gain favour under a monarchy; which is a new strain of politics that I shall not pretend to account for.

Examine all the eastern towns of Ireland, and you will trace this horrid instrument of destruction, in defacing of churches, and particularly in destroying whatever was ornamental, either within or without them. We see in the several towns a very few houses scattered among the ruins of thousands, which he laid level with their streets; great numbers of castles, the country seats of gentlemen then in being still standing in ruin, habitations for bats, daws and owls, without the least repairs or succession of other buildings. Nor have the country churches, as far as my eyes could reach, met with any better treatment from him, nine in ten of them lying among their graves, and God only knows when they are to have a resurrection. When I passed from Dundalk, where this cursed usurper's handy-work is yet visible, I cast mine eyes around from the top of a mountain, from whence I had a wide and a waste prospect of several venerable ruins. It struck me with a melancholy, not unlike that expressed by Cicero in one of his letters, which being much upon the like prospect, and concluding with a very necessary reflection on the uncertainty of things in this world, I shall here insert a translation of what he says. In my return from Asia, as I sailed from Ægina towards Megara, I began to take a prospect of the several countries round me. Behind me was Ægina; before me Megara; on the right hand the Pyræus; and on the left was Corinth which towns were formerly in a most flourishing condition: now they lie prostrate and in ruin. Thus I began to think with myself: shall we, who have but a trifling existence, express any resentment, when one of us either dies a natural death or is slain, whose lives are necessarily of a short duration, when at one view I behold the carcases of so many great cities?

What if he had seen the natives of those free republics reduced to all the miserable consequences of a conquered people, living without the common defences against hunger and cold, rather appearing like spectres than men? I am apt to think that, seeing his fellow-creatures in ruin like this, it would have put him past all patience for philosophic reflection.

As for my own part, I confess that the sights and occurrences which I had in this my last journey so far transported me to a mixture of rage and compassion, that I am not able to decide which had the greater influence upon my spirits; for this new cant of a rich and flourishing nation was still uppermost in my thoughts, every mile I travelled giving me such ample demonstrations to the contrary. For this reason I have been at the pains to render a most exact and faithful account of all the visible signs of riches which I met with in sixty miles, riding through the most public roads, and the best part of the kingdom. First, as to trade; I met nine cars loaden with old, musty, shrivelled hides; one car-load of butter; four jockeys driving eight horses, all out of case; one cow and calf, driven by a man and his wife; six tattered families flitting to be shipped off to the West Indies; a colony of a hundred and fifty beggars, all repairing to people our metropolis, and by increasing the number of hands, to increase its wealth, upon the old maxim that people are the riches of a nation, and therefore ten thousand mouths, with hardly ten pair of hands, or hardly any work to employ them, will infallibly make us a rich and flourishing people. Secondly, travellers enough, but seven in ten wanting shirts and cravats; nine in ten going bare-foot, and carrying their brogues and stockings in their hands; one woman in twenty having a pillion, the rest riding bare-backed: above two hundred horsemen, with four pair of boots amongst them all; seventeen saddles of leather (the rest being made of straw); and most of their garrons only shod before. I went into one of the principal farmers' houses out of curiosity, and his whole furniture consisted of two blocks for stools, a bench on each side the fireplace made of turf, six trenchers, one bowl, a pot, six horn spoons, three noggins, three blankets, one of which served the man and maid-servant; the other the master of the family, his wife, and five children; a small churn, a wooden candlestick, a broken stick for a pair of tongs. In the public towns, one third of the inhabitants walking the street bare-foot; windows half built up with stone to save the expense of glass; the broken panes up and down supplied by brown paper, few being able to afford white; in some places they were stopped with hay or straw. Another mark of our riches are the signs at the several inns upon the road, viz., in some a staff stuck in the thatch with a turf at the end of it; a staff in a dunghill, with a white rag wrapped about the head; a pole, where they can afford it, with a beesom at the top; an oatmeal cake on a board in a window; and at the principal inns of the road, I have observed the signs taken down and laid against the wall near the door, being taken from their post to prevent the shaking of the house down by the wind. In short, I saw not one single house, in the best town I travelled through, which had not manifest appearances of beggary and want. I could give many more instances of our wealth, but I hope these will suffice for the end I propose.

It may be objected, what use it is of to display the poverty of the nation in the manner I have done. I answer, I desire to know for what ends, and by what persons, this new opinion of our flourishing state has of late been so industriously advanced: one thing is certain, that the advancers have either already found their own account, or have been heartily promised, or at least have been entertained with hopes, by seeing such an opinion pleasing to those who have it in their power to reward.

It is no doubt a very generous principle in any person to rejoice in the felicities of a nation, where themselves are strangers or sojourners: but if it be found that the same persons, on all other occasions, express a hatred and contempt of the nation and people in general, and hold it for a maxim, that the more such a country is humbled the more their own will rise, it need be no longer a secret why such an opinion, and the advancers of it, are encouraged. And besides, if the bailiff reports to his master that the ox is fat and strong, when in reality it can hardly carry its own legs, is it not natural to think that command will be given for a greater load to be put upon it?

No. XII.

Since our English friends have done us the honour to publish to their countrymen some of the pieces from this paper, we think ourselves obliged in justice to return the favour, by making the following tale from the "Country Journal," dated the 3rd of August, 1728, the subject of this day's entertainment.

FROM MY OWN CHAMBERS.

When I was a young man, I was very curious in collecting all the occasional state tracts, or pieces of poetry, which were published at that time; and upon looking them over, I find some which I believe my readers will think not altogether mal à propos at present. The following verses are of this kind, which appear plainly enough to be levelled at some pensionary parliament; but as the author of this little piece hath not sufficiently distinguished the characters which he designed to expose by any particular marks, so my memory will not enable me to explain the sentiments of the public on that occasion. However, as it seems to contain a good general moral, I have ventured to give it to my readers, and if it should happen to meet with any success, I may perhaps communicate others, which are not to be met with in any of the public miscellanies of those times.

THE PROGRESS OF PATRIOTISM. A TALE.

Vendidit HIC auro patriam.

Sir Ralph, a simple rural knight,
Could just distinguish wrong from right,
When he received a quarter's rent,
And almost half in taxes went:
He rail'd at places, bribes and pensions,
And secret service, new inventions;
Preached up the true old English spirit,
And mourn'd the great neglect of merit
Lamented our forlorn condition,
And wish'd the country would petition;
Said he would first subscribe his name,
And added 'twas a burning shame
That some men large estates should get,
And fatten on the public debt;

Of his poor country urg'd his love,
And shook his head at those above.

This conduct, in a private station,
Procur'd the knight great reputation;
The neighbours all approv'd his zeal,
(Though few men judge, yet all men feel,)
And with a general voice declar'd
Money was scarce, the times were hard;
That what Sir Ralph observ'd was true,
And wish'd the gallows had its due.

Thus blest in popular affection,
Behold there came on an election,
And who more proper than Sir Ralph
To guard their privileges safe?
So in return for zeal and beer,
They chose him for a knight o' the shire.

But mark how climates change the mind,
And virtue chops about like wind!
Duly the knight came up to town,
Resolv'd to pull corruption down,
Frequented clubs of the same party,
And in the cause continued hearty,
Broach'd his opinions, wet and dry,
And gave some honest votes awry.

At length, in that old spacious court,
Where members just at noon resort,
Up to our knight Sir Bluestring came,
And call'd him frankly by his name;
Smiled on him, shook him by the hand,
And gave him soon to understand,
That though his person was a stranger,
Yet that in times of greatest danger,
His faithful services were known,
And all his family's here in town,
For whom he had a great affection;
And wish'd him joy of his election,
Assur'd him that his country's voice
Could not have made a better choice.

Sir Ralph, who, if not much belied,
Had always some degrees of pride,
Perceiv'd his heart begin to swell,
And liked this doctrine mighty well;
Took notice of his air and look,
And how familiarly he spoke;
Such condescensions, such professions,
Remov'd all former ill impressions.

The statesman (who we must agree
Can far into our foibles see,
And knows exactly how to flatter
The weak blind sides of human nature)
Saw the vain wretch begin to yield,
And further thus his oil instill'd.

"Sir Ralph," said he, "all forms apart,
So dear I hold you at my heart,
Have such a value for your worth,
Your sense, and honour, and so forth,
That in some points extremely nice,
I should be proud of your advice;
Let me, good Sir, the favour pray
To eat a bit with me to-day:
Nay, dear Sir Ralph, you must agree"——
"Your honour's hour?"——"Exactly three."

These points premis'd, they bow and part
With hands pressed hard to either heart:
For now the public business calls
Each patriot to St. Stephen's walls,
Whether the present debts to state,
Or on some new supplies debate,
Would here be needless to relate.

From thence, at the appointed hour,
The knight attends the man of power;
Who, better to secure his ends,
Had likewise bid some courtly friends,
His brother Townly and his Grace,
Great statesmen both, and both in place:
Our British Horace famed for wit,
Alike for courts and senates fit;
Sir William, from his early youth,
Renown'd for honour, virtue, truth;
And Bubble, just restored to favour,
On pardon asked for late behaviour.

The statesman met his convert guest,
Saluted, clasped him to his breast,
Then introduced him to the rest.

Whilst he with wonder and amaze,
The splendour of the house surveys:
Huge china jars, and piles of plate,
And modish screens, and beds of state,
Gilt sconces of stupendous size,
And costly paintings strike his eyes,
From Italy and Flanders brought;
At the expense of nations bought;
Yet doth not one of these relate,
The tragic end of r——s of state;
Although such pictures might supply
Fit lessons to the great man's eye:
But o'ergrown fav'rites dread to think
From whence they rose, and how may sink.

Dinner now waited on the board,
Rich as this city would afford,
(For every element supplies
His table with its rarities.)
The guests promiscuous take their place,
Pro more, without form of grace:
There might the little knight be seen
With ribbons blue and ribbons green,
All complaisant and debonair,
As if the king himself were there.
Obsequious each consults his taste,
And begging to be served the last,
Points round by turn to every dish,
"Will you have soup Sir Ralph, or fish?
This frigasee or that ragout?
Pray, Sir, be free, and let me know."

The cloth removed, the glass goes round,
With loyal healths and wishes crown'd;
May king and senate long agree!
Success attend the ministry!
Let public faith and stocks increase!
And grant us, Heaven, a speedy peace!

Discourse ensues on home-bred rage,
That rank distemper of the age;
And instantly they all agree,
They never were so bless'd or free;
That all complaints were nought but faction,
And patriotism mere distraction,
Though full of reason, void of grace,
And only meant to get in place.

Sir Ralph in approbation bow'd;
Yet owned that with the giddy crowd,
He formerly had gone astray,
And talked in quite another way,
Possess'd with jealousies and fears,
Dispers'd by restless pamphleteers,
In libels weekly and diurnal;
Especially the "Country Journal;"*
But as he felt severe contrition,
He hoped his faults would find remission.

"Dear Sir," replied the Bluestring knight,
I'm glad you think affairs go right,

* From hence it appears that a paper was published under that name, long before this, in which we are at present engaged.

All errors past must be excus'd,
(Since the best men may be abus'd,)
What's in my power you may command:
Then shook him once more by the hand,
Gave him great hopes, (at least his word,)
That he should be a Treasury lord,
And to confirm his good intention,
At present order'd him a pension.

By these degrees, sir Ralph is grown
The stanchest tool in all the town,
At points and job-work never fails,
At all his old acquaintance rails;
Holds every doctrine now in fashion,
That debts are blessing to a nation;
That bribery under Whig direction,
Is needful to discourage faction;
That standing armies are most fitting
To guard the liberties of Britain;
That F——ce is her sincerest friend,
On whom she always should depend;
That ministers, by kings appointed,
Are, under them, the Lord's anointed;
Ergo, it is the self-same thing,
T' oppose a minister or king;
Ergo, by consequence of reason,
To censure statesman is high treason.
In fine, his standing creed is this;
That right or wrong, or hit or miss,
No mischiefs can befall a nation,
Under so wise a ministration;
That Britain is sir Bluestring's debtor,
And things did surely ne'er go better!

So the plain country girl, untainted,
Nor yet with wicked man acquainted,
Starts at the first lewd application,
Though warm perhaps by inclination,
And swears she would not with the king,
For all the world do such a thing:
But when with long assiduous art,
Damon hath once seduc'd her heart,
She learns her lesson in a trice,
And justifies the pleasing vice,
Calls it a natural, harmless passion,
Implanted from our first creation;
Holds there's no sin between clean sheets,
And lies with every man she meets.

LAMENTATIONS, CHAP. II. VER. 19.

ARISE, cry out in the night: in the beginning of the watches pour out thine heart like water before the face of the Lord: lift up thy hands towards him, for the life of thy young children that faint for hunger in the top of every street.

I do remember to have read an account, that an ode which Pindar writ in honour of the island Delos, was inscribed in the temple of Minerva at Athens, in large letters of gold. A public and very laudable acknowledgment for the poet's ingenuity, and for no more than a bare compliment! Such was the encouragement given by the great and public-spirited Athenians. Had the same poet, inspired by a noble and heroic ardour, by another ode awaked and roused their whole state against an invading enemy, or opened their eyes against any secret and wicked contrivers of their destruction, they would have erected him a statue at least. But, alas! that spirit is fled from the world and long since neglected. Virtue is become her own paymaster. My countrymen I hope will forgive me if I complain, there has been so little notice taken of a small but most excellent pamphlet, written by the drapier. It is entitled, "A Short View of the State of Ireland. There never was any treatise yet published with a zeal more generous for the universal good of a nation, or a design more seasonable, considering our present lamentable condition; yet we listen not to the voice of the charmer. Whereas it should have been inscribed in capital letters (as glorious as those of the poet) in the most public part of every corporation town throughout this whole kingdom, that people might behold the several unprovoked causes of their poverty, our offences towards heaven excepted. Nay, I will proceed further, and say that every head of every family ought to instruct the children so far in this most incomparable pamphlet, that they should not only understand, but be able to repeat by heart every single paragraph through the whole. This was the method laid down by the wisest lawgiver that ever the world produced, to gain the hearts of the people, by working upon their memories.

Deut. vi. 7.—And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up.

8. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes.

9. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates.

And where would be the great trouble, since we have little else to do, if every man would read a lecture of the "Short View" every day in his family after reading prayers? Nor do I think the expense would be extravagant if he should have every page of it reprinted to be hung up in frames in every chamber of his house. That it might be as evident as the handwriting on the wall.

And since I have ventured thus far to praise and recommend this most inimitable piece, let me speak a few words in favour of its author.

I would propose to my countrymen, before all their money goes off, (it is going as fast as possible,) to convert it into a few statues to the drapier in those memorable parts of this kingdom where our heroes have shone with the greatest lustre, in defence of our liberty and the Protestant religion, over all Europe: at Derry, at Enniskillen, at Boyne, at Aughrim. Nor would it be amiss to set up a few more about our metropolis, with that glorious inscription, Libertas et natale solum.

If our money were metamorphosed upon such a good occasion as this, it would not be in the power of any Cypselus,[a] to get into his own coffers, and it would be the only method to prevent its being carried off, except our viceroys should act like the Roman præfects, and run away with our very statues.

Courteous reader, mark well what follows. I am assured that it hath for some time been practised as a method of making men's court when they are asked about the rate of lands, the abilities of tenants, the state of trade and manufacture in this kingdom, and how their rents are paid, to answer, that in their neighbourhood all things are in a flourishing condition, the rent and purchase of land every day increasing. And if a gentleman happens to be a little more sincere in his representations, besides being looked on as not well affected, he is sure to have a dozen contradictors at his elbow. I think it is no manner of secret why these questions are so cordially asked, and so obligingly answered.

But since, with regard to the affairs of this kingdom,

[a] Cypselus, a governor of Corinth, who contrived a tax which brought all the money of that state to himself in ten years' time. —Vide "Aristot Polit."

I have been using all endeavours to subdue my indignation, to which indeed I am not provoked by any personal interest, being not the owner of one spot of ground in the whole island, I shall only enumerate by rules generally known and never contradicted, what are the true causes of any country's flourishing and growing rich, and then examine what effects arise from those causes, in the kingdom of Ireland.

The first cause of a kingdom's thriving is the fruitfulness of the soil to produce the necessaries and conveniences of life, not only sufficient for the inhabitants, but for exportation to other countries.

The second is the industry of the people, in working up all their native commodities, to the last degree of manufacture.

The third is the conveniency of safe ports and havens to carry out their own goods as much manufactured, and bring in those of others as little manufactured, as the nature of mutual commerce will allow.

The fourth is that natives should, as much as possible, export and import their goods in vessels of their own timber, made in their own country.

The fifth is the liberty of a free trade in all foreign countries which will permit them to export their goods over the world, except to those who are in war with their own prince or state.

The sixth is, by being governed only by laws made with their own consent, for otherwise they are not a free people. And therefore, all appeals for justice, or applications for favour or preferment to another country, are so many grievous impoverishments.

The seventh is, by improvement of land, encouragement of agriculture, and thereby increasing the number of their people, without which any country, however blessed by nature, must continue poor.

The eighth is, the residence of the princes, or chief administration of the civil power.

The ninth is, the concourse of foreigners for education, curiosity or pleasure, or as to a general mart of trade.

The tenth is, by disposing all offices of honour, profit or trust, only to the natives, or at least with very few exceptions, where strangers have long inhabited the country, and are supposed to understand and regard the interest of it as their own.

The eleventh is, when the rents of lands, and profits of employments are spent in the country which produced them, and not in another, the former of which will certainly happen, where the love of our native country prevails.

The twelfth is, by the public revenues, being all spent and employed at home, except on the occasions of a foreign war.

The thirteenth is, where the people are not obliged, unless they find it for their own interest or conveniency, to receive any moneys, except of their own coinage by a public mint, after the manner of all civilised nations.

The fourteenth is, a disposition of people of a country to wear their own manufactures, and import as few excitements to luxury, either in cloaths, furniture, food, or drink, as they possibly can live conveniently without.

There are many other causes of a nation's thriving, which I cannot at present recollect; but without advantage from at least some of these, after turning my thoughts a long time, I am not able to discover from whence our wealth proceeds, and therefore would gladly be better informed. In the mean time I will here examine what share falls to Ireland of these causes, or of the effects and consequences.

It is not my intention to complain, but barely to relate facts, and the matter is not of small importance. For it is allowed that a man who lives in a solitary house, far from help, is not wise in endeavouring to acquire in the neighbourhood the reputation of being rich, because those who come for gold, will go off with pewter and brass rather than return empty; and in the common practice of the world, those who possess most wealth make the least parade, which they leave to others who have nothing else to bear them out, in showing their faces on the exchange.

As to the first cause of a nation's riches, being the fertility of the soil, as well as temperature of the climate, we have no reason to complain; for although the quantity of unprofitable land in this kingdom, reckoning bog and rock, and barren mountain, be double in proportion to what it is in England, yet the native productions which both kingdoms deal in, are very near on equality in point of goodness, and might, with the same encouragement, be as well manufactured: I except mines and minerals, in some point of skill and industry. In the second, which is the industry of the people, our misfortune is not altogether owing to our own fault, but to a million of discouragements.

The conveniency of ports and havens which nature bestowed on us so liberally, is of no more use to us than a beautiful prospect to a man shut up in a dungeon.

As to shipping of its own, this kingdom is so utterly unprovided that, of all the excellent timber cut down within these fifty or sixty years, it can hardly be said that the nation hath received the benefit of one valuable house to dwell in or one ship to trade with.

Ireland is the only kingdom I ever heard or read of, either in ancient or modern story, which was denied the liberty of exporting their native commodities and manufactures wherever they pleased, except to countries at war with their own prince or state; yet this, by the superiority of mere power, is refused us in the most momentous parts of commerce; besides an act of navigation to which we never consented, pinned down upon us and rigorously executed, and a thousand other unexampled circumstances, as grievous as they are invidious to mention. To go on to the rest:—

It is too well known that we were forced to obey some laws we never consented to, which is a condition I must not call by its true uncontroverted name, for fear of my L—— C—— J—— W——d's ghost, with his "Libertas et natale solum," written as a motto on his coach, as it stood at the door of the court, while he was perjuring himself to betray both. Thus we are in the condition of patients, who have physic sent them by doctors at a distance, strangers to their constitution, and the nature of the disease; and thus we are forced to pay 500 per cent. to decide our properties, in all which we have likewise the honour to be distinguished from the whole race of mankind.

As to improvement of land, those few who attempt that, or planting, through covetousness or want of skill, generally leave things worse than they were, neither succeeding in trees nor hedges, and by running into the fancy of grazing, after the manner of the Scythians, are every day depopulating the country.

We are so far from having a king to reside among us, that even the viceroy is generally absent four-fifths of his time in the government.

No strangers from other countries make this a part of their travels where they can expect to see nothing but scenes of misery and desolation.

Those who have the misfortune to be born here have the least title to any considerable employment, to which they are seldom preferred but upon a political consideration.

One-third part of the rents of Ireland is spent in England, which, with the profit of employments, pensions, appeals, journeys of pleasure or health, education at the inns of courts, and both universities, remittances at pleasure, the pay of superior officers in the army and other incidents, will amount to a full half of the income of the whole kingdom, all clear profit to England.

We are denied the liberty of coining gold, silver, or even copper. In the Isle of Man they coin their own silver, every petty prince, vassal to the emperor, can coin what money he pleaseth. And in this, as in most of the articles already mentioned, we are an exception to all other states or monarchies that were ever known in the world.

As to the last or fourteenth article, we take special care to act diametrically contrary to it in the whole course of our lives. Both sexes, but especially the women, despise and abhor to wear any of their own manufactures, even those which are better made than in other countries, particularly a sort of silk plaid, through which the workmen are forced to run a gold thread, that it may pass for Indian. Even ale and potatoes in great quantity are imported from England as well as corn, and our foreign trade is little more than importation of French wine, for which I am told we pay ready money.

Now if all this be true, upon which I could easily enlarge, I would be glad to know by what secret method it is that we grow a rich and flourishing people, with liberty, trade, manufactures, inhabitants, money or the privilege of coining, without industry, labour, or improvement of lands, and with more than half of the rent and profits of the whole kingdom annually exported, for which we receive not a single farthing: and to make up all this, nothing worth mentioning, except the linen of the north, a trade casual, corrupted, and at mercy, and some butter from Cork. If we do flourish, it must be against every law of nature and reason, like the thorn at Glassenbury, that blossoms in the midst of winter.

Let the worthy C------rs who come from England, ride round the kingdom, and observe the face of nature, or the faces of the natives; the improvement of the land; the thriving, numerous plantations; the noble woods; the abundance and vicinity of country-seats; the commodious farmers'-houses, and barns; the towns and villages, where everybody is busy, and thriving with all kind of manufactures; the shops full of goods wrought to perfection, and filled with customers; the comfortable diet, and dress, and dwellings of the people; the vast number of ships in our harbours and docks, and shipwrights in our seaport towns; the roads crowded with carriers laden with rich manufactures; the perpetual concourse to and fro of pompous equipages.

With what envy and admiration would these gentlemen return from so delightful a progress! What glorious reports would they make when they went back to England!

But my heart is too heavy to continue this irony longer, for it is manifest, that whatever stranger took such a journey, would be apt to think himself travelling in Lapland, or Iceland, rather than in a country so favoured by nature as ours, both in fruitfulness of soil and temperature of climate. The miserable dress, and diet, and dwelling of the people; the general desolation in most parts of the kingdom; the old seats of the nobility and gentry all in ruins, and no new ones in their stead; the families of farmers who pay great rents, living in filth and nastiness upon buttermilk and potatoes, without a shoe or stocking to their feet, or a house so convenient as an English hogsty to receive them: these indeed may be comfortable sights to an English spectator, who comes for a short time, only to learn the language, and return back to his own country, whither he finds all our wealth transmitted.

Nostra miseria magnus es.

There is not one argument used to prove the riches of Ireland, which is not a logical demonstration of its poverty. The rise of our rents is squeezed out of the very blood and vitals, and cloaths, and dwellings of the tenants, who live worse than English beggars. The lowness of interest, in all other countries a sign of wealth, is in us a proof of misery, there being no trade to employ any borrower. Hence alone comes the dearness of land, since the savers have no other way to lay out their money. Hence the dearness of necessaries for life, because the tenants cannot afford to pay such extravagant rates for land (which they must take or go a-begging) without raising the price of cattle, and of corn, although they should live upon chaff. Hence our increase of buildings in this city, because workmen have nothing to do, but employ one another, and one half of them are infallibly undone. Hence the daily increase of bankers, who may be a necessary evil in a trading country, but so ruinous in ours, who for their private advantage have sent away all our silver, and one-third of our gold; so that, within three years past, the running cash of the nation, which was about 500,000*l.*, is now less than 200,000*l.*, and must daily diminish unless we have liberty to coin, as well as that important kingdom the Isle of Man, and the meanest prince in the German empire, as I before observed.

I have sometimes thought that this paradox of the kingdom growing rich is chiefly owing to those worthy gentlemen, the bankers, who, except some custom-house officers, birds of passage, oppressive thrifty squires, and a few others that shall be nameless, are the only thriving people among us; and I have often wished that a law were enacted to hang up half a dozen bankers every year, and thereby interpose, at least, some short delay to the further ruin of Ireland.

"Ye are idle!—ye are idle!" answered Pharaoh to the Israelites, when they complained to his majesty that they were forced to make bricks without straw.

England enjoys every one of these advantages for enriching a nation, which I have above enumerated, and into the bargain a good million returned to them every year without labour, or hazard, or one farthing value received on our side: but how long we shall be able to continue the payment I am not under the least concern. One thing I know, that when the hen is starved to death, there will be no more golden eggs.

I think it a little unhospitable, and others may call it a subtle piece of malice, that, because there may be a dozen families in this town able to entertain their English friends in a generous manner at their tables, their guests, upon their return to England, shall report that we wallow in riches and luxury.

Yet I confess I have known an hospital, where all the household officers grew rich, while the poor, for whose sake it was built, were almost starving, for want of food and raiment.

To conclude, if Ireland be a rich and flourishing kingdom, its wealth and prosperity must be owing to certain causes, which are yet concealed from the whole race of mankind, and the effects are equally invisible. We need not wonder at strangers, when they deliver such paradoxes; but a native and inhabitant of this kingdom, who gives the same verdict, must be either ignorant to stupidity, or a man-pleaser at the expense of all honour, conscience, and truth.
